5) Jamadagni getting the bow of Viṣṇu. Once the devas (gods) desired to know who, of Śiva and Viṣṇu was the more powerful. They informed Brahmā of their desire. Brahmā asked Viṣvakarmā to make two tremendous bows. He gave one to Śiva and the other to Viṣṇu. The bow which Viṣṇu got was known as Vaishā- vacāpā and that which Śiva got was known as Śaiva- vacāpā. After this Brahmā caused enmity between Śiva and Viṣṇu. A terrible battle ensued between Śiva and Viṣṇu. After a while the Śaiva- vacāpā became less effective. At the request of the devas, the fight was stopped. The devas decided that Viṣṇu was superior to Śiva, in power. Śiva got angry at this decision and gave his bow to Devarāja Janaka, the King of Videha. It was this bow that Śrī Rāma broke at the marriage of Sitā.

Seeing that Śiva had given away his cāpā (bow) Mahāviṣṇu gave his bow to his devotee, the hermit Reška. That Vaishāvacāpā cāpā was given to Jamadagni by Reška. Thus the famous Vaishāvacāpā cāpā arrived at the hermitage of Jamadagni. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Sarga 75).

6) Reṣukā was killed. Parāṣūrāma became fourteen years old. Jamadagni went to the forest to gather fruits, roots etc. After completing the cleansing work of the hermitage, leaving Parāṣūrāma in the forest, Reṣukā went to the bank of the river Narmadā (Revā) to fetch water. When she reached the river, Kārta- vīryārjuna and his wives were playing in water. She waited for them to go. When they were gone she got into the river. But as the water was muddy because of the play, she walked a little to the east where there was pure water. She saw there Gītraratha the King of Śālva playing with his wife in the water. How beautiful they were! She had never seen such beautiful a woman or so handsome a man. She stood there looking at them for a while. When she reached the hermitage with water, Jamadagni had already returned a long while ago. He had returned weary and tired of the heat of the midday-sun. He did not see his wife in the hermitage. He had been sitting very angry when Reṣukā returned with water. She put the pot down and bowed before her husband and told him the reason for her being late. When he heard the reason his anger blazed. He called his sons one by one and ordered them to kill her. But the four elder sons did not dare to execute his order saying that slaughter of a woman was a great sin. But Parāṣūrāma came forward and by a cutting-arrow cut off the head of her mother. The father called the four sons who disobeyed him and cursed them thus:

"Since you have disobeyed the order of your father, because of your ignorance, you shall become foresters and live in forest."

Being overwhelmed with sorrow at the death of his mother, Parāṣūrāma swooned and fell down. When his anger subsided, discretion dawned on Jamadagni. He aroused his son and took him on his lap and asked him what boon he wanted for having accomplished the unaccomplishable task. Parāṣūrāma’s request was that his mother should be brought to life again. The hermit was pleased and he brought Reṣukā to life again. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 60).

7) The sun gate Jamadagni an umbrella and sandals. See under the word Cripā (Sandals).

8) The temptation of Dharma. See under the word ‘Dharma’ Para 6.

9) Jamadagni was killed. Once Kārtavīryārjuna, with his minister Candragupta and some attendants had been hunting in the forests on the banks of the river Narmadā. It was noon. The hunters grew tired of hunger and thirst. They came to the hermitage of Jamadagni. The hermit called his divine cow Susīlā and ordered her to give food to the King and his party. Within a few seconds meals were got ready for thousands of people. The King and his attendants had a feast. On their return journey the wonderful cow Susīlā was the subject of their talk. The King wanted to get the cow which possessed divine power. So he sent his minister Candragupta to the hermitage of Jamadagni with instructions to get the cow Susīlā in exchange for a crore of cows or even half of the kingdom. But the hermit was not prepared to give the cow. The minister and his men caught the cow by force and went away. The hermit, filled with grief, followed the party a long way through the forest, and requested Candragupta to return the cow. Candragupta got angry and struck him to death, and took the cow to the palace, in the capital city of Māhīṣmati. After waiting for a long time, Reṣukā started in search of her husband. She saw Jamadagni lying almost dead, in a pool of blood. She fell down and beating her breast cried aloud. Parāṣūrāma with Akṛtavrana and other disciples came there. When she saw her son Parāṣūrāma, she beat her breast twenty-one times and cried. Parāṣūrāma, took an oath that since his mother beat her breast twenty-one times and cried, he would travel around twenty-one times and put an end to the Kṣatriya Kings. After that they took the dead body of Jamadagni and placed it on fire, and began to sing the song of Viṣṇu. Then the hermit Śukra came by that way and with the help of Mṛtasunāvīni brought Jamadagni to life again. The lost cow Susīlā also returned without her calf. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 69; M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 49).

10) Death of Jamadagni. Parāṣūrāma and Akṛtavrana went to the city of Māhīṣmati with the intention of bringing the calf of Susīlā back. They stood at the gate of the city and challenged Kārtavīryārjuna for a... fight. Kārtavīryārjuna came out with his army. In the battle which ensued, Kārtavīrya and his sons and most of his warriors fell dead. Parasurāma and Ākṛtvāraṇa returned with the calf. Jamadagni asked Parasurāma to go to Mahendra-giri and do penance in order to mitigate the sin of killing a large number of people. When Parasurāma had gone for penance, Śurasena a son of Kārtavīryārjuna came with his men to the hermitage, cut off the head of Jamadagni and took it away. Parasurāma and the disciples of Jamadagni placed the dead body of Jamadagni on the pyre and burnt it. Reṇūkā jumped into that fire and died. After this Parasurāma began his twentyone tours for the extermination of the Kṣatriya Kings. (Brahmāda Purāṇa, Chapter 86).

11) Other information. (1) Udayana grew up in the hermitage of Jamadagni. (See under Udayana).

(2) Jamadagni was one of the hundred sons of Rṣiṇi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Stanza 45).

(3) Jamadagni was one of the hermits, who visited Śrī Rāma on his return from forest life. The hermits who came to Ayodhya from the North were, Kaśyapa, Bharadvāja, the Sanakas, Sarabhaṅga, Durvasas, Mataṅga, Viśbhāṅdaka, Tumburu and the Saptarṣis (the seven hermits). Utarā Rāmāyaṇa).

(4) Jamadagni was present at the Jānmotsava (birth celebration) of Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 51).

(5) This hermit is a luminary in the assembly of Brahmā. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 22).

(6) During the time of the battle of Mahābhārata, Jamadagni entered Kurukṣetra and advised Drona to stop the battle. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 190, Stanza 35).

(7) Jamadagni once delivered a speech on the bad sides of accepting rewards, to the King Vṛṣādārbi. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 93, Stanza 44).

(8) Jamadagni vowed that he was innocent in the affair of the sealing of Agastyya’s lotus. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 94, Stanza 25).

12) The Names of Jamadagni. Ārṣikā, Bhārgava, Bhārgavanaṇdana, Bhṛguvaṅḍula, Bhṛgvaṅḍula, Bhṛgvaṅḍulamśa Rṣikaputra are the names used by Vyāsa to denote Jamadagni, in Bhārata.

JĀMAGHA. A King of the family of Yayāti. (Bhāga-vata, Skanda 9).

JĀMBĀVĀN. A monkey of extraordinary might. He was the minister of Sugrīva.

1) Birth. When the troubles and hardships caused by the wickedness of Rāvaṇa became unbearable the goddess Earth and the Devas approached Brahmā for redress. Brahmā took them to the sea of Milk. Mahāviṣṇu heard everything and said that he would incarnate as the son of Daśaratha and would kill Rāvaṇa. Brahmā was directed to create monkeys to help him on that occasion. Accordingly Brahmā created Jāmbāvān and several other monkeys.

There are two stories about the birth of Jāmbāvān in the Purāṇas.

(1) Brahmā sat for a long time thinking about the creation of monkeys. Then he wanted to yawn, for which he opened the mouth and instantly Jāmbāvān came out from inside Brahmā through the open mouth. “I have already created Jāmbāvān the noble bear, who jumped out of my mouth when I yawned.” (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Sarga 17, Stanza 6).

(2) One day time of Brahmā ended and the night had advanced two yāmas (six hours). The Madhu-kaṭiṭhas born of the ear-wax of Mahāviṣṇu began to create trouble and commotion in the waters of the great flood. They saw a lotus on the surface of water. Seeing Brahmā in it they challenged him for fight. Hearing their shouting and the challenge Brahmā became afraid of the asuras. His middle face began to sweat. The sweat flowed through his cheeks and reached the loins. Jāmbāvān came into being from that sweat. So he got the name Ambujāta, (born from the water of sweat). As he was the first person who entered the country of Jāmbūnada he was called Jāmbāvān. As he was born when there was no universe or time his age or date of birth could not be ascertained. At the time of Śrī Rāma Jāmbāvān was six Manvantaras (age of a Manu) and for hundred and sixtyfour Caturyugas (a period of four yugas) old. (The present age is the twentyeighth Caturyuga of the seventh Manu). Jāmbāvān had witness all the incarnations from Matsya to Śrī Rāma. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa Pūrva Kāṇḍa).

2) Jāmbāvān and the incarnation of Śrī Rāma. During the time of Śrī Rāma Jāmbāvān was the minister of Sugrīva. It is stated in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindha Kāṇḍa, Sarga 41, that Nila, the son of Agni, Hanūmāṇ, Jāmbāvān, Suhotra, Sarāri, Saragulma, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śuṣeṇa, Rṣabha, Mainda, Dvivida, Vijaya, Gandhamadāna, Ulikāmkha, Asaṅa, Aṅgada and others were the ministers of Sugrīva.

The monkeys who went to the south in search of Sītā, reached the sea shore. The question was how to jump over the sea to Lakṣā. Each of them came forward to show his ability and admitted failure. Finally Jāmbāvān called Hanūmāṇ to him and advised him to jump over to Lakṣā. Hanūmāṇ who was not aware of his own powers, refused. Jāmbāvān told him about his birth, self-power, attainment of boons etc. Hanūmāṇ became convinced of his powers at the words of Jāmbāvān and jumped over the sea to Lakṣā. (Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindha Kāṇḍa).

3) Jāmbhāṇa and the incarnation of Vāmana. Jāmbāvān walked round Mahāviṣṇu, who incarnated as Vāmana to curb the powers of Mahābali. At that time Jāmbāvān was immensely strong. But by the time of the incarnation of Śrī Rāma his strength had decreased much. Hear what he said to the monkeys who assembled on the sea shore to go in search of Sītā.

“My abilities in olden times were not what you see now. In the far old days, I had walked round that Eternal Being Viṣṇu when he measured three steps at the sacrifice of Mahābali. Now, I am very old and have not enough strength to jump over the sea.” (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindhā kāpada, Sarga 65).
JAMBAVATI

4) Jāmbavān and the incarnation of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The long-living Jāmbavān who had witnessed nine out of the ten incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu is seen in connection with the precious stone Syamantaka, in the incarnation of Kṛṣṇa. The Sun-god gave this jewel Syamantaka to King Śatruṭija. His younger brother Prasena wore it and went to the forest for hunting. A lion killed him and took the jewel in his mouth and was going along the forest when Jāmbavān killed it and took the jewel. It was rumoured that Śrī Kṛṣṇa had killed Prasena and taken the jewel. So Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in search of the jewel to the forest, defeated Jāmbavān and took the jewel, and returned it to Śatruṭija. Śrī Kṛṣṇa married Jāmbavati the daughter of Jāmbavān. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

5) Jāmbavān became old for ever. At the time of the incarnation of Vāmanā, Jāmbavān was very strong and valiant. When Vāmana brought under control the three worlds by measuring three steps Jāmbavān travelled throughout the three worlds carrying the news everywhere. Within three moments Jāmbavān travelled eighteen times through the three worlds. In this travel of lightning-speed the end of the nail of his toe touched the highest peak of Mahāmeru, who considered it as an insult and said “You are arrogant of your speed and youth. Hereafter your body will not reach where your mind reaches and you shall be ever old.” Because of this curse Jāmbavān became old and unable to carry out what he wished. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Yudhā Kāndā).

JAMBĀVATI. Daughter of the famous Jāmbavān. Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in search of the famous precious stone Syamantaka which was lost when Prasena wore it and went to the forest for hunting. Kṛṣṇa found it in the cave of Jāmbavān, who fought with him and was defeated. Finally he gave his daughter Jāmbavati to Śrī Kṛṣṇa as wife, and the jewel Syamantaka as dowry. Śrī Kṛṣṇa came to his capital Dvārakā with his wife Jāmbavati. When sons were born to the other wives of Kṛṣṇa she became sad and requested her husband that sons may be born to her also. On hearing this request Kṛṣṇa went to the mountain where the hermit Upamanyu was engaged in penance. With that hermit who was an ardent devotee of Śiva, as his teacher, Kṛṣṇa began a penance before Śiva, in accordance with his (Upamanyu’s) advice. The penance, holding yogadaṇḍa and Kapāla (devotee’s staff and skull) lasted for a month. In the second month penance was performed standing on one leg and drinking only water. In the third month he did penance standing on toes only and using air as food. After six months Paramaśiva appeared and blessed him that his wives would have ten sons each. Accordingly Jāmbavati gave birth to her first son who was named Śāmba. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 8).

JAMBHA. A Dayīya (Asura). He was the chief among those who snatched away Amṛta from the hands of Dhanvantari. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 3).

In the Purāṇas several Asuras (demons) bearing the name Jambha are mentioned. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Dākṣiṇātyapātha, Chapter 38, that Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed an Asura named Jambha. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 98, Stanza 49 that the teacher Śukra refused to help a Jambha whom Indra killed later. It occurs in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 102, Stanza 24, that Mahāviṣṇu had killed an asura called Jambha. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 2, that a group of Jambhāsuras, who had undergone training under Rāvana, once attacked Hanūmān. Another Jambhāsura had been killed by Arjuna, as stated in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 49. All these Dānavas (Asuras) were sons of Kaśyapa born of his wife Danu.

JAMBHAKA. A Kaśtriya King. This King was killed in battle by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. He had a son who, later became King but was killed by Sahadeva in his conquest of the countries. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 7).

JAMBŪ. A tree which stands on the southern side of the mount Mahāmeru. This tree bears fruits and flowers throughout the year irrespective of the seasons. This tree is watered by the Siddhacāraṇas. The branches of this tree reach the realm of heaven. The place in which this tree stands is known as Jambūdvīpa. The ripe fruits as big as elephants fall down and are broken. The juice oozing from them flows as a big stream. This is called the river Jambū. It flows through the southern part of the country known as llāvṛtta. The goddess who lives on the bank of this big river is known as Jambvādini. She is very fond of Jambū fruit. This goddess who loves everything in the world, is worshipped by the gods, nāgas (snakes), the hermits and sages, Rākṣasas (giants) and every body in the world with devotion. Even by the mere thinking of her she could be pleased. She destroys the sins and increases the purity of people. She cures all the diseases and gives people, health, wealth, long life, prosperity and happiness.

The juice of the Jambū fruit when mixed with soil and acted upon by water, air and sun’s rays, turns into a kind of gold called Jambūnada. The dcvas, Vidyādhars etc. use this gold to make ornaments for their women. This gold is superior to other kinds of gold. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 8).

JAMBŪDVĪPA. One of the Purānicely famous Saptadvīpas (seven continents). These seven continents are embankments separating the seven seas. Jambūdvīpa, Krauṇḍadvīpa, Śākadvīpa and Puṣkaradvīpa are included in the seven islands.

Jambūdvīpa has an area of one lakh of yojanas. The island is round like a lotus flower. There are eight long mountain ranges which divide the island into nine countries, which look like nine petals of the lotus flower. Each of these nine countries has an area of nine thousand yojanas. The two countries of the north and south extremities are bowshaped. Four of the remaining seven are longer than the rest. The central country is square. This country is known as llāvṛtta, at the centre of which there is the mountain Sumeru with a height of one lakh of yojanas. This is called Svarṇaparvata (The mountain of gold). The top of this mountain is a great flat place with an area of thirty thousand yojanas. This great plain is ten thousand yojanas above the ground level. On the northern part of llāvṛtta lie the three mountain ranges of Nilagiri, Svetagiri and Śrīgāvan, and midway between them the three countries called Rāmyaka, Hiraṇmaya and Kuru. On the southern part of llāvṛta, there are three mountains of Nīṣadh, Hemakūṭa and Hīṃlaya and three countries Harivarṣa, Kimpuruṣa and Bhārata. The mountain Mālyavān lies to the west and Gandhamādana to the east of llāvṛta. There are two countries Ketumāla and Bhadrāśva having an area of two thousand yojanas each with the two mountains Nila and Nīṣadha as boundaries. At the foot of the mountain Mahāmeru, there are the mountains of Mandara, Meru, Supārśvaka, Kumuda and many others. On those mountains big trees like nāvāl (syzygium jambolanum) Mākanda (Mango tree) Kaṭambū (Nauka Candamba) bāyān etc. grow in plenty. On the top of these mountains there are four lakes, full of milk, honey, juice of sugarcane and sweet water. The devas become prosperous by the touch of the water of these lakes. Besides these parks there are four heavenly parks known as Nandana, Caitrārathā, Vaibhārāja and Sarvabhadra. The women folk of the devas (gods) and Gandharvas (demi-gods) play in these parks, which are convenient for couples to carry on lustful play. A river is formed there, by the juice oozing from the fallen mango fruits. The river is purple coloured and is called Arūṇānadī (river Aruṇā). The goddess named Arūṇā lives here. The famous Jambū tree is in this Jambūdvīpa. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 8).

JAMBUKA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 74).

JAMBUKA. (JAMBUMALIK). A Śūdra Sage. The child of a brahmin died when Śrī Rāma, after his twelve years’ exile in forest had returned to Ayodhya and was ruling the country in an ideal manner. The brahmin and his wife carried the dead body of their child to the palace with loud lamentations. Everybody felt surprised how there could be child-death in the land when the King was ruling it in the most dhārmic (righteous) manner. Then did Nārada, who was present in the assembly, point out that in a corner of Rāmarāya a Śūdra Sage was doing tapas and that it was the reason for the untimely death of the brahmin child. At once Śrī Rāma set out in search of the Śūdra Sage after directing Śatrughna to see that no enemy entered the country, and asking Lakṣmaṇa to take care of the dead body of the brahmin child. After a rather detailed search Śrī Rāma found Jambuka at the mountain called Śālām doing tapas hanging from the branch of a tree on his legs with head down. He told Śrī Rāma that he was the Śūdra Sage called Jambuka and was performing tapas thus so that he might ascend to heaven in his very body. Śrī Rāma at once cut off the head of the Śūdra Sage, who attained, as soon as Rāma’s sword fell on him, mokṣa (salvation), and the dead child of the brahmin returned to life again. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

JAMBUKESVARA. Name of an idol of Śiva (Lingga) installed in Mysore. The Śiva linga installed in the Jambukeshvara temple in Mysore. Jambū is a fruit tree. There is a story about how Śiva happened to come under this tree. Once upon a time this place was full of Jambū trees, and a recluse performing a penance under a Jambū tree got a fruit of it. Attracted, so to say, by the sanctity of the fruit the recluse submitted it first as an offering to Lord Śiva, and only after that he ate it. As a result of the fruit germinated in the stomach of the sage grew up into a tree and emerged into light and air bursting his head open. Elated at this the sage danced before God, who asked him to return to the place from where he got the fruit. Accordingly he returned to Tiruvānākovil and continued his penance. Please so much with the Sage Śiva followed him and sat under the tree. From that day onwards Śiva came to be called Jambunātha. To this day Jambunātha sits under the Jambū tree.

Later, a temple came to be built there under the following circumstances. A controversy arose between Mālyavān and Puspadanta, two of the Bhūtaagānas of Śiva, as to who cherished more devotion to the Lord. The controversy developed into a quarrel and Puspadanta cursed Mālyavān into a spider, and Mālyavān cursed Puspadanta into an elephant. Now, when the mutual curse took effect, wisdom dawned on both Mālyavān and Puspadanta, and they took refuge in the Lord for redemption from the curse. The Lord sent both of them to the Cola country, and after wandering about in different parts of the country both of them came to Jambukēvara, and lived there worshipping God. The elephant used to bathe daily in sacred tirthas, bring holy water in its trunk and make an offering of it to the Lord. As for the spider it wove a net above the head of the Lord, so that dry leaves did not fall on it. The elephant used to daily sweep off the net above the head of the Lord and make his offering of the water thereon. But, the spider would again weave the net. Thus their quarrel continued. One day the spider, in great anger, got into the trunk of the elephant and bit it hard. Due to unbearable pain it smashed its trunk on a granite stone and fell down dead. At this God appeared and blessed both of them. The Lord also said that the sacred spot would come to be known as Tiruvānā-Kovil (āna=elephant; Kovil=temple) in memory of Puspadanta who had taken the form of the elephant. The spider was told that he would be born in the Cola dynasty and carry on for long years many good acts. Accordingly Mālyavān was born as the son of Subhadeva, the Cola king and Kamalāvatī, his queen, and ruled the land for many years under the name King Cēkaṅga. He it was who built the Jambukēvara temple. (Tiruvānākāvū Purāṇa).

JAMBUMALI. A Rākṣasa (giant) who was the son of Prahasta. Hanumān killed this Rākṣasa in a fight, when he went to Lāukā in search of Sītā. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa Sundarākāṇḍa, Sarga 44).

JAMBUMALIK. See under Jambuka.

JAMBUMARGA. An ancient holy place. If one visits this place one will attain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Aśvamedha (horse sacrifice). (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 62).

JAMBUNADA I. A mountain. The river Ganges flows through the valley of this mountain which is connected with Mahāmeru. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 16).

JAMBUNADA II. A golden mountain which stands in the place called Uṣirábhī. A King named Marutta
JAMBOÑADA III 344

JAMBOÑADA. III. Gold is formed from the river Jambū which flows through Jambūdvipa (the island Jambū). The gold is called Jambūnada, according to Mahābhārata, Bīṣma Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 26.

JAMBOÑADA IV. A son of Janamejaya, a King of the dynasty of Pūru. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Stanza 56).

A MBŪNADI. A famous river. (See under Jambūdvipa).

JANADEVĀ. A Janaka King who ruled over Mithilā (Śānti Parva, Chapter 218, Verse 3).

1) Mahāvīṣṇu, once in the guise of a brahmin, tested the King and pleased with him granted him certain boons. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 219).

2) None of the 100 ācāryas in his court could answer his questions about salvation satisfactorily. But, Paścaśīkha, who casually came to the palace advised the King about the means to attain salvation. (Śānti Parva Chapter 211).

JANAKA. 1) Genealogy. Janaka was descended from Viṣṇu in the following order: Brāhma, Marici, Kaśyapa, Vivasvān, Vaivasvata, Ikṣvākū, Nimi, Mithi, Udāvasu, Nandivardhana, Suketu, Devarāta, Bhadratha, Mahāvīra, Sudhṛti, Dhṛṣṭaketu, Haryāśva, Maru, Pratvantaka, Kirtiratha, Devamūḍha, Vībudha, Mahīdhra, Kirtirātra, Mahāroman, Svararoman, Hrasvaroman, Śrīradhvaja (Janaka).

2) Janaka dynasty. Daṇḍa, Vikuṣi and Nimi were the three prominent sons of Ikṣvākū. The dynasty of Vikuṣi earned a reputation as the cradle of such powerful kings as Vikuṣi, Kratha, Mândhatā, Tri'āṅku, Hariścandra, Sagara and Bhagiratha. Sri Rāma also was born in Vikuṣi’s dynasty. It was Nimi, the younger brother of Vikuṣi who founded the Videha dynasty. There is a story about that dynasty getting the name, Videha. Nimi decided to conduct a yajña and requested Vasishṭa to act as high priest at the yajña. Vasishṭha, who then was busy with the affairs of another yajña asked Nimi to postpone his proposed yajña to a later date. To this Nimi made no answer, and Vasishṭha went away under the impression that his suggestion had been accepted by Nimi. Accordingly, as soon as he got free from other preoccupations Vasishṭa went to Nimi to conduct his yajña. But, Nimi had already performed the Yajña with Gautama as high priest. Enraged at this Vasishṭa cursed Nimi that he should lose his body and become Videha (without body). As the result of the curse Nimi fell down dead. As Nimi had no sons living the Rāja churned out of his body a child. As the child was got by mathana (churning) he was named Mithi Janaka. After that all kings born in Mithi’s dynasty began using the common name Janaka. The actual name of Janaka, father of Sītā, was Śrīradhvaja. Mithilā or Mithilāpurī was the city founded by Mithi. From the time of the curse pronounced on Nimi the kings of that dynasty also came to be known as Videha, and the country they ruled Videha. (See Nimi). (Devī Bhāgavata, 6th Skanda).

3) Brother of Śrīradhvaja. Śrīradhvaja, the father of Sītā had a brother called Kuśadhvaja. While Śrīradhvaja was the King of Mithilā the King of Sāṅkāśya called Sudhanvan attacked Mithilā. Śrīradhvaja killed Sudhanvan in the war and crowned his brother Kuśadhvaja as the King of Sāṅkāśya. Lakṣmaṇa’s wife Ῥūmiṭā was Kuśadhvaja’s daughter. Kuśadhvaja had three daughters called Māndavī, Ῥūmiṭā and Sūradhvika. Bharata married Māndavī and Sūradhvika married Sūradhvika. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa; Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāṇḍa, Canto 71).

4) Birth of Sītā. At a time when Śrīradhvaja had no issues a girl emerged from the furrows of the ploughed earth, and Śrīradhvaja felt the desire to bring up the child as his own daughter. And, a celestial voice, “Oh! Śrīradhvaja! It is your own daughter” clinched the issue for the King. That daughter was Sītā. Śrīradhvaja—Janaka—accordingly brought up Sītā as his own daughter. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Ayodhyā Kāṇḍa, Canto 10).

5) Janaka got Śramaṇa. See under Jamadagni.

6) Janaka and Kaikeyi. See under Aśṭāvakra.

7) Janaka and Aśṭāvakra. See under Aśṭāvakra.

8) Janaka in Yamālakō. King Janaka once, by his yogic powers cast off his physical body. A vimāna (aerial chariot) from Devaloka arrived to carry Janaka’s soul there. On his way to Devaloka Janaka approached Kālapūrī where innumerable sinners were being tortured in the various hells. When they breathed the air which had come in contact with Janaka’s body, they got much relief from their tortures and the fire of hell now became cool and pleasing to them. When Janaka was about to go away the inmates of hell begged him not to leave them in that condition. He thought to himself thus: “If these beings get some comfort or happiness from my presence I shall surely stay here in Kālapūrī, which will be my svarga (heaven).” Thinking thus, Janaka the most righteous of souls stopped there. And then Kāla arrived there to determine suitable punishments to the various kinds of sinners, and seeing Janaka there, asked why he, the most virtuous and the purest of souls, waited there, Janaka explained his reason for standing there and added that he would quit the place only if Kāla released all those people from hell. On hearing Janaka’s answer Kāla pointed out to him one by one the sinners who were being tortured in hell and explained things as follows:— “Look here, that fellow there had seduced the wife of his most intimate friend, and that is why he is tied to a red hot iron bar for 10,000 years. After those 10,000 years he would be born in a pig’s womb, and when he is born among human beings it would be as a eunuch. The other fellow there forcibly kissed another man’s wife, and so he has to be roasted in Raurava hell for hundred years. That other fellow is put into this vessel filled with blood and pus with both his hands cut off as he had stolen other people’s property. This fellow did not speak even a word of welcome to a tired and hungry man who sought his hospitality at night. That is why he has been thrown into thick darkness, and there, for a hundred years, he must undergo the additional suffering of wasp-bite. As for this man he had in a loud voice found fault with another man, and this other fellow is his friend who listened to those vilifications attentively. And, that is the reason why both of them have been pushed into this unusual well. So, all those people have to suffer for their sins. You, King Janaka, who did only righteous acts will please go away from this accursed place.” Janaka asked Kāla how those sinners could be released from hell, and Kāla answered that if any good act of the King was transferred to them could be set free. One early morning Janaka had, with a pure heart, chanted "Rāma, Rāma" and that good act was exchanged for the freedom of the sinners. After their release had been effected, Janaka asked Kāla: "You say that only sinners come here. What sin have I committed that I should come here?" Kāla's reply to the question was as follows:—"Oh! King, no one else in the whole world has so much punya as you have got. But, a small sin you have committed. Once you prevented a cow from eating grass, and, therefore, you had to come up to the gates of hell. Now, that sin has been atoned for. So you may go to svarga." Janaka saluted Kāla and in the divine vimāna went to Heaven. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapters 30 and 31).

9) Artificial Janaka. While Sitā was a captive in Lāṅkā Rāvaṇa, to bring her round, a deity very clever magician called Marutta to her, disguised as Janaka, her father. And Marutta, in the capacity of her father consoled her and advised her to yield to the wishes of Rāvaṇa. But Sītā did not yield, and the artificial Janaka assumed his original form of Marutta and went away. (Kāmba Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa).

10) Other information about Janaka. (1) Bhīmasena defeated one Janaka, who was King of Mithilā during the time of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 13). (2) King Janaka was a personification or incarnation of all good qualities. (Vana Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 37). (3) Janaka, the father of Sītā, in his old age renounced his kingdom and became a recluse. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 18, Verse 4). (4) Once the sage called Aːmakāma imparted some pieces of advice to Janaka. (See under Aːmakopākhyāna).

5) Once in a war between Janaka and a king called Pratardana, the army of Janaka, in the presence of the army of Pratardana stood aghast, and Janaka incited them to fight by showing heaven and hell to them. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 4).

6) Once in a war with a King called Kṣemadarśi when victory for Janaka was found to be an impossibility he, as advised by Sage Kālakavyāsaka gave his daughter to Kṣemadarśi in marriage. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 2).

7) Once Māṇḍārjya a great sage put many questions about Tṛṣṇā (desire) to Janaka and he, the great philosopher answered the questions quite satisfactorily (Sānti Parva, Chapter 276).

8) On another occasion Janaka had a talk with Sage Parāṣāra about the attainment of prosperity and welfare. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 296).

9) There was a King called Karāla Janaka among the Janaka Kings. Once Vasīṣṭha gave some good advice to Karāla Janaka. (Sānti Parva, Chapters 302-303).

10) Once a Sage advised a Janaka King called Vasumān on subjects relating to Dharma. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 309).

11) Vasumān Janaka, son of Devarāta put many questions to Yājñavalkya and they were answered to the full satisfaction of the King. (Sānti Parva, Chapters 310-310).

12) The Janaka King called Janadeva had once a discussion with Sage Pañcaśikha about the means to avoid death. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 319).

13) There was once a Janaka King called Dharmadhvaja, and Sulabhā, an erudite woman in Mithilā wanted to test the King. By her yogic powers she assumed the form of a very beautiful woman and visited Janaka's palace. She was offered a seat by the King, and seated on the stool she took her soul into the body of Janaka, and the soul entered into a discussion on philosophic subjects with Janaka. Sulabhā was thus convinced about the unique scholarship of the King and left the palace ashamed about her attempt to test the King. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 320).

14) Sūka, the son of Vyāsa not being fully satisfied by the study of Bhāgavata once visited Janaka at the instance of his (Sūka's) father, and Janaka did so easily clear the doubts of Sūka, which even Vyāsa had not been able to successfully tackle. (Devi Bhāgavata, 1st Skandha).

15) King Janaka did not eat flesh. (Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 65).

16) Dharma, once in the guise of a brahmin imparted many pieces of advice to Janaka. (Āvamedha Parva, Chapter 32).

The above facts prove that the Janaka kings, as a rule, were great scholars and philosophers.

11) Synonym of Janaka. Aindrayunni, Daivarāti, Dharmadhvaja, Karāla, Karālajanaka; Maitihula, Mithilādhipha, Mithileśvara, Vaideha etc.

JANAKI I. A Kaśyapa king who was the rebirth of an asura named Candra. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 20, that the Pāṇḍavas had sent to him a letter of invitation to take part in the battle of Bhārata.)

JANAKI II. See under Sītā.

JANALOKA. One of the fourteen worlds. This world is situated three crores of yojanas (leagues) away from Dhrupapada (the region of Dhrupa—Pole star) according to Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Aṅgā II, Chapter 7.)

JANAMEJAYA I. A famous King of the Solar dynasty.

2) Birth, marriage and accession to throne. Janamejaya was the son of Parīkṣit by his wife Madravatī. Vapustamā, daughter of Suvarṇavarman, King of Kāṭi was Janamejaya's wife. Two sons, Satānika and Śaṅkukarṇa were born to them. Janamejaya had three brothers called Ārjuna, Ugrasena and Bhīmasena. (Devi Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha; Adi Parva, Chapters 3 and 95).

3) Death of his father. Janamejaya's father, Parīkṣit ruled the country in a very distinguished manner for sixty years. While once hunting in the forest Parīkṣit became very tired and thirsty. While searching for water he came across a Sage named Śaṅkika and asked him for some water. Samika being engaged in meditation did not hear the King's request. But, the King mistaking the sage’s silence for haughtiness threw in anger a dead snake round his neck and went away. But, within seven days of the incident, Parikṣit was bitten to death by Takṣaṅka, king of the Nagas according to the curse pronounced on him by Gavijāta, son of sage Śamika.

Janamejaya was only an infant at the time of his father’s death. So the obsequies of the late king were performed by his ministers. After that at an auspicious time Janamejaya was crowned King. Within a short time he mastered statecraft. Dhanurviḍīyā was taught by Kṛpācārya. Very soon he earned reputation as an efficient administrator. He got married in due course.

(Devi Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

4) His hatred towards snakes. In the course of a talk one day with Janamejaya Uṭṭāṇaka the sage detailed to him the circumstances of his father’s death. Only then did he understand the actual cause of Parikṣit’s death, and the information kindled in him intense feelings of revenge not only against serpents but also against the whole serpent dynasty. (Devī Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

5) Sarpaśatra. (Serpent yajña). Janamejaya sought the advice of priests and Ṛtviṅkas as to how best revenge could be taken against the serpents, and they advised him to perform the great Yajña called Sarpaśatra. And, accordingly all necessary arrangements for the Sarpaśatra were made, and the King began dikṣā (Initiation) for it (to live for a few days under severe routine to prepare the author of the yajña for it). But the priest who made the arrangements looked into signs about the successful conclusion of the yajña and opined that it would be obstructed by a brahmin, and, the King, therefore, ordered strict steps to be taken against the entry of strangers into the Yagnaśāla.

And, the Sarpaśatra began. High priests wore black cloths, and chanting mantras they made offerings in the sacred fire, and this created a burning sensation in the hearts of serpents. They began, one after another to come and fall into the fire. All varieties of serpents got consumed by the fire thus. Sages like Uṭṭāṇaka, Candaḥāṛgava, Śāṅgarava, Vyāsa, Uḍḍālaka, Ātrya, Pramataka, Śvetaketu, Nārada, Deva, Kālaghata, Śrutaśravas, Koḥala, Devaśarman, Maudgalya and Samasaurabha acted as Rtviṅkas at the Sarpaśatra. Though almost all the serpents courted death in the fire, Takaṣaṅka alone did not come. Fear-stricken he had taken refuge with Indra.

As the chanting of mantras increased in intensity and volume Vāsuki began to feel the burning sensation. He requested his sister Jatakaru to find out some means of escape from the Sarpaśatra, and at the instance of Jatakaru her son Āṣṭika set out for the palace of Janamejaya to obstruct the Yajña.

Though the Ṛtviṅka invoked for a long time Takaṣaṅka did not appear. Enraged at his absence, Uṭṭāṇaka searched for Takaṣaṅka with his divine eyes and found him seated on the throne of Indra along with him, who had given him (Takaṣaṅka) asylum. This challenge of Indra kindled the wrath of Uṭṭāṇaka all the more, and he invoked Indra, Takaṣaṅka and Indra’s throne too so that all of them might together come and fall into the fire. And, lo! there came the whole lot of them. Only two minutes more and all of them would be reduced to ashes.

By now Āṣṭika, the son of Jatakaru had arrived at the Yajña śāla. Janamejaya received the young Sage with all respect and promised to grant his desire whatever that be. Āṣṭika’s demand was that the Sarpaśtra should be stopped. Though Janamejaya was not for stopping the yajña, he was reminded of his promise to grant any desire of Āṣṭika and the latter insisted on the stopping of the Sarpaśatra. Janamejaya stopped it. Āṣṭika blessed that the serpents which had died at the Sarpaśtra would attain salvation. (Ādi Parva, Chapters 52-50 ; Devī Bhāgavata, 2nd Skandha).

6) Listens to the Bhārata story. While the Sarpaśatra was being conducted Vyāsa came over there and related the whole story of the Mahābhārata at the request of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 60).

7) Saramā’s curse. Janamejaya along with his brother once performed a yajña of long duration at Kurukṣetra. While the yajña was going on, a dog (son of Saramā the bitch of the Devas) came there. The three brothers of Janamejaya beat the dog which returned to its mother, Saramā, crying. The mother asked him whether he had done anything to deserve the beating, and he answered thus: “No, mother, I had done nothing wrong. I did not lick the havis, nor did I even look at it.” Hearing her son’s reply Saramā in deep anguish, went to Kurukṣetra and questioned Janamejaya as to why her innocent son was beaten by his brothers. Neither he nor his brothers replied to Saramā, and she cursed Janamejaya that he would be subjected to adṛṣṭaphala (unforeseen results). This curse upset Janamejaya so much that after the Sarpaśatra was over and on his return to Hastinapura he made a search for a Purohita (priest) competent enough to redeem him from his sins, and at last he invited Somaśravas, son of the great sage Śrutaśravas to be his Purohita, and thus did Somaśravas become the priest of Janamejaya (Ādi Parva, Chapter 3).

8) Successors of Janamejaya. Janamejaya had two sons, Candrapāṇi and Suryapāṇi by his wife Kāṣyā. Hundred sons, experts in archery, were born to Candrapāṇi. The eldest of them, Satyakarna, ruled the country after Janamejaya. Satyakarna had a son called Śvetakarna to whom was born a son called Ajāpārśva by his wife Yādavi, the daughter of Sucūr (Bhaviṣya Parva, Chapter 1).

9) Other Information

(1) Janamejaya defeated the King of Takṣaṅkalas and subjugated the country. Ādi Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 20).

(2) The Sage called Veda was the preceptor of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 82).

(3) After the Sarpaśatra, Janamejaya performed an Āśvamedha yajña at which Vyāsa delivered a lengthy discourse on life and salvation. As Janamejaya said that if he were to believe the words of Vyāsa his dead father Parikṣit should be shown to him. Vyāsa brought Parikṣit down from Svarga and showed him to his son. On the occasion were also present sage Śamika and his son Śrīgī (Āṣṭaravāsika Parva, Chapter 35).

10) Life time of Janamejaya. The great war at Kurukṣetra was fought in 3135 B.C. (See under Mahābhārata) After the war was over the Paṇḍavas ruled the country for 36 years. Vyāsa took three years to compose the Mahābhārata. According to the Mahāprāshāntika Parva the Paṇḍavas set out for the forest after handing over the government to Parikṣit, who ruled the country for sixty years. From the above fact it becomes evident that Janamejaya became king in 3042 B.C.

JANAMEJAYA I. One Janamejaya, a prominent member of Yamarāja's assembly is referred to in the Ādi and Sabhā Paryans of the Mahābhārata. This Janamejaya had once been defeated by Māṇḍhāśa (Dropha Parva, Chapter 62, Verse 10). He conquered the world within three days. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 234).

JANAMEJAYA III. A Kṣatriya King who was Krodha-vaśa, the Asura, reborn. He was killed by Durmuksa, the son of Dīṛtarāṣṭra. (Kāṛa Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 19).

JANAMEJAYA IV. A prince born to King Kuru by his wife called Vāhiṇī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 51).

JANAMEJAYA V. Another King born in the dynasty of Pariksit. He had a son called Dīṛtarāṣṭra. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 3). He once committed brahma-hatyā (sin of killing a brahmin) and so had been forsaken by his subjects. So he had to take to the forest. His search for means to get rid of the sin took him at last to sage Indrota, who made him perform Aśvamedhī yajña. Thus, he got redemption from the sin and he became Indrota's disciple also. (Śānti Parva, Chapters 150-153).

JANAMEJAYA VI. A son of King Kuru by his wife, Kausalyā. He is also known as Pravrī. The King had a son called Praciṁvān by a noble lady called Anantā of the Madhu Dynasty. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 95).

JANAMEJAYA VII. A serpent who attends the council of Varuṇa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 10).

JANAMEJAYA VIII. A King born in the family of Nipa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 174, Stanza 13).

JANAMEJAYA IX. A King who had been to Yudhīṣṭhira. He fought with Karna. This Janamejaya was the son of King Durmuksa. (M.B. Dropha Parva, Chapter 23; Kāṛa Parva Chapter 49).

JANAPADI A celestial maid. This celestial maid was sent by Indra to hinder the penance of the hermit Saradvān and the moment the hermit saw this celestial beauty sensual discharge occurred to him. Kṛpa and Kṛṣṇa were born from that semen. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 129).

JANĀRDANA I. A synonym of Mahāvīśṇu (Śrī Kṛṣṇa). Because he made the Dasyus (Asuras—demons) tremble, Śrī Kṛṣṇa was called Janārdana.

"He, who has lotus as his seat, who is eternal, imperishable and unchangeable, he who has all these attributes is Puṇḍarīkākṣa (lotus-eyed) and he who makes the Asuras tremble is Jānārdana." (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 6).

JANĀRDANA II. See under Dībhaka.

JANASTHĀNA. This is a part of the forest Daqāqaka, which lies in the basin of the Godāvari. Śrī Rāma had lived in this forest with Śītā and Lakṣmaṇa for a long time during the period of his forest-life. It was at this place that Śrī Rāma killed fourteen thousand Rākṣasas (giants) such as Khara, Duśana, Triśiras and others. (M.B. Daśāṣṭra Pāṭha, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38). Mārica allured Śītā and Rāvya kidnapped her in this place. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 147). Śūryapakāh tried to attract Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, and her nose etc., were cut off, in this forest. It was in this place that Śrī Rāma cut off the head of a Rākṣasa (demons) and threw it away. That head fell in the lap of a hermit called Mahodara. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 39).

Janāśīhāna is regarded as a holy place. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 29, that those who stay in this place and take bath in the Godāvari will acquire imperial prosperity.

JĀNDAKĀRA. One of the eighteen Vināyakas, who stay near the Sun. In chapter 16 of the Sāmbhava Purāṇa it is mentioned that this Jāndakāra is engaged in carrying out the orders of Yama (the god of death).

JĀNGAL. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 56).

JĀNGĀRI. A brahmavādi son (interested in theories about Brahman) of Viśvāmitra. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 57).

JĀNGHĀBANDHU. A sage who was a member of Yudhīṣṭhira's assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 16).

JANTU.

1) General information. A King of the Pāru dynasty. It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278, that he was the son of the King Somaka and father of the King Vṛṣṭanu.

2) Jantu born again. Somaka had hundred wives. But only one of them gave birth to a child. That child was Jantu. He was a pet of all the hundred wives. Once Jantu was bitten by an ant. All the hundred queens began crying and shouting and all ran to him. Hearing the tumult in the women's apartment of the palace, the King and the minister ran to that place. When the tumult was over the King began to think. "It is better to have no sons at all, than to have only one son. There are hundred queens. But none of them bears a child. Is there a solution for this?"

At last the King summoned his family-priests and consulted them. The decision of the priests was that if the King should sacrifice his only son, then all his wives would become pregnant and all would give birth to children, and that among the sons thus born, Jantu also would be reborn. The mother of Jantu did not look at this project with favour. "How can we be sure that Jantu also will be there among the sons to be born, after his death?" She was worried by this thought. The priests consoled her and said that there will be a golden mole on the left flank of Jantu. Finally the mother agreed to their plan. Sacrificial dais was arranged. Sacrificial fire for holy offerings was prepared. The priests tore the child into pieces and offered them as oblation in the fire. When the sacrifice was finished, all the hundred queens became pregnant. Each of them gave birth to a child. As the priests had predicted, there was a golden mole on the left flank of the child delivered by the mother of Jantu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 127 and 128).

JĀNUJĀNGHA. A King who is fit to be remembered every morning and evening. Mention is made about this King in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Stanza 69.
JAPÂ(S). A group of Gods (devas) of the third Manvantara (age of Manu). In that Manvantara the Manu was Uttama, Indra was Susânti, and the Devagânas (groups of gods) were Sudharmâs, Satyas, Japas, Pratardanas, and Vâsavarânis, the five groups, each consisting of twelve members. (See under Manvantara).

JÂPÂKA. A Brâhmaña who was constantly engaged in uttering Gayatri. Jápaka was ordered to go to hell because certain mistakes were detected in the uttering of Gayatri. But Devi Sâvitrî intervened. She appeared before him and gave him heaven. This Jápaka was a contemporary of Ikṣvâku. (M.B. Sânti Parva, 3 Chapters from 197).

JARÂ. A forester. It was this forester who shot an arrow at Śrî Kṛṣṇa and killed him mistaking him for an animal. (See under Śrî Kṛṣṇa).

JÂRA. A harpy (Rākṣasī). Though she was a harpy she loved human beings. It is believed that if the picture of Jarâ and her children is placed in the house and venerated, there will be no haunting of any other kinds of demons. The figure of Jarâ was sculptured on the wall of the Palace of Bhradhratha, the King of Magadha, and was being worshipped. Because the King worshipped her, she had been looking forward to an opportunity to reward the King. Bhradhratha had married two daughters of the King of Kâśi. They were twin sisters. For a long time they remained childless. The King was very sorry, and went to the forest with his wives. He saw the hermit Kâśîvân or Gaṇdâkauṣika, the son of Gautama and requested that a son should be born to him. The hermit was sitting in meditation under a mango tree and a mango fell on his lap. The hermit took it and by prayer and meditation he invoked divine power into it and gave it to the King. The King divided it into two and gave it to his wives. The queens became pregnant and the three returned joyously. In due course both delivered. But each of them gave birth to only half of a child. The horrid queens took the uncouth figures outside the palace and left them there. Jarâ was watching this. She ran to the spot and placed the two portions together. Instantly the child became a child of proper form. Hearing the cry of the child the mothers came out. Jarâ appeared there and placed the child before the King Bhradhratha. As desired by Jarâ the child was named Jarâsandha because he was joined together by Jarâ. This child grew up and became the notorious King Jarâsandha of Magadha. (M.B. Sâbhâ Parva, 3 Chapters from 17).

It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 182, Stanza 12 that when Arjuna fought with Jarâsandha this harpy had been staying in the weapon of Jarâsandha and was killed in that fight.

JARATKÂRU I. A hermit who is Purânicly famous.

1) Birth. This hermit was born in a Brâhmaṇa dynasty known as Yâyâvarsas. He was the only son of Yâyâvaras. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 13).

2) The name Jaratkaru. The meaning of the name Jaratkaru is given in Bhâsâbhârata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 40, as follows:—

"Jarâ is consumption, Kâru is dårûna (awful). By and by his body became hard and awful and by penance he made his body to wear out, and so he got the name 'Jaratkaru'."

by means of penance he made his body lean and worn out and so got the name Jaratkaru.

3) Marriage. The calm and abstemious Jaratkaru remained unmarried for a long time. One day he happened to meet with his Manes. They were holding on to a grass and were about to fall into hell, and a rat was cutting the root of the grass which was their only hold. The moment the root is severed all the Manes would fall into the deep ravine of hell. It was at this juncture that Jaratkaru, met his Manes. The moment they saw him they said, "See Jaratkaru, we are your Manes. We have to obtain, heaven, life, contentment and happiness by the good deeds of your son. So go and get married quickly."

At first he did not like the talk about marriage. Still, in order to procure heaven for his ancestors he agreed to get married. But he made a condition that the name of the bride also should be Jaratkaru and she should be given to him as alms. Saying these words, he walked away along the forest.

News reached the ears of Vâsuki, the King of the Nâgas (serpents) that the hermit Jaratkaru was wandering through the forests calling out that somebody should give him as alms a damsel named Jaratkaru. Vâsuki had a sister. Jaratkaru was her name. Vâsuki decided to give her to the hermit Jaratkaru. She was adorned with costly garments and ornaments and was taken to the hermit Jaratkaru. Jaratkaru said:

"Hear my condition, I will not cherish her if she causes displeasure to me. If she does so I will send her away instantly."

On condition that if she did anything displeasing to him he would leave her at once, the hermit Jaratkaru married Jaratkaru the sister of Vâsuki. (Devî Bhâgavata, Skandha 2; Mahâbhârata, Ādi Parva, Chapters 13 and 47).

4) Leaves his wife. Jaratkaru lived in the hermitage with her husband looking after him with love and loyalty. One day the hermit was sleeping with his head on the lap of his wife. Though it was sunset the hermit slept on. It was time for the evening worship of the hermit. If he is aroused he will get angry. The wife was in a difficult situation. Anyhow she aroused her husband. The hermit got up full of anger and shouted, "You have hindered my sleep, you wicked woman and teased me. So from today you are not my wife. I am going away."

She begged him for pardon with tears. But without paying any heed to the entreaties of his pregnant wife, he left her.

The helpless Jaratkaru gave birth to a son named Āstika who later stopped the famous sacrifice, Sarpa Satra meant for killing the serpents. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 47). See under Jaratkaru II.

JARATKÂRU II.

1) General information. It occurs in Devî Bhâgavata, Skandha 9, about Jaratkaru, the sister of Vâsuki and the wife of hermit Jaratkaru as follows. This devî (goddess) is the daughter of Prajâpati Kaśyapa, born from his mind. So she got the name Manasâyevi (goddess born from mind). Some think that she got the name Manasâyevi because she is the deity of mind. There are some who imagine that she got the name Manasâyevi because she held Śrî Kṛṣṇa Paramâtman (the Supreme Spirit) firmly in her mind. This devî had been meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā for three yugas (world-ages). She is known by twelve names.

1) Jaratkāru. Manasādevi had been performing penance, and meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā for three complete yugas and her garments and body were worn out. So Kṛṣṇa gave her the name Jaratkāru.

2) Jagadgaurī. Because she was comely and beautiful and of fair complexion and was worshipped all over the world, she got the name Jagadgaurī.

3) Manasā. Because she was born from the mind of Kaśyapa, the name “Manasā” was given to her.

4) Siddhayogini. As the fruits of her Tapas (penance), she got the attainments of Yoga (meditation, devotion, contemplation and other ways of union with the Universal Soul) and so she was given the name Siddhayogini.

5) Vaishnavī. Because she had constant devotion to Mahāviśnu she was called Vaishnavī.

6) Nāgabhaginī. Because she was the sister of Vāsuki the King of the Nāgas, she got the name Nāgabhaginī. (Sister of Nāga).

7) Śaivī. As she was a disciple of Śiva she got the name Saivī.

8) Nāgēśvarī. Because she saved the Nāgas (serpents) from the Sarpasatra (sacrifice for killing the serpents) of Janamejaya the son of the King Parīkṣit, she got the name Nāgēśvarī.

9) Jaratkārṇaupiyā. Because she became the wife of the hermit Jaratkāru she was called Jaratkārṇaupiyā.

10) Āstikamātā. Because she was the mother of the hermit Āstika she got the name Āstikamātā.

11) Viṣahārī. Because she was the goddess who destroyed poison, she was known by the name Viṣahārī.

12) Mahājñānavaitī. Since she had the attainments of vast knowledge, yoga and the power of bringing the dead to life, she was given the name Mahājñānavaitī.

2) Birth. Once the serpents became a plague to the men of the earth and they all went to Prajāpati Kaśyapa and made their complaints. Kaśyapa and Brahmā consulted each other and at the instruction of Brahmā Kaśyapa created several Mantras (spells and incantations) and Manasādevi from his mind as the deity of these spells.

3) Power of her tapas (penance). When she was very young she went to Kailāsa and performed penance to Paramāṣiva for a thousand years. At last Śiva appeared before her and gave her the divine knowledge, and taught her the Śāmaveda. He gave her the divine Śrī Kṛṣṇa mantra (a spell) called ‘Āstikāśārī’ and the Śrī Kṛṣṇa Kavaca (the armour of Kṛṣṇa) called Traiyokyaśārga and taught her how to use them in worship. Wearing this armour and using the spell she performed penance in Puṣkara, meditating upon Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā, for three yugas (world-ages). At the end of this period Śrī Kṛṣṇa Paramātmā appeared before her and gave her all the boons she wanted. Śrī Kṛṣṇa said that all over the world she would be worshipped and that she had power to give boons to her worshippers.

4) Marriage and rejection. Kaśyapa gave his daughter Manasādevī in marriage to Jaratkāru, a hermit. As they were living in the hermitage, once the hermit slept with his head on the lap of his wife. Seeing the setting sun she aroused her husband. The hermit became angry and decided to reject her. She thought of the Devas, who instantly arrived. Brahmā argued that it was not meet and right to reject his wife before a child was born to her. The hermit touched the groin of his wife and prayed and with the power of yoga (meditation, contemplation etc.) she became pregnant. The son born to her is the famous hermit Āstika.

After giving birth to Āstika she went to Kailāsa, where Paramēśvara and Pārvatī received her.

5) The mantra (incantation) of worship. To get the attainment of Manasādevī one has to utter the spell (mantra) “Orī Hṛīṁ-Sūrin-Ahit-Manasādevīvat śvāhā” five lakh times. He who has got the attainment of this mantra as given above will be equal to Dhanvantari (the physician of the Gods) and to him poison will be Amṛta (ambrosia). This goddess could be invoked into a secluded room on the day of Saṅkṛanti (Transit of the Sun). If offerings of oblations and worship are carried on, he would be blessed with children, wealth and fame.

JARĀŚANDHA I. A terrible King of Magadha.

2) Birth. Jārāsandha was created by joining together a child, by a giantess called Jara, and so this child got the name Jārāsandha. (For detailed story see under Jara).

3) The first battle with Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Asti and Prāpti, the two wives of Kaṁsa, were daughters of Jārāsandha. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed Kaṁsa, the two daughters went to their father and shed tears before him. Jārāsandha became angry and with a mighty army surrounded the city of Mathura. A fierce battle was fought between Jārāsandha and Kṛṣṇa. At last Balabhadraṇa caught hold of Jārāsandha and was about to kill him, when an ethereal voice said that Balabhadraṇa was not the person to kill Jārāsandha. Accordingly Rāma and Kṛṣṇa set Jārāsandha free. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

4) Other information.

1) It is mentioned in Bhāgavata, Skandha 10, that Jārāsandha was the teacher too, of Kaṁsa.

2) Jārāsandha had four sons, Soma, Sahadeva, Tūrya and Sruṭāśrū, of whom Sahadeva became King of Magadha, after the death of Jārāsandha.

3) Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 185, that Jārāsandha had been present at the Svayyamīvra (marriage) of Pāṇcāli.

1) Once there arose a battle between Jārāsandha and Kārṣṇa, in which Jārāsandha was defeated and so he made a treaty with Kārṣṇa. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 6).

5) The death of Jārāsandha. The enmity between Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Jārāsandha was life-long. These two mighty powers confronted each other eighteen times. Śrī Kṛṣṇa decided to kill Jārāsandha, the King of Magadha, in a duel. Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa with Arjuna and Bhīma reached the city of Magadha in the guise of Brāhmaṇas. They started from the kingdom of Kuru.
travelled through Kurujāṅgala and passed by Padmasaras and Kālakūţa, visited the holy places of Gandaki, Mahāsūnā, Sadānārā and such others, crossed the river Sarayū and reached the opposite bank. Then they travelled through the countries of East Kosala and Mithilā. Touring through the countries they crossed the rivers Carmaṅvatī, Gaṅgā and Saṅga. Wearing matted hair and barks of trees they reached Giri-vrāja, the capital city of Magadha. There were three big drums, which were used only on special occasions. The hide of elephant was used for making them.3 Seeing all these sights they reached the presence of Jarāsandha, who welcomed them with necessary formalities and talked with them. But they kept silence. At last Śrī Krśṇa told him that his two friends were having the vow of silence, which would terminate only at midnight. So the King left them in the sacrificial hall and went to the palace. He came to them at midnight and asked them who they were. Śrī Krśṇa revealed to him that they were Krśṇa, Bhīma and Arjuna, who had come to fight a duel with Jarāsandha, who had unreasonably put many innocent Kings in dungeon, and challenged him to select any one of them for duel. Jarāsandha, trembling with fury, selected Bhīma. In that duel Jarāsandha was killed. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, 3 Chapters from 20).

6) Names given to Jarāsandha. Bāhradṛastha, Māgadha, Magadhādhipa and Jarāputra are some of the names used in the Mahābhārata by Vyāsa as synonyms of Jarāsandha.

Jarāsandha II. (Śatrusaha). One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 157, Stanza 30 that this Jarāsandha was killed by Bhūmasena.

Jarāsandha III. In Karṇa Parva of the Mahābhārata, Chapter 5, Stanza 30, we see a King Jayatsena who fought on the side of the Kauravas and had been killed by Abhīmanu. The father of this King Jayatsena was one Jarāsandha, a Kṣatriya of Magadha.

Jarāsandhavahāparva. A sub-section of Sabhā Parva, of the Mahābhārata. This sub-section comprises of Chapters 20 to 24 of Sabhā Parva.

Jarayu. An attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Stanza 19).

Jaritā. A mother bird with four young ones, who suffered much in the burning of the forest Khāṇḍava. (For detailed story see under Khāṇḍavadāha, Para 8).

Jaritāri. A son of the mother bird Jaritā. (See under Khāṇḍavadāha, Para 8).

Jarjarānanā. An attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 19).

Jartiṅka. A tribe of Vāhikas. They are considered to be the lowest of the tribes. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 10).

Jarudhi. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

Jarūthi. An ancient city. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 30, that Śrī Krśṇa, with his friends Āhuṭi and Kṛthā defeated Śeṣūpāla, Jarāsandha, Śaibya and Satadhanvan in this city.

Jatadhara. A warrior of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

1. See under Bhradṛastha IV to know about the sound of this big drum.
reach up to the top of the head, for Kṣaṭriyas up to the forehead and for Vaśyās up to the nose. Before going for alms, the celibate should take his stick, bow before the sun, go round the fire and only then set out. The alms received should be offered to the teacher as oblation, then he should turn to the east and wash hands and mouth and eat it. Brāhmaṇas should wear the upper garment or their sacred thread (Yajñāsūra) on the left shoulder and under the right arm and then it is called ‘Upāvita’; if it is on the right shoulder and under the left arm it is called “Prācināvīta” and if it is round the neck it is called “Nivīta”.

These Jātakarmas may be done for the female child also at the stipulated times by tantras, without reciting mantras, for the purification of the body. The rituals performed without reciting Vedamantras (spells) are called tantras. For women marriage is to be considered as Upanayana, looking after the needs of husband to be considered as learning at the house of the teacher, and housekeeping as samādāhana (gathering of fuel of Butea frondosa). ( Manusmṛti, Chapter 2).

JĀṬALĪKA. A female attendant of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 23).

JĀṬĀPĀTHA. See under Ghanapātha.

JĀṬARŪPAŚILA. A mountain. This mountain stands in a place having an area of thirteen yojanas, on the opposite shore of the sea where the water-creatures fall in abundance and cause the death of anything that comes near them. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kāśikādāhāna, Chapter 14, Stanza 5).

JĀṬASAURA I. A. King, who was a member of Dharmaputra’s assembly. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 24).

JĀṬASAURA II. A Rākṣasa, Jāṭasura, disguised as a brahmin lived with the Pāṇḍavas in the forest. His aim was to carry off Pāṇcālī and the arrows of the Pāṇḍavas and when he got an opportunity for it. One day taking advantage of Arjuna’s absence Bhima was out hunting) Jāṭasura caught hold of the others as also the arrows and ran away with them. Sahadeva alone managed to slip away from his clutches. Dharmaputra pledged his word that Jāṭasura would be killed before the sun sets. Hearing all the hubbub (Bhima hurried to the scene, killed the Asura and saved his brothers and Pāṇcālī from difficulties and danger. (Vana Parva, Chapter 157).

JĀṬASAURA III. This Jāṭasura had a son called Alamśuṇa who was killed by Ghaṭotkaca in the great war. (Drona Parva, Chapter 174).

JĀṬASAURA PARVA. A sub-Parva of Mahābhārata. (See under Mahābhārata).

JĀṬAVEDA (S). Three sons of Purūravas, born from Agnī (fire). They are called the Jāṭavedas. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

JĀṬAYU. A bird famous in the Purāṇas.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu as follows, Brahmā—Marici—Kāśyapa—Arūṇa—Jāṭayu.

2) Birth. Two sons called Sampāti and Jāṭayu were born to Arūṇa. Their mother, a bird, was Śycēti. Śycēti, wife of Arūṇa, delivered two children, Sampāti and the great Jāṭayu (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 71). “Know that I am the son of Arūṇa and Sampāti is my elder brother: My name is Jāṭayu, and I am the son of Śycēti.” (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Canto 14, Verse 32).

But, according to Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, the name of the mother of Sampāti and Jāṭayu was Mahāśvetā. (Kīśkindhā Kāṇḍa). Perhaps, Śycēti was also known as Mahāśvetā.

3) Jāṭayu flies towards Sūryā. Sampāti and Jāṭayu, once under a bet flew up towards the sun. Jāṭayu outflew Sampāti, and in the exuberance of youth entered Sūryā’s orbit at noon time with the result that, due to the excessive heat his wings were scorched. At this Sampāti, to save his brother, flew up higher than Jāṭayu and spread out his wings like an umbrella over Jāṭayu with the result that Sampāti’s wings were burnt, and he fell down somewhere on the Vindhya mountains. He spent the rest of his life under the protection of a sage called Nīśākara who was performing penance on the mountains. After their tragic meeting in Sūryamapda Sampāti and Jāṭayu never again met in their life. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kīśkindhā Kāṇḍa, Chapter 58; Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Kīśkindhā Kāṇḍa).

4) Fought with Rāvana. Jāṭayu clashed with Rāvana, who was carrying away Śūdēvī in his vimāna, and in the fierce fight that they fought in the air, Rāvana cut off Jāṭayu’s wings and thus felled him on the earth, almost dead. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, Chapter 51).

5) Death. Rāma and Lākṣmana during their search in the forest for Sītā came upon Jāṭayu lying without wings almost dead and reciting Rāma’s name. Jāṭayu described to Rāma how Rāvana had carried away Sītā and how he had tried to stop him and fought with him. After giving this account he died. Rāma and Lākṣmana lit a fire and cremated Jāṭayu. The great bird’s soul attained salvation. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

JĀṬI. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

JĀṬI. See under Cāturvarpaṇa.

JĀṬILA. The name assumed by Śiva when he played the part of a Brahmacārin. Pārvati began rigorous penance to obtain Śiva as her husband, and Śiva visited her disguised as Jāṭila, a brahmacārin to test her. (Śiva Purāṇa, Satradrasanīhītā).

JĀṬILA. A righteous and generous woman who was born in the Gautama dynasty. She once sought the help of the saptarṣi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 195; also See under Gautami II).

JĀṬISMARA. A holy bath. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 128 that the body and mind of the person who bathes in this tirtha (bath) will become pure.

JĀṬISMARAHRA. A holy place. In the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Stanza 3, mention is made that if a man gives alms at this holy place, he will be able to remember his previous birth and life.

JĀṬISMARAKĪṬA. A worm which got emancipation through the advice of Vyāsa. Once while Vyāsa was roaming about in the country, by chance he saw this worm. It was running through the road, seeing a cart coming very fast. Vyāsa stopped it and asked, “What are you running from?” The worm replied that he was running in fear that the wheel of the cart coming from behind might crush him. In the previous birth this worm was a Śūdra, Jealousy, resentment, arrogance, selfishness etc., were the traits of his character in his previous life. Only twice in his life had he done good deeds. Once he honoured his mother and on another occasion he respected a Brāhmaṇa. Because of these two good deeds, in his present life as worm he had the remembrance of his previous life. Vyāsa gave the worm necessary advice. Instantly the worm was crushed under the wheel of the cart.

In the next rebirth this Jātismarakaṭi was born as a Kaśyatra King. As he was leading the life of a powerful King he met with Vyāsa. He received advice from the hermit. In his next life he became a Brāhmaṇa and finally he attained bliss. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, 3 Chapters from 117).

JĀTTHARA I. A very erudite brahmin scholar in Vedic lore. Jathara was a prominent figure at the serpent yajña held by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Verse 6).

JĀTTHARA II. A mountain within the ranges of Mahāmeru. On the eastern side of Mahāmeru there exist two mountains called Jātthara and Devakūṭa, 18,000 yojanas in extent and 2000 yojanas high. On the western side of Meru are the mountains called Pavamāna and Pārīyātra, on the southern side Kaśīśa and Kāraṇvīra, and on the northern side Trīśṛgīra and Makarangiri. (Devi Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

JĀTTHARA III. An urban region in ancient India.

JĀTTHARA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 128).

JATUGRAM. See under Arakkillam (lac palace).

JATUGRHAAPARVA. A particular section of Ādi Parva.

JĀTUKARNA. An ancient hermit with control over his senses. He was a member of the council of Yudhiṣṭhira.

(M.B. Sabhā-Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 14).

JAVA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 75).

JAVA I. A son of Dhrtraśūtra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 119). He fought with Arjuna at the time of the stealing of cows. (M.B. Viśā Parva, Chapter 54). This Jaya fought with Nila and Bhima in the battle of Bhārata. Bhima killed him. (Drona Parva, Chapters 25 and 135).

JAVA II. A deva (god). At the time of the burning of the forest Khaṇḍava, this deva came with an iron pestle to fight with Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 226 Stanza 34).

JAVA III. A King in ancient India. He sits in the Durbabar of Yama (God of death) and worships him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 3, Stanza 15).

JAVA IV. A synonym of the Sun. (M.B. Parva, Chapter 3, Stanza 24).

JAVA V. The pseudo name taken by Yudhiṣṭhira at the time of the pseudo-nymity of the Pāṇḍavas in the country of Viṣṇu. Bhima was known as Jayanta, Arjuna by the name Viṣṇu, Nakula by the name Jayatena and Sahadeva by the name Jayadala at that time. (Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35). At that time Pāṇḍāli addressed her five husbands by the name Jaya. (M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 23, Stanza 12).

JAVA VI. A nāga (serpent) born in the family of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Udya Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 16).

JAVA VII. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156, that both Śakuni and this warrior fought with Arjuna.

JAVA VIII. A warrior of the country of Pāṇḍāla. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 44 that this warrior fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas and that Karṇa was killed in the battle.

JAVA IX. One of the attendants given to Subrahmanya by Vāsuki, the King of the Nāgas (serpents). Vāsuki gave Subrahmanya two attendants named Jaya and Mahājaya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 52).

JAVA X. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 67).

JAVA XI. (JAVA VI JAYAS). They were gate-keepers of Vaikuṇṭha. As these two sons of devas were engaged in the service of Mahāviṣṇu guarding the gate, the hermits Sanaka and others came to see Mahāviṣṇu to pay him homage. Jaya and Viṣṇu stopped them at the gate. Sanaka got angry and cursed them to take three births on the earth as Devas (demons). The sorrowful Jaya and Viṣṇu requested for absolution from the curse. The hermit said that they had to take three births as Devas and that they would be redeemed by the weapon of Mahāviṣṇu. According to the Jaya and Viṣṇu were born in the earth as Hiraṇyākṣa and Hiraṇyakaśipu. They were killed by Mahāviṣṇu. The second birth they were Rāvana and Kumbhakarna. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Śrī Rāma killed them. In the third birth they were Śiśupāla and Dantavakra. They were killed by Śrī Kṛṣṇa, an incarnation of Bhagavān Viṣṇu. For further details see under Hiraṇyākṣa. Hiraṇyakaśipu, Rāvana; Kumbhakarna, Śiśupāla and Dantavakra. After three births Jaya and Viṣṇu returned to Vaikuṇṭha. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

JAVA XII. Father of the Kāksasa (giant) Viśā, who was killed by Śrī Rāma at the forest Danḍaka. Viśā was born to the giant Jaya by his wife Śatadhāra. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Sarga 3).

JAVA XIII. The original name of the Mahābhārata written by Vyāsa. Many of the scholars are of opinion that Vyāsa was not the author of the whole of the Mahābhārata that we see in its present form now. They say that the Bhārata written by Vyāsa consisted only of eight thousand and eight hundred stanzas. That work was named Jaya. To those eight thousand and eight hundred stanzas Vaiśampāyana added fifteen thousand, two hundred stanzas and this great work was given the name Bhārata or Bhārata sarvhitā (Bhārata collection). When Śūta recited this book to other hermits in Naimiśāranya the book had a lakh of stanzas. Henceforward the book was called Mahābhārata, (History of classical Sanskrit Literature; Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 62, Stanza 20).

JAVA. I. A daughter of the hermit Gautama. Gautama had two daughters by his wife Ahalāyā named Jayaṇī and Aparājaṭī besides Jaya. While Dakṣa was performing a yāga, (sacrifice) this Jaya informed Pārvati of it. Pārvati fell down when she heard that Dakṣa had not invited Śiva to the sacrifice. Śiva got angry at Dakṣa’s negligence and from his wrath the Bhūtānās such as Virāhadrā and others (attendants of Śiva) arose. (Vāman Purāṇa, Chapter 4).

JAVA. II. Wife of Puspadanta, a gaṇa (attendant of Śiva). See under Puspadan’a.

JAVA. III. Another name of Pārvati. (M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 16).

JAVA IV. A daughter of Dakṣa. Two daughters named Jaya and Suprabhā were born to Dakṣa. To Suprabha and Jaya fifty sons each were born. These hundred sons wore various kinds of arrows and such other weapons. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālaṅkṛṣṇa, Sarga 21).

JAYA V. A maid of Pārvatī. It is seen in Skanda Purāṇa that this Jayā was the daughter of Prajāpati Kṛṣṇa.

JAYA. Wife. The husband enters the form in the form of semen and takes birth as the foetus and then is born from her as son and so the wife is called Jayā.

Garbhake bhūtveha jāyate
Jāyāyastadhi jāyātvaṁ
Yadasyāṁ jāyate punaḥ”

(Manusmṛti, Chapter 9, Stanza 8).

JAYA (M) I. The name of an auspicious moment. This has the name Vijayam also. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 17).

JAYA (M) II. The name given to the story of Vidulā. See under Vidulā.

JAYADĪLA. The false name assumed by Sahadeva at the time of the incognito life of the Pāṇḍavas in the city of Vīrāta. (M.B. Virāta Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

JAYADEVA I. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 13th century A.D. He is the author of the play 'Prasannarāghavam'. As far as the story of Śrī Rāma is concerned, some changes have been made in this play from that given by Bhavabhūti in his 'Mahābhārata'. According to this play Śrī Rāma and Bānāsura both were lovers of Śītā. The famous work 'Candrāloka', a treatise on rhetorical figures, was written by this poet Jaya- deva. His most important work is 'Gīr-gūmgha', the theme of which is the early life of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, especially the love between Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā, which is very touchingly described. This book consists of 12 sargas and each sarga contains 24 octaves. This poet was a devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He used to sing lyrics before the image of Kṛṣṇa while his wife danced according to the beat.

JAYADEVA II. See under Dūṣāsana II.

JAYADHVAJA. The fifth of the hundred sons of Kārtavīryājuna. It is stated in Brahmānda Purāṇa, Chapter 46 that, of the hundred sons of Kārtavīryājuna, Śīra, Śūrasena, Dhiṣṇa, Madhu and Jayadhvaja were the mightiest warriors. This Jayadhvaja was the father of Tālājaṅgha.

JAYADRATHA I. A mighty warrior King who ruled over the kingdom of Sindhu.

2) Birth and attainment of Boon. Jayadratha was born as a result of severe fasts and vows taken by his father. There was an ethereal voice at the birth of Jayadratha, "This child would become a very famous King. The head of him, who puts down the head of this child on the earth would break into a hundred pieces within a moment" His father was filled with joy when he heard this ethereal voice, and so he made Jayadratha King at a very young age and went to Samantapaṇḍaka to perform penance. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 146).

3) Marriage. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 116, Stanza 17, that Jayadratha married the princess Dusšālā.

4) Jayadratha and Pāṇcāli. From the very beginning Jayadratha was a bitter enemy of the Pāṇḍavas. It is not difficult to find out the root of this enmity. It is stated in Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 21 that Jayadratha was present at the svaṇāvara of Pāṇcāli. The fact that he did not get Pāṇcāli, might have laid the foundation of this enmity. From this moment Jayadratha was looking forward to a chance to carry off Pāṇcāli.

The forest life of the Pāṇḍavas began. They wandered through many forests and finally reached the forest, Kāṃyaka. Once the Pāṇḍavas left Pāṇcāli alone in the hut and went to the forest for hunting. Jayadratha came to know of this. He came with his men to the place where the hut stood. At the very first sight of Pāṇcāli, he fell in love with her. He sent Koṭikāsya, the King of Trigarta, who was the son of Suratha as a messenger to Pāṇcāli. Koṭikāsya told Pāṇcāli about the superior qualities of Jayadratha and requested her to accept Jayadratha, leaving the Pāṇḍavas. But she rejected his request. The messenger returned to Jayadratha and told him what had happened. Jayadratha himself came in a chariot and tried to entice her. Pāṇcāli did not yield. Jayadratha caught her by force and took her away in his chariot. Dhaumya the priest of the Pāṇḍavas followed them with tears. Shortly afterwards, the Pāṇḍavas returned to the hut. They searched for Pāṇcāli here and there. They heard everything from a maid, and instantly followed Jayadratha, whose army confronted the Pāṇḍavas. The heads of almost all the warriors of Jayadratha fell on the ground. Jayadratha fled from the battlefield. The Pāṇḍavas followed him and caught him and scourged him. Bhīma shaved his head letting only five hairs to stand on the head. They took him as a prisoner before Dharmaputra. Finally at the instruction of Yuddhiṣṭhira and Pāṇcāli, he was released. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 264 to 272).

5) Other details.

(1) In the sacrifice of Rājaṣṭiya (imperial consecration) performed by Yuddhiṣṭhira, Jayadratha took part as a tributary King. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Stanza 8).

(2) Jayadratha was present at the game of dice between Duryodhana and Yuddhiṣṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 58, Stanza 28).

(3) It was while going to Śālva to marry a damsel that Jayadratha attacked Pāṇcāli at the forest of Kāṃyaka. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 264).

(4) Feeling ashamed at the result of his attempt to carry off Pāṇcāli, Jayadratha went direct to Gangādvāra and pleased Śiva by penance. Śiva gave him the boon that he would be able to defeat all the Pāṇḍavas except Arjuna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 272).

6) Jayadratha in the battle of Bhārata. In the battle of Bhārata, which lasted for eighteen days between the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas, Jayadratha... took the side of the Kauravas and fought against the Pāṇḍavas. The part played by him in the battle is given below:—

1) On the first day there was a combat between Jayadratha and Drupada. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 55 to 57).

2) Attacked Bhīmasena. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 79, Stanza 17 to 20).

3) Fought with Arjuna and Bhīmasena. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapters 113 and 115).

4) Engaged in a combat with the King Virāṭa. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 116, Stanzas 42 to 44).

5) Jayadratha and Abhimanyu fought with each other. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 14, Stanza 64 to 74).

6) Fought with Kṣatravarman. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 10 to 12).

7) Arjuna vowed that he would kill Jayadratha, who tried to flee from the battle-field when he came to know of this. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 74, Stanza 4 to 12).

8) He began to combat with Arjuna. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 145).

7) The death of Jayadratha. When a fierce fight began between Arjuna and Jayadratha, Śrī Kṛṣṇa came to Arjuna and said, “Arjuna, there was an etheoreal voice at the birth of Jayadratha. The head of the person who puts down the head of Jayadratha on the earth, would be broken into a hundred pieces. So send an arrow in such a way that his head falls on the lap of his father.” Hearing this, Arjuna sent an arrow which cut off the head of Jayadratha and the head fell in the lap of Jayadratha’s father who had been sitting in deep penance and meditation in Samantapāḍacaka. Instantly the father awoke from meditation and stood up and the head of his beloved son, with ear-rings on both ears fell on the earth and the head of the father was broken into a hundred pieces and he died. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 146, Stanza 104 to 130).

8) The names of Jayadratha. Saṁdhavaka, Saṁdhava, Sauvīra, Sauvīraja, Sauvīrarāja, Śindhu-pati Śindhu-rāja, Śindhu-rāja, Śindhusauvīrābhārtā, Sauvīra, Sauvīrarāṣṭrapa, Vārdhikāsatri and such other names are used as synonyms of Jayadratha in the Mahābhārata.

JAYADRATHA I. In Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 36 we see another Jayadratha who sits in the durbar of yama (the death-god) and meditates upon him.

JAYADRATHAVADHĀPARVA. A sub section of Droṇa Parva in Mahā Bhārata. This consists of Chapters 85 to 152 of Droṇa Parva.

JAYADRATHIMOKṢĀNA PARVA. A sub section of the Vana Parva, in Mahābhārata. Chapter 272 is in this section.

JAYĀNĪKA I. A grandson of Drupada. Mention is made in the Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156 Stanza 18, that this Jayānīka was killed by Śvāvatthāmā.

JAYĀNĪKA II. A brother of the King of Virāṭa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Stanza 42).

JAYANTA I. Son of Indra.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu in the following order: Brahmā — Marici — Kaśyapa—Indra—Jayanta. Jayanta was the son born to Indra by his wife Śacīdevī. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 112, Stanzas 3 and 4).

2) Jayanta lost one eye. During his forest life, Śrī Rāma lived with Śitā and Laksmaṇa on the mountain Citrakūṭa for some days. Once Śrī Rāma, being very tired of walking in the forest fell asleep with his head in the lap of Śitā. Taking this chance Jayanta came in the shape of a crow and scratched the breast of Śitā with his claws. Śitā cried and Śrī Rāma woke up and saw Jayanta in the shape of a crow. Rāma got angry and shot the Brahhmāstra (a divine arrow) against Jayanta. Fear of life made him fly throughout the whole of the three worlds. Even Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara were unable to protect him. All the while the divine arrow followed him. Finally having no go he came and fell at the feet of Śrī Rāma. Śrī Rāma said that the Brahmmāstra could never become futile and so the arrow must hit his right eye. Accordingly the arrow struck at his right eye and thus Jayanta lost his right eye. In Adhyāta Rāmāyaṇa this story is stated with some slight changes. According to Adhyaṭāma Rāmāyaṇa, this incident took place when Śitā had been drying raw flesh. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa, Sarga 38).

3) Jayanta hidden in the ocean. After getting the boons Rāvana became arrogant and with a big army went to the realm of the gods. Rāvana engaged Indra in a fierce battle. In that fight Meghanāda the son of Rāvana attacked Jayanta, who swooned and fell down. Immediately Pulomā, the father of Śaḍiecevi, gathered Jayanta in his hands unseen by anybody and hid him in the sea. After the disappearance of Jayanta the battle entered the second stage. Thinking that his son Jayanta had been killed, Indra began to fight with Rāvana with more vigour than before. In the battle which followed Meghanāda subdued Indra and made him a captive. Taking Indra and the celestial maids as captives, Rāvana and his men went to Lāukā. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

4) Jayanta became Bamboo. Once Agastya came to Indra’s durbar. Indra arranged for the dance of Urvāṣī in honour of Agastya’s visit. In the midst of the dance Urvāṣī saw Jayanta before her and she fell in love with him. Consequently her steps went out of beat. Nārada who was playing his lute called Mahatī went wrong. Agastya got angry and cursed Jayanta and changed him to a bamboo. Urvāṣī was cursed to become a woman with the name Mādhavi. Agastya cursed Nārada that his lute Mahatī would become the lute of the people of the world. (Vāyu Purāṇa).

5) Other information.

1) In the stealing of the Pārijātāpuṣpa (the flower of a paradise tree) Jayanta fought with Pradyumna the son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and was defeated. (Viṣṇu Parva Chapter 73).

2) Jayanta was defeated by Sūrapadma, an Asura, in a battle. (Skanda Purāṇa, Asura Kāṇḍa).

JAYANTA II. During the time of his life incognito in Virāṭa the name assumed by Bhīmasena was Jayanta. (M.B. Viśrāta Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

JAYANTA III. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 171, Stanza 11, mention is made about one Jayanta of Pāṇḍcāla.

JAYANTA IV. One of the eleven Rudras. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 208, Stanza 20).

JAYANTA V. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu (M.B. Anuṭāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 98).

JAYANTA VI. One of the twelve Adityas. (M.B. Anuṭāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Stanza 15).
JAYANTÍ I. A holy plac on the river of the bank Sarasvatī. There is a tīrtha (bath) here known as Somatirtha. It is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 19 that those who bathe in this tīrtha would obtain the fruits of the sacrifice of Rājasūya. (Imperial consecration).

JAYANTÍ II. Daughter of Indra and sister of Jayanta. In Bhāgavata, Skandha 4, there is a story stating how Jayantī was the wife of Śukra for ten years. Śukrācārya was the teacher-priest of the Asuras (demons). Once the devas (gods) had completely defeated the Asuras. With the intention of procuring new powers from Śri Paramesvāra, Śukrācārya went to Kailāsa. When the penance of Śukra became more and more severe the gods and Indra began to be flurried. Indra told his daughter Jayantī to become the servant of Śukra and to break his penance somehow or other. Jayantī did not like this procedure of her father. Still she did not like to disobey her father. So she went to Kailāsa and became the attendant of Śukra and stayed with him. She served him dutifully and with chastity. She would fan him with plantain leaf. She would prepare cold and fragrant water for him to drink. When the Sun became hotter she would hold her upper garment as an umbrella so that he should be in the shade. She would gather fully ripened good fruits for him to eat. She would gather good variety of darbhā grass, cut them into the length of a span and with good flowers she would give them to the hermit for his morning oblitions. She would gather soft sprouts and make bed for him and would stand near him fanning till he slept. She would get water ready for him to rinse his mouth when he woke up. Thus she did the work of a dutiful disciple. She did not, in any way by speech or action, try to entice him so that his vow of penance might be broken. She spoke only words which would be pleasing and helpful to him. This continued for thousand years and then Paramāśiva appeared before him and gave the boons he requested for. After that Śukrācārya talked with her. In accordance with her request the hermit Śukra allowed her to live with him for ten years as his wife. He gave her a boon that during that period of ten years they both would be invisible to the world. Thus Śukrācārya married Jayantī and they lived in the house very happily for ten years.

JAYANTÍ III. The queen of the King Rāshāba who was born in the dynasty of King Agniḍhira. Hundred children were born to Rāshāba of Jayantī (See under Rāshāba II).

JAYAPRĪYĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 12).

JAYARĀTA. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Bhīmasena killed this warrior, who was a prince of Kaliṅga, in the battle of Bhārata. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 155, Stanza 28).

JAYARATHA. A Sanskrit poet who lived in Kāśmīra in the 12th century. He was a Śaivite. His important work is Haraccaratacintāmaṇi'. (History of classical Sanskrit literature).

JAYASARMAN. A Brāhmaṇa who became wealthy by taking the vow of Kamāla (Kamalāvrata). Kamāla is the eleventh day of 'Adhimāsa'. It is believed that this day is better than others. If a man fasts on that day Goddess Kamāla will be pleased with him.

The devotee should awake in the Brāhma mūhūrta (forty-eight minutes before sunrise) and take bath thinking of Puruṣottama and begin the fast. If the prayer and meditation is conducted at the house he will get double the fruits. If it is at a river it will yield four times the fruits. If it is at a cow-shed the fruits will be thousandfold and if it is conducted at a fireshed or Śaivite temple, at a holy bath or in the presence of God the fruits will be a thousand and one hundredfold and if it is near a tulasi (holy basil) the fruits will be a lakhfold and if it is done in the presence of Viṣṇu the fruits obtained will be unlimited.

This Jayasarmā who took the fast was the son of a noble Brāhmaṇa named Śīvāsarmā of Avanti. He was the youngest of five sons. He became a wicked man. So he was avoided by his relatives. Being driven away from home, he went to a distant forest and lived there. Once, by luck, he happened to reach the holy place of Triveṇi Mahātirtha. He was very tired of hunger and thirst. So he bathed in the tīrtha and searched for some hermitage. By chance he saw the hermitage of Harimītra. As it was the month of Puruṣottama many people had gathered there. Brāhmaṇas were telling stories of mitigation of sins. He heard the story of the vow called Kamalāvrata and its fruits. So Jayasarmā stayed in that hermitage with them and took the vow of Kamalāvrata. That night Devī appeared before him and said: "I have come from Vaikuṇṭha, because I am greatly pleased with you. Since you have taken the vow of Kamalāvrata on the eleventh day of the dark lunar fortnight called Kamalā of the month of Puruṣottama I will grant you boons. Because you have taken the vow at Triveṇī, I am immensely pleased with you. The noble Brāhmaṇas of your future generations also will be blessed by me". Saying these words the Devī gave him boons and disappeared. From that day onwards Jayasarmā became a great wealthy man and he returned to his father's house (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 64).

JAYASENA I. Father of the famous Caṇḍamahāścana. (See under Caṇḍamahāśena).

JAYASENA II. A prince of Magadha. He was a member of the council of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Śabhā Parva Chapter 4, Stanza 26).

JAYASENA III. A King of Avanti. To this King was born a son named Vindanaṇvinda and a daughter named Mitravindā by his chief wife Rājādhikdevī. Mitravindā was married by Śri Kṛṣṇa.

JAYASVA I. A son of King Drupaṇa. It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 156, Stanza 181 that Jayasva was killed by Aśvatthāmā in the battle of Bhārata.

JAYASVA II. A brother of the King of Vīrāṭa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Stanza 42).

JAYATSENA I. A King of the kingdom of Magadha. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67 that this King, who was the son of Jarāsandha, belonged to the family of Kālakeya. This King was a friend of the Pāṇḍavas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 8, that Jayatsena was present at the svayamvara (marriage) of Draupadi. Towards the end of the battle of Bhārata, the Pândavas sent a letter of invitation to this King and accordingly he came to the help of the Pândavas with an akṣau-hinī of army (21870 Chariots, 21870 elephants, 65610 horses and 109350 infantry). (M.B. Udvyoga Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 8).

Jayatsena II. A King of the Puru dynasty. His father was Sārvabhauma and his mother was the princess Sunandā of Kekaya. Jayatsena married Suṣravas, the princess of Vidarbha. A son named Arvācina was born to them. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 35).

Jayatsena III. The name assumed by Nakula in his life incognito. (Vīraṭa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 35).

Jayatsena IV. A King who took the side of the Kauravas. He was son of Jarāsandha. This King came with an akṣau-hinī of army and helped the Kauravas in the battle of Bhārata. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 16, Stanza 16). It is mentioned in Karpa Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 30 that this King was killed by Abhimanyu.

Jayatsena V. A son of Dhrarāstra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 69, that this Jayatsena was defeated by Saṭānīka and in Salya Parva, Chapter 26 that he was killed by Bhīmasena.

Jayatsena. An attendant of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 12).

Jayatijayas. See under Jaya XI.

Jha. This syllable means 'famous'. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

Jhajha. The father of Sunda an Asura who was the father of Mērea, whose mother was Tāṭakā. (Vāmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kanda, Sarga 25).

Jhilli. A Yādava of the house of Vṛṣṇi. He was one of the seven chief ministers of Śri Kṛṣṇa in Dwārakā. (M.B. Sābahā Parva, Chapter 14, Dākṣinātya pātha).

Jhilli I. Jhīlipīngāraka. A warrior of the Vṛṣṇis. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 20, that this warrior was present at the svayamvara (marriage) of Draupadi. It is also seen that this Yādava carried the dowry of Subhadra to Kṛṣṇa-prastha from Dwārakā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 120, Stanza 32). This warrior took part in the Bhārata battle. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 28 that this warrior played a laudable part in the battle of Kurukṣetra.

Jhilli I. (Jhīlipīngārakam) (Jhillika). A worm. This worm has another name Jhūkku. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 1).

Jhillika(M). An ancient town in South India. Mention is made about this town in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 59.

Jhūkku. See under Jhilli II.

Jhūvā. A servant woman who stole ornaments from the palace. For the detailed story of how she was caught with stolen goods see under Hariṣframān.

Jimūta I. A King born of the family of Yayāti. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

Jimūta. II. A wrestler (Pahalvān). While the Pāṇḍavas were living incognito in the city of Vīrāṭa, once Bhrāmotsava (Brahmā festival) was celebrated all over the country. Wrestling was an important item of the Brahmā festival. Jimūta was the most famous of the wrestlers who took part in the festival. He struck several wrestlers down. At last King Vīrāṭa asked Bhīma to wrestle with Jimūta. Bhīmasena accepted the invitation. In the wrestling Jimūta was killed. (M.B. Vīraṭa Parva, Chapter 16).

Jimūta III. A hermit. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Udvyoga Parva, Chapter 111, Stanza 23 that this hermit got a treasure of gold called Jaimūta from the Himālayas.

Jimūta IV. The horse of the King Vasumas. See under Vasumas.

Jimūtaketu I. A synonym of Śiva. There is a story in the Purāṇas about how Śiva got the name Jimūtaketu.

When summer season began Pārvati told her husband Śiva: "My Lord, Summer has set in. What are we to do without a house to protect us from the hot sun and the strong wind?" Śiva replied. "Dear! It is because I have no house that I walk about in the forest always."

Because Śiva said so, the loyal wife Satīdevī spent the summer with her husband in the shade of trees. When the summer was over rainy season began. People stopped walking about. The sky became black with clouds. The roaring sound of thunder was heard everywhere. Seeing that the rainy season had begun Pārvati again requested her husband to erect a house. Hearing her request Śiva replied. "I have no wealth at all to build a house. You see that I am wearing the hide of a leopord. The serpent Seṣa is my Brahma-string. Padma and Pīṅgala are my ear-rings. One of my bracelets for the upper arm is Kambara and the other one is the nāga (serpent) Dhanājaya. My bracelet on the right hand is Āvatara and on the left hand is Taksaka. The string that I wear round my waist is Nila, as black as antimony. So let us go above the clouds and spend the rainy season there. Then rain will not fall on your body."

Saying thus, Śiva got into a lofty cloud with Pārvati and sat there. That cloud looked like the flag of Śiva. Thenceforward Śiva came to be known by the name Jimūtaketu. (Vāmanā Purāṇa, Chapter).

Jimūtaketu II. See under Jimūtavāhana.

Jimūtavāhana. A Vidvādara. ( demi-god). He was the son of Jimūtaketu, who was the ruler of a city named Kāñceanapura in a valley of the Himālayas. Being childless he had been sad for a long time. At last he approached the divine tree Kalpaka (a heavenly tree that yields every wish) that stood in his garden and requested it to bless him with a child. Thus a son was born to him. The famous Jimūtavāhana was that son. When Jimūtavāhana came to know of the divine powers of the Kalpaka tree, from the ministers, with the permission of his father he went to the Kalpaka tree, bowed before it and said to it, "Oh noble tree! You have granted all the wishes of my forefathers. But I have one wish. No body should be miserable in the world. So I wish to give you to the world with that purpose in view". Instantly an ethereal voice said from the tree. "If you are forsaking me I am going away. But I will fulfil your wishes." Thus according to the wish of Jilmūtavāhana the Kalpaka tree circled got to everywhere in the world and then went to heaven and disappeared. The earth became wealthy and prosperous. The fame of Jilmūtavāhana spread throughout the three worlds, and all the Vidyādharas grew jealous of him. As the heavenly tree Kalpaka, which yielded all the wishes, had returned to heaven, they thought it the most propitious time and arrayed their army against Jilmūtavāhana. His father Jilmūtaketu had completed all preparations to meet the enemy. But Jilmūtavāhana approached his father and said, "Father! I am perfectly sure that no body could defeat you in battle. But see how mean it is to destroy so many lives and win the country merely for the pleasures of this fragile body. So let us go away from here. Leave the kingdom to them." Jilmūtaketu, who was pleased at this generous nature of his son, respected his wish and went with his family to the Malayam mountain and lived there. Mitrāvāsū, the son of Viṣvāvāsū, the King of the Siddhas and Jilmūtavāhana became close friends. One day Jilmūtavāhana was wandering about in the forest when he saw in the middle of a garden a temple dedicated to Devī and a young woman of exquisite beauty, surrounded by her maids, singing hymns and worshipping Devī. Jilmūtavāhana was attracted by her extra-ordinary beauty. Love budded in her heart also. On enquiry it was understood that she was Malayavatī, the sister of Mitrāvāsū. After that both of them engaged in a little talk of love-making. Hearing her mother calling, Malayavatī instantly went home. Being fallen head-long in love, Jilmūtavāhana spent the night somehow or other and at dawn reached the temple with a hermit boy. While the hermit boy was consoling Jilmūtavāhana Malayavatī also came there. Jilmūtavāhana and his friend hid behind a tree. She was alone, and since she could not bear separation from her lover she decided to commit suicide and standing at the steps, she said "Devī! If it is impossible to get that Jilmūtavāhana as my husband in this birth, let it be so. But bless me that I may have my wish granted in the next birth at least". Saying this she tied one end of her upper garment on the tree and tried to commit suicide. Instantly there was an ethereal voice which said, "Daughter, don't do such rash things. Jilmūtavāhana will become your husband. He will become the emperor of the Vidyādharas also." Jilmūtavāhana came and untied the knot of the upper garment with his own hands and saved her from death. Her maid appeared and said with delight. "Friend! you are very lucky. Today I heard what prince Mitrāvāsū said to his father Viṣvāvāsū. Thus he said 'Father! Jilmūtavāhana who gave away his own Kalpaka tree for the welfare of others has come to this place. It will bring prosperity to us, if we show our hospitality to this noble guest by giving our Malayavatī to him. It is very difficult to get such a noble man for my sister anywhere else." The father consented. The prince instantly went to the abode of this gentleman. I think the marriage will take place today. So come, let us go home." With his heart overflowing with joy, Jilmūtavāhana went to his house. Mitrāvāsū was there. He revealed the purpose of his coming. Jilmūtavāhana, who had the remembrance of his previous births told Mitrāvāsū that in the previous birth also they had been friends and that Malayavatī had been his wife. Thus their marriage took place. Delightful songs of the married life passed one by one. One day Jilmūtavāhana and Mitrāvāsū went for a walk. They reached a forest on the seashore. Seeing some bones there Jilmūtavāhana asked Mitrāvāsū about them. Mitrāvāsū said: "In ancient days Kadrū, the mother of Nāgas (serpents) made Vinatā, the mother of Garuḍa, her slave by some trick. Garuḍa liberated his mother from slavery. But the hatred increased day by day and Garuḍa began to eat serpents, the children of Kadrū. Seeing this, Vasuki the King of Nāgas entered into a contract with Garuḍa, so as to prevent the nāgas from being destroyed altogether. The arrangement was that Vasuki would send a serpent everyday to Garuḍa. Garuḍa ate all those serpents sent by Vasuki in this place. These are the bones of those poor snakes." When Jilmūtavāhana heard this story his heart was filled with pity. He decided to save the life of at least one serpent by giving his body instead. But the presence of Mitrāvāsū was an obstacle to carry out his wish. At that particular moment a minister of Viśvāvāsū appeared there and took away Mitrāvāsū saying that he was wanted by his father. Left alone, Jilmūtavāhana stood there when he saw a young man coming with an old woman who was crying bitterly. On enquiry Jilmūtavāhana learned that in accordance with the agreement with Garuḍa, the old woman was bringing her only son Śāṅkhacūḍā to give him as food to Garuḍa. Jilmūtavāhana told them that he would take the place of Śāṅkhacūḍā that day. The mother and the son reluctantly agreed to his desire. The old woman went away crying and Śāṅkhacūḍā went to the temple.

Hearing the sound of Garuḍa's wings Jilmūtavāhana laid himself on a stone and Garuḍa taking him in his beaks flew to the top of the Malaya Mountain. On the way the jewel of Jilmūtavāhana known as 'Gūḍārataṇa', which was soaked in blood fell down, in front of Malayavatī. Knowing that it was the jewel of her husband, with a terrible cry she ran to her father. Because of his knowledge of arts and sciences, Jilmūtaketu also knew everything and with his wife and daughter went to the top of the Malaya mountain. In the meanwhile, Śāṅkhacūḍā, having done obeisance to 'Gokaranātha' (God), came back to the stone where he had left Jilmūtavāhana and seeing a pool of fresh blood, became sad and silent. Then determining that he would save Jilmūtavāhana at any cost, he went up the mountain following the track of the blood drops. Garuḍa took Jilmūtavāhana to the peak of the mountain and began to peck at him. Jilmūtavāhana grew more and more delightful as the pecking became harder. Garuḍa looked at him with wonder and thought, "Surely, this is not a nāga. It must be a Gandharva or somebody else." Not knowing what to do he sat looking at his prey, who invited him to finish off his meal. By this time Śāṅkhacūḍā had reached the spot. Soon Jilmūtaketu with his wife and Malayavatī also arrived.
They all cried aloud. Garuḍa was in great confusion. When he knew that he was about to eat the famous Jīmūtavāhana, who had given away even the Kalpaka tree for the good of others, Garuḍa was filled with remorse. Instantly Jīmūtavāhana died. The parents and Śaṅkhaṇeṇa cried beating their breasts. Mahayatāvī fell on the ground and cried. Then looking up she called out with tears. “Ha! Devi! Jagadambikā! you have told me that my husband would become the emperor of the Vidyādhāras. Has your boon become futile because of my misfortune?” Devī appeared and said “Daughter! My words will not become futile.” Then Devī sprinkled Āmṛta (ambrosia) on Jīmūtavāhana and brought him to life. He sprang up more radiant than before, and was anointed as emperor of the Vidyādhāras by Devī. When Devī disappeared Garuḍa who was much pleased, told Jīmūtavāhana to ask for any boon.

Jīmūtavāhana requested for the boon that Garuḍa should stop eating the Nāgas and that all the serpents who had been reduced to bones should be brought to life again. Garuḍa granted him that boon. All the serpents which had been killed by Garuḍa came to life again. All the gods and hermits came there with joy. After all had gone, Jīmūtavāhana went with his relatives to the Himālayas as the emperor of Vidyādhāras.1 (Kathāsaritsāgara, Saṅkhaṇavatī Lambaka, Tārānga 23).

Jīrṇoddhāra. Erection and consecration of images fixed in temples which have fallen into dilapidation, is called Jīrṇoddhāra. Mention is made in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 67, about the principles of Jīrṇoddhāra, as follows:

The priest should adorn the image with ornaments and perform ‘Stavana’. If the idol is very badly ruined by age it must be abandoned. Broken image and that with any part of the body severed or disfigured should also be abandoned, even if it is made of stone or any other material. When the image is renovated the priest should make burnt offerings thousand times with Narasimhamantra (spell or incantation). If the ruined image is made of wood it should be burned. If it is made of stone it should be placed at the bottom of deep water, either in the sea or anywhere else. If it is made of metals or jewels, it must be put into water. The ruined image should be placed in a carriage and covered with a cloth. With instrumental music and so forth the image should be taken to water in a procession and then submerged in water. After this the priest must be given a gift. Only after this should the new image be erected and consecrated. On a good day in an auspicious moment a new image of the same material and measurement as of the old image should be erected and consecrated by the priest.

Jitāri. Son of Avikṣṭa born of the family of Pūru. Avikṣṭa was the son of King Kuru. Mention is made about Jitāri in Mahābhārata, Aḍi Parva Chapter 94, Stanza 53.

Jivātman. A Vīvadeva (A class of gods) concerned with Śrāddha (offerings to the Manes). (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Stanza 31).

Jitavatī. A daughter of King Uśmāra. She was the most beautiful woman in the world. She was the friend of the wife of a Vasu named Dyau. It was because of the words of this Jitavatī that the Āśvavasus (the eight Vasus) stole the cow Nandini of Vasiṣṭha, and by the curse of Vasiṣṭha had to take birth in the womb of women on earth. (See under Gaṅgā, Para 7).

Jīṣṇu I. A name of Arjuna. (See under Arjuna).

Jīṣṇu II. A synonym of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. As Śrī Kṛṣṇa had won all the battles he fought, he got the name Jīṣṇu. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 13).

Jīṣṇu III. A warrior who fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas against the Kauravas. This warrior who was a native of Cedi, was killed by Karṇa (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 48).

Jīṣṇukarmā. A warrior who stood on the side of the Pāṇḍavas and fought against the Kauravas. He was a native of the country of Cedi. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 48).

Jivajivaka. A king of birds. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 6, about this bird.

Jivala. A charioteer of Rūtpāra, the King of Ayodhyā. Nala who had been living there under the name Bāhuca had accepted Jivala as his friend. (See under Nala).

Jivātman (The individual life or soul). The Apārabrahman (which is next to the highest Brahman) that is so minute and subtle is called Jivātman. Parabrahman is God almighty. It is mentioned in Taittiriyopaniṣad about this apārabrahman as follows:

“From this Ātmā came into existence either possessing the quality of sound. From either air, possessing the qualities of sound and touch, came into existence. Fire with the qualities of sound, touch and colour came into being from air. From fire, water having the qualities of sound touch, colour and taste came into being. From water earth with the qualities of sound, touch, colour, taste and smell came into existence. Vegetation grew from earth, and from vegetation food, from food, semen, and from semen Puruṣa came into existence. The materialized form of apārabrahman is the body. Its subtle form is the soul. Jivātma or the individual soul is the subtle form of soul dwelling in the materialized form of the apārabrahman. This soul sits in the miniature lotus of heart in the miniature ether. The body which is made of the five elements is the dwelling place of this Jivātma. The individual life exists in every living being. The body originated from food is the outer covering of the Jivātma. This materialized body is also called Annamayakośa (the cask of food). Inside this annamayakośa there is the Prāṇamayakośa (the chest of the life breaths). It is stated in the Taittiriyopaniṣad that this Prāṇamayakośa is separate from and existing inside the annamayakośa. The Prāṇamayakośa which exists inside the annamayakośa has the shape of man. The life breath which appears as the inhaling and exhaling breath is the head of the Prāṇamayakośa. The life breath Vyāna is the right wing and Apāna is the left wing, ether is its soul and Pṛthvi (the earth) its tail.2 Inside the Prāṇamayakośa, there exists the Manomayakośa (the chest of mind), but it fills the entire interior of the Pranamayakośa. The Vijnānamayakośa (the chest of knowledge or understanding) exists inside the Manomayakośa. The Jivatmā or the individual life dwells inside this Vijnānamayakośa and pervades the entire body. It is by the activity of Vijnānamayakośa that the Jivatmā feels its individuality. Inside the Vijnānamayakośa there exists a fifth kośa (chest) called the Anandamayakośa, which is the immediate covering of Jivatmā, and which has no sense of individuality. The three Kośas, Anandakosa, Vijnānamakośa and Prāgamayakośa together is called Susukṣmaśarīra (the subtle body). It must be remembered that Susukṣmaśarīra is different from Susukṣmaśarīra (the minute subtle body).

1 This story is told to the king Trivikramaśena by Vṛttā. See under Trivikramaśena.
2 Tasya prāṇa eva śiraḥ vyāna daśāṣṇāḥ pakṣaḥ apānaḥ uttaraḥ pakṣaḥ ākāśā ātmā, Pṛthivi puccham. (Taittirīya).

Heart is the abode of the Jivatmā. Here (in heart) they say (this being—Jivatmā exists). So the name ‘Hṛdaya’ (heart) is meaningful. The Purusā (male being), which sits inside the heart or the Jivatmā is as big as the toe according to the Kathopanishad. The Jivatmā or the Aparabrahman is without beginning. Even from the past which we are thinking over and over again, they had got into individuals and when the Annamayakośas of the individuals decayed due to death, they abandoned them and entered into new individuals. The author of the Bṛhadāraṇyaka gives an explanation to the question why this Jivatmā which is as free as air enters the body of man, beast, bird, tree, rock etc. and subjects itself to misery and hardship. “Where does the Jivatmā originate from? how does it enter this body?” Jivatmā originates from Paramātma (the soul of the universe). As the shadow pervades the body of a man this Jivatmā overshadows this body.” Śrī Śaṅkarācārya expounds it in another way; he says that the Jivatmā is tied to the body by the imagination or desires of the mind.

JNAṆAPĀṆAṆATIRTHA. An ancient holy bath. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 3 that those who visit this holy place will attain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Agni-tōna.

JRMĪBHĀDEVI. Sec under Koṭuvā (Gape).

JRMĪBHĪKA. Yawning or gaping. For the Purānic story of how gape came into existence in the world, see under Koṭuvā (Gape).

JUHU. A daughter of the family of Yayāti. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

JVALĀ I. A daughter of Takṣaka. The King Rṣa married her. Matināra was the son born to the couple. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 95. Stanza 25).

JVALĀ II. The wife of Niladhvaja. There is a story about this Jvalā in the “Jaimini Aśvamedha Parva”, Chapter 15, as follows: The Pāṇḍavas began the sacrifice of Aśvamedha. Arjuna led the sacrificial horse. He continued his victorious march defeating all Kings and reached the city of Niladhvaja. Niladhvaja was not prepared for a fight. Seeing this his wife Jvalā tried various ways to get her husband to war. Seeing them to be futile she approached her brother Unmukā and asked him to fight with Arjuna. He also was not prepared to fight with Arjuna. Jvalā became very angry and walked to the bank of the Ganges. When the Ganges-water touched her feet she stopped and said, “Dear me! I am become sinful by the touch of Ganges-water.” The amazed Gaṅgā took the form of Sumāngleśwari and stood before Jvalā and asked her the reason for saying so. Jvalā said “Gaṅgādevi submerged her seven sons and killed them. After that she took the eighth son from Santanu. That son too was killed by Arjuna in the Bhārata-battle. Thus Gaṅgā is childless and sinful.” Hearing this Gaṅgā Devī cursed Arjuna “Let his head be cut off in six months’ time.” Jvalā was satisfied. (For the result of the curse see under Arjuna, Para 28).

JVALĀJIHVĀ I. One of the two attendants given to Subrahmanyā by Agnideva. (Fire god). Jyoti was the other attendant. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 33).

JVALĀJIHVĀ II. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 61).

JVALESVARA. See under Tripura.

JVARA. (Jaram) (Fever).

1) General information. A fearful being. It is stated in the Purāṇas that living beings catch fever owing to the activities of this monster.

2) The origin of jvara. Once Śiva and Pārvati were talking with each other in the Holy Bath called Jyotis-kam on mount Mahāmeru. On that day Dakṣa had performed a sacrifice at Gaṅgādvāra, Śiva alone was not invited. Seeing the Gods Brahāma and the others going to that place through the sky, Pārvati asked Śiva what the matter was. Śiva explained everything to Pārvati, who became very sorry because her husband had not been invited. Śiva grew uneasy at the sorrow of his wife. A drop of sweat fell down from his third eye. A fearful monster with the lustre of fire arose from that drop of sweat. That figure is described as follows:

“With three legs, three heads, six hands and nine eyes, comes Jvara the terrible monster, fierce as Yama the god of death and fearful like a thousand clouds with thunderbolt, gaping and sighing, with tight body and horrible face, rendered so by many eyes.” (M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 122).

To this uncouth figure Śiva gave the name Jvara, who dashed away and entered into all devas (gods). Brahāma and the others caught fever and were laid up. At last they all came to Śiva. Hearing their request Śiva divided Jvara into several parts and separated them from devas and entered them into other living beings, and ordered that, headache for elephants, green coverings for water, shedding of skin for snakes, hoof-rot for cows, sore-throat for horses, feather-sprouting for peacocks, sore-eye for cuckoo, hiccough for parrot, weariness for tigers and fever for men will be caused by Jvara.

It was the time of the terrorization of Vṛtrāsura. Jvara caught hold of that Asura also. It was at this time that Indra used his thunderbolt and killed Vṛtrāsura. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 283; M.B. Viṣṇu Parva, Chapter 122).

1 Ayaṁ puruṣaṁ bhāḥ satyaṁ tasmin antarhrdaye yathā vr̥thr̥h vā, yavo vā, sa ˙eṣa svarṣyeśānaḥ sarvasya ˙ādhipatiḥ. (Bṛhadāraṇyaka)
JYÂMAGHA. A King born in the dynasty of Iksvâku. (Harivarshâ, Chapter 36).

Five sons, who were equal to gods, named Sahasrâda, Payoda, Krostâ, Nila and Âjika were born to Yadu of the family of Iksvâku. Several noble persons were born in the family of Krostâ. A noble and broadminded son named Vrjinivân was born to Krostâ. Svâhi was born to Vrjinivân, Rušeku to Svâhi, Citaratha to Rušeku and Saśâbîndu to Citarathâ. Thousand sons were born to Saśâbîndu who was an emperor. Important among those thousand who were blessed with radiance, fame, wealth and beauty, were Prthûrânas, Prthûyasâs, Prthutejas, Prthuhbava, Prthukrti and Prthumati. Ušanas was the son of Prthûrânas, âsneyu was the son of Ušanas and Rukmakavaca the son of Šîneyu. Rukmakavaca killed all the archers and conquered the countries and performing asvamedha (horse sacrifice) gave away all the countries he conquered, as gift to Brâhmana. Five sons were born to Rukmakavaca. Jyâmagha was one of them. His brothers were Rukmešu, Prthûrûkma, Pragisha and Hari. Of them Parigha and Hari were made Kings of foreign countries. Rukmešu was given the country ruled by his father. Prthûrûkma served Rukmešu. They drove Jyâmagha away from the country.

Jyâmagha went to the forest and erected a hermitage for him. Then according to the advice of a Brahmin, he who was an old man took bow and arrow and got into a chariot flying a flag and went to the bank of the river Narmadâ. He had neither wealth nor attendants. He stayed on the mountain Rksâvan eating fruits and roots. His wife Saibyâ also had become old. They had no children. Stîl Jyâmagha did not marry anybody else. Once Jyâmagha came out victorious in a fight in which he got a girl. Jyâmagha took the girl to his wife and told her, “This girl shall be the wife of your son.” She asked him how that could be when she had no son. He said, “She will become the wife of the son who is going to be born to you.” As a result of severe penance a son named Vidarbha was born to Saibyâ. The damsels who became the wife of Vidarbha gave birth to two sons named Kratha and KatiÂka. (Padma Purâña, Chapter 13)

JYESTHA I. A deity of inauspicious things. In Kamba Ramâyaña, Yuddha Kânda, it is observed that Jyestha was a goddess obtained by churning the Sea of Milk. As soon as she came up from the sea of Milk, the Trimûrtis (Višnu, Brahmâ and Śiva) found her and sent her away ordering her to sit in inauspicious places. The Goddess Jyestha came out of the Milk-Sea before the goddess Laksmi. So this deity is considered the elder sister of Laksmi. As she is the elder she is also called Mûdevi (Mûdevi). The mode of worshipping this goddess is given in Bodhâyana Suta. Tondiraśpitâlvar, who was a Vaishîvata Alvar, who lived in 7th century A.D. said that it was useless to worship this Goddess. Ancient images of this Goddess have been found. But worship of Jyestha was completely discontinued after the 10th century.

In Siva Purânas it is mentioned that this Goddess is one of the eight portions of Purâńakti. It was believed that the powers of this Goddess regulated human lives in various ways.

JYESTHA II. A star. It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Anuśâsana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 24 that if Brâh-maïpas are given greens on the day of this star it will bring good to the giver.

JYESTHA. A hermit who was well-versed in the Sama-Veda. This ancient hermit once received valuable advice from the Sâtvatas called Barhiśâd. (M.B. Sânti Parva, Chapter 318, Stanza 46).

JYESTHAPUSKARA. A holy place. Those who visit this holy place will get the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Agniśoma. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 200, Stanza 66).

JYESTHASAMA. A Sâma meditated upon by the hermit Jyestha. (M.B. Sânti Parva, Chapter 349, Stanza 46).

JYESTHILA. A river. This river stays in the palace of Varuṇa worshipping him. (M.B. Saḥâ Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 21).

JYESTHILA. A holy place. He who stays in this holy place for a night will get the fruits of giving a thousand cows as gift. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 164).

JYOTI I. Son of the Vasu named Aha. Mention is made about him in Mahâbhârata, Âdi Parva, Chapter 66, Stanza 23.

JYOTI II. One of the two attendants given to Subrahmanya by the God Agni (fire). The second one was Jvalâjihva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 33).

JYOTIKA. A famous serpent. This serpent was born to Kaśyapa by his wife Kadru. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 35, Stanza 13).

JYOTIRATHA. A famous river. The people of India used to drink water from this river. (M.B. Bhishma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 26).

JYOTIRATHYA. A river. He who bathes in this river in the particular place where it merges with the river Šoabhadra, would obtain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Agniśoma. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 8).

JYOTIRVASU. A King born in the family of Purânas. He was the son of Āvapati and the father of Prâkti. (Bhâgavata, Skandha 9).

JYOTISÂ(M). (Astronomy and astrology). Jyotisa is the science about the stars and heavenly bodies. The heavenly bodies are the sun, the moon, the other planets and the stars etc. From the very ancient days men believed that these planets and stars in the sky played an important part in controlling the growth and activities of all the living and non-living things in the world.

Astrology has been a recognized science in Egypt, China and India from very ancient days. History tells us that 3000 years before Christ there were astronomers in Babylon. But even before that time astronomy had fully expanded and grown in Bhârata. The Vedas are supposed to have six Ângas (ancillaries) They are Śiksâ (Phonetics), Kalpa (ritual), Vyâkaraṇa (Grammar), Jyotisa (astronomy) Chandas (metrics), and Nirukta (etymology). From this it can be said that the Indians had acknowledged Astronomy as an ancillary of the Vedas. The expounders of the Vedas say that Astronomy is the eye of the Vedas. Astronomy has two sides, the doctrinal side (Pramâna-bhâga) and the result-side (Phalâbhâga). The Calendar is reckoned in accordance with the Pramâṇa-bhâga. Prediction and casting horoscopes of living beings is the Phala-bhâga.
The astronomers have divided the sky that surrounds the earth into twelve parts called rāisūs (zodiacs). All the stars of the first zodiac appear in the shape of a goat (Meṣa) so that zodiac was called Meṣa. Thus the zodiac in which the stars took the shape of an ox was called Rāṣabha (ox). In the zodiac Mithuna the stars took the shape of a young couple. Kārtākaka means crab. In that zodiac the stars appear in the shape of a crab. In the same way Śīṅhā means lion and Kanyā means a damsel. Tūlā means balance and Vṛṣčika means scorpion; Dhanus means bow and Makara means Makara matsya (horned shark). Kumbha is a water pot and Mina means fish. The name of the zodiac is according to the sign of the zodiac. That is, in what shape the stars in that particular zodiac appear to the people of the earth. The figure of the twelve zodiacs with the earth as centre is given below:

<tr>
<th>Mina</th>
<th>Meṣa</th>
<th>Rāṣabha</th>
<th>Mithuna</th>
</tr>

</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhanus</td>
<td>Vṛṣčika</td>
<td>Tūlā</td>
<td>Kanyā</td>
</tr>

In Kerala and some other places the zodiacs are marked to the right in order beginning with Meṣa, whereas it is marked to the left in the same order in some of the other parts of India.

The earth completes one rotation in 60 Nādikās (24 minutes) i.e. 24 hours. In each rotation these twelve zodiacs face the earth. For a man standing at a particular point on the earth it will take 60%12 i.e. 5 nādikās (two hours) on an average, for a zodiac to pass him. But it may vary in different places according to the difference of the shape of the earth. A month is the time the sun remains in a zodiac. The planet Jupiter takes a year and Saturn two years and a half on an average to pass a zodiac. The calendar shows which are the planets standing in each zodiac and how far they have travelled at a particular time in that particular zodiac. When a particular zodiac is in a particular region of the earth, a man born in that region is said to be born in that zodiac. When a particular place faces the zodiac of Meṣa the child which takes birth in that place is said to be born in the zodiac of Meṣa. The zodiac of birth is given the name Lagna by astronomers. Those who are well-versed in the result-side of astronomy are of opinion that the life, fortune etc. of living beings depend upon the position of the planets in relation to their lagnas.

JYOTIŚKA. A famous serpent born to Kaśyapa by his wife Kadrū. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 203, Stanza 15).

JYOTIŚKAM (M). A peak of mountain Sumeru. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 283, Stanza 5).

JYOTIŚMĀN. An ancient King of Kuśadvipa. This King had seven sons, called Udībhida, Vēnumān, Vairathā, Lambana, Dhti, Prabhikara and Kapila. Each division of that country is given the name of each of these sons. (Viśu Purāṇa, Anāśa 2, Chapter 4).

JYOTISNAKALI. The second daughter of Candra. In Mahā Bhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 98, Stanza 13, it is mentioned that this daughter was extremely beautiful and that the Sun married her.

KA. This letter has the following meanings:

1) Prajāpāti. (Śloka 32, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva, M.B.)
2) A name of Dakṣaprajāpāti. (Śloka 7, Chapter 208, Sānti Parva, M.B.).
3) A name of Viśu. (Śloka 91, Chapter 149, Anuśasan Parva, M.B.).
4) Brahā (Viśu, Maheśvara). (Chapter 348, Agni Purāṇa, M.B.).

KABALABHISHA. A King of Viśnivamśa. (See under VRŚNIVAMŚA).

KABANDHA.

1) General information. The demon who attacked Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa while they were wandering in Daṇḍakāranya after the abduction of Sītā by Rāvana.
2) Previous history of Kabandha. There was a King of Gandharvas called Śri. He had a son named Danu. Danu was known as Viśvāvasu also. Viśvāvasu once performed a penance to propitiate Brahma for long life and Brahmac appeared before him and blessed him with immortality. Arrogant of this acquisition he roamed about as he pleased.

One day he attacked Indra and the latter furious at his impudence used the Vajrāydhau on him and the head and thighs of Viśvāvasu were squeezed into his body. Viśvāvasu pleaded that he should be given some way to take his food. Indra then granted him two very long hands and a mouth on his belly. Then Viśvāvasu spent his days in a forest near the Matangiśrama in Krau̇n̄cāranya bearing the name Kabandha (Headless trunk). Indra added that he would attain his real form when Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa cut his hands.1

A favourite pastime of Kabandha was to frighten the sages. One day he attacked a sage called śhūlaśīras and that sage cursed him saying that he would retain his ugly figure for ever. The demon pleaded for relief and the sage said that he would regain his original figure when Rāma cut his hands and left him in the desolate forest. From that day onwards Kabandha lived there waiting for Śri Rāma. (Śrāvaṇ 70, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

3) Kabandha meets Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Jāṭayu was lying half dead by a blow from the sword of Rāvana and Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa went to him and talked to him. He gave them some information regarding Sītā before he died. After burning the body of Jāṭayu in a funeral pyre Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa went westwards. They entered the Krau̇n̄cāranya and reached Mataiagavana. There they saw a great cave. A huge demoness attacked them near that cave and seeing the beautiful form of Lakṣmaṇa she invited him for amorous plays. Lakṣmaṇa cut off her ear, nose and breasts. Then they entered deep into the forests. Bad omens greeted them.

1. "I am the son of Śri named Danu" says Kabandha to Lakṣmaṇa in Śloka 8, Chapter 71, of the Aranyā Kāṇḍa of Vālmiki Rāmāyana. In Śloka 42, Chapter 279 of Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Kabandha says, "I am a gandharva, Viśvāvasu and came to be born in a demoniac womb by the curse of a brahmī."
Before long they saw Kabandha rushing towards them. He is described thus in the Mahābhārata:

"He was as big as a mountain, dark as a black cloud, with pointed hairs all over his body and looked fierce with a voice as loud as thunder. He had an eye on his stomach, round and yellow, emitting a glare like a fire-flame. Looking wicked he thrust his big tongue out of his huge mouth licking the sides."

The demon stretched out his big hands and caught hold of Śrī Rāma in his right hand and Lakṣaṇa in his left hand. Finding themselves helpless in his hands Lakṣaṇa implored Rāma to flee away from the demon leaving him alone. Śrī Rāma cut off Kabandha's right hand and Lakṣaṇa cut off the left hand. Kabandha then asked them who they were. Kabandha told Rāma and Lakṣaṇa his previous story and then fell dead. Rāma and Lakṣaṇa burnt the dead body in a funeral pyre. He rose up in the air as the Gandharva King of old and advised Śrī Rāma to go to Sugriva for knowing more about Sītā. (Sargas 70 to 72, Aranyaka Kanda, Vālmiki Rāmâyana).

KACA. The first son of Brhaspati. That extremely beautiful boy was a great favourite of the devas.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu—Brahma—Āṅgiras—Brhaspati—Kaca.

2) How he studied the secret of Mṛtasājnīvī. The devas and Asuras always quarrelled with each other. Devas accepted Brhaspati as their guru and the asuras made Śrīkācārya their guru. Śrīkācārya knew an art which Brhaspati did not know, the secret of Mṛtasājnīvī. When the devas cut the Asuras to pieces, Śrīkācārya used to bring them back to life by his knowledge of Mṛtasājnīvī. Mṛtasājnīvī is the art of reviving the dead.

Devas were at a loss to know what to do. They wanted to learn the secret of Mṛtasājnīvī from Śrīkācārya somehow. It was imperative that they should learn it. Then they found out a way. They sent Kaca, son of Brhaspati, to Śrīkācārya.

Kaca went to Śrīkācārya and told him that he was the son of Brhaspati and had come to him to be his disciple for a period of a thousand years doing service to him. The modesty of the boy appealed to Śrīkācārya and he accepted Kaca as his disciple.

Devayāni, daughter of Śrīkācārya, fell in love with Kaca. They were always together as an inseparable couple. Asuras did not like the advent of Kaca to the Āśrama of Śrīkācārya. They knew that he had come to study the secrets of the Asuras. Once Kaca went alone to look after the cows and the Asuras followed him stealthily. When Kaca entered deep into the forest the Asuras killed him and gave him to the wolves.

It became dusk. The cows returned to the Āśrama without the cowherd. Devayāni waited for a long time for Kaca to come. Not seeing him Devayāni went weeping to her father and said, "Oh, father, the sun has set. You have performed your nightly fire sacrifice. The cattle have come back by themselves and still Kaca has not returned home. I fear he is dead or has been killed. I cannot live without him."

The affectionate Śrīkācārya could not bear the sight of his dear daughter weeping and so he went to the forest with Devayāni and employing the art of Saṇḍhivī he invoked the dead youth to appear. At once Kaca came back to life and stood before them. All the three then returned to the āśrama happily.

The anger of the Asuras against Kaca knew no bounds. On another occasion the Asuras seized him and after killing him pounded his body into a paste and mixed it up in sea-water. This time also, at the request of Devayāni, Śrīkācārya brought him back to life. The third time the Asuras burnt the body of Kaca and mixed the ashes in wine and served it to Śrīkācārya to drink. The disciple thus went inside the belly of the guru. Dusk came, the cattle came and still Kaca did not return and Devayāni reported the matter to her father. Śrīkācārya sat for some time in meditation and then he knew that Kaca was in his own stomach. If he got Kaca out, he would burst his stomach and Śrūka would die and if he did not get him out his daughter would burst her heart and die. Śrīkācārya was in a fix.

He asked Kaca how he got in and he replied that it was through the wine. Śrūka imparted to Kaca the art of Mṛtasājnīvī and Kaca lying within the stomach repeated it. Then Śrūka cārya called Kaca by name and Kaca came out bursting the stomach of his guru. The preceptor lay dead and by employing the art of Mṛtasājnīvī he had learnt, Kaca brought his guru to life. Śrūka cārya eschewed wine from that day onwards and declared it as a forbidden drink to brahmins. Śrūka cārya said that because Kaca was reborn from his stomach he must be deemed his son.

3) Kaca was cursed. Kaca remained for some more time under the tutelage of Śrūka cārya and when his education became complete he took leave of his preceptor and also Devayāni. Devayāni followed him for a long distance from the hermitage and requested him to marry her. Kaca replied he could not do so because he had become a brother to Devayāni. Devayāni got angry and cursed him saying that he would not be able to use the art of Mṛtasājnīvī he had learnt from her father. Kaca cursed her back saying that none of the sons of sages would marry her. Kaca however felt relieved that though he would not be able to practise the art, his disciples would be able to do so. He went back to Devaloka and was heartily welcomed by all the devas. He then imparted the art of Mṛtasājnīvī to the devas. (Chapters 76 and 77, Adi Parva, M.B.).

4) Kaca visits Bhīṣma. Kaca was also one among the several people who visited Bhīṣma while the latter was lying on a bed of arrows awaiting death. (Sloka 9, Chapter 47, Śaṇḍi Parva, M.B.).

KACCHAM. An ancient place of habitation. (Sloka 19, Chapter 54, Śaṇḍi Parva).

KACCHAPAM. One of the nine treasures of Kubera.

KACCHAPI. Name of the harp of Nārada. (Sloka, 19, Chapter 54, Śaṇḍi Parva, M.B.).

KADALIGARBHĀ. Daughter of the great sage Maṇḍakaṇa. There is a story about her in Kāthāśārītāgāra.

There was once a city called Ikṣuṣmati. It was on the banks of the river Ikṣuṣmatī. It was Viśvāmitra who set up that river and city. In a hermitage in the thick forest on the shores of Ikṣuṣmatī lived a sage, Maṇḍakaṇa performing penance. One day the beautiful nymph Menakā came thither from above. As a wind blew, her upper garment was displaced. Seeing her bare body, Maṇḍakaṇa had emission. The semen of the sage fell into a Kadali (plantain) tree and from there arose a maiden, extremely beautiful. Because she was born from Kadali she was called Kadaligarbhā. Kadaligarbhā grew up into a beautiful lady and one day a King named Drīḍhavarmā came that way while hunting and seeing Kadaligarbhā he fell in love with her and married her with the permission of Maṅkapaka. The Devas advised her to scatter mustard seeds on the way to her husband’s house and in case her husband abandoned her she should be guided by the mustard plants to return home. She did so.

One day by the evil advice of a barber the King divorced her and she returned to the Aśrama by following the young mustard plants. But Maṅkapaka took her back to the King. (Tārāṅga 6, Madanamaṇ-jukālamba, Kathāsaraśīgāra).

KADALIVANA. This grove is situated on the banks of Kuberapuṣkārini which abounded in Saguṇdhika flowers. There were different kinds of plantain fruits of golden hue in this grove, Hanumān resided in it. (Chapter 146, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KĀDA MBARI. A river flowing westwards in Jambūdviṣa. In Bāhāgavata 5th Skandha ii is said that this river got its name "Kādambari" because it had the hollow trunk of a Kadamba tree as its source.

KADAMBARI II. An excellent story book in prose written in Sanskrit by the great Sanskrit poet Bāṇabhāṭṭa. Kādambari is the heroine of the story.

KADHMOR. A saintly King. He is worthy of being remembered in the morning. (Chapter 165, Anuśāsana Parva).

KADRU. Wife of Kaśyapa and daughter of Dakṣaprājāpati.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus:—Viṣṇu—Brahmā—Dakṣa—Kadru.

2) Kādura—Wife or daughter of Kaśyapa? Whether Kadru was the wife or daughter of Kaśyapa is a question which remains unanswered still in the Purāṇas. Chapter 65 of Bhāṣa Bhāratā states like this.

The six spiritual sons of Brahmā are: Marici, Arigas, Atri, Pulasty, Pulaha and Kratu. Marici got a son named Kaśyapa and he married the thirteen daughters of Dakṣa, namely, Aditi, Diti, Kalā, Danāyus, Danu, Śrīmihā, Krodha, Pradēh, Viśvā, Vinata, Kapiḷa, Muni and Kadru. So according to this, Kadru was the wife of Kaśyapa.

But the 14th Sarga of Aranyā Kaṇḍa of Vālmiki Rāma-yāna states:

Dakṣaprājāpati got sixty illustrious daughters and of these Kaśyapa married—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kāli, Tāmā, Krodhavāsa, Muni and Surāśa. Krodhavāsa gave birth to eight daughters. They were: Mṛgha, Mrga-mandā, Harī, Bhadramatā, Mātāngi, Sārdūli, Śvetā, Śrābhi, Surāśa and Kadru.

Tāmā another wife of Kaśyapa gave birth to five daughters, namely, Krauṣṭi, Bhāṣi, Śyenī, Śrīdharaśri and Śuki. Krauṣṭi gave birth to owls, Bhāṣi to Bhāsas, Śyenī to eagles and vultures, Śrīdharaśri to swans and Śuki to Nātā. Nātā gave birth to Vinata.

Thus, according to the Rāmāyaṇa Kadru was the daughter of Kaśyapa born of his wife Krodhavāsa. Again Vinata who is spoken of as the elder sister of Kadru in Mahābhārata is the daughter of the grand-daughter of Kaśyapa. This means that Kadru’s mother and Vinata’s grand mother’s mother were sisters. But both of them looked after Kaśyapa as if they were direct sisters.

3) Kādura, mother of serpents. Kadru and Vinata lived serving Kaśyapa. Kaśyapa was pleased with them and asked them what boon they wanted. Kadru asked for a thousand serpents to be born of her and Vinata asked for two sons who would be braver and more brilliant than the sons of Kadru. Kaśyapa granted them what they asked for and when Kadru and Vinata became pregnant he left for the forest.

After some time Kadru delivered a thousand eggs and Vinata two eggs. Both of them kept the eggs in warm jars and after five hundred years the thousand eggs of Kadru burst letting out a thousand serpents. Vinata became impatient and broke open an egg of hers. Out came from it a half developed being and that was Aruṇa. Aruṇa cursed her for being impatient and said “You let me out half developed because of your over-ambitions and you will, therefore, become a servant of Kadru. Keep the other egg for another five hundred years. Then a very powerful son will come out of it and that son will relieve you of your servitude to Kadru”. So saying he rose up in the air and became the charioteer of the sun. After five hundred years the other egg of Vinata broke and Garuḍa came out. (Chapter 16, Adi Parva, M.B.)

4) Sons of Kādura. Names of the prominent sons of Kādura are given below:

All the serpents in the world have been born from these prominent serpents. (Chapter 35, Adi Parva, M.B.).

5) Kādura cures her sons. Once Kadru called Vinata to her side and asked her the colour of Uccalīśravas, the horse of Indra. It was purely a white horse and Vinata told so. But Kadru said its tail was black. Each stood firm in her statement and then Kadru made a bet. She who was defeated in the bet should serve the other as her slave. Vinata agreed. Kadru wanted to cheat Vinata and so asked her sons to remain suspended from the tail of the horse in such an artful way that the tail would look black from a distance. Some of her sons refused to be a party to this deceit and Kadru cursed them saying that they would all be burnt in the Sarpasattra of Janamejaya. Kaśyapa did not like the curse. But Brahmā came there and said that the serpents as a class were injurious to society and as such a curse of that nature was necessary. Brahmā then taught him Visasanāhāravidiṣa (Treatment of snake-poisoning). (Chapter 20, Adi Parva, M.B.).
6) Kadru and children go to Rāmaṇiyaka. Once Kadru told Vinātā. “Vinātā, take me to the island of Rāmaṇiyaka in the middle of the ocean. It is a beautiful place to stay. Let your son, Garuḍa, take my sons to that place.” Vinātā took Kadru and Garuḍa took her children during the journey. Garuḍa rose high up in the air near the sun and the serpents began to feel the heat unbearable and began to get charred. Kadru then prayed to Indra and the latter then sent a heavy downpour of rains. This saved the serpents from being burnt to death and they reached the island of Rāmaṇiyaka safe. (Chapters 25 and 26, Ādi Parva, M.B.).

7) Other details.
(i) Kadru lives in the court of Brahmā worshipping him. (Chapter 11, Sābhā Parva, M.B.).
(ii) Kadru taking the form of Skanda—graha in an infinitely minute size enters the wombs of women and eats the embryo. (Chapter 230, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAHODA (KAHOĐAKA — KHAGOĐAKA). A sage the disciple and son-in-law of Uddālaka. He was the father of the sage Aṣṭāvakra. Uddālaka had another name “Śvetaketu”. He was a sage who had personally seen and talked to the goddess Sarasvatī. It was at that time that Kadru became his disciple. Kadru who was of a gentle nature served his preceptor for a long time and won his favour. He was immensely pleased and after teaching the necessary things gave his daughter Sujātā in marriage to Kadru. In due course, Sujātā became pregnant. One day, the child in the womb cried out that there was a mistake in his father’s recitation of the Vedas. Kadru was displeased at this. He cursed the child that he would be born with a body having eight bends (curves). So the boy was named “Aṣṭāvakra” (one who has eight bends). Sujātā who was poor, once sent Kadru to King Janaka for some money. Kadru who was defeated in a dispute was immersed in water. Aṣṭāvakra rescued his father. (See under Aṣṭāvakra).

KAHOLA. An ancient sage who flourished in Indra’s assembly. (Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7).

KAIKASI. Mother of Rāvaṇa.
1) Birth. From the wrath of Brahmā the giant Praheṭi was born and from Brahmā’s hunger the demi-god Heti was born. The son Vidyutkeśa was born to Heti, of Bhāyā the sister of Kāla (God of death—Time). Vidyutkeśa married Sālakaṭāṅkā the daughter of Sandhyā. A son named Sukeśa was born to them. Sukeśa married Devavati daughter of Manimaya, a Gandharva. Three sons Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī were born to them. The three brothers Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī married Sundari, Ketumālī and Vasudhā respectively, the three daughters of Narmadā, a Gandharva woman. To Sumālī, by his wife Ketumālī, were born the ten sons, Prahasha, Akampana, Viṅkaṭa, Kālakamukha, Dhūmrakṣa, Daṇḍa, Supārśva, Sainhrāda, Prākvāta and Bhāsakarna and four daughters Vekā (Bhā), Puspotkaṭa, Kaikasi and Kumbhinaśi.
2) Marriage. As Sumālī was walking through forests with his wives and daughters, he saw so many Yaksas (demi-gods) going in planes to pay homage to Viśravāṇa. Sumālī understood that Viśravāṇa became worthy of homage because he was the son of Viśravas. So he took his daughter Kaikasi and left her in the house of Viśravas. After a while, being pleased with her services, Viśravas took her as his wife. Once she requested her husband for children. Accordingly she got Rāvana, Kumbhakarṇa and Viṭṭhaṇa as sons.

KAKEYI I.
1) General information. One of the wives of Daśaratha, who had three wives, Kausalyā, Kaikēyī and Sumitrā. It is mentioned in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Ayodhyā Kāṇḍa, Sarga 70, Stanza 28 that Kaikēyī was the sister of Yudhāji, the King of Kekaya. Kekaya was seven days’ journey away from Ayodhya. 2) Getting boons. In days of old there was a battle between the devas and the asuras and Daśaratha went to the world of Devas, with Kaikēyī, in a chariot to help Indra against the Asuras. The devas were in a sorry plight due to the illusive and sorcerous mode of fighting of Sambara the Asura and his men. Daśaratha faced the Asuras in ten directions at the same time and fought with them. In this fight his chariot had to be turned to every direction and up and down so swiftly that the bolt of the wheel slipped out and the wheel was about to come off when Kaikēyī inserted her thumb in the hole of the bolt and kept the chariot safe and steady. The King was not aware of this bravery on the part of his wife. At last when he came to know of this he promised to give her two boons. The queen said that she would ask for those two boons later, as she didn’t want anything then. After this the King and the queen returned to their country. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sarga 9; Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa).
3) Request for the boons and the forest life of Śrī Rāma. As the celebration of anointing Śrī Rāma as the Heir apparent in Ayodhya was going on, the humpy Mantharā approached Kaikēyī and advised her on the ways of making her son Bharata King and sending Śrī Rāma to forest. At first Kaikēyī refused to agree to this, but at last she succumbed to the repeated advice of Mantharā. Daśaratha came to see Kaikēyī who was lying in grief. Making use of this opportunity Kaikēyī requested for the granting of the two boons promised earlier. One boon was that Bharata should be anointed as heir apparent making use of the preparations made for Śrī Rāma and the other boon was that Śrī Rāma should live in forest, wearing bark of trees and matted hair for fourteen years. When Daśaratha heard these requests he became unconscious. But he granted her wishes.

KAKEYI II. Wife of Ajāmidha, a King of the Pūru dynasty. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 93, Stanza 37).

KAKEYI III. Sudeśṇī, the wife of the King of Viṁśata was known by the name Kaikēyī also. She was the daughter of Kekaya, the King of Sūta, born of his wife Mālavī. As she was the daughter of Kekaya, she got the name Kaikēyī. (M.B. Viṁśata Parva, Chapter 16). Besides, it is stated in the Purāṇas that all the princesses of the kingdom of Kekaya were called by the name Kaikēyī.

KAILASA (KAILASAKA). A serpent belonging to the Kaśyapa family. Mention is made about this serpent in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 11.

KAILASA.
1) General information. The mount Mahāmeru has an area of eighteen thousand nāzhikas (Indian mile of 4 Kosa) and a height of two thousand nāzhikas. On the eastern side of this mount there are two mountains called Jaṭhara and Devakūṭa. Pavamāna and Pāriyātra are the two mountains on the western side. On the south there are the two mountains of Kaṭailasa and Karavīra. The two mountains on the north are called Triśriṅga and Makaraṇī. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapters 109 and 141 that the abodes of Siva and Kubera are on the mount Kaṭailasa. Once, to please Siva, Mahāviṣṇu performed penance on Kaṭailasa. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 222, Stanza 33 to 40). It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 3 that the mountain Mahānāka stands to the north of Kaṭailasa. Once Vyāsa went to Kaṭailasa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 43, Stanza 17). In Vana Parva, Chapter 106, mention is made that the King Sagara, with his two queens, once went to Kaṭailasa for penance. It was on the Kaṭailasa that Bhagiratha performed penance to propitiate Siva to bring down Gaṅgā. Kaṭailasa is hundred yojanas high. The devas come to this place daily and return. It is mentioned in Sabhā Parva, Chapter 141, that in the place where Kubera lives on Kaṭailasa there live a large number of Yakṣas (deities), Rākṣasas (giants) Kinnaras (celestial musicians), Garuḍas (hawks) Māṇīgaras (elephants) and Gandharvas (celestial beings). The lake of lotus of Kubera which was reached by Bhīmasena once, was in Kaṭailasa. In Vana Parva, it is mentioned that the Pāṇḍavas visited Kaṭailasa during their forest life. It could be understood from Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 83 that Kaṁadhenu performed penance on the Kaṭailasa, once.

KAŚIKA. See under Jyāmāgha.

KAŚIKA (M). An ancient country in Bhārata. It is mentioned in Mahā Bhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 14 that Bhīmamakṣa the King of Vidarbha conquered this country.

KAṬĀBAHA.

1) General information. Kaṭābaḥa was the brother of Madhu, an Asura (demon). These two brothers are known in the Purāṇas as Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas.

2) Origin. In the Purāṇas, two stories slightly different from each other, occur about the birth of Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa. One story occurs in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 10 and the other in Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva. In Devī Purāṇa, Chapter 1, it is stated as follows:—

   In the beginning there was no earth or any other planet. There was only water. Mahāviṣṇu slept on the surface of the water. From the navel of Mahāviṣṇu the stalk of a lotus grew up and there was a lotus flower at the end of the stalk. Brahmac was born in the lotus flower. Brahmac stayed in the flower in deep meditation reciting the Vedas. Ear-wax flowed out from both the ears of Mahāviṣṇu. From the ear-wax two Asuras Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa were born.

   The following occurs in the Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva, Chapter 348 about the birth of Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas.

   A lotus flower grew up from the navel of Mahāviṣṇu and Brahmac was born in the flower. In the flower there were two drops of water created by Mahāviṣṇu. One drop was as sweet as honey and from that drop was born the Asura Madhu with the attributes of tamas (darkness). The other drop was hard and from it Kaṭābaḥa was born with the attribute of Rajas (activity).

3) Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas’ acquiring boons. Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas were born in water, grew up in water and walked on the surface of water, haughty and arrogant. They began to think about how the big flood of water came into existence. Then Devī appeared before them and taught them the mantra or incantation of Vāgbija (origin of logos). Reciting this mantra, Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa worshiped Devī for thousand years. Devī appeared and asked them what they wished. They wanted the boon that death should befall them only as they desired. Devī granted them the boon. After this they became haughtier because of the boon, and lived in the water playing with the creatures in water having nobody to confront them (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 1).

4) The theft of the Vedas. Madhu Kaṭābaḥa saw Brahmac lying in the lotus flower reciting the four Vedas which he had created. They caught hold of all the Vedas and went to Pāṭalā, (the nether world) and hid themselves there. Brahmac grew sad at the loss of the Vedas and followed Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas, who began to attack Brahmac. At this Brahmac became terribly afraid of the Asuras and ran to Mahāviṣṇu, who was lying in a deep sleep of contemplation. Brahmac praised him. Mahāviṣṇu woke up. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

5) The death of Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa. According to the request of Brahmac, Mahāviṣṇu confronted Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa. Madhu engaged Viṣṇu in fighting while Kaṭābaḥa took rest and when Madhu became tired, Kaṭābaḥa engaged Viṣṇu in fighting. Thus the fight went on for a long time and Viṣṇu became tired of continuous fight. Viṣṇu understood that owing to the boon given by Devī the Asuras would die only if they wished for death, and that no body could kill them. So Viṣṇu began to meditate on Devī, who said “It would never be possible for you to kill Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa because of my boon. They could be killed only by deceit. So you may kill them deceitfully”. Hearing these words Mahāviṣṇu approached the Asuras and said to them, “I am much pleased with you. So you may ask for any boon.” Hearing this they laughed and said that they were more powerful than Viṣṇu and that he might ask of them any boon. Taking that opportunity Mahāviṣṇu said “Oh! powerful persons. I ask you to grant me this boon. Give me the boon to kill you.” This request shook them. They were willing to be killed at any place except water. They thought that Viṣṇu would not be powerful enough to kill them. Mahāviṣṇu instantly raised his thighs which were enlarged to a great extent over the water as solid earth seeing which the Asuras enlarged their bodies to the extent of a thousand yojanas. But Mahāviṣṇu enlarged his thighs further, caught hold of Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa, laid them on his thighs and cut off their heads with his discus. All the surface of the sea was covered with the medas (fat) of these Asuras. This medas of Madhu and Kaṭābaḥa collected itself into a lump and became the earth. So the earth got the name ‘Medini’. As the earth was the fat of the Asuras it was not fit for food. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 1).

6) The son of Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas. A horrible son named Dhundhu was born to Madhu-Kaṭābaḥas. He lived under the sand in a wilderness called Ujjalakam. A King of the Ikṣvāku family named Kuvalayāśva killed Dhundhu. So Kuvalayāśva got the name Dhundhumāra. See under Dhundhu. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 202). (Kharā and Atikāya are the rebirths of Madhu and Kaipaṭha. See under Atikāya).

KAITAVA. Another name of Ulüka, the son of Śakuni.

KAITAVA (M). A country in ancient Bhārata. Mention is made about this country in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 18, Stanza 13).

KĀKA A son of Karṣa (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KĀKAM. A town in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma, Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 64, contains a reference to this).

KĀKI I. Original mother of the crows. (See under CROW).

KĀKI II. One of the seven mothers who sucked Subrahmanyā at his birth. The seven mothers were—Kāki, Halimā, Brahmiṅkā, Mālinī, Palalā, Āryā and Mitrā. (M.B. Aranya Parva, Chapter 228, Verse 10).

KĀKA (CROW).
1) Origin. Kaśyapa was the son of Marici, who was the son of Brahmā. Kaśyapa’s wife Tāmṛa had many daughters like Kaṅkī, Śyenī, Bhāṣtī, Grīvī, and Grīvā. From Kaṅkī were born the crows in the world. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

2) Crows—the symbol of sin. There is a reference in Siva Purāṇa to this. Long ago the King of Kāshi had a daughter named Kalāvati. Even in her youth, she received the “Saiva paṅkaśkara mantra.” After that, she was married by Dāśārha, King of Mathurā, who was a sinner. When he touched Kalāvati who was a holy woman, he experienced unbearable heat. Kalāvati said that it was because of the King’s sin. So she took Dāśārha to the sage Garga, who purified Dāśārha with his mantras (incantations) and made him stand in water. At once the King’s sins came out of his body in the shape of crows. Some of them flew away. Many of them fell down with their wings burnt. Seeing this, the sage Garga said that all those crows were the volume of sins accumulated in the course of the innumerable births through which he had passed. (Siva Purāṇa, Paṅkaśkara Māhāmya).

3) T e Crow and Rice-offerings. In Uttara Rāmāyaṇa there is a story about the crow’s right to eat the offering of rice to Pīṭra. Once a King named Marutta performed a Maheśvara sattra. Indra and other gods attended the sattra. Hearing about this, Rāvaṇa came that way. The frightened gods fled away assuming the forms of different birds. Yama escaped in the form of a crow. From that time, Yama was pleased with crows. He gave a blessing that in future, when human beings worship the pīṭras by offering rice to them, the crows will have the right to eat that rice. Thus the right of the crows to eat offerings of rice, originated from that time. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KAKŚA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 49, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAKŚAKA. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sārpa sattra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 6, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

KAKŚASENA I.
1) General information. (i) A King who was the grandson of Avikṣit and son of Parikṣit. For genealogy see ‘Parikṣit’.

(ii) Ugrasena, Citrasena, Indrasena, Suṣeṇa and Bhimasena were his brothers. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

2) Other details.
(i) Kakaṣena was a member of the court of Yama. (Chapter 8, Śābha Parva).

(ii) Kakaṣena was considered to be one among the pious souls, like Śibi, Pratardana, Rantideva, Ambariṣa, Janamejaya, Vṛṣārdbhi, Paraśurāma, Śrī Rāma, Karandhama and Mitrasaṅga who had attained salvation by their charity and righteousness. Mahābhārata states that Kakaṣena the saintly king attained salvation by presenting gifts to the great Vasīṣṭha. (Sloka 14, Chapter 137, Anuvāsana Parva).

KAKŚASENA II. There was another King called Kakaṣena in the court of Dharmaputra. (Sloka 22, Chapter 4, Śābha Parva).

KAKŚASENĀŚRAMA. An Śārana situated on the top of the mountain, Asita. Perhaps this was constructed by Kakaṣena. (Sloka 12, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).

KAKŚEYU (KRŚEYU). Son of Raudravā born of a nymph called Miśrakeṣi. He had nine brothers, named Rķseyu, Sannateyu, Gṛḥteyu (Kyṛteyu), Citeyu, Śhaṇḍileyu, Dharmaṇuyu, Sammiteyu, Rṣteyu and Maitunāra. For genealogy see under ‘Pūruvaṁśa’. (Sloka 10, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

KAKŚIVĀN I. This was a Rṣi well praised in the Rgveda.

1) Birth. King Kaliṅga did not have children for a long time. The King, therefore requested the sage Dirghatamas (Gautama) to get a son for him by his queen. The sage consented. But the queen did not like to sleep with the old sage. She therefore requested her servant maid, Uṣī, to lie with the sage. Kakśivān was the son born to Dirghatamas of Uṣī. (Sūkta 125, Anuvāka 18, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

2) Other details.
(i) He was of the family of Āṅgiras and he lived in a hermitage in the east. (Chapter 206, Śānti Parva, and Chapter 135, Anuvāsana Parva).

(ii) He praised Viṣṇu by reciting the Rks with deep concentration and acquired many virtues. (Chapter 292, Śānti Parva).

(iii) Mahābhārata states that Kakśivān was the preceptor of Indra and also the creator of the word with Rudratejas (majesty equal to that of Śiva). Yavakṛti, Raibhya, Arvāvasu, Parāvasu, Kakśivān, Āṅgiras and Kaṃva are seven Barhiṣads (a set of men born of Brahmā) who are also gurus of Indra living in the east. (Chapter 150, Anuvāsana Parva).

(iv) Kakśivān was famous among the Jayavans. (Sūkta 18, Anuvāka 5, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(v) To test the strength of Kakśivān he was once given a hundred pitchers of liquor by the Āśins. (Sūkta 116, Anuvāka 17, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(vi) Kakśivān who was returning home from the Āśrama of the preceptor after completing his education spent one night at a place on the way. In the morning when he awoke he saw Svanaya son of King Bhāva-yavya before him. The beautiful boy had strayed to that place by accident while playing with his friends nearby. Kakśivān was attracted by the enchanting features of the boy and decided to make him the husband of his daughter. Svanaya on knowing the details regarding Kāṣṭhāvan took him to his father’s palace and the King received the sage with respect and gave him many presents. (Śūkta 125, Anuvāka 18, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

KĀṢṬHĀVAN II. A king of ancient India. He was the father of Bhadrā, wife of Śrītāśvā. (Śloka 17, Chapter 20, Adi Parva).

KĀṢṬHĀVAN. A son of Mahārṣi Gautama. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 3 states that at the time when Gautama was living in Gṛivāra, he had connection with a Śūdra woman of Uśinara land and as a result of it Kāṣṭhāvan was born to her. This Gautama was not the husband of Alahāya.1 Kāṣṭhāvan had a son named Caṇḍakaustika and two daughters named Bhadrā and Ghoṣa. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 17 states that Kāṣṭhāvan flourished in Yudhiṣṭhīra’s assembly.

KĀṢṬHĀVANAṬAUTA. A female sage named Ghoṣā who was the daughter of the sage Kāṣṭhāvan. As she was suffering from the disease of leprosy, no one was prepared to marry her. She composed a mantra in praise of the Asvinīdevas. They cured her of her disease. After that she got married. Besides Ghoṣā, Kāṣṭhāvan had another daughter named Bhadrā. (See under Bhadrā).

KAKUTSTHA. A son of Śaśāda, a king of the Iḍavāku dynasty. He was the father of Anenas. (See under Kākutstha).

KAKUTSTHA. Śrī Rāma got the name Kākutstha because he was born in the dynasty of Kākutstha. (See under Kākutstha).

KALĀ I. A measure of time. See under Kālamāṇa.

KALĀ II. Art. The sixty-four arts are as under ;—
1. Gita (music).
2. Vādyā (instrumental music).
3. Nṛtta (Dancing).
5. Citra (painting).
6. Acanāmṛta (making of types).

KĀLA I. (YAMA). The god of Death. When the life span of each living being is allotted by Brahmadeśa at an end. Yama sends his agents and takes the soul to Yama-purī (the city of Yama). From there, the holy souls are sent to Vaikuṇṭha (Heaven), the abode of Viṣṇu and the sinful souls to Hell.

1) Genealogy and birth of Yama. From Mahāviśnu were descended in the following order—Brahmadeśa, Marici, Kaśyapa, Śrīva (Sun), Yama (Kāla).

Śrīva married Sārījī, daughter of Viśvakarmā. They had three children, Manu, Yama and Yami. Of them, Yama has the task of taking away the souls of those whose life-span is at an end. Once Sārījī who was unable to bear the dazzling brilliancy of Śrīva, ordered her maid Čhāyā to attend on him and went to the forest for performing penance. Mistaking her for his wife Sārījī, Śrīva beget of her three sons namely, Sānīcāra, Manu and Tapaṭi. Once Čhāyā cursed Yama for disobedience. Then Śrīva and Yama understood that she was not Sārījī. After that the Āvini-kumāras, Revanta and Bhaya were born to Śrīva and Sārījī. Thus Viṣṇu Purāṇā, Part III, Chapter 2 says that Yama was the brother of Manu, Yami, the Āvini Kumāras, Tapaṭi, Sanaścāra and Bhaya. Yama’s sister Bhaya was married by the Avara, Hēti. Sūrīthā was the eldest daughter of Yama. Aṅga married her. The famous King Vena was her son. (Viṣṇu Purāṇā, Part I, Chapter 13).

2) Yama is a Dikāḷaka. Once Kubera offered penance to Brahmā for ten thousand years in water, head downwards and in the middle of Pañceagni. Brahmā who was pleased, appeared before him and Kubera prayed to him that he should be made one of the Lokapālakas. Accordingly Brahmā ordered that thenceforth, Indra should rule in the East, Yama in the South, Varuṇa in the West, and Kubera in the North. Yama’s city is called Saṁyāminī. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

3) Curse on Yama. Yama was once cursed by the sage Ani Māṇḍavya. It was as a result of it that Yama was born as Vidura. (For details see under Ani Māṇḍavya).

4) Yama became Mahārṣi. Śrī Rāma who returned after his forest life became king of Ayodyā. He ruled over

1. It is also stated elsewhere that Kāṣṭhāvan was the son of Dirghatama, the father of Gautama. See under Dirghatama.

2. Kāla and Dharma are not the same person. See under Dharma.
the country for 11,000 years. Then it was time to recall Mahāvīśṇu who had incarnated as Śrī Rāma, to Vaikūṇṭha. Bṛhmaṇ sent Yama to the earth to bring back Śrī Rāma. Yama who assumed the guise of a young Mahārṣi, went to Ayodhya and visited Śrī Rāma. He said that he was the disciple of the sage Atibala and had come to tell him a secret. So Lakṣmaṇa was posted at the entrance to prevent anyone from entering the room. It was announced that anyone who tried to enter would be slaughtered. After that, while Śrī Rāma and Yama were having their secret talk, Durvāsas, the sage, who was hungry after a fast of 1,000 years, arrived at the door, asking for food. Lakṣmaṇa told him humbly that he could not be allowed to enter just then. Durvāsas, who became furious, was about to curse the whole race of Kings. So Lakṣmaṇa entered the room and informed Śrī Rāma of the arrival of Durvāsas. At the same time, in fulfilment of the order, he was ready to be slaughtered. Vasiṣṭha suggested that it would be enough if Lakṣmaṇa was banished from the palace. Accordingly he was expelled and went and drowned himself in the depths of the river Sarayū. Śrī Rāma who was broken-hearted at his separation from Lakṣmaṇa went to the same river and drowned himself there shortly after. Yama then took their souls to Vaikūṇṭha. (Uttara Rāmāyana.)

5) Yama became crow. In Uttara Rāmāyana there is a story that at Marutta’s Yāga, Yama who was frightened at the sight of Rāvana, escaped in the form of a crow. (For details, see under Crow.)

6) An Age without Yama. In the Purāṇas there are references to three periods when there was no Yama.

(1) One such period was in Kṛtyuga. At that time there was no death on earth which became overcrowded with living beings. Unable to bear their weight, the earth sank down to a depth of 100 yojanas. The goddess of Earth offered tearful prayers to Mahāvīśṇu, who incarnated as Varāha (pig) and lifted up the earth 100 yojanas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 142.)

(2) When Mārkaṇḍeya reached the age of sixteen, Yama went to him to take away his life. Mārkaṇḍeya hid himself behind the idol of Śiva. Yama threw his noose at him but it fell round Śiva’s neck. Śiva opened his third eye and glared at Yama who was burnt to ashes in its fire. (See under Mārkaṇḍeya.)

(3) See under Pāñcālī, Para 1, Sub Para 2.

7) Yama returned Satyav n’t Life. (See under Satyavān.)

8) Yama and King Nṛga. See under Nṛga.

9) Yamaçūra (the city of Yama). Yamaçūra is thousand yojanas in extent. There is an entrance on each of the four sides. On one side of the city stands Citragupta’s mansion. The fort surrounding the city is made of iron. There are a hundred streets in Yamaçūra. They are all decorated with banners and festoons. There is a group of people in Citragupta’s mansion. They are engaged in calculating the life-span of living beings. They take into account the vices and virtues of human beings. To the south of Citragupta’s residence is situated “Jvaramandira” (the abode of diseases). Adjacent to it are the abodes of all kinds of diseases, each disease having its own abode. Yama’s home is situated at a distance of twenty yojanas from the abode of Citragupta. It has an area of two hundred yojanas and a height of fifty yojanas. It is supported by one thousand columns. On one side of it there is an extensive assembly hall. It is here that those who have led virtuous lives in the world, find their abode after death. They lead a life of eternal heavenly bliss there. (Garuḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 14.)

(10) Naraka (Hell). There is a world called Pīṭḍloka in the middle of the three worlds, on their southern side below the earth and above the Atala loka. The Agniśvātās and other pīṭḍs stay there in meditative trance for securing prosperity to those who come to pīṭḍloka. Yama is the ruler of pīṭḍloka. Since he is scrupulous in imparting justice, Yama is also called Yamadharma. He administers justice with an even hand to all living beings brought there by his agents, according to their virtues and vices during their earthly lives. He has power to assess the virtues and vices of people and to assign suitable punishments to them, but not to alter the laws or methods of punishment. Sinners are sent to the different Narakas by Yamadharma according to the nature and seriousness of their sins. The Purāṇas refer to twentyeight Narakas in all. They are:—

(1) Tāmīrsrama. Those who rob others of their wealth, wives, children etc., are bound with ropes by Yama’s servants and cast into the Naraka known as Tāmīrsrama. There, they are given sound beating until they faint. After they recover their senses, the beating is repeated and those who try to escape are bound hand and foot and pushed again into this hell. This is repeated as long as Fate has ordained.

(2) Andḥatāṁsram. This hell is intended for the wife who takes food after deceiving the husband or the husband who takes food after deceiving his wife. The punishment there is the same as that of Tāmīrsrama except the beating. But the excruciating pain suffered by the victims on being tied fast with Yama’s rope by his servants, makes them fall down senseless.

(3) Rauravam. This is the hell into which those who have persecuted other living beings are cast. Those who seize and enjoy another man’s property or resources, also come under ‘Persecution’. When such people are thrown into this hell, those whom they had persecuted or cheated while on earth, assume the shape of “ruru” and torment them severely. “Ruru” is a kind of dreadful serpent. This hell is known as “Rauravam” because of the abundance of rurus there.

(4) Mahārauravam. Here also there are ruru serpents. Only they are of a fiercer type. Those who deny the legitimate heirs, their inheritance and possess and enjoy others’ property, are squeezed to death by these terrible serpents coiling round them.

(5) Kumbhīkākam. This is the hell for the punishment of those who kill and eat birds and animals. Here, oil is kept boiled in huge vessels. Yama’s servants plunge sinners into this oil. The period of their torture extends to as many years as there were hairs on the bodies of the birds or animals which they killed and ate.

(6) Kālasūtra (Yamaśūtra). This hell is terribly hot. It is here that those who do not respect their father, mother, elders, etc., are cast. They rush about in the unbearable heat of this hell and drop down exhausted, from time to time.

(7) Asi(ta)patram. This is the hell in which those sinners who abandon svadharmā (one’s own duty) and accept Paradharmā (others’ duty) are flogged by Yama’s servants with whips made of asipatra (sharp-edged sword-shaped leaves). When they run about under the flogging they trip over stones and thorns and fall on their faces. Then they are stabbed with knives made of asipatras. They drop down unconscious and when they recover their senses, the same process is repeated.

(8) Sūkaranukham. Kings who neglect their duties and oppress their subjects by misrule, are punished in this hell. They are crushed to a pulp by beating until they fall down unconscious and when they recover, they are again subjected to the same treatment.

(9) Andhakāpam. This is the hell for punishing those who oppress Brāhmaṇas, gods and the poor. In this Kāpa (well) there are wild beasts like tiger, bear etc. carnivorous birds like eagle, kite etc. venomous creatures like snakes and scorpions and insects like bugs, mosquitoes, etc. The sinners have to endure the constant attacks of these creatures, until the expiry of the period of their punishment.

(10) Kṛmibhojanam (Food for worms). Depraved Brāhmaṇas who take their food without worshipping gods and honouring guests, are thrown into this “Kṛmibhojanam” Naraka which is one lakh yojanas in extent. Worms, insects and serpents sting them and eat them up. Once their bodies are completely eaten up by these creatures, they are provided with new bodies, which are also eaten up in the above manner. They have to continue there in this manner, till the end of their term of punishment.

(11) Tatpāmṛti. Those who plunder or steal other people’s gold, jewels, ornaments or money are cast into the furnaces of this Naraka, which is built of iron and always remains red hot with blazing fire.

(12) Sātmāli. This Naraka is intended for men and women who have committed adultery. A figure made of iron, heated red-hot is placed there. The victim is urged to embrace it. Yama’s servants flog the victim from behind.

(13) Vajrakarṇakaṣṭā. This Naraka is for the punishment of those who have unnatural intercourse with cows and other animals. Here, the guilty people are made to embrace iron images full of diamond needles.

(14) Vaitaraṇi. This is the Naraka for Kings who have violated all ordinances of Śāstras and for adulterers. It is the most terrible place of punishment. Vaitaraṇi is a river filled with human excreta, urine, blood, hair, bones, nails, flesh, fat and all kinds of dirty substances. There are various kinds of ferocious beasts in it. Those who are cast into it are attacked and mauled by these creatures from all sides. The sinners have to spend the term of their punishment, feeding upon the contents of this river.

(15) Pīyodakam. This is a well, filled with excreta, urine, blood, phlegm etc. Brāhmaṇas and others who have intercourse with women of low caste against customs, ordinances etc. vagabonds who wander about irresponsibly like animals and birds and other such sinners are cast into this Naraka.

(16) Prājarodham. This Naraka is for the punishment of Brāhmaṇas who keep dogs, asses and other mean animals and constantly hunt and kill animals for food. Here the servants of Yama gather round the sinners and cut them limb by limb with their arrows and subject them to constant insult.

(17) Viśasanam. This Naraka is for the torture of those who perform Yāga by killing cows to display their wealth and splendour. They will have to remain there during the whole term of their punishment under the constant flogging of Yama’s servants.

(18) Lalabhakṣam. This is the Naraka for lustful people. The lascivious fellow who makes his wife swallow semen, is cast into this hell. Lalabhakṣam is a sea of semen. The sinner lies in it feeding upon semen alone.

(19) Sāraṇeyāśanam. Those guilty of unsocial acts like incendiaryism, poisoning food, mass slaughter, ruining the country, etc. are cast into the Naraka called Sāraṇeyāśana. There, nothing but the flesh of dogs is available for food. There are 700 dogs in that Naraka and all of them are as ferocious as leopards. They attack the sinners who come there from all sides and tear their flesh from their bodies with their teeth.

(20) Asītī. This Naraka is for those guilty of bearing false witness, false swearing or assuming false names. They are hurled into Avī from a mountain which is 100 yojanas in height. The whole region of Avī is always shaken like an ocean with turbulent waves. As soon as the sinners fall into it they are utterly smashed into dust. They are again restored to life and the punishment is repeated.

(21) Ayakhānam. Those who belong to the first three castes viz. Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas—who indulge in drinking Soma, Surā etc. are bound and thrown into this hell. They are forced to drink melted iron in liquid form.

(22) Kṣhārakarīdam. Braggarts and those who insult people of noble birth are cast into this hell. Here, Yama’s servants keep the sinners upside down and torture them in various ways.

(23) Raksobhakṣam. This Naraka is for the punishment of meat-eaters. There are separate compartments in this hell for those who perform human sacrifice, eat human flesh or the flesh of other creatures. All the living beings they had killed before, would have arrived here in advance. They would all join together in attacking, biting and mauling these sinners. Their shrieks and complaints would be of no avail there.

(24) Śūlaprotam. People who take the life of others who have done no harm to them, by deceiving them or by treachery, with weapons like the trident, are thrown into the “Śūlaprotam” hell. Yama’s servants fix each of the sinners of the above class, on the top of a Trident. They are forced to spend the whole term of their punishment in that position, suffering intense thirst and hunger, enduring all the tortures inflicted on them by Yama’s servants.

(25) Dandasākam. Sinners who persecute fellow creatures like venomous serpents are cast into this Naraka. There are many wild beasts and many hooded serpents here. They cat alive, the sinners who fall into this hell.

(26) Vaitārakham. This hell is for those who persecute the creatures living on mountain-peaks, dense forests, hollow trunks of trees, etc. It resembles mountains, caves, forests etc. After throwing them into this hell the sinners are tortured with fire, snake, poison and weapons, just as they had tortured other creatures, while on earth.

(27) Parāyarthanakam. One who denies food to a person who happens to come at meal-time and abuses him, is thrown into this Naraka. The moment he falls into it, his eyes are put out by being pierced with the beaks of cruel birds like the crow, eagle, etc. It is the most painful experience for them.

(28) सुचिमुखम्. Proud and miserly people who refuse to spend money even for the bare necessities of life, find their place in this hell. Those who do not repay the money they have borrowed, will also be cast into this hell. Here, their bodies will be continually pricked and pierced with needles. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha; Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 2, Chapter 6).

12) Mantra (incantation) to invoke Yama.

“Mahīṣāvatva Yāmāgaccha daṇḍahasta mahīśāla/rakṣa tvaṁ dākṣiṇādvarah Vaiavasvata namo śtu te”.

After invoking Yama with this mantra, one should worship with the mantra “Vaiavasvataṁ Saṁgamanam”.

(Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 36).

13) Yama Defeated by Rāvaṇa. Once the sage Nārāyaṇa went to Rāvaṇa and expatiated on the glory and splendour of Yama. Immediately Rāvaṇa set out to Sāntyānā with the intention of subduing Yama. Accepting Rāvaṇa’s challenge, Yama came out. After a terrible battle between them, which lasted for seven days neither of them was able to defeat the other. Both of them had received Brahmac’s boon. In the night of the seventh day, Yama rushed forth with his staff to beat Rāvaṇa to death. Then Rāvaṇa took his Brahmacstra. At that critical moment, Brahmac came to the battle-field and persuaded Yama to withdraw from the fight. Yama retreated to his city and closed the gate. Rāvaṇa went back with a triumphant shout. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

14) Other details concerning Yama.

(i) Yama attended Draupadī’s Svayamivara. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 6).

(ii) It was Yama who performed “Śāmitra” (killing of animals) at the yāga done by devas in the Naimiśāranya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 1).

(iii) In the fight between Indra and Arjuna in Khāḍcavadvāhā, Yama joined the side of Indra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 226, Verse 32).

(iv) Once in a thousand years, Yama comes to Bindusaravara and performs a yāga. (M.B. Saḥbhā Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 15).

(v) Yama is a member of Brahmac’s assembly. (M.B. Saḥbhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 51).

(vi) When Arjuna performed tapas and received Paśupatāstra from Śiva, Yama was pleased and presented Daṇḍāstra to Arjuna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 41, Verse 25).

(vii) Yama was one of the devas who tested and then blessed Nala who went to Damayanti’s Svayamivara. (See under NAL).”

(viii) Indra made Yama, the King of Piṭṛs. (M.B. Udvyoga Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 14).

(ix) Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 26 says that when Devas milked Bhūmidevi, Yama took the form of a calf. (See under Vena).

(x) In Tripuradahanā (burning of Tripura) Yama remained in Saivābhā (the arrow of Śiva, (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 202, Verse 77. See also under TRIPURA).

(xi) Yama presented two warriors, Umrātha and Pramātha to god Skanda). (M.B. Saśya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 30).

(xii) Once Yama gave advice to the sage Gautama on the subject of Dharma. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 192).

(xiii) Yama once gave a boon to a Brahmac named Jāpakā. (See under JĀPAKA. M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 199).

(xiv) Once Mahāviṣṇu taught Yama, Śiva-Sahasranāma. Yama taught it to Nāciketa. (See under ŚIVA and NĀCIKETA. Also M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 17).

(xv) Yama sent his special agents to bring a Brahmac named Śarmi. (See under ŚARMI. Also M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 68).

(xvi) Yama once lectured on the efficacy of giving “tila” (gingelly seed) “jala” (water) and anna (rice) to a Brahmac. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 68).

(xvii) Yama once explained the secrets of Dharma. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 130).

(xviii) Yama used to worship Śiva on the mountain Muśījāvān. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 8).

(xix) Dhūmornā is the name of Yama’s wife. (M.B. Udvyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 9).

(xx) There is a story in Mahābhārata, Ādī Parva about the condition of the world in the absence of Yama. Once Yama started a prolonged yāga at Naimisāranya. At that time there was no death in the world. All living beings continued to live indefinitely. The Devas all joined together and approached Yama with a request to solve the problem. Yama concluded his yāga and resumed his duties and death came to the world again. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 199).

KĀLA II. A Mahāraṣṭra. Mahābhārata, Saśya Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 14, refers to this sage as offering worship to Indra, in Indra’s assembly.

KĀLĀ. A daughter of Daksaprājāpati. (See under Kālikā).

KĀLĀ. See under the word Kālamāṇa.

KĀLA (S) A group of Manes. This group lives in the Brahmasabha. (Chapter 11, Śānti Parva).

KĀLABANDHAKA. An adviser of Mahiṣāsura. Cikgura was his war-minister, Tāmra his finance minister, Asilomā, Prime Minister, and Udarka, Chief of the army. Kālabandhaka, Bāṣkala and Trinetra were the advisers of Mahiṣāsura. (Devi Bhāgavata 5th Skandha).

KĀLĀBHĪTI. A devotee of Śiva. As his father Māṇṭi performed penance for the sake of a son for a thousand years his wife conceived, but did not deliver. Māṇṭi asked the child in his mother’s womb why he did not come out to which the latter replied that he did not come out as he feared the Asura called Kālamārga. (As the child feared Kālamārga it came to be called Kālabhīti). As advised by Śiva, Māṇṭi created in the child knowledge about dharma, renunciation etc. and thus made him conscious about higher knowledge. The child came out of the mother’s womb. In due course of time Kālabhīti took to the worship of Śiva, who blessed him as follows: “Since you have outlived Kālamārga, in future you will become famous as Mahākāla.” (Skanda Purāṇa).

KĀLABRĀHMAṆA. A brahmin, who defeated Kāla. A great effulgence that emanated from his head two hundred years after his continuous Japa (chanting of mantras) blocked the passage of sky-walkers (Devas) and spread to the three worlds. When Brahmac and others asked him to choose any boon, he said that he wanted nothing but chanting the Lord's name and mantras. Again, Brahmā insisted on the brahmin's choosing some boon or other, and then he removed himself to the northern planes of the Himālayas, where also he continued chanting mantras. There too his effulgence became so powerful that Indra deputed celestial women to obstruct his Japa, but they could do nothing in the matter. Then Indra deputed Kāla to end the brahmin's life, but he failed in the attempt. Ultimately King Ikṣvāku came to the brahmin and asked for half the power he had earned by his tapas, which the brahmin readily granted. And, Ikṣvāku became thus famous all over the world. (Kāthāsīrīśāgāra, Sūrya-prabhālambākā.)

KĀLADA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

KĀLADANTAKA (KĀLADANTA). A serpent born in Vāsuki's dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57).

KĀLADVIJA. A serpent, which attained salvation. The story of this nāga, which was at first a Śūdra is told in chapter 16 of the Padma Purāṇa as follows.—Once upon a time there lived in Karavirapura a very selfish Śūdra called Kāladvija, who was sentenced by Kāla to live in hell for four Manvantaras. After living in hell the whole of the period, he was born as a nāga and suffered much in the crevices of a stone. While living thus, on an Āśvina pūrṇimā (Full moon day in the month of Āśvina), it threw out some fried paddy and Kauḍī (shells) which fell before Viṣṇu. At once the Lord redeemed it from all its sins, and on its death, in due course, the attendants of Viṣṇu took him in a divine chariot to the Lord.

KĀLAGHATA. A brahmin scholar in the Vedas. He was a member of the assembly at the serpent yajña conducted by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 53).

KĀLĀHĀ. Wife of a brāhmaṇa named Bhikṣu who was an inhabitant of the city of Saurāṣṭra. This woman used to do only the opposite of what her husband asked her to do and so Bhikṣu kept it as a rule to ask her to do the opposite of what he wanted her to do. But one day he asked her to float the śrāddha pīṇḍa in the river Gaṅgā, and she threw it in Saucyakūpa. As a result of that she was born in a demoniac womb. But Dharmadatta got her purified by the Dvādaśaṅkṣāri mantra and giving her half the virtue accrued by him. By virtue of this they were reborn as Daśāraṭha and Kausalyā, (Ananda Rāmāyaṇa, Sārakṣaṇa; Uttarākhaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa). See also under Dharmadatta.

KĀLĀJṆĀ (S). A synonym of the Kālakeyas. (See under Kālakaẏa).

KĀLĀK (KĀLIKĀ). One of the daughters of Dakṣa. Kaśyapa married her. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 183 states that Kālakāya and Narakāsura were born to Kālāk by Kaśyapa. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, Chapter 14). In Mahābhārata Aranyaka Parva, Chapter 174 we find that Kālākāya once received from Bramhā, a boon that her sons would never be killed.

KĀLĀK. An Asura born to Kālikā by Kaśyapa. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, Chapter 14).

KĀLĀKAKŚA. A warrior of Skanda deva. (M.B. Sālya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 69).

KĀLĀKĀŚA. An Asura. He was killed by Garuḍa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 105).

KĀLAKĀMUKHA (KĀLAKĀMMUKA). A Rākṣasas. He was the brother of Prahastra, Rāvaṇa's Minister. (For Genealogy, see under Prahastra). During Śrī Rāma's life in the forest Kālakāmukha was also among Khara, Dūṣaṇa and others. The other eleven members of that group were—Śyennagāmi, Pṛthugrīva, Yājñāsattu, Vihaṇgama, Durjaya, Karavirakṣa, Puroṣa, Mṛgamañjli, Mahāmātli, Sarpāsya and Rudhirāsana. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, 26th Sarga).

KĀLĀKANYĀ. Daughter of Kāla (Yama). (See under Purāṇajana).

KĀLAKĀVRKŚIYA. An ancient Saint. During the reign of the King Kṣemadarśin in the country of Kosala, his subjects were put to great sufferings under the misrule and corruption of his courtiers. At that time, Kālakāvrkśiya who was a friend of Kṣemadarśin and a reputed sage, came to Kosala with a caged crow. The sage went about the country claiming to know Kāla-vidyā (Vāyaśī vidyā) by which a crow could be made to tell past events. Actually, the sage was going round the country in order to gather first-hand information about the corrupt practices of the King's men. After acquiring knowledge of the exact state of affairs in the country, Kālakāvrkśiya reached the palace. Under the cloak of the crow's words he exposed some of the improprieties of the King's Minister. Naturally, the Minister was furious and by his secret instructions his servants shot the crow to death that same night. On the next day, the sage himself went to the King and convinced him of the Minister's guilt. The King accepted the sage's suggestions and brought about a thorough overhaul of the administration by punishing or dismissing the culprits. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 82).

In Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 106 we find that this sage once advised Drupada to make a treaty with King Kṣemadarśin. Kālakāvrkśiya was a sage who flourished in Indra's assembly. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7).

V. KĀLAKETU. A renowned Asura Emperor who was the son of Danu, the wife of Kaśyapa. Once he abducted Ekāvali, the wife of Ekāvira and went to Pātāla (underworld). Ekāvira fought a fierce battle with Kālaketu and recovered Ekāvalī. (See under Ekāvira).

KĀLKEYA(S). (KĀLKHAṆJAS).
1) Birth. The Asuras who were born to Kāla (Kālikā) by Kaśyapa Prajāpati, the son of Marici and Brahmā's grandson.
2) General. "Kālakeya" is not the proper name of a particular Asura. The sons of Kāla (Kālikā) are all collectively called Kālakeyas. They number about 60,000. Sometimes they fought under the leadership of Vṛtrāsura and at other times under other Asura leaders.
3) Agastya and the Kālakeyas. Once the Kālakeyas started a campaign of hatred against Brāhmaṇas. At nightfall they used to enter Brāhmaṇa premises and commit murders, disturb their yāgas, etc. The Brāhmaṇas complained to the sage Agastya. Agastya set out to capture the Kālakeyas, who were alarmed and hid themselves in the ocean. Agastya dried up the ocean by drinking it. But some of the Kālakeyas escaped and fled to Pātāla. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 101).
4) Arjuna and the Kālakayās. The headquarters of the Asuras was Hiranyakapura, situated near Devaloka. Once they allied themselves with thousands of other Asuras called “Nivātakavacas” and launched an attack on Devaloka. Indra sent his charioteer Mātali and brought Arjuna to Devaloka. Arjuna defeated the Nivātakavacas and Kālakayās in battle. A large number of Kālakayās were killed in the battle. (M.B. Vana Parva Chapters 172-175).

KĀLAKĪRTI. A Kṣatriya King. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67 says that this King was born from the limb of Suparṇa, the younger brother of the Asura, Mayūra.

KĀLAKOṬI. A sacred place in Naimiśāraṇya. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 3).

KĀLAKUSTA. The virulent poison that came up during the churning of the Ocean of Milk. Śiva swallowed it and retained it in his throat, and so he came to be called Nilakaṇṭha.

“And Kālakūṭa arose like fire burning all the worlds. The smell of it sent the three worlds into a swoon. At the request of Brahmā Śiva swallowed the poison to save the world from absolute destruction. And, he (Śiva) retained it in his throat”. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 18).

KĀLAMĀNA. (Calculating time). In ancient days in India time was calculated in the following manner.

Time taken (needed) to pierce a leaf with a needle — Alpakāla
30 Alpakālas — 1 Truṭi
30 Truṭis — 1 Kāla
30 Kālas — 1 Kāṣṭhā
30 Kāṣṭhās — 1 Niṃśa (mātrā)
4 Niṃśas — 1 Gaṇita
10 Gaṇitas — 1 Neṭuvirūpu (time for a deep sigh)
6 Neṭuvirūpus — 1 Vināzhikā
6 Vināzhikās — 1 Gaṭkīṭa
60 Gaṭkīṭas — 1 Day (Ahorātra)
15 Ahorātras — 1 Pakṣa (Fortnight)
2 Pakṣas — 1 Cāndramāsa (A day for the Pīṭṛs)
2 Māsas (months) — 1 Ṛtu.
6 Ṛtus — 1 year for men (A day for the Devas)
300 Years (Men’s) — 1 Divyavāra (Divine year)
4800 Divyavāras — 1 Kṛtayuga
3600 Divyavāras — 1 Tretāyuga
2400 Divyavāras — 1 Dvāparayuga
1200 Divyavāras — 1 Kaliyuga
12000 Divyavāras — 1 Divyavāra (Divine year)
71 Caturyugas — 1 Manvantara
14 Manvantaras — 1 Pralaya (Kalpa)
1 Pralaya — Brahmā’s one day

Fifteen Nīṃśas make one Kāṣṭhā. Thirty Kāṣṭhās make one Kāla and thirty Kālas make one Muhūrta. Thirty Muhūrtas make one day (man’s) and thirty such days divided into two fortnights form a Māsa (month). Six months form an Aṇava; there are two ayanas called Daksīṇa and Uttara. Daksīṇayana is night, and Uttarāyaṇa is day for the Devas. 12,000 Divyavāras—Deva varṣas—form a Caturyuga consisting of the Kṛta—Tretā—Dvāpara and Kali yugas, consisting respectively of 400, 3000, 2000 and 1000 Divyavāras. Before the commencement and after the end of every one of the above four yugas there is an interval respectively of 400, 300, 200, and 100 years. The interval before the commencement is called Sandhyā and that at the end is called Sandhyānāśa. The period between Sandhyā and Sandhyānāśa is called Kṛta yuga etc. One thousand Caturyugas form one day for Brahmā, and it (Brahmā’s one day) has 14 Manus. Again, Chapter 8, Part 2 of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa has the following to say about Kālamāṇa.

Fifteen nīṃśas make one Kāṣṭhā, thirty Kāṣṭhās one Kāla, thirty Kālas one mūhārta and thirty mūhūrtas one day and night. Day is long or short according to the length or shortness of parts of the day, like morning, noon and evening. Despite the above variation evening or dusk time is always (2 nāzhikās) the same. The three mūhūrtas from the sun’s ardhodayā (when half of the sun has arisen) is called Prāṭahākāla, (morning) and it is 1/5th of day time. The three mūhūrtas following are known as saṅgava. Madhyāṃṣa (noon) is the third mūhūrta after saṅgava. The time after madhyāṃṣa is aparāhrna (afternoon). Aparāhrna lasts for three mūhūrtas. The time after this is dusk. Thus, a day-time of fifteen mūhūrtas is divided into five parts of three mūhūrtas each. On Viṣṇu day the day will have full fifteen mūhūrtas. Then during Uttarāyaṇa and Daksīṇāyana the day will be longer or shorter. During Uttarāyaṇa the day will be longer than night, and during Daksīṇāyana vice versa. Viṣṇu occurs when the sun enters the Tūḷa (Libra) and Meṣa (Aries) houses. Daksīṇāyana is when the sun enters Cancer and Uttarāyaṇa when it enters Capricorn.

Fifteen days and nights constitute a Paṇḍava (fortnight), and two Paṇḍavas one month. Two solar months constitute a Rūta (season), three Rūtas one ayana and two ayanas one year. Since there are four kinds of months, i.e. Saura, Śāvana, Cāndra and Nāṅkṣatra, years are considered to be of five different kinds. The first is called Saṁvatsara; the second parivatsara; the third idvatsara; the fourth, anuvatsara and the fifth, vatsara. This period of five years is called a yuga. In a yuga of five years there are 60 saura months. 61 sivana months, 62 Cāndra months and 67 nāṅkṣatra months. At the beginning of the sixth year the sun and moon meet in the same house and that period of five years also is called yuga. (Śrīdharīyam).

KĀLĀMARA. See under BHADRAṢĀLA.

KĀLAMUKHA (S) A hybrid race born from the union of men and Rākṣasas. Sahadeva defeated the Kālamukhas also during his conquest of the southern region. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 67).

KĀLANEMI I. A great Asura. In later years he was born as Kaṁśa, the son of Ugrasena. (See under Karīṣa).

KĀLANEMI II. A brahmin from Mālava. His father was called Yaññasena. (Kathāsaritsāgara, Kathāmukha- lambaka).

KALANEMI III. A Rākṣasa. During the Rāma-Rāvaṇa war, when Lakṣmaṇa swooned, Hanumān started for Drona mountain for medicine. Rāvaṇa deputed Kālanemi to obstruct the path of Hanumān. Well acquainted with the trickeries of the Rākṣasas Hanumān killed Kālanemi who appeared before him disguised as a sage. (Adhyātma Rāmāyaṇa, Udyoga Kāyḍa, Canto 67).

KALANIRṆĀYA. (Calculating time). See under Kālamāṇa.

KALĀṆJARAGIRI. A famous mountain at Medhāviṅa tirtha. He who bathes in Vedihrāda on this mountain will get the benefits of giving away 1000 cows. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 25). Spread on the four sides of mount Mahāmeru are twenty mountains. They are:—

Kuraṇīga, Karaga, Kuśumbha, Vīkāṅkata, Triṅkṛta, Śiśira, Patāṅga, Rucaka, Nila, Nisaṅhā, Siṅśivīsa, Kapila, Saṅkhiṅka, Vaiḍūrya, Āruṇaka, Rāṣaṇā, Nāga, Kālaṇjīra and Nārada. (Devi Bhāgavatā, 8th Skandha).

KALĀṆA. A powerful sage of great majesty. Yudhisṭhira worshipped this sage at the end of the Rājasūya-yājña. (Chapter 85, Sabhā Parva).

KALĀṆA. A great sage, who was a member of Yudhisṭhira’s assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4).

KALĀṆAPARVATA I. A mountain on the sea coast near Laṅkā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 277).

KALĀṆAPARVATA II. A mountain seen by Arjuna on his way to Śiva with Śrī Kṛṣṇa during their dream-journey. (Drona Parva, Chapter 80).

KALĀṆAPATHA. A son of Viśvāmitra. He was a scholar in philosophy and a Śrāṇavādī. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 4).

KALĀṆAPINGA I. A holy place. (Śloka 43, Chapter 25, Anuśasana Parva).

KALĀṆAPINGA II. A kind of bird. See under Kapīn-jala.

KALĀṆPRŚṬHA. A serpent. It was with this serpent that the hair on the necks of horses attached to the chariot of Śiva at the burning of the Tripurās, was tied. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 34).

KALĀṆĀṬRI. The Devātā presiding over the night on the eye of death. The fierce aspect of the Devātā is described in the Mahābhārata as follows:—

Coal-black in colour, with swollen mouth and eyes and wearing red garlands and clothings—thus appeared the wom (Devātā) presiding over the death-night. With the fierce cord in her hand she drags away the souls of the dead. (Suapūka Parva, Chapter 9).

KALĀŚA. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 11, Chapter 103, Udyaṅga Parva).

KALĀŚAILA. A range of mountains in Uttarākhaṇḍa in ancient India. (Vana Parva, Chapter 139).

KALĀŚAPOTAKA. A serpent. (Śloka 7, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

KALĀŚI. A holy place. If one sips water from a pond in that place one will acquire the benefit of conducting an Agniṣṭoma Sacrifice. (Śloka 80, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

KALĀŚODARA. A soldier of Skanda. (Śloka 72, Chapter 85, Salya Parva).

KALĀŚUTRA. A hell. (See under Kāla).

KALĀṬĪRTHA. A sacred place in Ayodhyā. A bath here is as good as making a gift of eleven cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83).

KALĀTOYAKA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhūṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

KALĀVĀṬI I. A daughter of the King of Kaśi. This goddess of a woman worshipped the sage Durvāsas and became a saṅit by obtaining the Saiva Pañcākṣara (five letters pertaining to Śiva—Śivāya namāḥ). Afterwards Dāśārha, King of Mathura, married her. The King felt very hot whenever he approached her and he questioned her about it. She said she had received the Pañcākṣara Mantra even from childhood and sinners would feel the heat if they touched her. The sage was greatly disappointed and Kalāvāṭi took him to Sage Garga to redeem him from all his sins. The sage dipped the King in the river Kālindī and when the King rose up all his sins flew away from his body as tiny birds. The King reaching the palace, embraced Kalāvāṭi and then he felt her body very cool and pleasant. They got a son also. (Pañcākṣaramāhāmya, Śiva Purāṇa).

KALĀVĀṬI II. Mother of Mrgāvati, a queen. Mrgāvati was the mother of Udayana. See under Mrgāvati).

KALĀVĀṬI III. A nymph. See under Thīṁṭḥākārāla.

KALĀVEGA. A serpent born in the Vāsuki dynasty. It was burnt to ashes during the serpent yajña of Jana-meyāja. (Adi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 7).

KALĀYĀVANA. A powerful Asura born out of the effulgence of Gargācārya. He was killed by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

KALĒHIKA. A female attendant of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46).

KALĒYĀ(S). A set of Asuras born to the great sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kāla. Some scholars hold the view that the Kālaekyas and the Kāleyas are one and the same. Kāleyas destroyed the Āśramas of sages like Vasīśtha, Gyavana and Bhrādavāja. (Vana Parva, Chapter 102). Devas killed some of the Kāleyas; the others ran away to Pātāla.

KALĪ I. Incarnation of sin, the Sin-god.

1) Birth. Kaśyapaprajāpāti, son of Brahmā, begot of his wife Muni sixteen sons and Kāli was the fifteenth son. He was a deva-gandharva. The other sons of Kaśyapa were: Bhūmasena, Ugrasena, Suparna, Varaṇu Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Gopati, Suvarcas, Satyavāk, Arkaṇāra, Prayuta, Viṅrarta, Gītaratha, Śāliṣāra, Parjanya and Nārada. (4 Ślokas from verse 43, Chapter 65, Adi Parva).

2) How Parikṣit controlled Kāli. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa went to Vaikunṭha, the Pāṇḍavas entrusted the administration of the state to Parikṣit, son of Abhimanyu and started for the Mahāprasthāna. King Parikṣit was travelling the continent conquering places when he saw Kāli in the garb of a Śūdra King teasing a cow and bull couple. Parikṣit aimed an arrow at him and then Kāli came and bowed down before the King. The King did not kill him. He let him go free but ordered him to go away from his state. Kāli was nonplussed because all the land belonged to Parikṣit and there was no place for him to go. So Kāli begged of the King to give him some space to live. Parikṣit then declared that Kāli could live in the following five places: Gambling; Drinking, Woman, Murder and Gold. From that day onwards the free movements of Kāli were thus restricted (Chapter 17, 1st Skandha, Bhāgavata).
3) Kali, Lord of Kaliyuga. There are fourteen Manvantaras during the life of Brahmā. The life time of a Manu is a Manvantara. This present period is the seventh Manvantara. In each Manvantara there are four yugas, Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali. Kṛtayuga consists of 17,28000 years, Tretāyuga consists of 12,96000 years, Dvāparayuga 8,64000 years and Kaliyuga 4,32,000 years. The Christian era started in the Kali era 3102 and after another 4,26926 years Kaliyuga will come to an end and the present universe will enter the eighth Manvantara. From the beginning of the Kaliyuga acts of sin predominate and Kali, sin-god, will lord over the world.

Kali was born on the day Śrī Kṛṣṇa ascended heaven. When Bhagavān Mukunda abandoned his body and went to his place in Vaikuṇṭha, Kali came into being binding all on earth. (Śloka 66, Chapter 1, Bhāgavata Māhātmya).

4) Kali and Nala. Kali and Dvāpara were going to the Svayamīvara of Damayanti when they met Indra and others returning from the Svayamīvara. They told Kali and Dvāpara that Damayanti was married to Nala. Kali and Dvāpara felt it an outrage that Damayanti should have married a man of the earth and not a deva. Kali decided that Nala should be sent out of his country and his matrimonial life made most unhappy. Dvāpara consented to be his accomplice in this attempt. Kali followed Nala waiting for an opportunity to enter his body. One day, by an oversight Nala, without doing the śamana after passing urine, performed his sandhyāvandana. Taking that opportunity Kali entered the body of Nala. Kali went to Puṣkara, brother of Nala in the guise of a bullock and made Nala challenge his brother to a game of dice putting that bullock as a wager. Puṣkara accepted the challenge. Nala wagered and lost all his movable and immovable possessions and went to the forests with Damayanti. Nala, prompted by Kali, abandoned Damayanti in the forests and went his way. Damayanti cursed Kali.

It was at this time that the great serpent Karkoṭaka was entrapped in a wild fire. Nala saved him from the fire but in return the cobra bit him turning Nala into one of blue hue and said “Oh Nala, let Kali who cheated you and is now inside your body suffer with the poison I have injected into your body.”

Nala roamed about and reached Ayodhya and there became the charioteer of Rṣūparṇa, King of Ayodhya. When Rṣūparṇa went to the second marriage of Damayanti to Vibhishana, Nala went with him as his charioteer. On the way Nala taught Rṣūparṇa the science of Āśvāḥrdaya and Rṣūparṇa in return taught him the science of Akṣāḥrdaya. When Nala learnt the secret of Akṣāḥrdaya he vomited all the poison inside him and Kali left him. Nala was about to curse Kali but refrained from it at the request of Kali. At once Kali climbed on a Tāṇi tree (Beleric Myrobalan) and went down from the tree when Nala left the place. Tāṇi is from that day onwards considered a cursed tree. (Chapter 58, Vana Parva).

5) The world in Kaliyuga. The celebrated sage Mārkandeya had prophesied about the happenings in Kaliyuga thus: In Kaliyuga all will be dishonest. Charity and Sacrifices will be only for a name. Brāhmaṇas would do the duties of Śūdras. Śūdras will become prosperous. There will be sinners as kings. People will be short-lived and the stature of the people also will diminish. Beastly type of men will be on the increase. Taste and smell will vanish. Women will be ‘Mukhebhīgās’. Men will sell rice and brāhmaṇas, the Vedicas. Women will sell their vaginas. The yield of milk from cows will decrease. Flowers and fruits will become less. Crows will be on the increase. Brāhmaṇas would become beggars. Sages will be merchants. Brāhmaṇas would without any reason grow hairs and nails. Nonc will observe the four āśramas correctly. Students will defile the bed of their preceptors. Rains will be in and out of season. Trees and plants will refuse to grow in many places. There will be murder of people everywhere. Merchants will be cheats and they will use false measures. Righteous persons will decrease and sinners will increase. Girls of seven or eight years will become pregnant and boys will become fathers. Young men at the age of sixteen would be grey-haired. Old men will continue practising the habits of young men. Wives will lie with their servants. Wives will be prostitutes even while their husbands are alive. People will die in lots of hunger.” (Chapter 188, Vana Parva).

6) Kaliyugatīrtha. The greatest tīrtha of Kaliyuga is the river Gaṅgā. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

7) Duryodhana was the incarnation of Kali and Śakuni, that of Dvāpara. (Chapter 31, Āśrama Parva).

KĀLĪ I. A synonym of Śūrya. (Śloka 20, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).

KĀLĪ III. A synonym of Śiva. (Śloka 79, Chapter 17, Anuśāsana Parva).

KĀLĪ I. A synonym of Śatyavatī, mother of Vyāsa. (See under Adrikā and Satyavatī).

KĀLĪ II. An aspect or form of Pārvatī. (See under Pārva).

KĀLĪDĀSA. The greatest poet and dramatist in Sanskrit. Some scholars opine that Kālidāsa flourished in the 8th Century B.C. while others place his date up to the period 11th Century A.D. At any rate most of the scholars consider the period between 1st Century B.C. and 5th Century A.D. as the most probable date of the great poet. Some of the main theories in this regard are as follows:—

1. Eighth century B.C. Towards the close of Rāghu-variśa Mahākīvyā Kālidāsa has referred to the son of King Agnimitra. Therefore the poet must have lived in the 8th Century B.C. This is the view of the scholar Hippolyte Fanche.

2. Second Century B.C. According to Dr. Kuṇjaṇa Rājaṇ Kālidāsa lived in the second Century B.C., the reasons for the belief being as follows. The poet was a contemporary of King Agnimitra of the Śuṅga dynasty. This Agnimitra is culogised in Kālidāsa’s Mālavikāgni- mitra. Agnimitra is referred to in the Bharatavākyā (epilogue) of the drama also.

3. First Century B.C. The traditional belief is that Kālidāsa was a member in the assembly of poets and scholars of the court of emperor Vikramāditya, who started the Vikrama era in B.C. 56.

Dhanvantarikapāpakāmarasiniha-Sarīku—
Vetāla-Bhaṭṭa-Ghatakarpāra-Kālidāsāh /
Khyatā Varahānimiḥr nṛpate śabhaḥyām
Ratnāni vai vararuci nava vikramasya.

4. Fifth Century A.D. According to Dr. Keith, Kālidāsa lived in the fifth Century A.D. One Candra-gupta II, who defeated the Šakas in 339 A.D. was King of Ujjain. He was known as Vikramādiya also. Dr. Keith thinks that the great poet might have been a member of this King’s court. Perhaps Kālidāsa had remembered his royal patron Vikramādiya in his drama called Vikrama-vāśīyā. Dr. Keith is further of the view that Kālidāsa composed Kumārasambhava after attending the birth celebrations of Kumāragupta, son of King Vikramādiya.

5) Sixth Century A.D. Three scholars, Ferguson, Max Muller and Kern have opined that Kālidāsa lived in the sixth Century A.D.

Whichever be the date of Kālidāsa it could be known from his works that he spent the major part of his life in Ujjain, and was inextricably indebted to the city in many ways. Raghuvāniśa and Kumārasambhava are his two mahākāvyaśas. He had also written three dramas, Abhijñānaśīkanūṭa, Vikrama-rāśīyā and Mālavikagnimitra and a lyric called Rūstrapadumā. He wrote also a world-famous poem called Meghasandesā.

KĀLIKĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. (Sālaya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 14).

KĀLIKA. One of the attendants given to Skanda by Pūśan, the other being Pāṇitaka. (Sālaya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 43).

KĀLIKĀŚĀNGA A holy place. Bathing here is as good as that at Kālika-rāmā.

KĀLIKĀŚRĀMA. A holy place. If one bathes and spends three nights here one will be released from the sorrows of life and death. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25).

KĀLĪKEYA. A son of King Subala. He was killed by Abhinanyu. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 49).

KĀLIṆĪ (YAMUNĀ).

1) General. Kāliṇī alias Yamunā is one of the holy rivers in India. The presiding deity of the river is Kāliṇīdevī. Kāliṇī, the daughter of the sun, has her source in Kālinda mountain, and hence the name Kāliṇī for the river. Kāliṇī joins the Gaṅgā at Prayāga, and this confluence of the two rivers is called Saṅgāma, which is a sacred place.

2) Gave way for Śrī Kṛṣṇa. As soon as Kṛṣṇa was born Vasudeva stealthily removed the child to Ambādi. Due to heavy rains the Kāliṇī was overflowing, and Vasudeva begged Kāliṇī for a passage, and the river gave way for Vasudeva to take Kṛṣṇa to Ambādi. (Bhāgavaṇa 10th Skandha).

3) Balabhada dragged Kāliṇī. Balabhada-rāma once stayed in Ambādi for two months. One day he was picnicking on the banks of Kāliṇī with the Gopīśas. Under the influence of liquor he desired to play with his companions in the waters of Kāliṇī. He called Kāliṇī to his side, but the chaste Kāliṇī refused to oblige him. So he dragged her by his plough hooking her to it. In great fear Kāliṇī saluted him, and he enjoyed with the gopīśas for some time on its waters. (Bhāgavaṇa, 10th Skandha).

4) Kāliṇī, Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s wife. After Maya had built Indraprastha for the Pāṇḍavas, Śrī Kṛṣṇa spent a few days there with them. And, one day while Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were strolling on the banks of Kāliṇī the latter saw there a beautiful woman performing penance and he approached her. She told Arjuna that the object of her penance was to get Kṛṣṇa as husband, and when Arjuna passed on the information to Kṛṣṇa he took her in his chariot to Dwārakā and duly married her. (Bhāgavaṇa, 10th Skandha).

5) Sons of Kāliṇī. Ten sons, were born to Kāliṇī by Kṛṣṇa. (Bhāgavaṇa, 10th Skandha).

6) Harīsa and his son in Kāliṇī. Once Kṛṣṇa attacked Jarāsandha and the son of his minister, Harīsa, being told that his father had been killed committed suicide by jumping into Kāliṇī. But, Harīsa had not been killed, and when he returned from the battlefield and knew about the death of his son, he too jumped into Kāliṇī and committed suicide. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 14).

7) Other information.

(i) Kāliṇī is one of the seven tributaries of the Gaṅgā.

(ii) One who drinks its water will be released from all sins. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 139, Verse 19).

(iii) The Pāṇḍavas, during their life in exile in the forest drank Yamunā water, got over their weariness and continued their sojourn. (Vana Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 2).

(iv) Sahadeva, son of Śrījaya, gave Agni Deva 1000 golden emblems on the banks of the Yamunā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 7).

(vi) Bharata performed thirty-three Aśvamedhas on the banks of the Yamunā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 8). On another occasion he conducted six Aśvamedhas at the same spot. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 68).

(vii) Agastya the great sage performed penance on the planes of Kāliṇī. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161).

(viii) King Santanu conducted seven yajñas on the banks of the Kāliṇī. (Vana Parva, Chapter 162).

(ix) The colour of Kāliṇī is black. Kāma (Cupid) shot arrows of flower at Śiva, who was lamenting over the death of Satī, and he (Śiva) thus excited to a condition of insanity jumped into Kāliṇī with the result that its water turned black in colour. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 6 and also see under Yamunā).

KĀLĪṆĪDVĪPA. It was on this island that Vṛṣṇa was born as the result of the intercourse between Parāśara and Satyavatī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 60).

KĀLIṆĪGA I. Rāṭyū, King of Kāliṅgā was present at the sva-yāvāvara of Draupadi. (Śloka 13, Chapter 185 Ādi Parva). Rukmini played a game of dice with Balabhada with the help of Kāliṅga (for details see under Rukmini). The sage Dīrghatamas begot a son of the wife of the aged and senile Kāliṅga and the boy was named Kākṣīvāna (Sūkta 125, Anuvāka 18, Mandala 1, Ṛgveda).

KĀLIṆĪGA II. A warrior of the god Skanda. (M.B. Śālaya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 64).

KĀLIṆĪGA III. A Daitya who lived in Kṛṣṇayuga. In Skanda Purāṇa there is a story that he conquered heaven, drove away the Dīkpalakas, posted his own forces in their place and was finally killed by Devī.

KĀLIṆĪGA. Śrutīyūs, King of Kāliṅgā, and a member of Vuddhiśāṭhira’s assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4).

KĀLIṆĪGA (M) (KĀLIṆĪGA). An ancient place in the south of Bhārata.
Other details.

1) Arjuna visited this place while he was on a pilgrimage. (Sloka 9, Chapter 214, Ádi Parva).
2) Kaliṅga was also included in the countries conquered by Sahadeva while he was on his victory march. (Chapter 31, Sahā Parva).
3) People from Kaliṅga presented Yudhiṣṭhira with gifts for the Rājaśūya. (Sloka 18, Chapter 52, Sahā Parva).
4) Yudhiṣṭhira visited Kaliṅga while he was on a pilgrimage. (Sloka 4, Chapter 114, Vana Parva).
5) Karṇa conquered Kaliṅga while he was on a victory march. (Sloka 8, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).
6) Sahadeva defeated the King of Kaliṅga. (Sloka 24, Chapter 23, Udyoga Parva).
7) Śrī Kṛṣṇa slaughtered the people of Kaliṅga. (Sloka 76, Chapter 48, Udyoga Parva).
8) The people of Kaliṅga took part in the war between the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas. (Sloka 6, Chapter 20, Droṇa Parva).
9) Pāraśurāma conquered this place. (Sloka 12, Chapter 70, Droṇa Parva).

KALINGASENA. See under Madanamanjūkā.

KALIPRIYĀ. A prostitute. She attained svarga by observing the Kārttikvārata. (Chapter 21, Brahma-khandā, Padma Purāṇa).

KĀLIYA.

1) Birth. Kaśyapa, grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici begot of his wife Kadrū powerful nāgas like Śeṣa, Airāvata, Takṣaka, Kārkoṭaka, Kaliṅga, Maṇi-nāga, Purāṇanāga etc. and from them were born all kinds of nāgas on earth. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35). Kāliya possessed one thousand heads. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

2) Kāliya took his abode in Kālindī. Vināṭa and Kadrū were wives of Kaśyapa. The former was the mother of Garuḍa and the latter of the nāgas. In a wager Vināṭa was defeated and had to become the slave of Kadrū. Garuḍa brought Amṛta from Devakā and redeemed his mother from slavery. Yet Garuḍa and the nāgas continued to be enemies, Garuḍa killing and eating nāgas whenever he got a chance for it. At last the nāgas entered into an understanding with Garuḍa agreeing to give him the havis (offering) which they got on certain days, and thus Garuḍa stopped eating the nāgas. But Kāliya did not subscribe to the above agreement; he treated Garuḍa with contempt. But, in an encounter with Garuḍa Kāliya was put to so much of hardships that he, along with his family, shifted his residence to a particular sector in Kālindī.

3) Admission denied to Garuḍa. Owing to the curse of a sage called Saubhārī, who was performing penance on the banks of Kālindī, that Garuḍa would die broken-headed if he entered Kālindī, it was a prohibited area to Garuḍa.

4) Suppression of Kāliya. Owing to the virulent poison of Kāliya the waters of Kālindī became poisonous and the trees on its banks dried up. Once, while Kṛṣṇa and his companions, the Gopālas came to the banks of the river grazing their cows. The Gopālas drank water from the river and fell down dead. Then Kṛṣṇa jumped into the river from the top of a tree on its bank and danced upon the hoods of Kāliya who had rushed to attack him. Kāliya comitted blood and saluted Kṛṣṇa. His wives and children also saluted the Lord. Kṛṣṇa sent all of them away to Ramaṇaka island assuring Kāliya that Garuḍa would not attack him on seeing the marks of his (Kṛṣṇa's) feet on Kāliya. Thus did Kāliya and his family shift their residence to Ramaṇaka island. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KALIYUGA. See under Manvantara.

KALKI. The tenth avatāra (incarnation) of Mahāviṣṇu. The ten avatāras are called Daśāvatāras. Kalki is the last of them. Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 16 says as follows about the incarnation of Kalki:

Towards the end of Kaliyuga, all people will lose their faith in God and become irreligious. They will accept evil doers. Fifteen divisions of the Veda Vājaśaneya alone will become the authoritative document. People, wearing the garb of righteousness, will indulge in unrighteousness. Mlecchas (lowest class of people) assuming the form of Kings will begin feeding upon human beings. At that time Lord Viṣṇu will incarnate as Kalki, the son of Viṣṇuyāsas and the priest of Yājñavalkya and exterminate all mlecchas. He will restore people to cāturvarnya and the four śrāmas and maintain proper standards of conduct. Afterwards the Lord will renounce the form of Kalki and ascend Heaven. Then Kṛṣṇayuga will begin again.

Chapter 190 of Bhāṣa Bhārata supports almost all the above statements. In the light of them, we can gather certain features of Kalki's incarnation when Kaliyuga reaches its zenith. Mahāviṣṇu will be born as a Brāhmaṇa with the name Viṣṇuyāsas, in the village called Saṁbhala. Viṣṇuyāsas will become famous under the name Kalki. He will be the priest of Yājñavalkya. He will create armies and soldiers by his will itself and destroy the wicked. With that Kṛṣṇayuga will commence.

There is difference of opinion as to whether Kalki's incarnation has passed or is yet to come. But in the light of the statements in the Purāṇas, Kalki has not yet come. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, says that Kaliyuga extends over a period of 4, 32, 000 years. It is now only a little over 5,000 years since it began. Still, more than 4, 26, 900 years have to pass before the end of Kaliyuga. Therefore lakhs of years have still to pass before the incarnation of Kalki.

(M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 78), Kālmaśāpāda and Kālmaśāpāda were names which he got as a result of Vasiṣṭha's curse.

3) Mitrasaha became a Rākṣasa. Mitrasaha was a reputed and glorious king belonging to the solar dynasty of kings who ruled over Ayodhyā. He had a queen named Madayanti. While they were leading a happy and enviable married life, Mitrasaha was forced to lead the life of a Rākṣasa in the forest for a period of 12 years, as the result of a curse. The story of this curse is given in different Purāṇas in different versions and they are given below—

4) Śakti Cursed Mitrasaha. One day Mitrasaha went to the forest for hunting. Viśvāmitra wished to get this mighty King as his disciple. While the King was passing through the forest, he saw Śakti, Vasiṣṭha's son, coming towards him. The King was a Kṣatriya and Śakti was a Brāhmaṇa. They were faced with the problem of whether the Kṣatriya should make way for the Brāhmaṇa or vice versa. Neither of them made way for the other. At last, Mitrasaha struck Śakti with his whip. In his anger Śakti cursed Mitrasaha that he should become a Rākṣasa and roam about in the forest for 16 years. Viśvāmitra who was standing nearby at the time introduced a devil into the body of the King and from that day Mitrasaha wandered about in the forest in the form of a Rākṣasa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 176).

5) Vasiṣṭha: cursed Mitrasaha. Mitrasaha once went to hunt in the forest. While hunting he came across two tiger cubs. Actually, they were two Rākṣasas in disguise. The King who was unaware of it, killed one of them with an arrow. The other cub suddenly assumed his own form as a Rākṣasa and after giving Mitrasaha a warning that he would take revenge on him at the proper time, vanished.

After the hunt the King returned to his palace. He informed Vasiṣṭha that he wished to perform Aśvamedhayāga like his ancestors. The sage offered to assist him in it. Shortly after, one day, the old Rākṣasa-tiger, disguising himself as the sage Vasiṣṭha, came to Mitrasaha and said:— "Oh King! I will tell you a secret. Don't tell anyone else. I have a great desire to eat meat food. Please send some cooked meat to my Āśrama without anyone knowing about it." After saying this, the disguised Rākṣasa-sage left the place.

The King told this secret to his wife Madayanti. They prepared the meat-food secretly and took it to Vasiṣṭha's Āśrama. When Vasiṣṭha saw the meat food, he took it as a personal insult and transformed the King into a Rākṣasa. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

6) Another story of Vasiṣṭha's curse on Mitrasaha. Once while Mitrasaha was hunting in the forest, he happened to kill a Rākṣasa by accident. The dead Rākṣasa's younger brother swore to avenge his death. He went to the King in the disguise of a young Brāhmaṇa cook. Mitrasaha appointed him as a cook in the royal kitchen.

At about that time, one day, Vasiṣṭha came to Ayodhyā, on the invitation of Mitrasaha for a Śrāddha. Mitrasaha, accompanied by his queen, greeted the sage with honour. He ordered the cook to prepare food for the guest at once. The Rākṣasa disguised as cook, decided to make the best of this opportunity. In a short time he cooked some human flesh and offered it as food for Vasiṣṭha. The enraged sage cursed the King to become a man-eating Rākṣasa who would roam about for twelve years in the woods. Thus Mitrasaha became a Rākṣasa. (Sīva Purāṇa, Sīvarātri Māhātmya).

7) How Mitrasaha got the name "Kālmaśāpāda." Mitrasaha became very angry when he was cursed by Vasiṣṭha. He decided to pay back in the same coin by cursing Vasiṣṭha also. He took water in his hand and was about to throw it down with the words of curse. But his queen Madayanti stopped him. She reminded him that it was not right to curse a Brāhmaṇa and requested him to sprinkle that water on his own feet. The King's anger cooled down and he sprinkled the water on his own feet. Since his feet were polluted by the water of sin Mitrasaha came to be called "Kālmaśāpāda," and Kālmaśāpāda' from that day. (Sīva Purāṇa, Sīvarātri Māhātmya).

8) Kālmaśāpāda's life as Rākṣasa. The curse-ridden Kālmaśāpāda began to look upon Vasiṣṭha and his sons with inveterate hatred. He roamed the countryside and forests in the form of a Rākṣasa. He started man-eating by feeding upon Śakti, the eldest son of Vasiṣṭha. After that he ate all the remaining 99 sons of Vasiṣṭha. Distressed at the loss of his children, Vasiṣṭha left his Āśrama, bent on committing suicide. He tied his own hands and feet securely with a rope and jumped into the river to drown himself. This attempt, like several other attempts to commit suicide, failed and he did not die. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 177).

In the Mahābhārata there is a story which says that once Uttarka, a disciple of the sage Gautama went to beg the Kundalas (ear ornaments) worn by Kālmaśāpāda's (Saudasa's) queen, for the sake of Gautama's wife. (For details, see under the word "Uttarka").

9) Brāhmaṇi's curse on Kālmaśāpāda. In the course of his wanderings through the forest as a Rākṣasa, Kālmaśāpāda happened to come across a Brāhmaṇa youth engaged in amorous pleasures with his wife Āṅgirāsī. The King caught hold of the youth and killed him. His wife, the Brāhmaṇi wept loudly and after cremating her husband's body in a funeral pyre, jumped into it and burnt herself to death. Just before her death she pronounced a curse on Kālmaśāpāda that if he touched any woman in future he would die immediately.

After the death of the Brāhmaṇa couple, the sin of Brāhmahātṛ (killing of Brāhmaṇa) continued to pursue Kālmaśāpāda in the form of a terrible monster. He fled for life from it and at last reached the presence of King Janaka. There, he happened to see the sage Gautama who taught Kālmaśāpāda Divyajñāna (Divine wisdom). As advised by the sage, he went to the temple at Gokarna and spent some years in deep meditation. (Sīva Purāṇa, Sīvarātri Māhātmya).

10) Sāpamokṣa. (Liberation from Curse). Towards the close of the twelve years which Mitrasa (Kālmaśāpāda) spent as a Rākṣasa, Vasiṣṭha saw him. The sage sprinkled holy water on Mitrasa and at once the Rākṣasa (the spirit of the Rākṣasa) left his body and he resumed his original figure of the King. He accepted Vasiṣṭha as his preceptor. They went back together to Ayodhyā.

Although Madayanti, queen of Mitrasaha was there, the King was not able to touch her owing to the Brāhmaṇi's curse. So he requested Vasūṭha to beget children by her. Accordingly Madayānī became pregnant by Vasūṭha. But she did not deliver the child even after twelve years. At last she hit the embryo in her womb with a stone and the child was born. Since he was born with the help of a stone (Aṣṭam), the child was named "Aṣṭamakā". (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 167).

KALMĀŚI. A river. It was while travelling by the side of this river, that King Drupada reached a Brāhmaṇa village where he happened to meet Upayāja. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 166). Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 78, Verse 16 says that it was on the bank of this river that the sage Bṛhaspati blessed Yudhiṣṭhira. (Modern scholars believe that Kannāśi, is the same as the present river Yamuna).

KĀLODAKA. A sacred place. The sin of causing abortion of those who bathe in the tīrtha here will be washed away. (Anuśāsan Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 60 and Śānti Parva, Chapter 152, Verse 12).

KALPA I. A son of Dhrūva. See under DHRUVA.

KALPA II. A period of one thousand Yugas or fourteen Manvantaras. See under MANVANTARA.

KALPA III. The customary proceedings of Yāgas. These proceedings are made in the form of Sūtras. The Sūtras describe how the Brāhmaṇas and mantras are to be used. For each Śrāvaka there are separate Śrāvaka Sūtras. The Śrāvaka Sūtras for Rgyveda Śrāvaka are Āśvālayana, Śāṅkhārayana and Saunaka. Those for Śāma Sūtras are Maṣaka, Lāṭyāyana and Dāhṇyāyana. Those for Kṣrṇa Yajurveda are Āpastamba Baudhāyana, Satyāsādhu, Hiranyakeśi, Mānava, Bhrādvāja, Vādhūla, Vaiśākhana, Laukgī, Maitra, Kaṭha and Vārāha. For Sūklayajurveda it is Kātyāyana Śrāvaka Śūtra. For Atharvaveda it is Kauśika Śrāvaka Śūtra. All these Sūtras contain only brief symbolic words and are difficult to understand without explanation.

KALPAKA. Śiva’s garden. It is situated in Kailāsa. (Kathāsārītāgārā, Kathāpīṭhakalamkāra, Part 1).

KALPAVRKṢA. A tree in Devaloka. It has the power of giving any object that one wishes to get. There are five Kalpavṛkṣas in Devaloka. Their names are : Mandāra, Pārijāta, Saṃāra, Kalpavṛkṣa and Haricandana.

Agni Purāṇa, third Chapter mentions that among the wonderful things obtained by the churning of the ocean of milk, there was Kalpavṛkṣa also. So Kalpavṛkṣa was born from the ocean of milk.

KALYĀ (KĀL). Mother of Vyāsa. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KALYĀṆA. A sage. Once certain Aṅgirases including this sage observed sattra (sacrifice) for the attainment of Heaven. But nobody was sure about the Devayāna path which leads to Heaven. So they selected Kālyāṇa to find out the path. He went in search of the Devayāna path and on the way he met Uruṇāyū, a Gandharva who was in the company of some apsarā women. The Gandharva disclosed the Sāma which would enable Kālyāṇa to find out the Devayāna path. On his return, Kālyāṇa told the other Rṣis that he had received the Sāma, but he refused to disclose from whom he obtained it. With the help of that Sāma known as Aurnāyūva, the Aṅgirases attained Heaven, but because of his failure to disclose the whole truth, Kālyāṇa was denied access to Heaven. Besides that, he became a victim to the disease of leprosy. (Paṇca-viṣṇu’s Brāhmaṇam).

KALYĀṆI. A female follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 6).

KĀMA I. God of beauty in Indian mythology. 1) General. A Prajāpati named Dharma was born from the right breast of Brahmā. Dharma was very handsome. Three sons, Śāma, Kāma and Harṣa who were exceedingly handsome, were born to him. Of them, Kāma became the god of beauty. His wife was Rāti. Śāma became the husband of Prāpti. Harṣa had Nandā for his wife. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verses 31-33).

In Kālikā Purāṇa we see another story about Kāma’s birth. Brahmā created ten Prajāpatis. After that, the woman Sandhyā was created. At the very moment of her birth, Brahmā and the Prajāpatis were irresistibly fascinated by her charm and they sprang up from their seats. All their thoughts converged on the same object. At this time a handsome youth emerged from Brahmā’s mind with a floral bow in his hands. Immediately after his birth, he asked Brahmā “Kāṁ darpaṇaṁ” (Whom should I make proud ?) Brahmā replied—Let the minds of living beings be the aim of your arrows”. He suggested Rāti the daughter of Daśaka, to be Kāma’s wife. Since he stirred the mind of Brahmā, he got the name “MANMATHA”, and since he was extremely attractive in appearance he came to be called “KĀMA”. (For further details, see under “RĀTI.”)

2) How Kāmadeva got the name “KANDARPA”. As soon as Kāma was born, he went to Brahmā and asked him “Kāṁ darpaṇaṁ?” (Whom should I make proud ?) Therefore he got the name “KANDARPA” (Kathāsārītāgāra).

3) Brahmā cursed Kāma. Once Brahmā was meditating upon Para Brahma for the purpose of creation. He felt carnal thoughts rising in his mind. At once a girl was born from his mind. She appeared before him and bowed. Brahmā fell in love with her. He declared that she should stay in the tongues of all living beings, and particularly at the tip of the tongues of all scholars. After that he made Sarasvatī his wife. Soon he felt repentant for his weakness of mind. His anger blazed at Kāma who was the cause of all this. He cursed that Kāma would be burnt to ashes in the fire from Śiva’s third eye. After that Brahmā gave his carnal desire to the great sage Atri who transferred it to his wife Anasūyā. It hardened itself within her and took the form of Candra, who was thus born to her. (Brahmandā Purāṇa, Chapter 43).

4) Kāma was burnt up in fire. Long ago an Aṣura named Tāraka, who was proud of his invincible might, was causing much havoc and terror in the whole world. Even the gods were afraid of him because he had received a boon that Śiva’s son alone was capable of killing him. It was the time when Pārvatī, the daughter of Himavān, was performing a penance praying that Paramesvara should become her husband. Taking advantage of this opportunity, Indra sent Kāma to rouse the passion of love in Śiva’s mind. Kāma reached Śiva’s seat and tried to stir up his passions. Śiva who was enraged at this, opened his third eye blazing with fire. Kāma was burnt to ashes in that fire. The place where Kāma’s body (Anāga) fell, came to be called “Angrājya”. Since he lost his body, Kāmdeva got another name “Anāga”. (Valmiki Ramayana. Itila Kanda, Chapter 23).

5) Kāma’s Next Birth. When Śiva burnt up Kāma, the latter’s wife Rati prayed to Śiva to restore her husband to life. Śiva was pleased and said that Rati would be born in the world and Kāma would take birth as her son.” (Kathāsarrītāgāra).

According to Śiva’s blessing Rati was born in the world under the name of Māyāvati. She became the kitchen-maid of an Asura named Śambara. At that time Śri Kṛṣṇa approached Śiva with a request that he should be blessed with a son. Śiva blessed him saying that Kāma who was burnt up in the fire of his eye would be born as the son of Rukmini, Śri Kṛṣṇa’s wife. Accordingly, Rukmini, conceived and a handsome child was born to her.

Śambara, who employed Māyāvati as his kitchen-maid had received a boon from Śiva. A condition laid down in it was that Śambara would die not long after Kāmadeva’s birth in the world. So Śambara was making careful inquiries to ascertain whether Kāma was born anywhere in the world. It was during this period that Śambara received the news that Kāma had been reborn as Śri Kṛṣṇa’s son. At once he went secretly to Rukmini’s house and stole the little baby and threw it into the sea. A sea-fish swallowed the child and a fisherman who caught it presented it to Śambara. When Śambara cut it open, he saw a lovely baby inside the fish. He entrusted the child to Māyāvati to be brought up.

At this stage, the sage Nārada happened to come there and he explained to Māyāvati in secret, that the baby was Kāmdeva and she was Rati. From that time, she brought up the child with great affection and tenderness. As years passed and Kāma grew up into a youth, Māyāvati began to make amorous advances towards him. Looking upon her with regard due to a mother, Kāma was displeased with these advances. Then she told him what Nārada had disclosed to her about their relations in the past life. She advised him to kill Śambara and to leave the place for Dvārakā as soon as possible.

As advised by her, Kāma killed Śambara and both he and Māyāvati went to Dvārakā in a Vimāna and paid their respects to their parents there. In the presence of a large number of sages, Kāma was christened “Pradyumna”. Aniruddha, the husband of Uṣā, was the son of Pradyumna. Besides Aniruddha, Pradyumna had a daughter Trṣa.

6) Other names of Kāma. The following names have been used for Kāma in the Purāṇas—Madana, Manmatha, Māra, Pradyumna, Minakatana, Kandarpa, Darpaka, Anāga, Kāma, Pānčāśa, Śambarārī, Manasija, Kusumēṣu, Ananya, Puspadhanvā, Ratri, Makaradhvaja, Atmbhū, Iṣṭa, Iṣkēr, Gṛḍhuvakākā, Kaṭajana, Ramaṇa, Dippaka, Madhuhāpaka, Śamantaka, Muhira, Īmpēṣa, Gāmapatama, Makaraketu, Ratiniyaka, Rāgavrāṇa, Sahasārāγuru, Gadayātum, Māplatya, Māyi.

7) Kāma’s weapons. Kāma has a bow made of sugar-cane, its string is made up of beetles, and the tips of his arrows are flowers. His vehicle is the parrot and the sign on his banner is fish. The five flowers of his arrows are—Aravinda, Aoaka, Gāta, Nāvamālikā, Nīlotpala. Besides these, he has five more arrows which are—Unmādana, Tāpana, Soṣaṇa, Stambhana and Sammohana. (Amara Rōta).

KĀMA I. An Agni who was the son of Svāhādēvi. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva. Chapter 219, Verse 23 says that this agni was of inimitable beauty.

KĀMA II. Another name for Paramesvarā. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 42).

KĀMA III. Another name for Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 45).

KĀMA IV. A great sage. There is a reference to this sage in Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 41.

KĀMA. Daughter of Prthu Rāvas. She was the wife of Ayuṭānāyi, a king of the Pāru dynasty and mother of Akrodhāna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 177).

KĀMATHA (KĀMATHAKA). A serpent born in Dhṛtarāstra’s family. This serpent was burnt up in Janamejaya’s sarpasattra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 16).

KĀMACARĪ. A woman follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 23).

KĀMĀDĀ. Another woman follower of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 27).

KĀMĀDEVĀ. See under Kāma.

KĀMADHENU. (SURABHI—NANDINI).

1) General. She is the first mother of cattle. She is a goddess with marvellous powers and attainments who gives milk whenever needed by gods and sages. The Purāṇas declare that all the cattle in the world today are descended from Kāmadhenu.

2) Three different names. This sacred cow is sometimes called “Kāmadhenu”, at other times, “Surabhī” and also “Nandī”. They are not three different cows, as some people suppose. See Bhāṣa Bhārata, Aranyaka Parva Chapter 9, Verses 7 and 17. This Surabhī and Kāmadhenu are names used for referring to the same cow. Again, in the Bhāṣa Bhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 14, we find the name Nandīnī applied to Kāmadhenu. Thus we may conclude that Kāmadhenu had two other names, viz. Surabhī and Nandīnī. But since the term “Surabhīravī” occurs in Amarakośa, it follows that even ordinary cows may be called “Surabhī”.

3) Birth and family. In the Purāṇas Surabhī is described variously as Dakṣa’s daughter, Kaśyapa’s wife, Kaśyapa’s daughter, etc. Although at first sight there may appear some discrepancy in these statements, in the light of them we may clearly arrive at the ancestry and birth of Surabhī. Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Anarayana Kanda, 14th Sarga says that Kaśyapa, the son of Marici and the grandson of Brahmā married Dakṣa Prajāpati’s daughters—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kaśīkā, Tāmṛ, KrodhaVaśa, Manu and Anālā. From verses 20 and 21 in the same Sarga we understand that Surabhī was the daughter of KrodhaVaśa, Dakṣa’s daughter, by Kaśyapa. In the same Sarga we find that two daughters, Rohini and Gandharvī were born to this Surabhī and from Rohini were born all the cows in the world that we see today. and from Gandharvī were born all the horses. It was by her own father Kaśyapa himself that Surabhi's offsprings were born. Therefore, the reference to Surabhi as the wife of Kaśyapa may also be justified. Since Krodhavās, the daughter of Dakṣa was the mother of Surabhi, actually Surabhi was the grand-daughter of Dakṣa. But in a broad sense, a grand-daughter may be considered as a daughter. So the reference to Surabhi in Bhāṣā Bhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 28 as Dakṣa's daughter is correct in that sense.

4) How Kamadhenu Received Divine Powers. Long ago Aditi, wife of Kaśyapa, conceived Mahāviśū in her womb and began an austere penance standing on one leg. At that time Surabhi went to Kailās and offered worship to Brahmā for ten thousand years. The gods who were pleased, came to Surabhi taking Brahmā with them. Brahmā said to her:—“Surabhi I have made you a goddess. You are now above the three worlds—Heaven Earth and Hell. Your world, “Goloka” will become famous. All people will worship you and the cows who are your off spring.”

From that day on which Brahmā blessed her, Surabhi became a goddess with marvellous spiritual powers. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 83).

5) More than one Kamadhenu? There are references to several Kamadhenus in the Purāṇas. There is one Kamadhenu in Vaiṣṇavī’s Āśrama. At Varuṇa’s yāga we see another Kamadhenu. There is no ground for believing that there is only one Kamadhenu and that it was borrowed by each Deva in turn for some particular occasion. It is possible that there were many Kamadhenus in the family of Kamadhenu and they were owned by different Devas. Moreover it is stated that several Kamadhenus take their origin from sources other than the family of Kaśyapa. One of them is from the ocean of milk. In Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 18, we find that when the Devas and Asuras churned the ocean of milk, along with many other precious things, Kamadhenu also came up to the surface. There is a reference to another Kamadhenu in Bhāṣā Bhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, There, it is said, Brahmā who got Amṛta swallowed it beyond limit in his avidity and when he vomited, a Kamadhenu came out from his mouth. That Kamadhenu is said to be living in the world known as Rasātala. The above-mentioned passage also says that there are four other Kamadhenus living on the four sides of the Kamadhenu which lives in Rasātala. They are Saurabhī in the east Harīsikā in the south, Subhadrā in the west and Dhenu in the north.

The next Kamadhenu is the one which was born from the side of Śrī Kaṛṣṇa. Once Śrī Kaṛṣṇa and his consort Rādhā were amusing themselves by amorous pleasures in a remote and secluded place. When they were tired they wished to drink some milk. At that time, Śrī Kaṛṣṇa created by his will power, the cow Saurabhī and the calf Manoratha, from the left side of his body. Śrī-dāman milked that cow into a new earthen pot and when Śrī Kaṛṣṇa was drinking it, the pot fell down and the milk was spilt all over the floor. The milk which spread over an area of 100 yojas, became a lake called “Kṣarasāgra” for Rādhā and her maid to bathe and enjoy water-sports. Numerous cows were born from the pores of Saurabhī and they were presented to the Gopas by Śrī Kaṛṣṇa. (Devi Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha). Like this, several Kamadhenus are seen in the Purāṇas. Therefore there is no discrepancy or contradiction in statements declaring that there were many Kamadhenus in different Āśramas. But since Kamadhenu had achieved divine powers by Brahmā’s grace, it is but reasonable to believe that the different Kamadhenus are really the different forms of the original Kamadhenu, the daughter of Kaśyapa.

6) Thefi of Kamadhenu by Satyavrata (Triśaṅku). Satyavrata (Triśaṅku) was the son of Aruṇa, a King of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He was a vicious and immoral fellow. Once he abducted a Brāhmaṇa girl just at the time of her marriage in her bridal dress. Enraged at this his father drove him away from his palace. Satyavrata wanderedabout aimlessly in the country and in the forests.

Soon after this there was a famine in the land. Human beings and animals began to die of starvation. At that time Viṣvāmitra was performing penance in the forest after leaving behind his wife and children in the country. When he saw that the whole family was in danger of death by starvation, he decided to make some money by selling one of the sons, in order to save the lives of the rest of the family. Satyavrata who came to know of this, met Viṣvāmitra and dissuaded him from selling his son. He promised to supply some flesh every day to the family by hunting animals in the forest and keeping the flesh suspended from the branch of a near-by tree. Accordingly, he began leaving the flesh regularly hanging from the branch of the tree. One day he could not get any flesh by hunting. That night he went to Vaiṣṇavī’s Āśrama and stole Kamadhenu. He killed the cow and ate some of its flesh. The rest he gave to Viṣvāmitra’s family. The next morning when Vaiṣṇavī woke up, he did not see his cow. But he came to know of the whole affair by his intuition. In his fury he cursed Satyavrata and said that the world would brand him with the name “Triśaṅ-ku” because he had committed three licentious sins viz. killing of cows, abducting another man’s wife and incurring his father’s displeasure. After that Vaiṣṇavī restored Kamadhenu to life. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

7) Viṣvāmitra attacked Kamadhenu. Once while Viṣvāmitra was a ruling King, he went into a forest to hunt. In the course of his rambles through the forest, he happened to arrive at Vaiṣṇavī’s Āśrama with his retinue. Vaiṣṇavī called Kamadhenu and ordered her to provide food for Viṣvāmitra and his party. Kamadhenu, by her divine powers, prepared food within a short time and gave them a sumptuous meal; Viṣvāmitra was greatly pleased with this amazing feat of Kamadhenu and he asked Vaiṣṇavī to give her to him. He even offered to give crores of cows in return for her. But Vaiṣṇavī refused to comply with his request. Then Viṣvāmitra tried to seize and take her away by force.

At once Kamadhenu assumed the form of a terrible monster of destruction. From the different parts of her body emerged fierce warriors who clashed with Viṣvāmitra’s followers. All the arrows shot by Viṣvāmitra were caught by Vaiṣṇavī with his hand. In the end Viṣvāmitra admitted that the might of a Brāhmaṇa is superior to the might of a Kaṭāriya. (Vaiṣṇavī was a Brāhmaṇa and Viṣvāmitra a Kaṭāriya). Viṣvāmitra, soon gave up his kingly duties and began penance, thus turning himself into a “Rājaṛṣi” (Royal saint). (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kānda, 52nd Sarga; M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40; M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 175).

8) Kāmadhenu was attacked by the Āṣṭa Vāsus. (See under the word “Āṣṭavasus”, Para 2).

9) Kāmadhenu cried. (See under the word “Indra”, Para 16).

10) Kāmadhenu revived King Baka. (See under the word “Gautama”).

11) Other details.

(i) Kāmadhenu gave birth to Ajāsa, Ekapāt, Ahirbudhnya, Tvaṣṭā and Rudra. Viśvarūpa was the son of Tvaṣṭā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

(ii) Kāmadhenu said that she had no part in the theft of Agastya’s lotus. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 94).

(iii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa turned Govardhana mountain into an umbrella and defeated Indra when Kāmadhenu came to Gokula and bathed Śrī Kṛṣṇa with her milk according to Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda.

(iv) Once the sage Jamadagni went to Goloka and propitiated Kāmadhenu by his tapas. Kāmadhenu gave her sister Sūlīlā to Jamadagni. The sage presented that cow to his wife Rēpukā. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 61).

KĀMALĀ I. Mother of Prahlāda. (Padma Purāṇa).

KĀMALĀ II. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 9, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva, M.B.).

KĀMALĀKṢA I. A great warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Duryodhana sent this warrior along with Śakuni to attack Arjuna. (Chapter 156, Droṇa Parva, M.B.).

KĀMALĀKṢA II. A son of Tārakāsura. He was one of the famous trio of demons. For details see under ‘Tripura’.

KĀMALĀKṢI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KĀMALĀVRATA. See under ‘Jayaśaśrmā’.

KĀMANDAKA. A great sage of ancient times. (Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva, Chapter 123) states that this sage once taught Rājadharma (kingly duties) to King Aṅgirasa.

KĀMĀPĀLA. A Yādava dependant of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

KĀMĀTHA I. A King of a country called Kāmboja.

This King was a prominent member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 22, Chapter 4, Śabhā Parva).

KĀMĀTHA II. A great sage. He became a realised soul by his penance. (Chapter 296, Śanti Parva, M.B.).

KĀMĀṬRĪTHA. A sacred place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 105 says that a man who takes his bath in this holy tirtha will have all his wishes fulfilled.

KĀMBALA. A prominent serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Chapter 33, Ādi Parva, M.B.). The Prayāga tirtha was the abode of this serpent.

KĀMBALA. A part of Kuśadvīpa. (Island of Kuśa). (Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva, M.B.).

KĀMBAR. A celebrated Tamil poet. He was born in a poor family. At the orders of the King many poets wrote the story of Rāmāyaṇa in Tamil. But Kāmbar’s work was accepted as the best. This is the renowned Kāmba Rāmāyaṇa. Kāmbar has written many other poems of which the important ones are Sarasvatī Anūṭā and Kāṇeś Purāṇa. It is said that unintelligent children of Tamil nādu are even now given sand from the burial ground of Kāmbar to induce intelligence into them. The (–r) suffix in Kāmbar is plural denoting respect. (See under ‘Bhadraḷī’).

KĀMBOJA I. Sudākṣina, the King of the country, Kāmboja. He was present at Draupadī’s swayamvara. In Mahābhārata, Karpa Parva, Chapter 156 we read that his younger brother was killed by Arjuna. The Kings of Kāmboja were all known as Kāmbojas. Long ago, this country was ruled by a King named Kāmboja. In Mahābhārata, Śanti Parva, Chapter 166, Verse 77, we see that this Kāmboja was given a sword by the King Dhumhumāra. Perhaps it was from this King Kāmboja that the country came to be called ‘Kāmboja’.

KĀMBOJA II. This kingdom was situated in the northwestern part of India. It is the modern Kabul. We get the following information from Mahābhārata.

(1) From Mahābhārata, Śabhā Parva, Chapter 27, Verse 23, we see that Arjuna had subdued this Kingdom.

(2) The horses which were tied to Yudhiṣṭhira’s chariot were brought from Kāmboja. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 5).

(3) The Mlecchas (a tribe of low-class people) of Kāmboja will become Kings in Kaliyuga. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 188, Verse 36).

(4) There were Kāmbojas in Duryodhana’s army. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 160, Verse 130).

(5) At the time of Mahābhārata the King of Kāmboja was the brave and heroic Sudākṣina. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 166, Verses 1–3).

(6) In the battle between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas, the Kāmbojas took their position in some places in the “Garuda Vīyāha”, a phalanx in the shape of an eagle made by Bhīṣma. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 58, Verse 7).

(7) The horses of Kāmboja were beautiful in appearance and of the colour of parrots. The horses which were tied to Nakula’s chariot, were of this kind. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 7).

(8) When the horses of Kāmboja ran, their tails and cars remained motionless. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 36, Verse 36).

KĀMBUGRIVA. Son of Sudhanvā, King of the country of Madra. Candrasena, King of Sīhālā, tried to get his daughter Mandodāri married to this King. But Mandodāri did not consent to it. (5th Skanda, Devī Bhāgavata.)

KĀMODĀ. A goddess who came out of the churning of the ocean of milk. (For further details see under ‘Vīhūṇḍa’).

KĀMPA. A prince of Vṛṣṇivaināśa. He became a Viśādeva after his death. (Chapter 5, Śvargārohaṇa Parva M.B.).

KĀMPANA I. A mighty King. He was a prominent member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Chapter 4, Śabhā Parva, M.B.).

KĀMPANA II. A demon. (See under Nāhuṣa).

KĀMPANA. A river. If one bathes in this river one will get the benefit of doing a Puṇḍarīka yajña. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KĀMPILYA. An ancient town in South Pāṇḍāla. It was the capital city of King Drupada. Śiṅhādī had come to this city after his marriage. Once the King Daśaratha came near this place and sent a Brähmana messenger to Kâmpilya. In olden days, a King named Brahmâ-datta used to rule over this city. (M.B. Udyoga Parva). See under the word ‘Brahmâdatta’.

KAMSA I. Son of Ugrasena, King of Mathurâ, and an incarnation of an Asura called Kâlînemi.

2) Karhsa, an incarnation of Kâlînemi. In the svâyambhuvaanvantara Marici had a wife named Urnâ and they had six mighty and powerful sons. One day they ridiculed Brahmâ saying ‘A father who has married his own daughter’ (Brahmâ married Sarasvatî, his own daughter). Brahmâ became angry and cursed them to be born as demons on earth. All the six sons were, therefore, born as sons of a demon called Kâlînemi on earth. In their next birth they were born as sons of Hiranyakasîpu. They led a pious life and pleased at this Brahmâ asked them what boon they wanted and they demanded that they should not be killed by anybody. Their father, Hiranyakasîpu, did not like his sons getting a boon behind his back and so he cursed his sons “May you all six go to Pâtâla (nether-world) and sleep there for a long time under the name of Śaṭarbhaâkas. The sons begged for relief and Hiranyakasîpu said that they would after sleeping for a long time be born to Devaki, wife of Vasudeva, as their children and that Kâlînemi, their father in their previous birth would then be born as Kânîsa and kill the children of Devaki by striking their heads on the ground.

Accordingly Kâlînemi was born as Karhsa and he killed the six children of Devaki by striking them on the ground. (Skandha 4, Devî Bhâgavata).

The 10th Skandha of Bhâgavata states “killing Kâlînemi born as Kânîsa” when it refers to the killing of Kânîsa.

3) Another story regarding the birth of Kânîsa. Kânîsa was not actually the son of Ugrasena. It was Nârada who revealed to Kânîsa the story of his birth. It is as follows.

Once when the wife of Ugrasena was in her menses she went to the garden with her companions. Then a Gandharva named Dramila disguised as Ugrasena went to her but she knew the trick and cursed him that he would go to hell. But Dramila committed rape on her and then left the place making her pregnant. When the child was born Ugrasena’s wife greatly hated the child got of an evil deed and cursed it saying that the child would be killed, by a member of the family of Ugrasena. Thus Kânîsa was the son born to the wife of Ugrasena by the Gandharva, Dramila. It was because Kânîsa was aware of it that he behaved very badly to Ugrasena and Kârśa. (10th Skandha, Bhâgavata).

4) How Kânîsa got Mathurâprâ. In olden times there was a famous place called Madhuvana in the river-base of Kâlîndi. The place got the name of Madhuvana because the demon Madhu was residing there.

Madhu had a son named Lavaṇa. Lavaṇa was a very wicked demon always ill-treating the devas. Satrughna, son of Daśaratha, killed him and lived there establishing a beautiful kingdom there. He named that place Mathurâ. After the death of Satrughna two of his sons ruled that country. Then when the Śûrya dynasty became extinct the city of Mathurâ came into the possession of the Yadu dynasty. It was ruled then by a very brave and valiant ruler named Śûrasena. Vasudeva father of Śrî Kṛṣṇa was the son of Śûrasena. After the death of Śûrasena another King of the Yadava dynasty, Ugrasena, became the ruler of the place, Vasudeva accepting cow-rearing as his profession. Kânîsa became King keeping Ugrasena as a prisoner. (Skandha 4, Devî Bhâgavata).

5) Vasudeva and Devaki are imprisoned. Vasudeva married Devaki daughter of Ugrasena and sister of Kânîsa. Kânîsa pleased with his sister presented her with a chariot. Kânîsa, Vasudeva and Devaki ascended the chariot and Kânîsa himself drove the chariot. Then from an unknown source above came a voice which said “Oh King, know thou this and from this moment chalk out thy plans for the future. The eighth son of your sister will kill you for certain. You will be no match against him.” (Chapter 1, Bhâgavata 10th Skandha).

Hearing this voice from heaven Kânîsa got furious and dragging his sister by the hair raised his sword to kill her. Vasudeva then pleaded weeping not to kill Devaki. Only the eighth child of Devaki was going to kill him. Vasudeva would hand over all the children to him as soon as they were born. Such arguments pacified Kânîsa and he left off Devaki without hurting her.

Devaki delivered a son. He grew up under the name of Kirtimând and one day Nârada visited Kânîsa and told him that he was the incarnation of an Asura named Kâlînemi and the son who would be born to Devaki to kill him was Nârâyâna. Kânîsa, blind with fury, killed Kirtimând by striking him on the earth and imprisoned both Devaki and Vasudeva.

6) Manûi of Kânîsa. Pralamba, Cânûra, Trûvârâ, Mûṣîka, Arîjûta, Keśi, Dhenuka, Agha, Vâivida and Pûtâna were born in the Asura family as servants of Kânîsa. He sent them to different sides of the country to torment the Yadavas. Many Yadavas left the place. Even Kânîsa’s father Ugrasena, a great devotee of Viṣṇu was teased.

In the meantime Devaki delivered six sons including Kirtimând and all of them were killed by Kânîsa by smashing their heads against the ground below. The seventh foetus of Devaki was aborted. (Instructed by Mahâviṣṇu, Mâyâdevi invoked the seventh foetus of Devaki and transferred it to the womb of Rohini another wife of Vasudeva. The child thus born to Rohini was Saïkarsâna or Balabhadradârâma. Mahâviṣṇu then entered the womb of Devaki instructing Mâyâdevî to enter that of Yaṣodâ, wife of Nandagopa of Ambâdî at the same time. Śrî Kṛṣṇa was then born in the figure of Viṣṇu. The watchmen were sleeping. Following directions from the new-born child Vasudeva took the child to Gokula and leaving the child there brought back the child of Yaṣodâ and placed it near Devaki. When the watchmen awoke and knew about the delivery of Devaki they immediately ran to Kânîsa to tell him. Boiling with rage Kaniṣa rushed to the side of Devaki and taking the child by the legs raised it for smashing against the ground. The child to the frightened dis may of Kaniṣa slipped from his hand and rising up in the air said “Hi, ill-mannered wicked Kaniṣa, do not waste your valour on women. Your killer has already been born on earth. Do search for him quickly.”

Kaniṣa went pale with fright on hearing this and went away to his palace.

7) Conspiracy of Kaniṣa. The thought that his killer was born somewhere made him restless. He let off Vasudeva and Devaki finding them innocent. Then he sat sadly pondering over the future. The courtiers then advised him to kill all the children who had been born within the past ten days and that would include the killer also. Kaniṣa accordingly sent to different parts of the country his secret agents to kill all children, ten days old.

During this campaign Pūtanā, Śakāṭa, Trnāvarta, Arisṭaka and Kesi tried to kill Śrī Kṛṣṇa also but Kṛṣṇa killed them all easily. For details sec under each head separately. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

8) Kaniṣa is slain. Arisṭaka was one of the prominent Asuras sent to kill Kṛṣṇa. He attacked Kṛṣṇa in the form of an ox. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed it without any difficulty. Nārada who saw this incident informed Kaniṣa about it adding that Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma were the sons of Vasudeva only and the child who slipped out of his hands was the child of Yasodā. Kaniṣa got furious and he again imprisoned Vasudeva and Devaki and brought to Mathurā Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārama and started thinking of ways and means to kill them. Kaniṣa arranged to conduct a grand celebration of Ayudhapuja (worship of the weapons) and invited Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma for the same among many other gopas from Ambādī. He sent his chariot with Akrūra to fetch Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma from Ambādī. Akrūra privately informed Kṛṣṇa of the bad intentions of Kaniṣa. Nandagopa and many others from Ambādī started for Mathurā. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārama started their journey in the chariot the gopas and gobikās assembled there cried loudly. Some blamed Akrūra. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma reached Mathurā. There they slew a huge wild elephant and the five Asuras, Cāṇūra, Mūṣṭika, Kūta, Sala and Kosala whom Kaniṣa had kept ready to kill Kṛṣṇa and Rāma. Sitting on a platform watching this, Kaniṣa became frightened and restless and roared with rage thus “The sons of Nandagopa should be instantly sent away from this palace. All their wealth and all that of the gopas should be confiscated. Bind with ropes the rogue Nandagopa, and kill the wicked Vasudeva. Throw my father, Ugrasena, into the river Kālindī bound hand and foot. Even a father should be killed if he was a relative of one’s enemy.”

Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma boiled with rage when they heard the orders of Kaniṣa and Kṛṣṇa, jumping on to the platform pushed Kaniṣa down and jumping down along with him killed him. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

9) Other details.

(i) Kaniṣa had married the two daughters of Jarāsandha named Asti and Prāptī. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

(ii) Kaniṣa was a fierce bow-man. All the kings hated him. Kaniṣa kept under him a crew of fighting men. He had eight laks of charioteers and an equal number of elephants. His army contained thirtytwo laks of horses. (Dākṣinātyaprāṣṭha; M.B., Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

KAMSA II. Mahābhārata mentions another Kaniṣa who was also killed by Kṛṣṇa. But he was not the son of Ugrasena. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Dākṣinātyaprāṣṭha, Page 325).

KAMYĀ. A celestial woman. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, it is said that she took part in the celebrations at the birth of Arjuna.

KAMYAKAVANA. The Pāṇḍavas lived in this forest for a long time, during their forest life. At that time, several sages were performing puñcanc in Kāmyakavana. Vidura who went out in search of the Pāṇḍavas met them in this forest. After that Sanjaya went to Kāmyakavana and took Vidura with him. It was in this forest that the Pāṇḍavas met sages Mārkaṇḍeya and Nārada. (M.B. Vana Parva).

KAN. Dakṣa. (See under DĀKṢA).

KANABHŪTI. A devil. His name in the previous life was “Supratika”. Once he made friends with the devil Śhūlāśiras. Kubera who became angry at this, cursed Supratika and turned him into a devil. Supratika settled down in the Vindhya mountain, assuming the new name “Kanabhūti”. After narrating Bhṛat-kathā to Gāṇeṣha, Kanabhūti assumed his former form. (For further details, see under the word GUṆĀ-DHIYA).

KA. ĀDA. A famous sage of ancient India. He was the founder of the Vaiśeṣika system. The word means one who eats Kana (atom). His foes gave him this name to ridicule him. He is also called Kanaabhakṣaka. Kañjāda is known as Pippalāda also. (He got that name because he used to eat Pippali (long pepper) in large quantities). (See under PIPPALĀDA).

KANAKA. A big forest on the southern base of Mahāmeru. Ajanādevi gave birth to Hanumān in this forest. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KANAKADHVĀJA. (KANAKAGADA). A son of King Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was slain by Bhīmaṣena. (Śloka 27, Chapter 96, Bhīma Parva).

KANAKĀKṢA. A soldier of Skandadeva. (Śloka 74, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

KANAKANGADA. See under KANAKADHVĀJA.

KANAKAREKHĀ. Daughter of the King of the island of Kanakapurī. By a curse she was born as the daughter of Paropakārī, King of the city of Vardhamāna. A brahmin named Saktideva married her. (Caturdārikālambaka, Kathāsāritsāgara, Tārānga 1).

KANAKAVARSA. A King who ruled the country of Kanakapurī on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. (Kathāsāritsāgara).

KANAKĀVATI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Chapter 618 Śalya Parva).

KANAKAYUS. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He had another name, Karakāyus. This prince was present at the svayānivara of Draupadi. (Śloka 183, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

KANAKHALA I. The place where the Dakṣayīga was conducted. (Chapter 4, Vāmana Purāṇa).

KANAKHALA II. A holy place on the shores of the river Gaṅgā. If one bathes in this river one gets the benefit of performing an Asvamedha sacrifice. (Śloka 30, Chapter 84, Vana Parva). Kālidāsa speaks about this place in his famous work ‘Mehadūta’. At the behest of Vasiṣṭha, Taḵṣaṇa, son of Lakṣmana, conquered the foresters of Kanakha and then established a city there called Agaṭī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KĀNCANA I. One of the two warriors given to Skandadeva by Mahāmeru. The other warrior was named Meghamālī. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 47).

KĀNCANA II. A King of the Pūru dynasty. See under the word PŪRUVAMŚA.

KĀNCANAKŚA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 57).

KĀNCANAKŚṬI. A river which flows through Naimiśāraṇya. This is a part of the river Sarasvati. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 38, Verse 19).

KĀNCANAMĀLĀ. A lady attendant of Vāsavadattā, wife of Udayana.

KĀNCĪ (KĀNCĪPURA). This was the capital city of the Cola Kings. This city was also called “Kāṇeivaram”. It is mentioned among the holy cities. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 21).

KANDARĀ. A follower of Skandadeva. (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KANDARPA. Another name for Kāmadēva. Kāmādeva was born to the mind of Brahmā and as soon as he was born he turned to Brahmā and asked “Kāṁ darpayāmi?” (Whom should I make proud?) So Brahmā gave him the name Kandarpa alias Kandarpa. (Lāvaṇapakalambaka, Kathāśāristisāgara, Tarangā 6).

KANDU. A great sage of ancient Bhārata. He was the father of Māriśa (Vārki) wife of the Praecetas.

1) Birth of Māriśa. Māriśa, daughter of Kanḍu, took her birth from a tree. There is an interesting story about this in Viṣṇu Purāṇa.

Sage Kanḍu, chief of the devajñās, was performing penance in a hermitage on the banks of the river Gomati. Devendra sent Pramlocā, an enchanting nymph, to Kanḍu to distract him from his penance. Pramlocā by her sweet words and enticing manners won the heart of the sage and Kanḍu accepting her as his wife went to the valley of Mandara and lived there happily for a hundred years. One day Pramlocā went and bowed before her husband and sought his permission to go back to Devaloka. “Dear, stay here for some time more” replied the sage. Another hundred years went by. Again one day she went and sought permission to go home. Again the sage asked her to stay for a while more. Centuries passed without the sage losing even a little of his amour. On the other hand every day it found different channels of expression. One evening the sage stepped out of his Ārāma and on seeing that Pramlocā enquired where he was going.

Sage: The sun is going to set. I am going to do my sandhyāvandana. I do not want to bring a break in my daily ablutions and duties.

Pramlocā: Oh, Righteous one, did the sun set for you only today? The Sunset of hundreds of years has gone by without your knowing.

Sage: Dear, you came to this holy river-shore only this morning. It was only this morning that I saw you coming to my Ārāma for the first time. Now the day is over and dusk is coming. Why this ridicule? Please do tell me the truth.

Pramlocā: That I came to you one fine morning is quite true. But since that several centuries have elapsed.

Sage: How many years have gone by since I started enjoying with you?

Pramlocā: Nine hundred years, six months and three days have passed since I came to you.

The great sage became very angry and scolded Pramlocā much. That beautiful maiden heard it all standing bathed in perspiration. The sage in rage commanded the trembling nymph to go away from his presence. Pramlocā, thus reprimanded and sent away, rose up in the air and travelled by it. As she flew, the perspiration of her body was absorbed by the tender leaves of trees on the way. She was pregnant at that time and the embryo which went forth along with her perspiration was absorbed in bits by the tender leaves and sprouts. Wind gathered them from the different trees and made everything into one. Moonlight gave it development and gave it the form of a woman. She was named Māriśa. That was how Māriśa was born of trees (Chapter 15, Anēa I. Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

2) Curse of Kanḍu. Kanḍu’s dear son aged sixteen died in a forest. Grief-stricken, the sage cursed that forest and made it a desert. There was no water there and all the trees became dried and dead. Hanumān and party who went in search of Śītā came to this place. (Chapter 46, Kiṣkindhā Kanṭha, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Kanḍu in the presence of Śrī Rāma. When Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhyā after his exile many sages from all the four different parts came to visit him. Those who came from the south were Kanḍu, Dattātreya Namuci, Pramuci, Vālmiki, Soma and Agastya. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KANḍūṬI. A follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 14, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

KANIKĀ I.

1) General information. One of the ministers of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was a brahmin well-learned in Kūṭaniti (Diplomacy). The bad advice he gave to Dhṛtarāṣṭra became well-known as “Kanikā’s Kūṭaniti”.

2) Kanikā’s Kūṭaniti. Once Dhṛtarāṣṭra asked Kanikā how to conquer one’s enemies by using the four methods of Sāma, Dāna, Bheda and Daṇḍa. Kanikā replied: “Threaten the timid ones. Give respect to the brave and kill them by trickery. Give gifts to the greedy ones. If any one becomes your enemy kill him even if it be your father, preceptor, son, brother or friend. Never speak insulting words about others even when you are extremely angry. Never believe the faithful and unfaithful alike.”

3) Kanikā’s story. Kanikā justified his policy by means of the story of a fox who put into practice the four tricks to gain his end. Once there was a very selfish fox in a forest. He felt a desire to eat the flesh of a lion. For that end he made friends with a tiger, a rat and a mongoose. The fox advised the rat to gnaw the paws of the lion and make it lame. The tiger should then kill the lion. The lion was killed and the fox suggested that they could have a hearty meal of the lion after a bath. Everybody excepting the fox went for his bath and the fox stood watch over the carcass of the lion. First came the tiger after his bath. The fox looked worried and the tiger asked him the reason why. The fox said “Comrade, the rat says with arrogance that he it was that killed the lion. My pride does not allow me to eat what the rat claims to be his kill.” Hearing this the proud tiger left the place saying “Let me see whether I can kill my prey without the help of anybody.”

Sometime later the rat came after its bath. The sly fox said “My friend, the mongoose says that the flesh of a lion is poison. It says “Let the rat eat it and die.” Hearing this the rat went its way.

Then came the mongoose. The fox threatened it and it went away. The fox then ate the flesh of the lion by himself and was contented.

Kanika then said that the Kings should use such tricks against their enemies. (Chapter 139, Adi Parva).

Kanika II. There is a statement in Mahabharata about another brahmin of the Bharadvaja family who was also well-versed in Kāṭaniti. He was an adviser to Satrujitaya, King of Sauvīra. (Chapter 140, Sānti Parva).

Kāṇīṇa. A child born to an unmarried woman. Vyāsa, Karṇa, Śibi, Aṣṭaka, Pratardana, and Vatsāman were Kāṇīṇas.

Kāṇjala. See under Dharmāṇāmā.

Kāṇka I. One of the seven famous archers of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. The seven are: Kṛtavarmā, Anādhṛṣṭi, Śāmīka, Samūṇiyājaya, Kāṇka, Saṅku and Kunti. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva).

Kāṇka II. A King of ancient India. (Sloka 233, Chapter 1, Adi Parva).

Kāṇka III. A bird, son of Surasā. (Sloka 69, Chapter 66, Adi Parva).

Kāṇka IV. The name which Dharmaputra bore when he spent his life incognito at the palace of the King of Vīraṭa. (See under Dharmaputra).

Kāṇka V. A place of habitation of ancient India. This place was given to Dharmaputra as a gift by the inhabitants of the place. (Chapter 51, Sabhā Parva).

Kāṇkāṇa. A follower of Skandadeva. (Sloka 16, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

Kāṇṭākanya. A follower of Skandadeva. (Sloka 16, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

Kāṇṭāraka. A city in South India. There is a reference in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 16, about the conquest of this place by Sahadeva. Modern scholars are of the opinion that Kāṇṭāraka is situated on the banks of the river Vénā.

Kāṇṭāriki. An ancient sage. He was a worker of his gotra. It was in this family that the pre-eminent Brahmadatta was born. (Chapter 342, Sānti Parva).

Kānti. A city in ancient India. (M.B. Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 40).

Kāntivrata. A Vrata observed in the month of Kārttika. It consists in offering worship to Balarāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa and taking food only at night. By observing this Vrata for one year, beauty, longevity and health can be obtained. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 177).

Kāṇva I. (Kāṣyapa).

1) General information. Kāṇva attained Purānic fame as the father who brought up Sakuntalā. From Rgveda it can be gathered that the Kāṇva family was very prominent among the Rṣi families of ancient India. Because he was born in the family of sage Kaśyapa, son of Bhrāma, Kāṇva was known as Kaśyapa also. Kāṇva’s father was Medhātithi as could be seen by a reference to him in Sloka 27, Chapter 208 of Sānti Parva as Medhātithisuta. Kāṇva was staying in a hermitage on the banks of the river Mālinī, with a number of disciples.

2) Kanyāhrada. Vana Parva of Mahābhārata states that Kaṇvāsrāma was on the northern shore of the river Prävenī. According to certain critics Kaṇvāsrāma was situated on the banks of the river Cambal, four miles to the south of ‘Kota’ in Rājputānā.

3) How Kaṇva got Sakuntalā. Once Viśvāmitra started a severe penance and Indra desired to obstruct the attempt sent the enchanting Menakā to entice him. They fell in love with each other and soon Menakā bore a girl. The parents left the child in the forest and went their way. Birds (Sakuntas) looked after her for some time and so she was named Sakuntalā. Accidentally Kaṇva came that way and took the child to his Āśrama.

4) The Yaga of Bharata. Bharata, son of Dusyanta, performed a peculiar type of Yaga called ‘Govitata’ with Kaṇva as the chief preceptor to officiate. (Sloka 130, Chapter 74, Adi Parva).

5) Kaṇva and Duryodhana. Once Kaṇva narrated to Duryodhana how Mātali and his wife Sudharmā went to him in search of a suitable husband to their daughter Gunakeṣi. (Chapter 97, Udvyoga Parva, M.B.).

6) Kaṇva, a sage of the east. When Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhiyā after his exile many sages from many different parts came to visit him. Kaṇva was one of those who came from the east. The others who came along with him were, Vasiṣṭha, Atri, Viśvāmitra, Gautama, Jamadagni, Bharadvāja, Sanaka, Sarabhaṅga Durvīsas, Māṇiṅga, Vibhāṅdaka and Tumburu.

7) Kaṇva and Rgveda.

(i) There are ten Maṇḍalas in Rgveda. The Maṇḍalas from two to seven are written by different Rṣi families. The second Maṇḍala was written by the Bhārgava family of Rṣis, the third by the Viśvāmira family, the fourth by that of Vāṃdeva, the fifth by Atri, the sixth by that of Bharadvāja and the seventh by the family of Vasiṣṭha. Fifty Sūktas of the first Maṇḍala and the whole of the eighth Maṇḍala were written by Kaṇva.

(ii) Kaṇva had a son named Medhātithi. Sūktā twelve of Anuvāka four in the first Maṇḍala of Rgveda is written making Medhātithi a sage.

(iii) Kaṇva had a daughter named Indivārāparbhā by Menakā, (Kathāśārīṣāgarā). (See under Candrāvaloka and Kaśyapa I).

Kaṇva I. A King of Pūruvarhsa. (Pūru dynasty). He was the son of the brother of Santurodha, father of Dusyanta. His father was Pritārtha and he also had a son named Medhātithi. (Agni Purāṇa).

Kaṇvaśiras. A caste. Originally they were Ksatriyas. In Mahābhārata, Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 17 we find that they were reduced to low caste because of their being jealous of the superiority of the Brahmans.

Kanyāhrada. A sacred place. If one stayed in this place for a while one would attain Devaloka. (Chapter 25, Anuśasana Parva).
KANYAKĀGUṆA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).
KANYAKUBJA. (KANYAKUBJA).

1) General information. A city of Purānic fame on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. This is the same place which is now known as Kanauj. Viśvāmitra was the son of Gāḍhī, King of Kanyakubja.

2) Origin of this city. Once there was a great sage named Kuśa who was the son of Brahmā. He had of his wife Vaidarbhī four sons named Kuśāmba, Kuśāṇābha, Asūṛtarajas and Vasu. Kuśa asked them each to rule a country and so each of them built a city of his own. Kuśāmba named his city Kuśāmbī, Kuśāṇābha gave his city the name of Mahodayapura, Asūṛtarajas called his city Dharmāranya and Vasu called his city Girivrajā. Of these Mahodayapura, city of Kuśāṇābha, became later famous as Kanyakubja. (Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

3) How Mahodayapura became Kanyakubja. Kuśāṇābha begot a hundred daughters of the nymph Ghṛtacti. Those beautiful girls were once playing in the forests when the wind-god fell in love with them. The girls rejected his love and Vāyu getting angry with them cursed them and made them hunchbacks. Because the hundred Kanyākās (girls) became Kubjas (hunchbacks) at that place, the place became known as Kanyakubja.

When the daughters returned to the palace as hunchbacks Kuśāṇābha was greatly distressed. Weeping, the girls told him what had happened. At that time a sage named Cūllī was performing penance in a forest nearby. Somadā, daughter of Ürmilā, a bandharva lady, married Cūllī and they got a son named Brahmādatta. This Brahmādatta married the hundred hunchbacks of Kuśāṇābha and the very touch of Brahmādatta transformed the hunchbacks into beautiful girls.

After having given his daughters in marriage Kuśāṇābha conducted a Pratikāmeṣṭi yāga to get a son. In that Yāga Brahmā appeared in person and blessed Kuśāṇābha and he got a son. The son was named Gāḍhī. Gāḍhī got a son and a daughter. The son was named Viśvāmitra and the daughter, Satyavatī. Rēkīa married Satyavatī. Gāḍhī and Viśvāmitra were the rulers of Kanyakubja. See under ‘Rēkīa, Viśvāmitra’—(Sargas 32 to 34, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

4) Nārada and Kanyakubja. There was a very big lake in Kanyakubja. Mahāvīṣṇu once showed Māyā to Nārada at that place. (See under ‘Nārada’).

5) Viśvāmitra and Indra take wine together. Viśvāmitra and Indra took wine together at Kanyakubja. (Śloka 17, Chapter 87, Vana Parva).

KANYĀKUMĀRĪ (KANYA-KUPA; KANYATĪRTHA)

1) General information. Mahābhārata makes references in many places to Kanyākumārī, the southern extremity of former Kerala and Gokarṇa, the northern boundary. It must, therefore, be surmised that these two holy places were very ancient ones. Vana Parva, praises Kanyākumārī at many places. If any one batters at this place one will become very famous. (Anuśasana Parva, M.B.).

Chapter eighty-five of Aranyā Parva, of Bhāṣā Bhārata speaks praising of Kanyākumārī and Gokarṇa among other places. It says thus:

“If you visit Rṣabhācala of Pāṇḍyadeśa you will get the benefit of conducting an Āśvamedhayāga. Then you must go farther south and take a dip in Kanyakūṭirn. The touch of that water absolves you of all sins. Then visit Gokarna situated in the ocean famous in all the three worlds and worshipped by all.'

From this it is to be understood that ot the time of Mahābhārata Kanyākumārī was part of Pāṇḍyadeśa and that Gokarṇa was an island.

2) Purānic stories about Kanyākumārī. There are several stories regarding the origin and renown of Kanyākumārī in the Purāṇas. The most important ones are given below.

(1) Absoler of sins. The wife of a brahmin named Paṇcikā living in Kāśi became unchaste and to wash away her sin she came to Kanyākumārī walking all the way and did penance there, daily bathing in its waters. She attained Salvation and it is believed that a bath in its waters would absolve anybody of all his sins. (Mapimekhāla).

(2) Cakra tīrtha of Kanyākumārī, Puyakāśī, daughter of Mayāśura, once went to Kailāsa and worshipped Sīva. After three yugas Sīva appeared before her and asked her what she wanted. She replied that she wanted to be merged in Sīva always. Sīva then said ‘Three hundred and sixty-five days would make a year. Four lakhs and thirty-three years would make a Kali Yuga. Kṛta, Tṛctā, Dvāpara and Kali are four Yugas and when two thousand such Yugas are over Brahmā finishes a day. Such thirty days make one month and twelve months, a year for Brahmā. When such hundred years of Brahmā are over the great deluge comes. Such ten deluges make a nāzūkā (twenty-four minutes) of Viṣṇu. Counting thus when you pass ten Viṣṇu deluges Sīva passes a second. Then is the time for the fulfillment of your desire. Till that time you sit in meditation on the shores of the south seas. Your hermitage would be known as Kanyākṣetra or Tapaḥ Sthala. During your stay there you must kill all the wicked people like Bāṇāsura and give relief to the people. I will also come and stay with you there then.”

Puyakāśī after prostrating before Sīva went to the south seas. Taking a Japamālā (necklace for prayer) in her hands she assumed the name Kanyākumārī and started her penance. After conquering all the three worlds demon Bāṇa was having a wicked rule over his people when he saw Kanyākumārī and asked her to be his wife. He approached her with his wicked servants Durmmukha and Durdarṣa. But Kanyākumārī flatly refused and in the battle that ensued, Bāṇāsura fell dead by the Cakrayuḍha (Discus) of Devī and at that spot is the Cakrauḍha. (Skanda Purāṇa).

(3) The phantom child which escaped from the hands of Kaṃsa at the time of the birth of Śrī Kṛṣṇa was that divine lady, Kanyākumārī. (Padma Purāṇa).

3) The Geographical view. It is said that there was an extension of the present continent to the south and that expansive land called Lamūra was later submerged in waters. There is a description of such an extended land in some of the old literature like Cīlappadikāram.”

Kanyākumārī which was called ‘Kumāri-amādi’ also was the first setu; Dhanuṣkoṭi the middle setu; and Koṭikkara, last setu. (Scu Purāṇa)
4) In History. Kanyakumāri had attracted the attention of foreigners long before Christ. Herodotus who lived in the third century B.C. has written about Kanyakumāri in one of his books.

In the book ‘Periplus’ written in 60 A.D. there is a mention of Kanyakumāri. It says: "Pious ones at the far end of their lives dedicate their lives to God and go to Kanyakumāri on a pilgrimage and stay there accepting an ascetic life. A divine lady bathed in the holy waters there grants you ‘darṣāna’." Ptolemy another traveller who lived two thousand years ago refers to Kanyakumāri in his book as ‘Komaria Akron’. He had bathed in those waters and worshipped in the Kanyakumāri temple.

Marco Polo of Venice who had travelled these parts in 1243 A.D. has written of his worshipping in the Kanyakumāri temple. He has also recorded having seen thirty miles from Kanyakumāri a glittering figure like that of the Pole-star.

Ibn Batūtā who lived in 1203 A.D. has referred to Kanyakumāri in his book as Rāṣkūnhāri.

KANYĀSAMVEDYATĪRTHA. An ancient holy place. It is believed that those who visit this place will attain the world of Prajāpātimanu. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KANYĀSĀRAMA. A holy place. If a man spends three nights at this place he would attain Svarga. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

KAPA(S). A company of Asuras. The Mahābhārata gives a story of how the brahmins killed these demons. The Āsvīnivedas once came to the earth and gave eyesight to the blind sage Cyavana. It was the time when Indra had denied Soma juice to the Āsvīnivedas. Sage Cyavana got back his eyesight and promised the Āsvīnivedas that he would lift the ban on wine for them. Cyavana conducted a Yāga to which the Āsvīnivedas were also invited. Indra and the other devas refused to take the sacrificial wine and butter along with the Āsvīnivedas. Cyavana got angry and he produced from the sacrificial fire an Āsura named Māda. With a huge mouth and long teeth the demon went round eating all the Devas. All at once Cyavana conquered the earth and the Kapas subjugated heaven. When they lost both heaven and earth the Devas approached the brahmins for help. The brahmins started a war against the Kapas. The Kapas sent Dhani to the brahmins for peace-talks. Dhani said: “The Kapas are equal to you, Oh brahmins, and so why do you fight them? They are well-versed in Vedas and are very wise men who are entitled to conduct Yāgas. They are righteous persons similar to Brahmāris. Prosperity lives in them. They never keep unchaste wives nor do they eat stale meat. It is not proper to fight against such virtuous persons.”

But the brahmins did not pay heed to what Dhani said and they killed all the Kapas in bulk. The Kapas, though they were born Asuras, were good-natured persons. (Chapter 157, Anuśāsana Parva)

KAPĀLA. See under Brahmā, 5th Para.

KAPĀLAMOCANA. A holy place on the shores of the river Sarasvatī, in Kurukṣetra. (Chapter 88, Vana Parva; See under Rahodara and Śiva).

KAPĀLĪ I. One of the eleven Rudras. This Rudra was the son of Sūhānu, son of Brahmā. (Chapter 66, Adī Parva). According to the Mahābhārata the eleven Rudras are the following: Mrgavyādha, Sarpa, Nirṛti, Ajāikapāti, Ahirbudhnya, Pināki, Īvara, Kapāli, Śhāhu, Bharga and Dāhana. (See under Kapārdī). The eleven Rudras are referred to in different ways in Agni Purāṇa and Viṣṇu Purāṇa.

KAPĀLĪ II. Śiva. The Mahābhārata gives the following story regarding the reason for Śiva’s getting the name of Kapāli.

Once a great controversy arose regarding the supreme sovereignty of the three worlds between Brahmā and Viṣṇu. Then there came to their midst an effulgence of Śiva and a voice from heaven said “He who finds the source of this brilliance is the real sovereign of the three worlds”. Brahmā went up to find the upper end and Viṣṇu went down to find the lower end. They travelled for a very long time without finding the end when Brahmā saw a Ketaki flower coming down. On enquiry the flower said it was coming from the origin of the brilliance and that three Brahmā deluges had elapsed since its starting from there. Brahmā took that flower and went to Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu asked Brahmā whether he had seen the end of the effulgence and Brahmā said ‘yes’. Immediately the flower in the hand of Brahmā turned into the figure of Śiva and cut off one of the heads of Brahmā making five-headed Brahmā into four-headed. The angered Brahmā cursed Śiva “May you go begging with a Kapāla (human skull) in your hand.” Thus Śiva became a Kapāli. Śiva cursed Brahmā back saying “You will not be worshipped by anyone” (See under Śiva, Brahmā).

KAPĀRDĪ. One of the eleven Rudras. According to Agni Purāṇa the Ekādaśa Rudras (eleven Rudras) are the following: Hara, Bahuṛupa, Tryambaka, Aparājita, Vṛṣākapi, Śambhu, Kapārdī, Raivata, Mrgavyādha, Sarpa and Kapāli. (Chapter 18, Agni Purāṇa).

KAPAṬA. A demon. He was Kaśyapa’s son born of his wife Danu. (Chapter 65, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAPAṬAṬBIHKUSU. A false sage. To illustrate the fact that if a man fails in his deceit he will be subjected to ridicule, a story of a false sage occurs in Kathāsāritgāra. Since this Character has earned a place in the Indian literature his story is given below:

There was once a city called Mākandi on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. In that city lived a sage who observed silence as a Vrata. One day when he went begging he saw a beautiful girl in a Vaiṣṇya’s house and the false ascetic was attracted by her. Breaking his silence he said “What a pity!” and left the place. The Vaiṣṇya was worried why the sage said so and approached him and asked why he broke his silence to say so. The sage said: “Your daughter is ill-omened, If you give her in marriage all of you remaining will perish. So pack her in a box and with a torch burning on the top of it set it afloat on the river.” The Vaiṣṇya did so.

The sage coming to his Āśrama called his disciples to his side and said “To-night a box with a torch burning on the top of it will come floating on the river. You must take it and bring it to me without opening it.” The disciples went to the river and seeing the box coming floating caught it and took it to their preceptor. But from a point high up in the river a prince had seen the box coming floating and had opened it. He had then released the girl from the box and had floated the box again filling it with a black monkey. When the disciples got the box to the guru he said “Take it upstairs and keep it there. There is a Pūjā to be conducted with the recital of sacred verses. It should not be seen by others. You can all go to sleep."

The false sage went up eager to enjoy the girl in the box and opened the box with pleasant thoughts. But to his utter horror there jumped from the box a ferocious black monkey who mauled him terribly. The Kapāṭa-bhiṣku was fooled. (Tāranga 1. Lāvānakalambaka, Kathāsaritsāgara).

KĀPĪ. A river. (M.B. Bhāṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KAPIDHVĀJA. Arjuna.

KAPIŁA. I. A fierce sage.

1) Genealogy and birth. Kapila was the son of Kardama-prajāpāti, son of Brahmā, born to him of his wife Devahūti, grand-daughter of Brahmā and daughter of Svāyambhūva Manu. Svāyambhūva Manu got two sons named Priyavrata and Uṭīnāpāda and three daughters named Akūti, Devahūti and Prasūti. The daughters were married to Ruci, Kardama and Daksā respectively. To Ruci was born of Akūti a boy named Yañja. He was a partial incarnation of Viṣṇu. To Kardama was born of his wife Devahūti Kapilācarya, a great sage and the celebrated exponent of the Śāṅkhya philosophy. Prasūti got many daughters (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Kapila was known as Cakradhanus also. (Śloka 17 Chapter 109, Udyoga Parva).

Kardama married the daughter of Vaivasvata Manu called Devahūti. They spent their honeymoon in the air travelling throughout the world. Devahūti delivered nine daughters and a son named Kapila. Kardamaprajāpāti gave his daughters in marriage to Marici and the other sages.

2) Kapila—incarnation of Viṣṇu. The Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa states that Kapila was the incarnation of Viṣṇu. In Chapter 93 there is this statement: "Bhāgavān Nārāyaṇa will protect us all. The Lord of the universe has now been born in the world as Kapilācarya."

3) Kapila imparts spiritual knowledge to his mother. Kapila started a severe penance. At that time Kardamaprajāpāti died and Devahūti wife of Kardama and mother of Kapila approached Kapila and asked him to instruct her on the path of Bhakti Yoga. Kapila imparted to her spiritual knowledge and gave her instructions to follow the path of Bhakti Yoga for Salvation. She entered into a life of austerities and attained Samādhi. (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) How Kapila burnt to ashes the Sagaraputras. Once there was a king called Sagara in the Solar dynasty. He had two wives named Keśinī and Sumati. Keśinī got a son named Asamāṇjasa and Sumati got sixty thousand sons. Once Sagara conducted an Aśvamedha Yāga at a place where the rivers Sindhu and Gaṅgā meet. Aśvamāṇ, son of Asamāṇjasa led the sacrificial horse. Indra disguised as a demon stole the horse when it came to a mountain side and hid it in the nether worlds. Sagara sent his sixty thousand sons in search of the horse. They dug the whole continent of Jambūdvīpa surrounded by mountains. Devas, gandharvas and bhujāṅgas complained to Brahmā. Then Brahmā said: "The whole of this world belongs to Viṣṇu. He has incarnated himself as sage Kapila to kill the sons of Sagara and is now in the nether-world bearing this world. In the fire of his anger the Sagaraputras will be burnt to death."

On hearing this all of them came back.

The Sagaraputras returned to their father when they could not find the horse. But Sagara ordered "Go and dig again till you find it". They went to the nether world. After circling the eight elephants who carry the world they dropped down to the nether world through the north-east corner of the earth. There they saw sage Kapila engaged in penance and the sacrificial horse grazing by his side. The sons of Sagara made a great hubbub there and Kapila produced a big sound of rebuke and stared at them. All the sixty thousand sons of Sagara were reduced to ashes. For more details see under Bhāgiratha. (Sargas 39 and 40, Bālakāṇḍa. Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

5) Kapilayogasāstra. Kapila made the renowned Kapila-sāstra sitting in his Āśrama and taught it to his mother Devahūti. Kapila was a great yogin. The yoga Śāstra itself is based on the Śāṅkhya philosophy of Kapila. His Śāṅkhya Śāstra, known as Kapila Sāstra also, contains the distinctive yoga of meditation and it creates in you spiritual knowledge removing your ignorance totally. After teaching his mother his Kapila' he went to the Āśrama of Pulaha and lived there. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

6) Other details regarding Kapila. (i) Kapila was the preceptor of the King of Sindhu. 5th Skandha, Bhāgavata. (ii) Kapila visited Bhāṣma while the latter was lying on his bed of arrows before his death. (Śloka 8, Śaṅtī Parva, M.B.). (iii) There occurred a discussion once between Kapila and a Sage named 'Gau' on the subject whether Gṛha-thadharma (doing one's duty as a house-holder) or yogyadharma (doing yoga practices) was superior. (Chapter 286, Śaṅtī Parva). (iv) Kapila was a sage of great brilliance of body. When the sons of Sagara went to the nether world in search of the horse they saw the sage Kapila sitting there radiating a brightness equal to that of fire. (Chapter 107, Aruṇya Parva). (v) Kapila was an authority on Śāṅkhya and Veda and was a worshipper of Śiva. (Śloka 4, Chapter 18, Anuśāsana Parva). (vi) He has written two books, namely, Śāṅkhya-pravacana and Tatvamsāsa.

KAPILA II. Another name of Śūrya. (Śloka 24, Chapter 3, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAPILA III. A serpent king. It is believed that Kapila is one of the seven serpent Kings who hold the earth in its position. The others are: Dharma, Kāma, Kāla, Vasu, Vāsuki and Ananta. (Śloka 41, Chapter 150, Anuśāsana Parva).

KAPILA IV. Son of an Agni named Bhānu. He was his fourth son and was believed to be another incarnation of sage Kapila (Śloka 21, Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

KAPILA V. Another sage who was the father of Śalīhotra. He officiated in a yajña conducted by Upārivaravasu. (Chapter 336, Śaṅtī Parva).

KAPILA VI. A son of Viśvāmitra who was a brahma-vādī. (Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

KAPILA VII. A synonym of Śiva. (Chapter 17, Anuśāsana Parva).

KAPILA VIII. A synonym of Viṣṇu. (Chapter 149, Anuśāsana Parva).
KAPILĀ I. Daughter of Dakṣaprājāpati, Kāśyapa married Kapilā. (Sloka 12, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva M.B.).

KAPILĀ II. A holy place of Kuruksetra. If one bathes in a sacred pond there one will get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (giving away cows as gifts). (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀ III. A river. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAPILĀ IV. The mother of Pañcaśīka. (Chapter 218, Śaṇti Parva).

KAPILĀ (M). Seventh division of Kuśadvipa. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 14).

KAPILĀHARADA. A sacred place in Kaśī. If one bathes there one will get the benefit of performing a Rājastuya yajña.

KAPILĀKEDĀRAṬṬRHA. A holy place of ancient India. Sage Kapila stayed there for some time. If one bathes in a pond there one will acquire the art of becoming invisible to others. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, M.B.).

KAPILĀŚĀTRA. The Śāstra made by Kapila, the sage. After making this Śāstra Kapila communicated it to his mother Devahūti. (Devī Bhāgavata 8th Skandha).

KAPILASVA. Son of a King called Kuvalāśva. A sage named Dhandhu destroyed him. (Sloka, 40 Chapter 204, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀṬRHA. A sacred pond owned by a King called Kapila. (Sloka 32, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KAPILĀVATĀ. A sacred place. If you stay there and observe fasting you will get the benefit of giving away in charity a thousand cows. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

KAPILEYA. Son of Viśvāmitra. After saving Śunaśeṣha from death, Viśvāmitra was fondling the child on his lap. At that time, the child's father Ajīgarta came to him and wanted Viśvāmitra to return the child to him. Viśvāmitra then told him "Like Kāpileya and Bāhhrayva, this is also my son." From this we may infer that Kāpileya must have been Viśvāmitra's son. (Aitareya Brāhmaṇa).

KAPIṆJALĀ. A river of ancient India. (Sloka 26, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KAPIṆJARA. (KAPIṆJALĀ). A bird. There is a story about the origin of this bird in the Mahābhārata. Once Tvāṣṭa created Trīśiras to kill Indra. Trīśiras had three heads. When by one head he recited the Vedas by another head he drank wine and by the third he looked at the world wickedly. Indra envious of the growing strength of Trīśiras felled him down by his Vajrayudha. A person called Taḳsaka carrying an axe came that way then and by orders from Indra he cut off the heads of Trīśiras. When the heads fell down there emerged from them birds called KapiṆjalā, Tittiri and Kalapīṅgala. From the head which recited the Vedas came the birds KapiṆjalas; from the head that drank the wine came the birds Kalapīṅgalas; and from the head that looked at the world with wickedness came the birds Tittiris. (Chapter 9, Udyoga Parva).

KAPISKANDHA. A soldier of Skandadeva. (Sloka 57, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

KAPOTA. A son of Garuḍa. (Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

KĀPOTA. A sage. Citrāṅgadā, the daughter of Kakutstha and Urvaśī, was his wife. She had two sons named Tuaburu and Suvarcas. Kāpota received much wealth from Kubera and gave it to his sons. Once Kāpota cursed Tāravātī, the queen of Candra-ekhara, that she would bring forth two sons with monkey-faces. (Kālikā Purāṇa, Chapter 56).

KAPOTAROMĀ (KAPOTALOMĀ). Son of the emperor Śibi who was greatly devoted to his dependants. (For genealogy see under Śibi). He had another name Audbhida. (Chapter 197, Vana Parva). He was a prominent member of the court of Varuṇa. (Śaṇti Parva).

KARABHA. A King who bowed before Jarāsandha, King of Magadha. (Sloka 13, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARABHĀJANA. A King of ancient India.

KARABHĀJANA I. A King of ancient India.

KARABHĀJANA II. One of the nine celebrated sons of Rṣabhadeva. He was a yogin of divine wisdom. He imparted spiritual knowledge to these present at the yajña of the King of Videha. (Skandhas 4 and 5, Bhāgavata).

KARĀBHĀJANKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Sloka 69, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARABHI. Son of Śakuni. (Matsya Purāṇa).

KARAHĀṬKA. A country of south India. Sahadeva conquered this country. (Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARĀKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARAKARSAKA. A brother of the Rājā of Cedi. Sarabha is the other brother. The Rājā of Cedi along with his brothers, Karakarṣaka and Sarabha, helped the Pāṇḍavas in the great battle. (Sloka 47, Chapter 50, Udyoga Parva).

KARAKASĀ. A soldier who fought on the side of the Kauravas. He stood and fought at a strategic point in the Garuda Vyūha formed by Droṇa. (Sloka 6, Chapter 20, Droṇa Parva).

KARĀLA. A Deva Gandharva. He took part in the birth-day celebrations of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva, M.B.).

KARĀLADANTA. A great Sage. He was a bright member of the court of Indra. (Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARĀLĀJANAKA. A King of Mithilā. Vasiṣṭha imparted to him spiritual knowledge. (Śaṇti Parva).

KARĀLĀKṢĀ. A soldier of Skandadeva. (Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

KARAMĀLĀSAMPRADĀYA. The method of counting the number of recitals of a prayer by using the fingers of the hand. (See under Gāyatrī).

KARAMBHĀ. Brother of Rāmbha, father of Mahiṣāsura. See under Mahiṣa.

KARAMBHĀ. A princess of Kaliṅga-deva. She was married to Akrodiha, a King of the Puruvaṁśa. She was the mother of Devāṭhī. (Sloka 22, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

KARANĀ. Another name of Yuyutsu. See under Yuyutsu and Varṇa.

KARANDHAMA.

2) How he got his name Karandhama. Once there came a famine in the country of Suvarcas. The treasury became empty. Taking that opportunity the enemies attacked his country. There was no army for him to fight against his enemies. Meditating upon God he blew his hands and then an army sufficient to fight his enemies appeared before him and using that he defeated them. Because he arranged an army by Karadhamana (blowing of hands) he was given the name of Karadhamana also.

3) Other details.
   (i) The celebrated King Aviṣṭi was the son of Karandhama. (Chapter 4, Aṣvamedha Parva).
   (ii) Karandhama was a prominent member of the court of Yama. (Śloka 16, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

KARANDHAMANA. See under the word Karandhama.

KARANDHAMANA (M). A tirtha situated near the southern ocean. The five holy places in the southern ocean, viz. Agastya tirtha, Saubhadrā tirtha, Pauloma tirtha, Karandhamana tirtha and Bhārādevīja tirtha were called Pañca tirthas. In the course of Arjuna's pilgrimage, he visited these Pañca tirthas. At that time, the Sages never used to go there. There was a special reason for it. The five celestial women, Vargā, Saurabhccyi, Sāmicī, Buddhāda and Latā used to live in them in the form of crocodiles as a result of a sage's curse. Arjuna liberated all of them. (For details see under the word "Vargā").

KARAṆJANILAYĀ. Analā, the mother of all trees. She was the daughter of Dakṣa and the wife of Kaśyapa. She is known as Virudhā also. That was how Viṟūṭ became a synonym of tree. It is believed that Analā stays in the tree Kāraṇāja. To obtain blessings from Analā people worship the Kāraṇāja tree. (Ślokas 35 to 36, Chapter 230, Vana Parva).

KARAPARVAN. A holy place in the Sarasvati river valley. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 54).

KĀRASKARA. A despised country of ancient times. There is a reference to this country in the Mahābhārata, Karnā Parva, Chapter 44.

KARAṬA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 63, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARATOYĀ. A holy river. This river worships Vārubu sitting in his court. (Śloka 22, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva). If one stays on the shores of this river and observes fasting for three days one would get the benefit of performing an Aṣvamedha yāga. (Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

KARAVIRA I. A prominent serpent. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

KARAVIRA II. A mountain on the southern side of Mahāmeru. See under Mahāmeru.

KARAVIRA III. There was once a country named Karavira on the base of the mountain Gomanta. That country was being ruled by a King called Sṛgāla-vāsudeva. He was killed by Śrī Kṣaṇa and Balarāma together as per instructions from Parāṣurāma. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

KARAVIRA IV. A forest in the neighbourhood of Dvārakā. (Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

KARAVIRAKṢA. A demon. He fought against Rāma and Lakṣmana along with Kārā, Dūṣana and Tṛīśiras. (Śloka 24, Chapter 26, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, Vīśvāṅku Rāmāyaṇa).

KARAVIRAPURA. A holy place. If one bathes in this place one will attain the form of Brahmat. (Chapter 23, Anuśāsana Parva).

KARDAMA I. A Prajāpati. Pulaha, son of Brahmā, be− got of his wife Kṣaṃā three sons named Kardama, Urvāriyān and Sahiṣṭu. (Chapter 10, Aśī 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa). Of these three Kardama married Devahūti. Devahūti was the daughter of Śvāyambhuva Manu and sister of Ākūti and Prasūti. (5th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Devahūti was an ideal wife and served her husband with great devotion. Kardama was pleased with his wife and presented her with an aeroplane. Kardama and Devahūti conducted then a tour of the worlds in that plane. Devahūti delivered nine daughters and a son. The daughters were married to Marici and other sages and the son grew into the celebrated Sage Kapilacārya. Kardama then entered into Samādhi. (Sitting in yoga and courting death of one's own accord). (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

KARDAMA II. A virtuous serpent. (Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

KARDAMA III. This Sage sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

KARDAMA IV. A celebrated sage who was the grand−son of Viraja. He had a son named Aṇāṅga. (Śloka 90, Chapter 59, Sānti Parva).

KARDAMILAKSETRA. A temple near the mountain of Samaiga. Bharata was crowned King at this temple. (Śloka 9, Chapter 135, Vana Parva).

KARENUMATI. Daughter of Śiśupāla, King of Gedi. Nakula married her and they got a child named Nirmitra. (Śloka 79, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

KARIṢA. A son of Viśvāmitra. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 55).

KARIṢAKA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva, M.B.).

KARIṢIṢ. A river. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARIṬI. A place of habitation in ancient India. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARKAHANDA. A place of habitation in ancient India. This place was conquered by Karna for Duryodhana. (Vana Parva).

KARKANDU. A saintly King mentioned in Śūktā 112, Anuvāka 16, Maṇḍala 1 of Rgveda.

KARKARA. A prominent serpent. See under Kadrū.

KARAKTI. See para 12 under Brahmā.

KARKI. The son of the sage Āpastamba by his wife Aksusūtra.

KARKOTA. A terrible serpent.

1) Birth. This serpent was born to Kaśyapa, by his wife Kadrū.

2) The curse. Once Karkotaka cheated the sage Nārādy. The angry sage cursed him and said that he would have to remain without the power of movements in the forest till Nala came to rescue him. From that day Karkotaka lived in that forest, awaiting the arrival of Nala.

3) Nala and Karkotaka. Once a wild fire spread all over the forest. Karkotaka whose power of movement was destroyed by Nārāda's curse, cried aloud, calling upon Nala to come and save him. It was at this time that Nala arrived at the spot after leaving Damayanti in the forest. Nala came to him, on hearing his cries. The serpent informed Nala about the story of Nārāda's curse and reducing himself to the size of a thumb sat on the ground. Nala removed him to a safe spot away. from the fire. The serpent asked Nala to walk a few steps counting his footsteps. Nala did so and at the tenth step, Karkotaka stung him and his whole body was turned blue. Suddenly Karkotaka assumed his own original shape and spoke to Nala as follows:—"I have changed your appearance so that people may not be able to recognize you. Kali who is troubling you, still lives within you. It is he who is affected by my poison. You need not fear danger from poison any more. You will never be defeated in battle. Go and engage yourself as the charioteer of Rtuparṇa, King of Ayodhya. You will teach him Aśvāṅḍraya mantra. In return for it he will teach you Aṣṭaḥṣaḍraya mantra. Here are two garments which I give you. If you put them on, you will be restored to your own shape. May you be blessed again with a happy family life." After saying this, Karkotaka vanished. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 66).

KARKOTAKA. A land beyond the eastern ocean. It is not far from there to the river Śītodā. The Udaya mountain is just across it. (Kathāsaritsāgara).

KARMAḤŪMI. The land of Bṛharyatā. How this continent got the name of Karmabhūmi is given below. All those born in this land enjoy a life in Svarga, on earth or in hell according to the class to which their actions belong namely Sātvic, Rājasic or Tāmasic. It is possible for only this land to obtain for its people life in other worlds. Therefore this land got the name Karmabhūmi. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

KARMAṆA†. A King of the family of Arjuna. He was the son of Bṛhatśena and the father of Srutaśūjaya. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

KARNA I. The eldest son of Kunti. Though he was the brother of the Pāṇḍavas he joined sides with the Kauravas and became the King of Aṅga. So the name of Karna comes in the genealogy of the Aṅga royal family. 1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viśu:—Brahmā-Atri-Candra-Buḍha-Puruṣasvaya-Āyus - Nāhuṣa-Yayātis-Turvasu-Vahni-Bhargava-Bhānu-Triḥbhadra-Karan-dhama-Marutta - (Marutta had no son and he adopted Dusuṣya) - Dusuṣya - Vāruṇa - Gāndīra - Gāndhāra-Kola-Druhyu-Babhruesu - Purovasa - Γharma - Gṛtha-Viduṣa-Pracetas-Sabhānara-Kālana - Sṛṇja - Purṇa-jaya - Jana-mejaya-Mahāśiṣa-Mahāmanas-Uṣmara - Titi-ka-Ṛuṣadratha-Paśa-Suṭapana-Bali-Aṅga - (The Aṅga dynasty begins) - Daḍhīvaṇa - Dravrīntha - Dharma-ratha-Citraratha-Satya-ratha - Lomapāda - Caturāṅga-Pṛthulakṣa-Campa-Haryagya-Bhadraratha-Bṛhatkarmā-Bṛhadbhānu-Bṛhadāmā-Jayadratha-Bṛhadratha-Viva-jī-Karna.

2) Birth of Karna. Pāṇḍu, a King of Candravānī, married Kunti, daughter of King Śūrasena. This girl was brought up even from childhood by a King called Kuntibhoja. She grew up in the palace of the King. She was once put in charge of attending to the welfare of those engaged in religious duties. The sage Durvīśas came there then and stayed for four months as the king's guest. Kunti served the sage during his stay there with so much care, patience and devotion that the sage was immensely pleased and gave her at the time of his departure a divine mantra. If she called upon any god repeating that mantra once, that god would manifest himself to her and bless her with a son equal to him in glory. The mantra was to be used only five times. Kunti was young and wanted to test the power of the mantra. So she recited the mantra meditating on the Sun. Instantly she felt she saw a divine person coming to her from the sun. She was perplexed. But the divine form embraced her and consoled her saying that she would never lose her virginity even if she bore a son from him. None excepting her step-mother knew about this. In due course Kunti delivered a male child and with the help of her step-mother she put that child in a box and floated it on the river Aśvā. That box leaving the river Aśvā entered the Yamunā river and leaving Yamunā it entered the river Gaṅgā. Drifting slowly the box reached Campāpurī, a country of Śūtas. Adhiratha born of the Sūtvānāśa and an ally of the Kauravas, saw a box floating on the river while he went for his bath and took it home. Rādhā, wife of Adhiratha, who was childless was greatly pleased to see a babe inside the box and they adopted it and brought it up. The boy was named Vārṣaṇa. It was this babe that became the celebrated Karna afterwards. (Four chapters from 305, Vana Parva).

3) Education of Karna. Karna grew up in the house of Adhiratha in the country of Aṅga bearing the names Vāsaṇa and Vṛṣa. Kunti knew this through spies. When the time came for imparting education to Karna Adhiratha sent him to Hastināpura to the presence of Drona for teaching him archery. Karna studied under Krpā and Parāśurāma also. After his education he entered into a treaty with Duryodhana. (Chapter 309, Vana Parva).

4) Karna is cursed. Karna was cursed by a brahmin and Parāśurāma. The story is given below. Even while they were studying archery Arjuna and Karna vied with each other. Karna once requested Drona to teach him in private the secret of the Brahmā missile to fight against Arjuna. But Drona did not accede to his request. Karna then went to Mahendragiri and bowed before Parāśurāma and represented himself as a member of the Bhṛgu family. He said he had come to him to be his disciple and learn the secret of the Brahmā missile from him. Parāśurāma believed him and accepting him as his disciple taught him many new techniques in archery. Once Karna was wandering in the vicinity of the āśrama when he saw a lonely cow grazing there and Karna without knowing that it belonged to a brahmin sent an arrow and killed it. The brahmin got furious and cursed Karna thus "Oh, sinner, the wheel of your chariot would go down in the mud when you face the enemy to fight against whom you are now taking training. Then, when you stand perplexed, your opponent would cut off your head." Karna requested for a removal of the curse but the brahmin refused to show any mercy. Parāśurāma taught Karna the secret of the Brahmā missile. One day tired after a day's fast and a walk around the āśrama with his disciples Parāśurāma slept resting his head on the lap of Karna. Then a beetle named Alarka attacked Karna and started sucking blood from his thigh. Blood was oozing from his thigh and still Karna did not stir from his position lest it should disturb his guru in his nap. Suddenly Parāśurāma awoke and stared at the beetle and the beetle fell dead. It then took the form of a demon and rising up in the air said "SVAMIN! I was once a demon called Dārśā. Once I carried away by force the wife of the sage Bhrūṣṭa and the angered sage cursed me and made me a battle. When I craved for pardon he said that I would be given my original form by Paraśu-rāma."

When the demon disappeared saying so much Paraśu-rāma turned to Karna who stood with respect, his dress all covered with blood. Paraśu-rāma said: "No brahmin can bear so much pain with such patience. Surely, you are not a brahmin. Let me know the truth." Trembling with fear Karna revealed his identity and then Paraśu-rāma cursed him saying "You will forget the secret of the Brahmā missile at the time when you want to use it against your enemy." (Chapters 2 and 3, Sānti Parva).

5) How Karna became the King of Aṅga. The Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas were studying archery under Dronācārya together and Karna also was among them. When their education was complete a day was fixed to exhibit the skill of the students. The public also was invited to see the skill of the princes. Everybody showed his best and Arjuna displayed super-human skill so that the vast assemblage was lost in wonder and admiration. Then strode Karna to the scene and not only did he duplicate with ease Arjuna's feats but he did show something more. The assemblage was dumfounded. Arjuna turned pale. At this moment Kṛṣṇa stood up and questioned the right of Karna to compete with these with royal blood in them. Then rose Duryodhana and said: "If the combat is not in order simply because Karna is not a prince it is easily remedied. I crown Karna as the King of Aṅga". Then there came to the scene the aged Adhiratha, the foster-father of Karna, and as Karna saw him coming he went and bowed before him and Adhiratha embraced him with tears in his eyes. (Chapters 134 to 136, Adi Parva, M.B.).

6) Karna's armour and ear-rings. Karna was born with an armour on his body and rings in his ears. Chapter 99 of Adi Parva says thus: "To Kuntī was born of Sūrya the mighty Karna. Even at his birth he was adorned with an armour over his body and rings in his ears." Sūrya had ordained that as long as Karna wore the armour and ear-rings he would be unconquerable. Indra knew this and wanted to get Karna rid of these so that Arjuna, his son, might gain a victory over Karna. Karna was reputed for his charity and Indra under the garb of a brahmin went to Karna and begged of him his ear-rings and armour. The Sun god had already warned him in a dream that Indra would thus try to deceive him. Still Karna could not bring himself to refuse any gift that was asked of him and so he cut off the ear-rings and armour with which he was born and gave them to the Brahmāṇa. The only request that the noble Karna did make was that in separating the ornaments from his body no wound should be made. Indra did it with great skill neither hurting him nor making even a scratch on this body. Indra bade Karna ask for any boon he wanted. The Sun god had also advised him to ask for a good weapon in return in case he gave away his assets and so he requested Indra the best of the weapons he possessed. Indra gave him his weapon, the Śakti, called Vaijayantī also. Karna had to use that weapon to kill the great Ghaṭotkacā in the Mahābhārata battle.

7) Other details.
(i) Karna was present at the Svayamvara of Draupadī. (Śloka 4, Chapter 185, Adi Parva).
(ii) Bhīma defeated Karna once in a single combat. (Śloka 20, Chapter 34, Sābhā Parva).

(x) Kāṇḍapṛṣṭham is the name of Karna's bow.

8) Karna and the Kurukṣetra battle. The great battle of Mahābhārata lasted for eighteen days and some of the incidents touching Karna during that period are given below:
(i) Before the great war started Kuntī went alone to the shores of Gaṅgā and met Karna. She then confessed to him that she was his mother and that the Pāṇḍavas were his brothers. She advised Karna to join sides with the Pāṇḍavas and the Sun god approved of it. But Karna refused to do so. He said he would never forsake Duryodhana who had brought him up from his childhood at a time when he was in peril. But he promised his mother that he would never kill any of her other four sons but would kill Arjuna in the battle-field. (Chapter 146 Udyoga Parva).
(ii) Karna started his fight against the Pāṇḍavas after taking blessings from Bhīma. (Chapter 3, Droṇa Parva).
(iii) Karna fought against the princes of Kekaya, Arjuna, Bhīma, Dhṛṣṭadyumna and Śātayaki in single combat. (Chapter 32, Droṇa Parva).
(iv) Abhimanyu defeated Karna in a single combat. (Chapter 40, Droṇa Parva).
(v) Karna made Bhīma unconscious. (Chapter 139, Droṇa Parva).
(vi) Karna once withdrew a bit when hit by the arrow of Arjuna. (Chapter 139, Droṇa Parva).
(vii) Karna insulted Kṛpācārya at one time. (Chapter 158, Droṇa Parva).
(viii) Karna killed Ghaṭotkacā with the weapon Śakti which Indra had given him in exchange for the armour and ear-rings which he had given Indra. (Chapter 130, Droṇa Parva).
(ix) Karna ran away from the battlefield when he heard that Drona was dead. (Chapter 193, Karna Parva).
(x) Karna was made the Generalissimo of the Kaurava army when Droṇa died. (Chapter 10, Karna Parva).
(xi) Śāliya became the charioteer of Karna (Chapter 36, Karna Parva).
(xii) The beautiful headwear of Arjuna fell down to the ground by the snake-faced arrow of Karna. (Chapter 90, Karṇa Parva).

(xiii) When Arjuna was fighting against Karna the chariot-wheels of Karna sank into the ground. (Chapter 90, Karṇa Parva).

(xiv) Arjuna slew Karna. (Śloka 50, Chapter 91, Karṇa Parva).

(xv) Karna had three sons named Citrasena, Satyasena and Suṣeṇa. All the three were killed at Kurukṣetra by Nakula. (Ślokas 19 to 50, Chapter 10, Sāya Parva).

9) Karna goes to heaven. After his death Karna went to heaven and merged with his father, the Sun god. (Śloka 20, Chapter 5, Svargārohaṇa Parva).

10) Names of Karna.

(i) Because Karna was born with an effulgence (Vasu) he was first given the name Vasuṣeṇa.

(ii) Because he was born with Kūḍalas (ear-rings) in his Karna (ears) he was called Karna. (Chapter 302, Arāpya Parva).

(iii) Besides these two he had many other names. A few are given below:

Ādhirathī, Ādityanandana, Ādityatanaya, Āṅgārāja, Āṅgēśvara, Arkaputra, Bhāratarasabha, Goputra, Kaunimentary. Kuntoṣuta, Kuruvāha, Kuruptraptapati, Kuruvīra, Kuryodhā, Pārtha, Vṛṣṭāmaṇa, Rāhasūta, Rādhā-

KARNĀTAKA. A country of South India. Mahābhārata says like this: “There are a few more countries to the south and they are: Drāviḍa, Kerala, Prācya, Muṣika, Vanavāsika, Karnaṇṭaka, Mahīṣāka, Vīkalpa and Mūṣaka.” (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARNAVEŚTA. A Kṣatriya King. He was the incarnation of an Asura named Krodhavāsa. (Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

KARŚIKĀ. One of the eleven Devakanyakās who sang and danced in the Jannotsava of Arjuna. The others are: Menakā, Sahaṇayā, Puṇḍikasthāla, Rūṣṭhāla, Gṛḥtāṭi, Viśvāḍi, Pūrvacitti, Ulloca, Prāmloca and Urvaśī. (Chapter 123, Ādi Parva).

KARŚIKĀRĀVANA. A forest to the north of the mountain Sumeru. All the six seasons appear there at the same time and so this forest is always filled with flowers. (Chapter 6, Śloka 24, Bhīṣma Parva).

KARPARA. See under Ghaṭa.

KARPASIKA. A country in ancient India. The maids of this country served in the Rājāsūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Śabha Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 8).

KARŚAPANA (M). (KARŚIKĀM). A measure of weight for gold and silver in ancient India.

KARŚNI. A Deva Gandharva. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 56 says that he participated in the celebrations connected with Arjuna’s birth.

KĀṬ. A Viśādeva, (Śloka 35, Chapter 91, Anuśānana Parva).

KĀṬASVARA. An Asura. Once this Asura became world emperor. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 52).

KĀṬAVĪRYARJUNA (KĀṬAVĪRYA). A renowned King of the Hehaya dynasty; 1) Genealogy. From Mahāviṣṇu were descended in the following order: Brahmā—Atri—Çandra—Buddha—Parur-

2) Hehaya Dynasty and Bhārgava Dynasty. The Hehayas were Kṣatriyas and the Bhārgavas were Brāhmana. The Bhārgava sages were the family preceptors of the Hehaya Kings. The Hehayas who were generous and charitable, used to give plenty of wealth to the Bhārgavas. Consequently in course of time, the Bhārgavas grew wealthy while the Hehayas gradually declined. In order to tide over their difficulty, the Hehayas decided to borrow some money from the Bhārgavas. But the Bhārgavas refused to oblige, on the plea that they had no money. The enraged Kṣatriyas (Hehayas) began to persecute the Bhṛgu (Bhārgavas). The Bhṛgu left for the Himālayas after burying all their treasures under the floor of their Āśramas. The Kṣatriyas pursued them and hunted them even there. At last a Brāhmaṇī who belonged to the Bhārgava race, gave birth to a sage named Arvua through her thigh. With his birth the Hehayas began to lead a less aggressive life. After the lapse of many years, the mighty Kāṭavīryarjuna was born in the Hehaya dynasty and the mighty sage Jamadagnī was born in the Bhṛgu dynasty. Both of them nourished their hereditary feud. With his capital in the city of Māhīṣmati on the banks of the river Narmadā, Kāṭavīryarjuna began his reign. (See under Arvua I).

3) Thousand Hands of Kāṭavīryarjuna. Once when Kāṭavīryarjuna was living in his capital Māhīṣmati, the sage Nārada happened to come there. The King greeted him with due reverence and asked him what course of action was to be followed for attaining mokṣa (salvation) and at the same time for enjoying worldly pleasures. Nārada replied that by performing the rite known as “Bhadradīpa Pratiṣṭhā”, both these objects could be achieved. Accordingly, Kāṭavīrya went to the banks of the river Narmadā with his wife and began the observance of Bhadrabā Pratisthā. Kaṭṭavirya’s guru was Dattātreya, the son of Atri. At the conclusion of the Yağa rites, Dattātreya who was pleased, asked Kaṭṭavirya what boons he wished to have. Kaṭṭavirya with joined palms asked him many boons one of which was that he should have a thousand arms. Dattātreya granted him the boons, and Kaṭṭavirya who became proud of his new possessio, ruled at Mahīśmati for 66,000 years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 44).

4) Vāyu’s Warning. Kaṭṭavirya who returned triumphant after receiving the boon from Dattātreya heard a mysterious voice warning him in the following words:—”You fool! Don’t you know that a Brāhmaṇa is superior to a Kṣatriya? A Kṣatriya governs his subjects in alliance with the Brāhmaṇa”. On hearing this, Kaṭṭavirya became angry. He understood that Vāyu, the divine messenger was behind the mysterious voice. He despised Vāyu and argued that a Kṣatriya was superior to a Brāhmaṇa. Vāyu gave him a warning that a Brāhmaṇa would curse Kaṭṭavirya. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 152).

5) Kaṭṭavirya cursed by the sage. Once Agni (fire-god) approached Kaṭṭavirya and begged for food. The King allowed him to feed upon mountains and trees from any part of his Kingdom. So Agni began to devour the woods and hills. This led to the burning down of an Aśrama owned by a sage called Āpava. The enraged Sage came to know that Kaṭṭavirya was responsible for the havoc and pronounced a curse that Paraśu-rama would chop off all the thousand hands of Kaṭṭavirya.

6) Kaṭṭavirya and Rāvana. In the course of his triumphal march, after conquering the whole land, Rāvana once arrived with his forces on the bank of the river Narmadā. Enjoying the smooth flow of the crystal clear stream of the Narmadā and the pleasant sand banks in the river-bed, he spent a night there with his followers. Early next morning he took his bath in the river and setting up the idol of Śiva on the sand bank, began to worship it. Just then Kaṭṭavirya and his wives came to the place and began their water sports, a few yards down the river from the place where Rāvana was sitting. As part of his amusements, Kaṭṭavirya stopped the flow of the river by making a dam with his thousand arms. This caused the level of the water to rise and Rāvana with his materials of worship was submerged in the flood. Enraged at this disturbance to his worship, he sent two of his men down the river bank to find out what was happening. They traced the source of the trouble to Kaṭṭavirya and his water-sports and reported the matter to their master. At once Rāvana armed himself with his bow rushed to Kaṭṭavirya and began a fierce fight. At last Rāvana fell down under the heavy stroke of Kaṭṭavirya’s mace and was bound in chains and imprisoned. He lay there for one year. Rāvana’s father sage Pulastya came to know of this and he went to Kaṭṭavirya’s palace. He was received with due respect and at his request, Kaṭṭavirya released Rāvana and after that they remained friends for life. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

7) Kaṭṭavirya and Reṇukā’s Death. One day when Paraśurāma was fourteen years old, his father sage Jamadagni went to the forest to fetch some Samitis (sacrificial twigs). Jamadagni’s wife, Reṇukā swept and cleaned the Aśrama and went to the river Revī to fetch water and Paraśurāma was left behind in the Aśrama. When she reached the river bank, she saw Kaṭṭavirya indulging in amorous pleasures with his wives in the water. She waited unobserved on the bank for some time and after they had left the place, she stepped into the river. But since the water was muddy, she had to go to another place in the river to get clear water. There also she lingered for a few minutes, looking at the amorous amusements of Citrarathā, King of Sālva, with his wives. It was only after they had departed that she was able to return to the Aśrama with water. Meanwhile Jamadagni who had returned to the Aśrama earlier was angry at her delay and was waiting impatiently for her arrival. As soon as she reached the Aśrama, the sage, in a fit of fury, ordered Paraśurāma to cut off her head and the latter obeyed him. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 58).

8) The Triumphant March of Kaṭṭavirya. All the Kings in the world acknowledged the supremacy of Kaṭṭavirya. In Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16, we find that Kings of the Solar dynasty like Trayyārūna, Hariścandra, Rohitāśva and Cucu were defeated by Kaṭṭavirya. In his golden chariot he went about defeating Devas, Yakṣas, Rṣis and others. He challenged even Viṣṇu. He insulted Indra in the company of Indrāni. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 115).

Intoxicated by his successes, Kaṭṭavirya went to the sea-shore and challenged the ocean and began to destroy the animals in the sea by shooting them with his arrows. God Varuṇa appeared before him and asked him what he wanted. Kaṭṭavirya asked the god to name a man who had the capacity to fight with him. Varuṇa answered that Jamadagni’s son Paraśurāma was the person who satisfied that condition. Kaṭṭavirya accepted the challenge and went in search of Paraśurāma. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 29).

9) Killing of Jamadagni. Once Kaṭṭavirya went to hunt in the forest with his followers. They were roaming in the Vindhyā forests in search of game. At noon after a refreshing bath in the clear waters of the river Narmadā when they were preparing to return, they saw Jamadagni’s Aśrama. After asking his men to wait at the river-bank, Kaṭṭavirya went alone to the Aśrama. He paid his respects to the sage and after their usual greetings, Jamadagni asked him to call his followers also to the Aśrama. When all of them arrived the sage gave them a sumptuous feast. Kaṭṭavirya wondered how the sage managed to do it. They spent the night there and when they returned home next morning Kaṭṭavirya’s minister Candragupta told him that he saw a cow in Jamadagni’s Aśrama and that it was from that divine cow that the sage was able to get all the rare articles of food which he supplied to the guests. He also offered to get the cow from the sage. So the King sent Candragupta to the Aśrama to beg the cow from the sage for him. Candragupta accordingly went with a few followers to the Aśrama and begged for the cow. At that time Paraśurāma was not in the Aśrama. Jamadagni told them that the cow was Kāmādhenu’s sister, Susīlā and that it was not possible to give her. Candragupta tried to seize the cow by force but she suddenly vanished into the sky. The King’s men tried to capture her calf. Jamadagni who came forward to prevent them, was beaten to death by Candra-group. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 67 to 70).

10) Jamadagni's Restoration to Life. Paraśurāma returned soon to the Ārāma with the disciple Akṛṭavaṇa. At the sight of his father lying dead on the floor, Paraśurāma cried aloud. Repūkā beat her breast twentyone times. Seeing this, Paraśurāma took a solemn vow that he would go round the world twentyone times and expitrate the Kaśṭriya Kings. The sage Sukra appeared there with Suśīlī who had vanished. After restored Jamadagni to life Sukra went back.

11) Death of Kārtavirya-jūna. Paraśu Rāma who had turned himself into the very embodiment of Revenge, accompanied by Akṛṭavaṇa, took his stand at the gates of the city of Māhiṃṣatī and challenged Kārtavirya-jūna to a fight. Kārtavira came out with a huge army. In the terrible fight that followed, Paraśurāma himself with his axe (paraśu) chopped off all the thousand arms of Kārtavirya-jūna. All his sons were killed. Kārtavirya himself fell down beheaded. This was the end of the pillar of Hehaya dynasty. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 81).

12) Kārtavirya's sons. Kārtavirya had one hundred sons. All of them were killed in the battle by Paraśurāma. Their names, as given in Chapter 76 of Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, are given below:—

KĀRTTIKEYA. Skanda, the son of Śiva. For details see under Skanda.

KĀRŪṆA. See under Dhaṇaṭījaya.

KĀRŪṆA I. A King of Kārūṇa. A lady of name Bhadrā was performing penance to get this King as her husband when Śīṣūpaṇa carried her away. (Slokā 11, Chapter 45, Sabhā Parva).

KĀRŪṆA II. One of the nine sons of Vaivasvata Manu. The other sons are: Ikṣvāku, Nābhāga, Drṣaṇa, Śaryāti, Narīsyaṇa, Prāṇīśuṇāga, Diśa and Prṣadhra. (7th SKANDHA, Devi Bhāgavata).

KĀRŪṆA III. A Yaśa. This Yaśa accompanied by his brothers performed penance on the shores of the river Kālindī, to propitiate Devi, taking in only air. Devi was pleased and appearing before him in person said "You will become the lord of Manvantara". (SKANDHAS 10 and 13, Devi Bhāgavata).

KĀRŪṆA I. The sixth son of Vaivasvata Manu. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 75).

KĀRŪṆA II. An ancient land. (The King of this land used to suppress robbers and plunderers. He was present at Draupadi's Swarādhana. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 185).

KĀRŪṆA (M). A place in ancient India. Historians are of opinion that it is the Bundelkhaṇḍ of modern India. The sin of Brahmahātyā (killing of brahmins) of Indra was washed away by brahmins at this place. The place where Karīṣa (cow dung) from Indra fell was called Karīṣa and it gradually became Karūṇa. (See under Abigamalaya).

KĀRVĀṬA. An ancient country of India. The King of this land was slain by Bhīmasena. (Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

KĀŚERAKA. A Yaśa. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 15 says that Kaśeraka continues to attend on Kubera as a member of his assembly.

KĀŚERU. A lovely daughter of Tvaṭā, the Prajāpati. Narākāsura abducted Kaśeru when she was fourteen years old. She was one of the virgins married by Śrī Kṛṣṇa who won a victory over Narākāsura. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38, Dākṣipāṭya Pāṭa).

KĀŚERUMĀN (KĀSERUMĀN). An Asura who was a Yavana. He was slain by Śrī Kṛṣṇa according to Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 32.

KĀŚI I. (VARĀṆASI. BANARAS). (See under Divoṇā also).

1) General. One of the oldest and most popular sacred centres in India, Kāśi is reputed for its Viśva-nātha temple of hoary traditions, according to one of which the Śivallīga in the temple was installed by Bhrami himself. (Haśāya Mahāṭmya).

2) Pilgrimage on foot to Kāśi. Devotes from many parts of India go on pilgrimage to Kāśi on foot, bathe in the holy waters of the Gaṅgā and thus earn spiritual satisfaction and release from worldly attachments. The reason for the above is stated in the Agni Purāṇa as follows:—Once, at Kailāsa Śiva told Pārvati that the temple at Kāśi was called 'Avimukta' (unreleased) as it never perished, and all Japa, tapa, homa and dāna made there never cease to give auspicious results. One should walk on foot to Kāśi and live there. Having gone there one should never leave the place. There are eight great tirthas at Avimukta, i.e. Hariścandra tirtha, Āvīrātakṣevāra tirtha, Jayavēṣṭa tirtha, Śrī Parva-tirtha, Mahālayatirtha, Bhṛgu tirtha, Cārṇātha tirtha and Kedarātirtha. These tirthas extend to two yojanas to the east of the Kāśi temple and half-a-yojana to the west of it. The river Varāṇi is also there, and Varāṇasi is at the centre of all these. Whatever is done at Varāṇasi like bath, Japa, homa, worship of Devaś, dāna, obsequies for the dead, oneself living there etc. is productive of devotion and salvation. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 112).

3) References to Kāśi in the Mahābhārata.

(i) Paṇḍu once conquered Kāśi. (Bhīma Parva, Chapter 9).

(ii) Bhīma married Balandhara, daughter of the King of Kāśi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 77).

(iii) Bhīmasena conquered Kāśi. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 6).

(iv) Sahadeva conquered Kāśi. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 31).
(v) In the war between the Pândavas and the Kaуra-vases, the King of Kāśī fought on the side of the former. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 2).
(vi) Arjuna conquered Kāśī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 40).
(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa conquered Kāśī. (Drona Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 15).
(viii) Kārṇa once conquered Kāśī on behalf of Duryodhana. (Kārṇa Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19).
(ix) Kāśī had been ruled by the Kings called Haryāśva, Sudeva, and Divodāsa. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 30, Verses 12 to 15).
(x) King Vṛṣaḍarba and Uśānara had ruled over Kāśī. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 9).
(xi) Bhīṣma conquered Kāśī during the Svayaṁvara of Ambā. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 44, Verse 38).
(xii) The horse sent out in connection with Yudhis†thira’s Aśvamedha passed through Kāśī also. (Āśva-medha Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 14).
(xiii) For the origin of the name Kāśī see under Divodāsa.

KĀŚI II. An inhabitant-citizen-of Kāśī. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 18).

KĀŚIKA. A famous charioteer on the Pândava side (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 171, Verse 15).

KĀŚIṢVARA TĪRTHA. A sacred place on the banks of river Ambumati on the borders of Kurukṛṣṭra. A bath in the river redeems one from all sins and raises one to Brahmaloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 57).

KĀŚMIIRA (KĀŚMĪRAKAM). A state in North India. Kāśmīra was famous during the Mahābhārata period also. Once Arjuna conquered this state (Sahābā Parva, Chapter 27). People from the state had attended Yudhis†thira’s Rājāsyā with many articles of presentation. Śrī Kṛṣṇa once defeated its ruler. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 16). Parāśurāma also once defeated its ruler. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 11).

KĀŚMIIRAṆANDALAM. A particular place in Kāśmīra where once a conference of sages was held. (Vana Parva, Chapter 203). Besides all the prominent sages of North India, distinguished persons like Nahuṣa, Yaśō, Aśi and Kāśyapa attended the conference. Rivers Jhelam and Chenab flow through this place, and it is a holy centre. Those who bathe here will become like sages.

KASTŪRĪGANDHĪ. Another name for Kālī (Matsya-gandhi) or Satyavatī, the mother of Vyāsa. To know how she got this name, see under Satyavatī.

KĀŚYA I. A famous King of Kāśī; father of Ambā, Ambikā and Ambālikā. He was also called Krodha-†vasa. According to Chapter 171 of Udyoga Parva, Kāśyā’s real name was Śenābindu.

KĀŚYA II. One of the great sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Śantā Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).

KĀŚYAPA I. Chief among the Prajāpatīs.

1) Kāśyapa—Son or Grandson of Brahmā? It is impossible to give a definite answer to this question. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, we see that six spiritual sons—Maṛci, Aṅgiras, Atri, Pulāṣṭya, Puṣāha and Krautu—were born to Brahmā. Kāśyapa was born as the son of Maṛci and that all living beings in the world took their origin from Kāśyapa. According to this statement, Kāśyapa is the grandson of Brahmā.

But in the 14th Sarga of Aranyakāṇḍa in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa there is an account of the creation of all animate and inanimate objects in this world. According to a statement in that passage, we find that Kāśyapa was the youngest brother of Marici, Atri, Pulastya and others. This means that Kāśyapa was the son of Brahmā. Therefore there is nothing wrong in regarding him either as the son or as the grandson of Brahmā. In the Purāṇas we find references to him in both ways.

2) Original Gotra or Clan. Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 297, verse 17 says that all living beings belong to the four original Gotras—the gotra of Aṅgiras, Kāśyapa gotra, Bhṛgu gotra and Vasuṣṭha gotra and that all the other gotras came into existence subsequently.

3) Kāśyapa’s wives. Kāśyapa had 21 wives who were—Aditi, Diti, Danu, Arṣiṭa, Surasā, Khaṣā, Surabhi, Vinatā, Tāmri, Krodhavāsa, Īrā, Kadrū, Muni, Pulomā, Kālākā, Nātā, Dānayus, Śiṁhilā, Pradhā, Viśā, and Kapilā. Of these, the 13 wives, Aditi, Diti, Kālākā, Dānayus, Danu, Śiṁhilā, Pradhā, Viśā, Vinatā, Kapilā, Muni and Kadrū, were the daughters of Dakṣa.

Of these the first wife Aditi had 12 sons. These 12 sons namely Viṣṇu, Śakra, Arṣya, Dāhā, Vaṣṭā, Pūṣa, Vivasvān, Savitā, Mitra, Varuṇa, Āniśa and Bhaga are called Adityas (sons of Aditi). In the sixth Manvantara these 12 Adityas belonged to the tribe known as Tūṣitas. (The present Manvantara is the seventh one). The 33 crores of Devas came into being from the twelve Adityas.

The Dānāvas were born from Kāśyapa’s second wife Diti. The chief Dāityas are Hīranyakāśīpu, Hīranyākṣa and Śīṁhilā. All the other Dāityas were born from them.

The Dānāvas were the children of Danu, another wife of Kāśyapa. Dvīmūrdhā, Śambara, Ayomukha, Śaṅku-sīra, Kapilā, Śaṅkara, Ekaekāra, Mahābhū, Tāraka, Mahābala, Svarbhānu, Vṛṣapravāru, Pulomā, and Vipracitty are the famous Dānāvas. The other Dānāvas were the children of the people mentioned above.

Another wife of Kāśyapa, Surabhi gave birth to Aja, Ekapād, Ahirbuddhāya, Vaṣṭā and Rūdra and also the Ekaekāsa Rūdras namely—Hara, Bahurūpā, Tryambāka, Aparājīta, Vṛṣākapī, Śambhū, Kapardī, Raivatā, Mrgavāydhā, Sarpa, and Kapālī. Vinatā gave birth to Garuda and Kadrū was the mother of the nāgas. The Purāṇas proclaim that all living beings that we see in the world today, sprang from Kāśyapa’s offsprings by his different wives. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kanda, Chapter 29; Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapters 15-21; Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapters 16 and 65 and Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

4) Brahmā taught Kāśyapa cure for snake poison. The ser-pent’s (Nāgas) were born to Kadrū, one of the wives of Kāśyapa. Once Kadrū asked her children to hang down like hair from the tail of Ucchaśras. They refused to do so. Kadrū became angry and cursed them that they would be burnt alive at Janamejaya’s Sarpa Sattrā (snake-sacrifice). After the curse, the Nāgas became dangerously venomous. At this stage, Brahmā taught Kāśyapa the art of curing snake-poison to protect other creatures that might be bitten by the Nāgas. Cure of snake-bite in this world dates from that time. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 20).
5) Kaśyapa and Garuḍa. Garuḍa is a mighty son of Kaśyapa by his wife Vinatā. Vinatā made a bet with her sister Kadrū. Kadrū won the bet. Vinatā became Kadrū’s maid-servant as a result of the bet. To be relieved of this bondage Vinatā’s son Garuḍa had to bring Amṛta from Devaloka and give it to Kadrū and her Nāga-sons. Garuḍa agreed and flew up to Heaven to fetch Amṛta.

On the way, he visited his father Kaśyapa who was performing penance on the Gandhamadāna mountain. He asked his father to give him some food, as he was very hungry. Kaśyapa told him the following story:

‘Long ago a sage named Vibhāvasu lived near this place. He and his younger brother named Supratika began to quarrel over the sharing of their father’s wealth. The elder brother transformed the younger brother into an elephant by a curse and the younger brother turned the elder into a tortoise by his curse. They are still living in yonder lake as elephant and tortoise and continue like enemies. If you eat both of them, you will be strong enough to fight against the Devas and get possession of Amṛta for yourself.’

On hearing this, Garuḍa went to the lake and caught the elephant and tortoise in his claws and flew up into the sky. The mountains began to tremble and a whirlwind swept the Heavens when Garuḍa beat with his wings. He flew about here and there unable to find a convenient place to sit and enjoy his meal. On the way, his eye caught sight of a huge banyan tree spreading its branches far and wide, to a distance of 100 yojanas around it. When he perched on one of its branches with the elephant and tortoise, the branch broke and fell down. From that branch certain sages known as Bālakhilyas were hanging with their heads downwards. So, to prevent them from falling to the ground, Garuḍa lifted it in his beak and began to fly up again. Unable to find a suitable spot where he could deposit the branch with the sages, Garuḍa returned to his father again. At the request of Kaśyapa, the Bālakhilyas went to the Himālayas. He showed Garuḍa a vast, snow-clad mountain on which he could deposit the broken branch he was carrying. Garuḍa flew to that mountain and ate up the elephant and tortoise and thus gained strength to fight with the Devas for Amṛta. After that he proceeded to Heaven. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapters 29-31).

6) Other Birth of Kaśyapa. In Cākaśuṇa Manvantara, the sage Sutapas performed a penance along with his wife Prśni for 12,000 years. Lord Viṣṇu appeared to ask them what boon they wished to ask. They prayed that the Lord should take birth as their son. Viṣṇu granted their prayer and was born as their son. In the next Manvantara (the period of Vaivasvata Manu) Sutapas and Prśni were re-born as Kaśyapa and Aditī respectively. At that time also Mahāvīśnu was born to Aditī as Vāmana. (See under Vāmana.). In this birth, Kaśyapa had many other wives besides Aditī. Surasā was one of those wives. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

It was this Kaśyapa himself who was re-born as Vasudeva and Aditī became Devaki. Surasā was born as Rohiṇī, another wife. There is another reason for Kaśyapa and Aditī to take birth for the third time. Once Kaśyapa had prepared to perform a Yāga. All arrangements were complete. But the sacrificial cow alone was not available. Kaśyapa solved the problem by stealing a cow from Varuṇa’s cattle-shed. Aditī and Suraṣā concealed it in the Āśrama. Enraged at the theft of his cow, Varuṇa complained to Brahmā. A curse was pronounced by Brahmā and Varuṇa that as a punishment for stealing and hiding the cow, Kaśyapa should be born as a cowherd and Aditī and Suraṣā should be born as the cowherd’s wives. It was by this curse that Kaśyapa, Aditī and Suraṣā were born as Vasudeva Devaki and Rohiṇī respectively. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

7) Paraśurāma’s gift of land to Kaśyapa. Paraśurāma performed a Yāga after exterminating all Kṣatriya Kings. At that Yāga he gifted all the lands he had conquered till then to Kaśyapa. In Mahābhārata, Aranyaka Parva, Chapter 117, there is a reference to this gift.

8) Kaśyapa and Kerala. After Paraśurāma went round the world eighteen times and exterminated the Kṣatriya Kings he performed a Yāga. At that Yāga he gave the whole earth as daksīṇā to Kaśyapa. After that, Kaśyapa drove away Paraśurāma from the earth to the south. Taking pity on Paraśurāma, the ocean gave him the region known as ‘Surparaka’. Kaśyapa seized Surparaka also from Paraśurāma and gave it to Brahmaṇas. Paraśurāma went to the forests after it. Later on, intermixture of castes took place in this region and anarchy prevailed there. At one time, Surparaka sank down into Pātaḥ (lower world). Kaśyapa who saw this held the earth up, brought Kṣatriyas from the north and made them rulers of the country. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 49). This ‘Surparaka’ is believed to be Kerala.

9) Other Details about Kaśyapa.

(i) Kaśyapa arrived at the place of Arjuna’s birth accompanied by other sages. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122).

(ii) Kaśyapa flourished in Brahmā’s assembly. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 11).

(iii) Once there was a dispute between Virocana, the son of Prahlāda and Sudhanvā, the son of Aṅgiras. It was Kaśyapa who settled this dispute. (See the 5th Para under the word Aṅgiras).

(iv) Once Kaśyapa went on a pilgrimage in the company of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 85).

(v) Once Brahmā gifted the entire earth to Kaśyapa as a Yajña gift. Bhūmidevī (Goddess of the earth) who was distressed at it, went to Pātaḥ and began to lament. At that time Kaśyapa propitiated the goddess by his austere penance. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 114).

(vi) After Paraśurāma had given the entire earth to Kaśyapa, Kaśyapa drove away Paraśurāma from the earth. Paraśurāma then shot an arrow into the sea and converted that portion of the sea into land. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Verses 18 and 19).

(vii) When the war between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas was in progress, Kaśyapa approached Droṇa and wanted him to bring the battle to a close. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 190).

(viii) Kaśyapa was also present with other sages at the time of Skanda’s birth. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45).
(ix) Kas"yapa once gave some pieces of advice to Pur"uravu. (M.B. S"anti Parva, Chapter 73).

(x) In the 8th verse of Chapter 206 of S"anti Parva, in the Mah"abh"arata, we find that Kas"yapa had another name Ariñjani.

(xi) Kas"yapa once related to Bli"hma, the story of Mah"av"ii"bhav"ar"at"a. (Incarnation as Boar). (M.B. S"anti Parva, Chapter 209, Verse 6).

(xii) Bh"as"a Bh"arata says that gingly seeds were first introduced into this world from sage Kas"yapa's body. (M.B. Anu"s"as"ana Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 10).

(xiii) Kas"yapa explained to Vr"uddhah"r"i, the evil of receiving pratigrah"a (presents). (M.B. Anu"s"as"ana Parva, Chapter 93).

(xiv) Kas"yapa once spoke to Arundhati about the weakness of his body. (M.B. Anu"s"as"ana Parva, Chapter 93, Verse 65).

(xv) At another time, Agastya suspected that Kas"yapa had stolen his lotus. But Kas"yapa swore that he was innocent. (M.B. Anu"s"as"ana Parva, Chapter 94).

(xvi) In Bh"as"a Bh"arata it is said that Kas"yapa was one of the Sapta Gurus (seven Preceptors) of Kuber. The other six Gurus were—Vasi"stha, Atri, Gautama, Bharadv"aja, V"iv"am"itra and Jamadagni. (M.B. Anu"s"as"ana Parva, Chapter 150).

(xvii) In Bh"agavata we see that Kas"yapa and other sages were instrumental in bringing about the destruction of Yadu Vah"sa. (For further details see under S"AMBA).

KAŚYAPA II. A serpent. In Mah"abh"arata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, we read that this serpent was present at the time of Arjuna's birth.

KAŚYAPA I. (KA"NVA).

1) General. Two sages Ka"nya and Kaśyapa are mentioned in the Pur"anas, and due to the close similarity in the names in some Pur"anas the two names are used one for the other. There is, therefore, considerable difficulty in distinguishing the one from the other and unerringly hitting upon the right person in certain contexts.

There is a very ancient sage the first cause or the original father of all living beings in the universe. He is described, in most of the Pur"anas, as the grandson of Brah"ma and the son of Mar"ci. He was the husband of the original or first mothers of living beings, called Di"ti and Ad"iti. The interpretation that he was called Kaśyapa as he used to drink Kas"yam (liquor) is not founded on facts. No Pur""a refers to him as a drunkard.

The sage called Kaśyapa was the foster father of Śakuntalā. The statement that he was called Kaśyapa as he was born in the dynasty of Kaśyapa is also not correct. Ka"nya was not born in the dynasty of Kaśyapa. The genealogy of Kaśyapa is as follows:

2) Genealogy. Descended from Vi"ş"u thus: Brah"ma—Atri—Candra—Buddha—Pur"uravas—Ayus—Nahu"sa—Yay"ti—Pura—Jana"m"a—Prac"i"n"a—Pra"v"ra—Namu"ya—Vitabh"a—Ś"u"nda—Bahu"v"da—Sa"ni"ya—Rah"o"v"a—Rau"dra"ś"a—Mat"i"n"a—P"ru"r"a—Medhātithi—K"a"nya (Kaśyapa). Medhātithi was Ka"nya's father. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 27).

According to the Agni Pur""a a son called Ka"nya was born (Kaśyapa) to Medhātithi, son of King P"ru"r"a of the Puru dynasty. But, nothing about the family matters of Ka"nya is mentioned therein. In the Mah"abh"arata itself the name Kaśyapa is often used instead of Ka"nya.

From the above facts it may be understood that Ka"nya was born as a prince, and that later on, he became a sage. Moreover, the Agni Pur""a says that Santurodhi, the brother of Ka"nya's father, was the father of Dusyan"a. According to that Kaśyapa and Dusyan"a were the sons of brothers, Kaśyapa being that of the elder one. For the time being the above are the only reasonable inferences, and the truth has to be found out by further researches. But, one thing is certain according to the genealogy, that Kaśyapa was born twenty generations after Kaśyapa.

3) Kaśyapa and Taksaka. The story is told in the 2nd Skandha of Devi Bh"agavata and in the Adi Parva of Bh"arata that Taksaka set out to bite King P"ru"r"a and Kaśyapa to cure him of Taksaka's poison, but that Taksaka bribed Kaśyapa off his mission to save the King. But, the story as such is unfounded. It was Kaśyapa and not Kaśyapa whom Brah"ma had taught the science of the treatment and cure of poison (see under Kaśyapa) and, therefore, it should be Kaśyapa whom Taksaka bribed.

4) Kaśyapa and Śakuntalā. See under KA". VA. 5) Kaśyapa and Rṣyas"r"i"ga. Father of Rṣyas"r"i"ga was one Kaśyapa; may be Ka"nya or Kaśyapa. The greater possibility is for Kaśyapa to be the father. (See under Rṣyas"r"i"ga).

6) After a Yaj"nā Viśvakarman made a land-gift to Kaśyapa once. (See under KA"NYA).

KAŚYAPA II. Priest of Vasudeva; this Kaśyapa lived for years as a good friend of the P"ru"r"avas. He is considered to be a very distinguished ascetic. (Ās"vedha Parva, Chapter 16).

KAŚYAPA III. Son of Sage Kaśyapa. This Kaśyapa was member of Indra's assembly. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7).

He was present at the Yaj"nā conducted by emperor Pṛthu.

KAŚYAPA IV. An Agni, the son of Kaśyapa. Pāñc"c"a"j"a"n"yā was born from the five Agnis, Kaśyapa, Vasi"stha, Pra"nā, Aṁg"a"ra and C"a"v"a"n"a, all of whom were sons of Kaśyapa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 220).

KAŚYAPA V. A haughty Viś"a"ya once fell to the ground a brahmin youth called Kaśyapa by hitting him with his chariot. (See under Indra, Parā 36).

KAŚYAPA VI. Sons of Kaśyapa like Vibhā"ndaka, Rājadharman, Viś"v"a"s"u, Indra, Ad"i"tya and Vasū, other Devas and other living beings born in Kaśyapa's dynasty—all these are also called Kaśyapas.

KAŚYAPAD"V"A (ISLAND). An island in the shape of a bare visible in the moon. (Bli"hma Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 55).

KAŚYAPI. (Earth). The earth came to be known as Kaśyapi as it had been given as a gift to Kaśyapa by Parāśurāma. "The whole of the earth was given to Kaśyapa and thus it came to be called Kaśyapi". (Brahmāṇḍa Pur"a"ṇa, Chapter 89).

KATHAKA. A soldier of Skanda. (Śloka 67, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

KATHAŚARITŚAGARA. See under BRHATKATHA.

KATHOPANISAD. See under NACIKETAS.

KAṬVĀKU (KAṬVĀKU). A son of Vaivasvata Manu. Brahmāṇḍa Pur"a"ṇa states that he was an ancestor of Iks"vāku.

In the beginning Manu, alias Vaivasvata, had a son named Kaṭvāku. He was the first of kings and he ruled the world for a long time. On the banks of the river Sarayu he constructed a city called Ayodhya. Ayodhya was celebrated for its beauty and wise men proclaimed that it was more beautiful than the cities of the eight guardians of the universe or the city of even Brahma, the Creator.

KĀTYĀYANA I. A grammarian who wrote a commentary on Pāṇini's grammatical work entitled Aṣṭādhyāyī. He has also written Śrauta Sūtras and a book on "Dharma Sāstra".

KĀTYĀYANA II. Kathāsārītāgāra says that "Kātyāyana" was another name of Vararuci.

KĀTYĀYANA III. A great sage who flourished in Indra's assembly. We see a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Šabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 19).

KĀTYĀYANI. One of the two wives of Yājñavalkya. After withdrawing completely from worldly activities, Yājñavalkya asked his wives to divide his worldly assets equally between them. But Maitreyi, the other wife, being of a deeply spiritual nature, Kātyāyani herself had to undertake the burden of all the material affairs. (Bhādaranyākopanisād).

KAUKUHA. An ancient country in South India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

KAUKULIKĀ. An attendant of Śkandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 15).

KAUMODAKI. The club of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 224, Stanza 23, that this club was given to Śrī Kṛṣṇa by Varūna the god of water, at the time of the burning of the forest Khañḍava.

KAUNAPA. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death in the Sarpa Sattra (sacrificial fire to kill serpents) of Janamejaya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Stanza 6).

KAUNAPĀŚANA. A famous serpent born in the family of Kaurava. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Stanza 14).

KAUNDINYA I. See under Mitrabheda.

KAUNDINYA II. A hermit who lived in the Palace of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Śabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16). See under Dṛṣṭabuddhī.

KAUNDINYA III. A hermit. This hermit had erected his hermitage in Hastimātisabramatīsāgama and lived there. Once due to excess of rain the river flooded and his hermitage was washed away. So the hermit cursed the river. "Let the river be dried up!" Then he went to the realm of Vaikunṭha. (Padma Purāṇa, Īttara Khañḍa, Chapter 145).

KAUNIKUTSYA. A noble Brahmin. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 25, that this Brahmin visited Pramadāvarī who died of snake-bite.

KAURAVA (S). 1) General Information. Those who were born in the family of the famous King Kuru. Descended in the following order from Viṣṇu:—Brahmā—Atri—Candra Budha—Pururāvas—Āyus—Nahuśa—Yayāti—Puru—Janamejaya—Prācinvān—Pravīra—Namasyu—Vitabhaya—Śrundu—Bahuvidha—Srivāyi—Rahovādi—Raudrāvā—Matināra—Santurodha—Dusyaṇa—Bharata—Suhotra—Suhotā—Gala—Garda—Suketu—Bhrat-kṣetra—Hasti—Ajamidha—Rṛṣa—Sarvaṇa—Kuru. This is the genealogy of Kuru. From Kuru the genealogy continues as follows:—Jahnu—Sūratha—Viṣṇura-tha—Svāvabhauma—Jayatsena—Ravaya—Bhāvuka—Cakroddhata—Devātithi—Rṛṣa—Bharata—Pratīca—Śantanu. Śantanu had two wives Gangā and Satyavati. Bhiṣma was born of Gangā. Vyāsa was born to Satyavati before her marriage, from the hermit Parāsara. After the marriage, from Śantanu, two sons Śrīrāngaga and Vicitrīvyāra were born to her. A Gandharva killed Śrīrāngaga. Bhiṣma brought the three daughters of the King of Kāśī, Ambā, Ambikā and Ambālikā as wives of Vicitrīvyāra, but on the way knowing that Ambā was in love with the King of Śālva, she was sent back. Ambikā and Ambālikā became the wives of Vicitrīvyāra. Shortly Vicitrīvyāra also died. With a view to continue the royal family, Satyavati sent for Vyāsa, so that he might beget children of Ambikā and Ambālikā. At the time of coition Ambā closed her eyes to avoid seeing the uncouth face of Vyāsa. So she got as son Dṛṣṭarṣṭra who was blind from birth. Seeing the ugly figure of Vyāsa Ambālikā turned pale and so the son born to her was pale in colour. He was called Pāṇḍu. From Dṛṣṭarṣṭra, Duryodhana and his brothers were born and from Pāṇḍu were born the Pāṇḍavas. All members born in the family of Kuru were known as Kauravas. But later, the sons of Dṛṣṭarṣṭra came to be known by the name Kaurava.

2) The Origin of Kauravas. (Duryodhana and his brothers). Dṛṣṭarṣṭra married Gāndhārī the daughter of Subala the King of Gāndhāra. Once Vyāsa reached the palace weary with hunger and thirst. Gāndhārī gave Vyāsa food and drink. Vyāsa was pleased with her and told her that she might ask for any boon. She said that she wanted to get hundred sons from Dṛṣṭarṣṭra. Vyāsa granted the boon. Gāndhārī became pregnant. Even after two years she did not deliver. She heard that Kuntī, the wife of Pāṇḍu had given birth to a child. Gāndhārī became sad. She crushed her womb and gave birth to a lump of flesh. Understanding this, Vyāsa came there and cutting the lump into hundred and one pieces kept them in ghee-pots. Advising Gāndhārī to keep the pots in secret, Vyāsa went to the Himālayas. The pots were broken at the proper time and hundred sons and a daughter came out. Besides them Dṛṣṭarṣṭra had another son named Yuyutsu by a Vaiśya woman. The hundred and one sons of Dṛṣṭarṣṭra beginning with Duryodhana are the Kauravas.

A small crane which sat on a branch of the tree passed excreta on the head of the Brahmin. He became angry and looked at the bird. Instantly the bird was reduced to ashes. The Brahmin sincerely repented and went to the countryside to live on alms. Once he reached the house of a Brahmin. The wife of the Brahmin came to the door and requested him to wait a bit. Immediately her husband arrived, and she, being engaged in looking after the needs of her husband forgot the Brahmin Kausika, who became angry and spoke crude words to her. She argued that the noblest deed was looking after one's husband and that it was not meet and right for Brahmans to get angry. She advised Kausika to go to Mithilapuri and to receive advice from the famous Dharmavyādha. Kausika repented his rash nature, went to Dharmavyādha and received advice from him. He returned home and lived peacefully with his parents. (M.B. Vana Parva, ten chapters from 206).

Though a man of veracity, he finally had to go to hell, for the following reason. While he was engaged in penance in the forest some thieves came by that way with some stolen goods. The owners of the goods were chasing the thieves. Kausika told them the way by which the thieves had gone. So at the end Kausika was thrown into hell. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 69).

All agreed to this and Pitṛvartī killed the cow and began the sacrifice. Two elder brothers were employed in worshipping the gods and three were detailed to give offerings to the manes. One was asked to be the guest. Pītvartī was the sacrificer. Remembering the ancestors with reverence he began the sacrifice in accordance with the rites. Thus the seven hermits ate the cow and told Garga that the cow was caught by a tiger.

In due course the seven of them died, and took rebirth as rude low-caste people in Dāśapura. Because of the sacrifice and offerings to the Manes they had the remembrance of their previous birth. So they feared god and took fast and vow at a holy bath and in the presence of a multitude cast off their lives and were born again as animals in Kālānjara hills. Because of their abstinence due to knowledge they cast off their lives by Prapatana (jumping down from the top of the mountain) and were born again as Ruddy geese in the Māṇasaras when their names were Śumaṇas, Kusuma, Vasu, Citradaśī, Sudarsā, Jñātā and Jñānapāraga—names conforming to their character. The seven brothers became pure and sinless by their union with God the Supreme Spirit. But three of them fell out of the union because of their desire. They saw the pleasurable life led by Anuha the King of Pañcāla who was immensely wealthy with many beautiful wives. At the sight of this, one of the geese—the Brahmin Pitravrati, who performed the sacrifice of offering to the Mancs because of his love for his father—wished to become a king. Seeing the two wealthy ministers who led luxurious lives, two of the ruddy geese wanted to become ministers. Accordingly Pitravrati was born as Brahmadatta the son of Vaibhārāja and the other two as sons of ministers with names Puṇḍarīka and Subālaka. Brahmadatta was anointed as King of Pañcāla in the great city of Kāmpilya. That King was mighty, loving his father well, always desirous of giving offerings to Manes and harmonious with God, having the ability to read the hearts of every living being. He married Sannati the daughter of Sudeva. This woman in her previous birth was the cow of Garga. As this cow was used as offering to the Mancs she got rebirth as a religious-minded woman and became the queen of Brahmadatta, who ruled over the kingdom well for a long time.

Once the King and the queen were walking in the garden when they saw two ants which were quarrelling with each other. They were husband and wife. After a time the quarrel ended and they grew more loving than before and the she-ant pressed closely against her husband, Brahmadatta hearing their conversation stood smiling. He could understand the language of every living being because of the merits of his previous births. When the King smiled his wife asked him for the reason. He described to his wife the quarrel of the ant-couple. The queen did not believe his words. She thought that the King had been making fun of her. She asked him how he learned the language of birds and beasts. But the King could not give an answer and he became thoughtful. The remaining four of the ruddy geese took rebirth as the sons of a poor Brahmin in the same city of Kāmpilya. They had the remembrance of previous births. Their names were Dhrītiman, Sarvadarśī, Vidyācandra and Tapodihiya, names befitting their character. They decided to perform severe penance to attain Supreme bliss, and were about to get away from the house when their father, the poor Brahmin cried bitterly, being helpless. They taught their father the following poem and advised him to recite the poem before the King the next morning, in order to get plenty of wealth.

"Noble Brahmins in Kurukṣetra
The seven foresters in Dāśapura
Deer in Kālaṇjara and in Mānasā
Ruddy geese, the same now are men."

Brahmadatta who was not able to give answer to the question of his wife, was about to go out from the palace for a walk with his wife and ministers, when the old brahmin made his appearance and recited the poem taught by his sons, to the King. When the King heard the stanza he remembered the previous births and fainted and fell down. The two ministers, Subālaka son of Bāhbhravya the author of the science of love and Puṇḍarīka son of Pañcāla the author of the science of medicine and treatment, also remembered about their previous births and fell down with grief. The three of them lamented about their fall from the union with the Supreme Spirit. Brahmadatta gave that old Brahmin plenty of wealth and villages and sent him away contented.

After anointing his son Viṣvaksena as King, Brahmadatta and his retinue went to Mānasasaras for penance. For a while they lived in the forest engaged in penance and then cast off their lives and entered the world of Supreme bliss. (Padma Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 10).

KAUSIKA VII. A King. This king became a cock at night. His wife Viśālā was filled with grief at this transfiguration of her husband in the night. She told her grief to the hermit Gālava who told the queen about the previous birth of her husband as follows:

"In the previous birth he used to eat cocks to get strength. Knowing this Tāmracūṇḍa the king of fowls cursed him. "You shall become a cock during nights." That is why your husband has become a cock."

According to the advice of the hermit the King began to worship Lord Śiva and he was liberated from the curse. (Skanda Purāṇa).

KAUSIKĀ. (GOMATİ). A river. The hermitage of Viśvāmitra stood on the bank of this river. The modern name of Kausikā is Kośī. The river Kośī flows through Bihar. Those who bathe in this river will obtain remission of sins. See under Gomati. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84).

KAUSIKĀÇARĪYA. The king Ākṛti. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, that this King ruled over Saurāśṭra and was known also by the name Kausikācarya.

KAUSIKAKUNDA. A holy place. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, that Viśvāmitra got his attainments in this place.

KAUSIKĀŚRAMA. A holy place. It was at this place that Ambā, the daughter of King of Kāśī performed a severe penance. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 156, Stanza 27).

KAUSIKYARUNĀSAŅGAMA. A holy place. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 that if a man fasts in this place, the confluence of Kausikī and Aruṇā rivers he will be absolved of all his sins.

KAUSTUBHĀ. A brilliant precious stone. It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 3; Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa Bālakāṇḍa Sarga 45, Stanza 39 and Mahābhārata, Adi Parva that this precious stone floated up at the time of the churning of the sea of Milk. This jewel which originated from the ghee in the sea of Milk, was worn on the breast by Viṣṇu.

"This divine jewel called Kauśtabha came up in the middle of ghee and stayed in the breast of Viṣṇu, spreading its rays everywhere." (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 18, Stanza 37).

KAUTHUMI. Son of a Brahmin named Hiraṇya nābha. Once this Brahmin youth went to the hermitage of King Janaka and entered into a controversy with the Brahmins there. In the argument Kauthumi became angry and killed a Brahmin. From that day he became a leper. The sin of Brahmahatya (murder of a Brahmin) also followed him. Finally according to the advice of his father he worshipped the sun God, with Svayamprakāśakta (a spell or incantation) and by the blessing of the Sun God he got deliverance from the sin of Brahmahatya and the disease of leprosy. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, Brāhma Parva).

KAUṬĻYA. See under Cāṇakya.

KAUTSA. A noble Brahmin scholar. He was present at the sarpa-sattra (sacrificial fire to kill serpents) of KAUTSAYA (KAUTSA). A hermit who was the disciple of Varatantu. When he had completed his education he asked his teacher what gift he desired. The teacher said that he wanted fourteen crosses of gold coins as gift. Kautsaya approached the emperor Raghu. The emperor had just finished a sacrifice called Viṣvajit and had emptied his treasury by giving away all the wealth he had as alms. Only pots made of wood were left as his wealth. When the emperor heard about the need of Kautsaya he decided to conquer the capital city of Kubera. That night Kubera filled the treasury of Raghu by a shower of gold. The emperor Raghu gave Kautsaya fourteen crosses of gold coins. (Raghuvānsa).

KAVACA. A sage in the assembly of Indra. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7). He was one of the sages of the western part. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 30).

KAVACI. One of the sons of Dhtarāṣṭra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 103). In Mahābhārata, Karna Parva, Chapter 84, it is said that he was killed by Bhīmasena.

KĀVĒRĪ. A holy river in South India. Famous sacred places like Śrīraṅga and Kumbhakonā are on its banks. The Devī of the river lives in Varuṇa's assembly worshipping him. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20). The Skanda Purāṇa has the following story as to how Kāverī came down to earth:

Once Agastya propitiated Śiva at Kailāsa and sought the boon of some water for him to found a sacred place on earth. At the same time Kāverī also was worshipping Śiva. Śiva filled Agastya's bowl with Kāverī water. Agastya, on his way back from Kailāsa cursed the Rākṣasa called Krauñca and kicked the Vindhyā mountain down. (See under Agastya). After overcoming various difficulties Agastya at last reached South India. He sat in meditation with the bowl of Kāverī water before him, and then, at the request of Indra, Gaṇapati, in the guise of a crow came and sat on the brink of the bowl and upset it. The water in the bowl flowed as a river, and that river is the present Kāverī. (Asurakāṇḍa, Skanda Purāṇa).

KAVI I. A son of Vaivasvata Manu. Vaivasvatā was the son of Kaśyapa and Aditi. Vaivasvata Manu was the son of Vaivasvān. Manu had sixteen sons who were—Manu, Yama, Yaml, Āśvinikumāras, Revanta, Sudyumna, Ikṣvāku, Nṛga, Saryāti, Diśa, Dhṛṣṭa, Karuṣa, Nāriyanta, Nābhāga, Pṛṣadha and Kavi.

KAVI II. There is a reference to a sage named Kavi who was the son of the sage Bhṛgu, in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 42. He was among the sages who stole the lotus of Agastya. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 32).

KAVI III. An agni who was the fifth son of Brhaspati, is named Kavi. This agni is situated in the sea in the form of Badavāgni. This agni has two other names also—Udāha and Urdhdhavābhāk. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 219, Verse 20).

KAVI IV. In Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Verse 132, Chapter 83, we find that three persons, namely, Kavi, Bhṛgu and Aṅgiras took their birth from the sacrificial fire at the famous Yāga of Brahmā. Of them Brahmā made Kavi his own son. This Kavi had eight sons known as the Varuṇas. One of them was named Kavi and another was named Kavya.

KAVI V. Rgveda, 1st Mandala, 17th Anuvāka, 116th Sūkta refers to a blind sage named Kavi.

KAVIRĀJĀ. A Sanskrit poet who lived in India in the 12th Century A.D. His chief works are “Rāghavapāṇḍaviya” and “Pārijātaharaṇa”. His real name was Mādhavabhaṭṭa.

KAVĪṢA. A sage. There was a name Kaviṣa among the sages who came to visit Śrī Rāma when he returned after his life in the forest. The sages who came there from the western country were, Vṛṣaṅgu, Kavisā, Dhaumya, Raundreya, Nārada, Vāmadeva, Saubharī, Aṣṭāvakra, Śukā, Bṛgū, Lomaśa, and Maudgalyā. (Uttara Rāmāyāṇa).

KAVYA. Son of Kavi, one of the Prajāpatis. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 85). Also, a synonym of Śukra.

KAVYA. (M.). Agni Purāṇa, Chapters 390 to 400 contain a discussion on poetry, which is the basis for literary criticism in India. The above discussion in Agni Purāṇa, comprehends the forms and features of poetry, rasa (sentiment), style, the art of acting and the drama, and other matters related to poetry and art.

KĀVYAMĀTĀ. Mother of Śukra, the preceptor of the Dīayats. Kāvyamātā possessed extraordinary powers of penance. In the Devī Bhāgavata the following story is given; how she cursed Viṣṇu and how she made Viṣṇu and Indra powerless. Once a fierce war was fought by the Devas and the Asuras in which the latter got defeated, and they sought the help of Śukrācārya. But, as the Devas enjoyed the support of Viṣṇu, Śukra could not do anything for the asuras, and he therefore advised them to get on somehow or other for some time. After that Śukra went to Kailāsa and performed penance, hanging head downwards, for a thousand years to secure rare and exceptional mantras. During this period the Devas again attacked the Asuras, who ran up to Kāvyamātā for succour, and she, by one glance, sent the Devas to long sleep. She reduced Viṣṇu and Indra also to a state of paralysis. Then Viṣṇu meditated upon the Sudarṣanā Cakra, which arrived immediately and with the Cakra he cut off Kāvyamātā's head. Sage Bṛgū then appeared on the scene and brought back Kāvyamātā to life, and she, in furious rage cursed that Viṣṇu should take many births. As a result of the curse Mahāviṣṇu had to incarnate himself on earth many times. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

KAVYAVĀHĀ (S). A group of Pīṭr. The Devī Bhāgavata, Skandhas 11 and 15 state that this group of Pīṭr were born from the drops of sweat which came out of the bodies of Daḵṣa and others when they were fascinated by the charm of Sandhyā, the spiritual daughter of Brahmā.

KAYĀDHĪ. Wife of Hiranyakāśipu. Prahlāda was born to her.

KĀYAŚODHANATĪRTHA. A holy place in Kuru-ḵsetra. According to Mahābhārata, Vana Parva,

1 Śukra is also known as Kāvyā. Certain Purāṇas claim Śukra as the son of Bṛgū, while certain others refer to him as the son of Kavi son of Bṛgū. Pulomā was Bṛgū's wife. But, the Purāṇas call the mother of Śukra Kāvyamātā. No mention is made about the wife of Kavi, the son of Bṛgū. Pulomā and Kāvyamātā are different persons. Therefore, Śukra might be the son of Bṛgū by another wife, or he might be the son of Kavi.
Chapter 86, by taking a bath at this place the body would be purified.

KAYAVYA. A Caṇḍāla. He was born to a Caṇḍāla woman as the son of a Kṣatriya. But the Caṇḍālas who were impressed by Kāyava's moral conduct, made him the headman of the village. He taught others that all people should honour Brāhmaṇas and love their country. His political creed was that those who prospered by the ruin of a country were just like the worms living on a dead body. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 135).

KEDĀRA. A holy place in the interior of Kurukṣetra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 83, that those who bathe in this holy Bath would obtain the fruits of good actions. One of the twelve Liṅgas consecrated in important places, is in Kedāra.

KEKARALOHITA. A great serpent which once took sage Cyavana to Pātāla. Cyavana, after worshipping Śiva at Nakulēsvara tirtha got into river Narmadā to take his bath when the nāga called Kekealohita caught hold of him, dragged him and bit him. As the sage meditated upon Viṣṇu the poison did not affect him. The serpent released him from Pātāla as he was unaffected by poison. Cyavana went to the palace of Prahlāda accompanied by nāga damsels. On the request of Prahlāda Cyavana described to him the holy places on earth, and without any delay Prahlāda came to earth for hunting during which sojourn on earth he visited Nakṣīmārṣayā. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 8).

KEKAYA. The Mahābhārata mentions another Kekaya, a King of the solar dynasty. He wedded two Mālava princesses from the elder of whom were born Kīcaka and Upākēcaka, and from the younger was born Sudeśṇā, also called Kākeyī. This Sudeśṇā married Mātūya, the Viśāṭa King. (Viśāṭa Parva, Southern text, Chapter 16).

KEKAYA(M).
1) General. A Kingdom in ancient India. Kākeyī, one of Daśaratha's wives, was a daughter of a Kekaya King.
2) Origin. The country got the name 'Kekaya' as it was ruled by King Kekaya. His genealogy is as follows. Descended from Viṣṇu thus:—Brahma—Atri—Candra—Budha—Puruṣaras—Ayus—Naraśa—Yayāti—Anudruthy—Sabhānara—Kālanara—Śṛījaya—Usīmara—Śibi—Kekaya. Śibi had four sons called Bhadra, Suvira, Kekaya and Vṛṣādarpa. (Bhāgavata 9th Skandha).

Other details. (1) The King and the people of Kekaya were called the Kekayas.
(2) Five heroic Kekaya princes met with their death in fighting Drona. (Sīri Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 25).
(3) Two Kekaya Princes, Vinda and Anuvinda fought on the Kaurava side. (Karna Parva, Chapter 13).

KERAKA. People of an ancient country in South India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhāparva, Chapter 31 that Sahedeva the son of Mādryi conquered the Kerakas and Kerala.

KERALA.
1) General information. A small country lying in the south-west corner of India. From the Purāṇas it could be understood that this country lying to the south of Gokarṇa up to Cape Comorin and to the west of Western Ghats had a very ancient history and civilization of its own.
2) Origin of Kerala. There are two statements, slightly different from each other, in the Purāṇas, about the origin of Kerala.
(1) For performing the funeral ceremony of the sons of Sagara whose ash was lying in Pātāla (Nether world), Bhāgiratha performed penance and brought the heavenly river Gaṅgā to the earth. (See under Gaṅgā). The river fell in North India and flowed in torrents to the sea and the surrounding regions were submerged in water. Among the places submerged, there was the important holy place and Bath of Gokarṇa also, lying on the west coast of India. Those hermits who lived in the vicinity of the temple at Gokarṇa, escaped from the flood and went to Mahendra-giri and informed Paraśurāma of the calamity of the flood. Paraśurāma went with them to the sea-shore. Varuṇa did not make his appearance. The angry Paraśurāma stood in deep meditation for a little while. The weapons came to his hands. Varuṇa was filled with fear and he instantly appeared before Paraśurāma, who asked him to release the land swallowed by the sea. Varuṇa agreed. Paraśurāma sent his bow and arrow back to the sky. Then he took a winnowing basket (Śūrpa) and threw it at the sea. The sea retreated from the place up to the spot where the winnowing basket fell, and the portion of land including Gokarṇa which had been swallowed by sea was recovered. This land is called Kerala, which is known by the name ‘Śūrparaka’ also. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 98 and 99).
(2) Paraśurāma went round the world eighteen times and killed all the Kṣatriya Kings. After that he performed the sacrifice of Aśvamedha (horse sacrifice). In the sacrifice he gave all the lands as alms to Brahmins. Kaśyapa received all the lands for the Brahmins. After that he requested Paraśurāma to vacate the land. Accordingly Paraśurāma created new land by shooting an arrow at the sea, for his own use. “At the words of Kaśyapa, he made the sea retreat by shooting an arrow, thereby creating dry land.” This land was Kerala. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 70).
3) Kerala and Pātāla (Nether world). The ancient sages of the Purāṇas have grouped the worlds into three, the Svarga (heaven), Bhūmi (the earth) and the Pātāla (the nether world). The three worlds taken as a whole were divided into fourteen worlds. It does not appear that this grouping was merely imaginary. A keen observation of the Purāṇas would lead one to infer that the Himālayan plateau was considered as Devaloka-Svarga (heaven), the planes between the Himālaya and the Vindhya as Bhūloka (the earth) and the regions to the south of the Vindhya as Pātāla (the nether world), by the ancient people of India. The seven worlds of Pātāla such as Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātāla, Mahātāla, Rasātāla and Pātāla might have been seven countries in this region. The following description which occurs in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 8, would substantiate this inference.
“Pātāla is below the earth. This Pātāla is a group of seven worlds one below the other, with names, Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātalā, Rasātāla and Mahātāla. In all those worlds, there are several beautiful cities and houses, palaces and castles, parks, gardens, open temples and halls, natural arbours etc. made by Maya. There live the Asuras, the Dānavas (a class of Asuras-demons) the nāgas (serpents) and others, with their families, with happiness and comfort. Chirping birds, pigeons, parrots, docile parrots etc. always play there with their inseparable mates. Trees bearing sweet fruits, plants covered with fragrant flowers, arbours with creepers growing thick, beautiful houses floored with white marble, and so many other things giving pleasure and comfort are seen there in plenty. In these things the Pātāla surpasses heaven. Dāityas, Dānavas and the Nāgas (the Asuras and the serpents) are the dwellers of these worlds. They lead a happy and pleasant life with their families enjoying all sorts of comfort and luxury."

Pātāla, one of the seven divisions of the world is described as follows:

"This is the region of the Nāgas (the serpents). At the root-place of this region there is a particular place having an area of thirty thousand yojanas. Viṣṇu Kālā who has the attribute of 'tāmāsa' (darkness) lives there under the name 'Ananta'. The real Ananta or Ādiśeṣa is the radiant embodiment of this Kālā. The daughters of the Nāga Kings are of fair complexion and very beautiful, with clean body. They use perfumery such as sandalwood, aloewood, saffron, etc."

In this description, the words Dāityas, Nāgas, Ananta, Sandalwood, aloewood etc. and the mention of natural beauty should be paid particular attention to. From the Rāmāyana we can understand that the Āryas referred to the Drāviḍas as Asuras, Rākṣasas (Giants) etc. History says that the Nāgas were the early inhabitants of Kerala. The ancient word 'Ananta' denotes Trivandrum (Tiru-Ananta-puram). The temple of Śri Padmanābha at Trivandrum answers to this description. The perfumery such as sandalwood, aloewood (cedar) etc. are the wealth of Kerala. On the whole the description of Pātāla fits well with that of Kerala. So it is not wrong to infer that the description of Pātāla in the Purāṇas is entirely about Kerala in all its aspects.

4) The Primitiveness of Kerala. From the portions of Purāṇas given below it could be ascertained that Kerala had an independence of its own from the very ancient days.

(1) Among the Kings who attended the Svayamvara (marriage) of Śaśikālā, the daughter of the King of Kaśi, such as, the King of Kurukshetra, King of Madra, King of Sindh, King of Pānchāla, Kings of Karnataka, Cola and Vidarbha, there was the King of Kerala also. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skanda 3).

(2) When describing the various places in the Southern part of Bhārata, names such as Dramiḍa, Keralam, Mūsika, Karnāṭaka etc. occur in the Mahābhārata. So it is to be understood that when Vyāsa wrote Bhārata, there was the kingdom of Kerala and that it was separate from the country of Drāviḍa. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

(3) "Kārtavīryājuna took his majestic seat in the midst of Cola, Keralam, Pāṇḍya and other Kings of the countries under the sea, who were standing round him to pay homage to him." (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 54).

(4) It is mentioned in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277, that a King named Gāndhāra was born in the dynasty of Turvasu the brother of Yadu, and that from Gāndhāra were born the powerful families of the Gāndhāras the Keralas, the Colas, the Pāṇḍyas and the Kolas.

(5) In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 175, it is mentioned that the people of Kerala were considered as barbarians by the North Indians.

(6) In Bhāgavata, Skanda 10, it is mentioned that the Kings of Cola, Pāṇḍya and Kerala, from South India, had reached the capital city of Vidarbha to take part in the Svayamvara (marriage) of Rukmiṇī.

(7) Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanza 15, that in his conquest of the countries, Karṇa had conquered Kerala also.

(8) It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 31, that Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas, conquered the Kerala and the Kerakas. It may be noted that the Kerakas are different from Keralas.

(9) Vālmiki mentions the countries which could be seen by the monkeys who were sent to the South by Sugriva to search for Sītā.

Nāḍīnī Godāvari caiva
Śarva-viṇapāṣya
Tathāvāndhrān ca Pauḍrān ca
Colān Pauḍyān ca Keralān.

"You could see the river Godāvari and beyond it the countries of Andhra, Pauḍra, Cola, Pauḍya and Kerala."

This is a proof of the primitiveness of Kerala.

(10) The King of Kerala had given Yuddhiṣṭhira, as presents, sandalwood, pearls, Lapis Lazuli etc. (M.B. Daksinātyapāṭha, Sābhā Parva, Chapter 51).

In several other Purāṇas also, mention about Kerala occurs.

5) The ancient administration of Kerala. Parimelazhakar, a Saṅga poet who was a great expounder of "Tirukkuṇal", has stated that from the beginning of the world the three kingdoms, Cera, Cola and Pāṇḍya had existed. Though there is a bit of exaggeration in this statement, there are enough proofs to say that a long time before the birth of Christ, Kerala was under a systematic rule. In 'Tolkāppiyam' the first grammatical work in Tamil mention is made about the administration of Kerala. Megasthenes, a traveller of 4th century B.C. has stated about the rule of Kerala.

There were five councils called the Paṇcamaḥāsabhās (the five great councils) to help the Cera Kings. It is stated that these councils were formed by the King Utiyān Cera of the Trkkanā fort. Besides these five councils there was an advisory Committee, of which, the priest of the King, the Chief Minister, Chief of the spies and the Chief Revenue officer (Khāṇī) were members. For convenience of administration the country was divided into tarakkāṭhas (groups of houses—villages) and Nāṭukkūṭṭhas (Districts—group of villages). Taras (villages) were ruled by four elders (Kāranavas). Four villages formed a Nālpaṇḍu (group) of four. Four Nāl-pāṇḍus formed a Khaṇḍaka (a division of the country with a chief temple within it) and four Khaṇḍakas formed a Perumkhaṇḍa (greater Khaṇḍaka). Perumkhaṇḍa was also known as Trkkanā. The assembly hall of trkkuṭṭha is called Kottil. This hall was erected generally beside the temple. The chief officer of the temple was the chairman of the trkkuṭṭha (assembly of the people). When a trkkuṭṭha is assembled, sixty-four elders of the "taras", the "accas" (officers) of Khaṇḍakas, the sixtyfour Taṇḍāns and sixteen Nāḻpādies had to be present. The Nāḻpādies were the chiefs of four aras. The accas, who were the Presidents, had to come clad in variegated silk, with waist-band of long cloth and wearing a small sword (Churikā). Till recently the Kazhakas of An̄ḍallūr, Rāmpallya, Kurvanta, Turutti etc., and so many Nāḻpādies and aras and the elders thereof had been retaining and enjoying titles and distinctions of rank.

The Namboothiris (Brahmins) entered Kerala before the beginning of the Malayāḷa Era. With that, changes took place in the administration of Kerala. Certain edicts help us to ascertain the changes that took place in the administration. The edict of Vāz̢happally of the 9th century by Rājaśekhara is an important one in this connection. This emperor of the Ceras who is considered to be a contemporary of Śrī Saṅkarācārya had the title beginning with “Rājādhirājā Paramēvāra Bhatsāraka”. (T.A.S. Vol. II, P. 8-14). The subject dealt with in the edict was the 'daily worship and settlement', in the temple of Tiruvottiyūr. It is stated in this edict that the people of Vāz̢happally and the representatives of 18 Nāḍus or divisions had met in the temple and taken certain decisions.

The next one is the Kottayam Copper edicts known as the ‘Tarisā Church Edicts.' This is a document granting the Tarisā Church in Quilon, the adjoining lands and some other institutions. This edict was granted by Ayanaṭi tiruvaṭikal the ruler of the Nāṭu (division), for the Cera emperor. It is mentioned as ‘including the Temple Officer Vijayarākātevar’, which means that Vijayarākā had been present on the occasion of granting the edict, as the representative of Emperor Śrī Saṅkarācārya. The Nāḍuvāzhis (local chiefs or rulers of division) were not empowered to take decision in very important matters. Titles, rights distinctions of rank etc. were granted by Chief minister, Officers, Punnattalappati and Polakkūṭēppati (two high officials). Vijayarākātevar, the Koil adhikāri, was the representative of the emperor at Mahodayapurā. The supervising officials of temples were generally called the ‘Koil adhikāri'. Normally the younger brothers of the Kings were appointed in this rank. These temple-officers were helped in their duties by the Division-rulers, people of the locality and the inferior officers in the temple. When the empire of Kulaśekhara declined, the family of Perumpadappu got this position of 'Koil adhikāri'. So the title 'Koil adhikāri' is added to the names of the princes of Cochin.

Another one is the Mampally Edicts. This is a deed of granting some lands free to the temple of Airūr, in the name of Adiccan Umayamma of Tirkakalayapuram, by Venāṭu Śrī Vallabhānkota in M.E. 149. Even such an unimportant thing as the granting of free lands, had to be effected with the permission of Cera kings and their councils. (T.A.S. Vol IV, Page 9).

From these edicts it is clear that the administration of the temples was carried out by representatives elected by people. For each village temple there was an administrative council. These councils were controlled by Nāḍuvāzhis and Deśavāzhis (Divisional and Sub Divisional rulers who had Nair infantry (big or small as the case may be) at their disposal. The administrative assembly met either in the open hall at the main gate of the temple or on the stage for performances.

The rights and authorities were in the hands of the general assembly of the people called Nāṭṭukkūṭa and the council of the temple officials. When the Namboothiris became powerful they became members of the council. With this change the Kings and Koil adhikāris became puppets in the hands of the Namboothiris. In the Rāmeśvaram edict of M.E. 276 it is mentioned that King Rāmavarma Kuḷāśekhara was punished with retribution for his 'hatred' of the Aryan. Finally the Nambūthiris (Malayāḷa Brahmins) became the landlords of the country.

6) The people of ancient Kerala. It is assumed that the ancient inhabitants of Kerala were Drāvidas. But some historians have mentioned about the 'Proto Dravidians and the Pre Dravidians. The hill tribes such as Kaṅkiṅkārs, Mutuvas, Māḷa Veṭas, Pulayas, Kuravas, Nāyaṭis, Malayarayas, Malayaṭas, Malapaḍaratis, Malayūralis, Mutuvas, Pullāṭis etc. are said to have belonged to this group. They worshipped several things such as stone, banyan tree, adik tree, Asclapia tree, Nīm tree Terminatia Bellarica, Borassus flabelliforis, cassia fistula, Ghosts, thunder, rain, the sun etc. They worshipped good ghosts for welfare, and bad ghosts to avoid misfortunes. They had images of Māṭa, Cittā, Cāvū, Maruta, Petucāvū, Arukula, Preta, Vazhipiṇākki, Ayiramillī, Parakkūṭi, Kathūţi, Malavāţi, Mārīpi, Nāyaṭṭu Pe Maṅkāṭṭamma, Muniyappa, Veṭṭakkārān and so on. They worshipped in small bushes, open grounds or houses. They knew black magic such as cursing, giving poison in meals etc. These uncivilized people were very particular about cleanliness on the occasions of delivery, menstruation, death etc. They pleased bad ghosts by offering liquor, flesh and blood, and good ghosts with milk, ghee, honey etc. They buried dead bodies with a little raw rice meant for food at the time of entering the other world. They had collective worship. They sang songs at the time of worship using some primitive musical instruments. For each village there were elders who were priests and rulers. They erected stone huts in the burial place and buried the dead inside these in graves. These graves were called 'Pāṇḍukuzhys'. The Īrālis, continue the custom of posting two stones at either end of the grave. The custom of burial prevailed more than cremation.

Nair, Nambūṭirī, Izhava, Christians, Muslims and such other castes came to Kerala from other places later.

7) Ibn Batuta and Kerala. Ibn Batuta who was born in the town of Ṭanṭir in Morocco in Africa in A.D. 1304 had travelled all over the Eastern countries then known. He had started from his house on a Haj Pilgrimage at the age of 22. He returned home only after 29 years, having travelled all over the known countries. He has written a book in Arabic about his travels of 29 years. One third of this thick volume is devoted for descriptions of his travels in India alone. Its name is 'Tuh Phattunānār'. He passed over the Hindu Kush in A.D. 1333 and entered India. In the midst of his travels throughout the length and breadth of India, he came to Kerala also. He says as follows about Kerala in his book:

"Malabar is the country of Pepper. This country's length from Gokarna to Quilon is two months' journey. All the roads in this country are rendered cool and shady by asclapia trees. On the roads at intervals of half an hour there are inns. Near the inn there will be a well and a person to give water. The non-Muslims are given water in pots. But water is poured into the hands of Muslims. Rice is served in plantain leaf and sauces are also served in the same leaf. Uncultivated and uninhabited land is not to be seen. Each house is situated in the centre of a cultivated area. The people of this country do not use animals to carry goods. Travelling is on foot. Only Kings use horses. There is a conveyance called mafcalf (Palanquin). Slaves are used as Palanquin bearers. I have seen roads which could be used so fearlessly, only in Kerala and, no where else in the world. Capital punishment is given to one who steals even a coconut. The people of this country respect Muslims.

There are twelve kings in Malabar. None of them are Muslims. Many of them are powerful having an army of more than fifty-thousand soldiers. But there are no quarrels or clashes among them. The powerful do not have the desire to subjugate the less powerful. The inheritors of these kings are not sons, but nephews (sons of sisters). Besides the people of Kerala I have seen only the Muslims of the country of Salam on the banks of the Niger in Africa who have adopted the system of inheritance in the female line.”

Ibn Batuta has given some minor descriptions about the towns of Maṅgalāpuram, Ezhumala, Kanpur Calicut, Pāliyam, Crāṅgaṇur and Quilon.

KESARA. A Mountain in Śākadvipa (Śāka island). The air on this mountain was always filled with fragrance. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 23).

KESARI. A forest King who lived in the Mahā Meru. While Kesari was living in the Mahāmeru, Brahmā cursed a celestial maiden named Mānagarvā and changed her into a female monkey. She became the wife of Kesari, under the name Aṇjānā. For a long time the couple had no children. Aṇjānā worshipped Vāyu Bhagavān (Wind-God) for a child.

Once during this period the gods and hermits went to Parama Śiva and requested him to beget a son to help Mahāviṣṇu who was about to incarnate as Śrī Rāma to kill Rāvaṇa. Śiva and Pārvatī instantly took the form of monkeys and entered the forest for play. They having not returned for a long time, the gods asked the wind-god to go in search of them. The wind god came in the form of a great storm and shook the whole of the forest. Still they did not come out. Pārvatī who was pregnant was ashamed to come out. With Śiva she got on an Aśoka tree and sat there. Seeing that tree alone standing motionless in the big storm Vāyu god approached the tree and looked up. Śiva and Pārvatī appeared before Vāyu. Pārvatī refused to take the focus in the form of monkey to Kāllāsā. As Śiva had instructed, Pārvatī gave the child to the womb to the wind-god. It was at this time that Aṇjānā had prayed to Vāyu for a child. Vāyu gave that child to Aṇjānā, who gave birth to it. That child was Hanumān. Thus Hanumān got the names, Aṇjanaputra (son of Aṇjānā), Vāyuaputra (son of Vāyu), Kesariaputra (Son of Kesari) etc. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 417).

KEŚAVA. See under Keśa.

KEŚAYANTRI. An attendant of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46).

KEŚI I. 1) General information. An Asura. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 65 that forty Asuras or Dānavas were born to Kaśyapa, the son of Marici, and the grandson of Brahmā, by his wife Daṇu, and that Keśi was one of them. 2) Keśi and Indra. Once a war broke out between the Devas and the Asuras. Disasters befall the Devas. Daityasena and Devasena, the daughters of Prajapati were about to be carried away by Keśi. Daityasena agreed to accompany him of her own accord, but Devasena cried aloud. Hearing her cry Devendra reached the spot. A terrible fight ensued and finally the defeated Keśi ran away. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 223).

3) Keśi and Viṣṇu. Once there was a fight which lasted for thirteen days, between Keśi and Viṣṇu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 134, Stanza 20).

KEŚI II. A follower of Kaṁsa. This Asura, on the instruction of Kaṁsa, went to Ambāḍi (Gokula) taking the form of a horse, to kill Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed Keśi. It is seen in the Bhāgavata (Malayālam) that Śrī Kṛṣṇa got the name Keśava because he had killed Keśi. (Skandha 10, Keśiśvadha).

KEŚI III. In Bhāgavata there is another Keśi who was the son of Vasudeva.

“Pauravi Rohipi Bhadrā Madirā Rocanā Ilā / Devakipramukhā āsan Patnya Anakadundubheḥ.”

Pauravi, Rohipi, Bhadrā, Madirā, Rocanā, Ilā and Devaki were the wives of Vasudeva.
From this statement made in Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, Chapter 24, it is clear that Vasudeva had a number of wives. Kausalyā, who was one of them, was the mother of Keśi. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, Chapter 24, Stanza 48).

KEŚINI I. A celestial woman. In Mahābhārata, Adi Parva Chapter 65 it is stated that the twelve celestial maids, Alambusa, Miśrakesī, Viḍyutaparnā, Tilottamā, Aruṇā, Rakṣitā, Rambhā, Manorāmā, Keśinī, Suratā, Surajā and Supriyā were born to Kaśyapa of his wife Pradāhā.

KEŚINI II. The wife of Ajamidhā, a King of the Puru dynasty. The three sons Jahnu, Vrajā and Rāpiṇā were born to Ajamidhā of his wife Keśinī. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KEŚINI III. A maid of Damayantī. When Nala reached Kuḍinapūṛi, as Bāhuka the charioteer of Ṛṣiparṇa, Keśini approached Bāhuka at the request of Damayantī and by various tests found out that Bāhuka was Nala. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 74 and 75).

KEŚINI IV. A servant of Pārvatī. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 231, Stanza 48 that once Pārvatī with her servant Keśinī praised Śiva.

KEŚINI V. Once there arose a quarrel between Sudhanvā, the son of Aṅgiras, and Virocana the son of Prahlāda, because both wanted to marry the same girl named Keśinī. Sudhanvā was a Brahmin whereas Virocana was an Asura, who argued that Asura was nobler than Brahmin and Sudhanvā said that it was the other way. Both wagered their lives and accepted Prahlāda as their judge. The decision of Prahlāda was that the Brahmin was the nobler of the two. Because Prahlada said the truth Sudhanva did not kill Virocana. But Virocana had to wash the feet of Sudhanva in the presence of Kesini, feet Sudhanva married Kesini in the presence of Virocana. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 35).

KEŚINĪ VI. A wife of King Sagara. This Kesini was the daughter of the King of Vidarbha. The son Asamajasa was born to Sagara of Kesini. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāṇḍa, Sarga 38).

KETAKI. (A flower). [Pandarum odoratissimus] Though Ketaki is a flower which had been worn on Śiva’s head, it is not worshipped for the following reason.

In Satya-yuga Mahāviśu performed intense penance on the Śvetā island for the attainment of eternal happiness. Brahmā also performed penance at a beautiful place for the annihilation of desires. During their tapas Viṣṇu and Brahmā, for a rest, left their seats and walked about in the forest when they met each other. There arose a controversy between them about their respective greatness when Śiva, in the form of a Liṅga, appeared between the two contestants and told them that he, who first found out his (Śiva’s) head or feet was greater than the other. Accordingly Viṣṇu went down and Brahmā went up on a tour of enquiry.

Though Viṣṇu went down deeper and deeper for a long time to find out Śiva’s feet he failed in the attempt and so returned and sat at the place whence he started for the search. Brahmā went up a very long distance when he saw a Ketaki flower falling down from the sky. He took the flower in his hands and went to Viṣṇu and told him that he had found out Śiva’s head and showed the Ketaki flower as proof of his discovery claiming that it was taken from Śiva’s head. But Viṣṇu did not believe Brahmā and asked the Ketaki flower to bear witness to Brahmā’s claim. The flower gave false evidence in favour of Brahmā. Śiva got angry at this false evidence of Ketaki and cursed it. The Ketaki lost its place among the best flowers from that day onwards.

KETU I. (KETUMĀN). A Dānava. He was the son of Kaśyapa (grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici) by his wife Dānu. This Asura, who exists in the shape of a planet had thirty-three brothers, i.e. Viṣṇucittī, Śambara, Namuci, Pulomā, Asilomā, Keśī, Durjaya, Ayaśīras, Aśvaśīras, Aśva, Śaṅku, Mahābala, Garga, Amūrdhan, Vēgaṇā, Mānaṇā, Svarbhānu, Aśvapati, Vṛṣaparvan, Ājaka, Aśvagrīva, Śukṣma, Tuhunţa, Ekapātī, Ekapacra, Virūpākṣa, Harāhara, Nikūmbha, Kapata, Śarabha, Śalabha, Śūrya and Candramas. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65).

But Ketu maintained closer relationship with Rāhu, a step-brother of his, being the son of Kaśyapa by another wife called Śīrhhikā. Rāhu and Ketu are even today considered as inauspicious planets. Rāhu wears a half-moon and Ketu holds in his hands a sword and lamp. Amitaujas was Ketu reborn. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 11).

KETU II. A great sage of ancient India. He attained salvation by self-study. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 7).

KETU III. A synonym of Śiva. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 38).

KETU IV. A King born in Bharata’s dynasty. (Bhāga-vata, 9th Skandha).

KETU V. (DHŪMAKETU). The following story is told in Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa about the birth of Dhūmaketu.

Noting that the population on earth had increased abnormally Brahmā created a demsul called Mṛtyu and asked her to kill people. At this command of Brahmā she began crying, and from her tear drops various kinds of diseases originated at the sight of which she took to penance. Then Brahmā appeared and blessed her saying that no one would die because of her at which she heaved a great sigh of relief from which was born Ketu or Dhūmaketu.

KETUMĀLA I. The grandson of Priyavrata, the son of Manu. Agnīdhrā, a son of Priyavrata married Pārvaciti. Nine sons were born to Agnīdhra of his wife Pārvaciti. Ketumala was one of them. His brothers were Nābbhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hāri, Ilāvṛta, Ramyaka, Hiranmaya, Kuru and Bhadrāśva. In old age Agnīdhrā divided his kingdom among his sons. Later, the portion given to Ketumāla came to be known as Ketumāla. (Bhāga-vatā, Skanda 5).

KETUMĀLA II. A holy place in Jambu dvipa. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 89).

KETUMĀLA III. (See under Ketumāla I). Ketumāla is the ninth division of Jambu dvipa. The people of this part of the earth are equal to gods (Devas). The women are very beautiful. In Mahābhārata, Saṅhā Parva it is stated that Arjuna conquered this land. Ketumāla is situated on the east of Mount Meru. In Mahābhārata, Bhūṣma Parva, Chapter 6, there is the description of Ketumāla.

KETUMĀN I. Ketu the Asura (demon). (See under Ketu 1).

KETUMĀN II. A King who was a luminary in the council of Yudhiṣṭhira. He was a warrior on the side of the Kauravas and a friend of Śrutayudha, the King of Kaḷiṅga. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Bhūṣma Parva, Chapter 54, Stanza 77, that Bhūmāsena killed this warrior in the battle of Bhārata.

KETUMĀN III. In the Mahābhārata, another Ketumān who had fought on the side of Pāṇḍavas, is stated. Dhrutarāśtra had praised the valour of this warrior. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 10, Stanza 44).

KETUMĀN IV. A palace in Dvārakā. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Dākṣiṇātya-pāṭha, Saṅhā Parva, Chapter 38, that Sudattā, the wife of Śrī Kaṅga lived in this palace.

KETUMĀN V. Antapāla (the guard of the boundary of the west). At the beginning of the creation of the world Brahmā had appointed as guards of the boundaries, Sudhanvan in the east, Saṅkhaṇāda in the south, Ketumān in the west and Hiranyaromaka in the North. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

KETUMĀN VI. A King of the Puru dynasty. (See under Vairāgya).

KETUMĀN VII. In Bhāga-vata we see a Ketumān who was the son of Dhanvantari, who gave Ayurveda to the world.

"Who was the devil who made the Ayurveda in days of old? His son was Ketumān whose son was Bhūma-ratha." (Bhāga-vatā, Skanda 9).

KETUMĀN VIII. Son of Ekālaya. In Mahābhārata, Bhūṣma Parva it is mentioned that this King of the forest tribes fought on the side of Duryodhana and was killed by Bhima.

KETUMATI. Mother of Prahasta, a minister of Rāvana. Ketumati had two sisters Sundarī and Vasudhā. These three were daughters of a Gandharva woman.

Giant Heti, the son of Brahmā married Bhayā and Vidyutkēsa was born to the couple. Sukēsa was born to Vidyutkēsa by his wife Sālakaṭaṇḍa. Three sons Mālyavān, Sumāli and Māli were born to Sukēsa by his wife Daivalati. Sundarī, Ketumati and Vasudhā the three beautiful sisters mentioned above, were married by the giants Mālyavān, Sumāli and Māli respectively. Thus Ketumati became the wife of Sumāli. To Sumāli and Kctumati were born ten sons, Prahasta, Akampana, Vikata, Kālakāmukha, Dhūmrākṣa, Dapḍa, Supārśva, Sairihrāda, Pravāta and Bhāsakarṇa and four daughters Vekā, Puṣpotkaṭa, Kaikasi and Kumbhīnasi. Most of the sons were ministers of Rāvana. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

KETŪSRĪNGA. A King of ancient India. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 1).

KETUVARMAN. A prince of the country of Trigarta. He was the youngest brother of Sūryavarmā, the King of Trigarta. When Arjuna led the sacrificial horse of the horse-sacrifice of the Pāṇḍavas, Ketuvarman accompanied Arjuna as a helper. (M.B. Avamedha Parva, Chapter 74).

KEVALA. A city of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanza 10 and 11 that Karna conquered this city.

KHA. This syllable has the meanings ‘empty’ and ‘organ of sense’. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

KHADGA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Mahābhārata, Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 67).

KHADGABĀHU. See under Duṣṣāsana II.

KHADGI. See under Kalki.

KHAGA I. A nāga (serpent) born in the family of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Udgya Parva, Chapter 103).

KHAGA II. A synonym of Śiva. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Stanza 67).

KHAGAMA. A Brāhmaṇa. In Mahābhārata, there is a story which describes how this Brahmīn Khagama changed another Brahmīn to a serpent by cursing him. The Brahmīn Khagama and Sahasrapāt were friends. Once Sahasrapāt made a snake of grass and terrified Khagama at Agnihotra (Burnt offering in the holy fire) Khagama instantly cursed Sahasrapāt to become a serpent. Sahasrapāt requested for liberation from the curse. Khagama said that he would resume his original form on the day he saw Ruru the son of Pramati. From that day onwards Sahasrapāt roamed about in several countries in the form of a serpent.

Once Pramadavārī the wife of Ruru, died by snake-bite. Ruru cried over the death of his wife for a long time. According to the advice of a messenger from the Devas Ruru gave half of his life-time to his wife and she came to life again. But Ruru felt a bitter hatred against serpents and began their extermination. Once he met with Sahasrapāt. Instantly at the sight of Ruru, Sahasrapāt obtained his original form. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 11).

KHAGAṆA. A King born in the family of Śrī Rāma. He was the son of Vajranābha and the father of Vidhtī. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

KHAṆṆĪ. See under Kahaḍa.

KHALI I. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Stanza 43).

KHALI II. An Asura dynasty. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 155, Stanza 22, that Vasiṣṭha once destroyed an Asura dynasty called Khal, with his effulgence.

KHALU. A river of ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 28).

KHANAKA. A messenger sent by Vidura, secretly to the Pāṇḍavas who were living in the wux-house. Vidura sent a message through Khanaka to the effect that Duryodhana had decided to set fire to the wux-house employing Purocean to do it on the 14th night of the dark lunar fortnight. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 147).

KHANṆĀKHAṆĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. In Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 20, mention is made about this woman.

KHANṆĀPANARASU. Śiva. A story occurs in Mahābhārata stating how Śiva got this name. The famous Dakṣa-yā ga (sacrifice performed by Dakṣa) was performed at a time when the Nara Nārāyaṇas were engaged in penance in Badaryārama. Dakṣa did not invite his son-in-law Śiva. The angry Śiva sent his trident against Dakṣa. The trident destroyed the sacrifice of Dakṣa and then flew against the breast of Nārāyaṇa who was sitting in penance in Badaryārama. By the power of the trident the hair of Nārāyaṇa became of muṇja (a grass) colour. From that day onwards Nārāyaṇa came to be known by the name Muṇjakesvara. By a sound “hum”, the hermit Nārāyaṇa deviated the trident, which reached the hands of Śiva, who got angry and approached Nārāyaṇa to kill him. Nara, who was close by took an arrow and reciting spells over it, released it to kill Śiva. Immediately the arrow changed to an axe. Śiva broke the axe. After this the axe became the weapon of Śiva. In Mahābhārata Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 49, Stanza 33, it is mentioned that this axe was given to Parasārāma the disciple of Śiva. Thenceforward Śiva got the name Khaṇḍaparasu. (Pāru means axe). (Mahābhārata, Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 343. Stanzas 150-59, 167).

KHANṆĀVADĀṆĀ. 1) Introduction. Long ago a King named Śvetaki began to perform a sacrifice of duration of 100 years. Many Brahmīns took part in the sacrifice as priests conducting the rituals and ceremonies. These Brahmīns priests began to depart after a few years turning blind due to the smoke coming out of the sacrificial fire. Thus the sacrifice was stopped for want of priests. Śvetaki was grieved at this and performed penance to Śiva for getting a priest. Śiva appeared before him and pointed out hermit Durvāsas as the priest. Śvetaki recommended the sacrifice and under the supervision of Durvāsas the sacrifice was completed. But Fire-god caused dysentery due to the continuous eating of oblations offered in the sacrificial fire for a long period. His face became pale, body became lean, and he had no taste for food. At last Fire-God went to Brahmā and complained about his disease. Brahmā said that in the forest of Khaṇḍava there lived so many creatures which were enemies of the devas (gods) and that by eating their fat the disease of Agni would be cured. Accordingly Agni came to the Khaṇḍava forest.
The serpent Takṣaka, a friend of Indra, lived in this forest with his wife and children. Indra knew that Agni had come to burn the Khaṇḍava forest and resolved to save Takṣaka at any cost. When Agni (fire) began to catch the forest, Indra had already begun rain. So it was not possible for Agni to consume the forest. Agni tried seven times to consume the forest and in all these seven attempts he failed. Agni again approached Brahmā, who told him that the Nara-Nārâyana would take birth in the earth as Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and that at that time it would be possible for fire to consume the forest Khāṇḍava.

2) Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna in the forest of Khāṇḍava. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in Indraprastha, once the hot season became so unbearable that Arjuna took Kṛṣṇa with him and went to the forest of Khāṇḍava. While they were playing in the river Yamunā with their wives Agni came there in the guise of an old Brāhmin and told them all that had happened and requested their help for eating the Khāṇḍava forest. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna promised to help him in this affair.

3) Preparation of weapons. For the time being Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were not having sufficient weapons. Agni (fire-god) thought of Varuṇa (the God of water) who instantly appeared. At the request of Agni Varuṇa gave Arjuna the famous bow 'Candrabhanus' (Gaṇḍiva), a quiver which would never become empty of arrows and a chariot having a flag with the sign of monkey and to Śrī Kṛṣṇa the weapon of the discus. Varuṇa gave four white horses also with gold chains round their necks for drawing the chariot of Arjuna. With these weapons Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna got ready to help Agni. Śrī Kṛṣṇa became the charioteer of Arjuna.

4) Burning the forest. When Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna stood ready Agni began to consume the forest. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna guarded the boundaries of the forest so that the inmates of the forest might not escape. The living creatures ran hither and thither finding no way to escape. Many died of suffocation. At that time the hermits who were dwellers of that forest ran to Indra and informed him of the great calamity. Indra instantly got ready to fight and save the forest. He covered the whole of the sky with clouds and a heavy rain was showered on the forest. Arjuna created a covering of arrows like an umbrella over the fire and saved him from the rain.

5) The family of Takṣaka. At this particular time Takṣaka had been away at Kurukṣetra. Aśvāsena the son of Takṣaka was writhing with heat and pain. Seeing this his mother (wife of Takṣaka) swallowed him from tail to head. Then she ran to the boundary to throw the child into the outer region. Seeing this Arjuna got angry and cut at the head of Aśvāsena. But at the nick of time Indra sent a storm and made Arjuna swoon and Aśvāsena was saved. So Arjuna became furious and began to cut down every creature he saw. Arjuna, Kṛṣṇa and Agni together cursed Aśvāsena that he would get refuge nowhere. Aśvāsena kept up his hatred of Arjuna. In the Bhārata battle, Aśvāsena got an arrow sent by Karna at Arjuna and knocked off the crown of Arjuna and returned. But due to the curse Karna did not receive him back.

6) Deadly fight. The serpents and hawks confronted Arjuna, who cut off their heads. Kṛṣṇa killed the Asuras with the weapon discus. Indra came to the battle-field riding on his elephant Airāvata. Kāla (Time), Kubera, Skanda, Aśvinidevas and all the other Devas (gods), and Asuras (demons) helped Indra in the fight. But Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna came out victorious.

7) The advent of Maya. Meanwhile Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna called Indra and told him who they were and informed him that Takṣaka had gone to Kurukṣetra. Hearing this Indra blessed Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and retreated from the battlefield. Agni began to consume the forest more vigorously than before. Because of the unbearable heat, Maya, the architect of the Asuras, came out of the house of Takṣaka and ran to Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna and entreated them to save him. Accordingly Arjuna saved him from the fire.

8) The story of four birds which escaped from the fire. In that forest a hermit named Mandapatā had erected his hermitage and lived there performing penance. He died and went to the world of ancestors. But there, the hermit did not attain any fruit of the penance he had performed. The hermit asked the Devas for the reason. They replied that it was because the hermit had no sons. The hermit came to the forest again to marry and beget sons. Mandapatā married a bird called Jarita. Four sons named Jaritari, Sārīṣhrka, Stambamitra and Droṣa, were born to them. After this Mandapatā left Jarita and her sons and went after another woman Lāpitā. Feathers were not yet grown on the body of Jaritā's four sons. The burning of the forest began before it. Jaritā and her sons were in a sorry plight. The mother could fly. But she did not think of leaving her young ones in danger. She decided to die in the fire folding the young ones under her wings. But her sons did not agree to it. They entreated her to fly away. Thus moments of tears passed by. At last Jaritā told them crying, "There is the hole of a rat closely. The rat had been taken away by a kite. I will take you to that hole and close it. Then I shall go away and return when the fire is abated."

But the young ones did not agree to this. They loved to be killed by fire, rather than to be killed by rat. Finally at their request Jaritā flew away. Mandapatā thought of his sons. He separated from Lāpitā, and came to Agni and requested him to save his sons and Jaritā. Agni consummed the forest and neared the birds. The young birds requested Agni to save them. Agni Deva saved them. Mandapatā and Jaritā returned. That family lived for a long time in joy and happiness and finally attained the world of the gods. Agni returned to heaven after the burning of the forest of Khāṇḍava. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapters 233 to 346).

KHĀṆḌAVAPRASTHA. See under Indraprastha.
KHĀṆḌAVĀṆANA. Paraśurāma gave all the countries conquered by him to Kaśyapa. Along with the lands he gave a golden dais also. The group of hermits called Khāṇḍavāyanas cut the dais into pieces and shared them with the permission of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 117, Stanza 13).
KHĀṆḌIKYĀ. A Kṣatriya King, Keśīdhvaja was the son of his paternal uncle. Both had learned well the ways of union with the divine life. Khāṇḍikya had become an expert in Karmayoga (the path of action) for becoming one with the divine life whereas Keśīdhvaja tried to achieve oneness with divine life by Jñāna.
Yoga (the path of knowledge or spiritual attainment). Each desired to subdue the other. Consequently Khāṇḍikīya lost his kingdom and had to live in a forest with his priest and minister. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9 and 13).

Keśidhvaja who tried the path of knowledge to attain Absolution performed several sacrifices for that purpose and cut himself asunder from the bonds of action. Once, while he was performing a sacrifice, a tiger came to the place of sacrifice and killed the sacrificial cow. Then Keśidhvaja asked the priests who were conducting the sacrifice, what the atonement was for the death of the sacrificial cow. The priests sent the King to the hermit Kāśeru, who sent the King to the hermit Bhṛgu. Hermit Bhṛgu in his turn sent the King to the hermit Śunaka. But the matter did not end there. The hermit Śunaka could not dictate the atonement for the death of the sacrificial cow. So he sent the King to Khāṇḍikīya who was living in the forest. The moment Khāṇḍikīya saw Keśidhvaja he stood ready to kill him. But Keśidhvaja revealed everything to Khāṇḍikīya. When he understood the situation Khāṇḍikīya told him with sincerity the rites given in the Śāstras (Vedāṅgas) to atone the death of the sacrificial cow.

Keśidhvaja returned and completed the sacrifice. The one item of 'gift to the teacher' alone remained. So Keśidhvaja came to the forest again. Khāṇḍikīya raised the sword to cut him. Keśidhvaja said that he had come to give Gurgudāṅṣīṇa to the teacher. Khāṇḍikīya repented his rashness and requested Keśidhvaja to tell him the ways of cutting himself asunder from the bonds of sorrow and grief. Keśidhvaja advised him the ways to obtain eternal bliss. (Nārada Purāṇa).

KHANĪNETRA. The eldest son of Vīvaṁśa, a King of the solar dynasty. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 4, that this King was driven away from the country as he harassed the people.

KHARA I. A giant (Rākṣasa). Khara and Atikāya were the rebirths of Madhu and Kaitabha. For details see under Kaitabha and Atikāya.

1) Birth and genealogy. Mahābhārata mentions as follows about the birth of this giant:- Viśravas was born from Puṣpaśya the son of Brahmā. Kubera was born from Viśravas. Kubera ruled over Laṅkā. Viśravas who had no one to help him once looked with anger at Kubera, who, understanding the wish of his father gave him three giantesses named Puṣpotkāṭa, Rākṣa and Mālīni as attendants. They attended on him faithfully and Viśravas was pleased with them. To Viśravas two sons named Rāvana and Kumbhakarna were born by Puṣpotatā, Viśhīṣṭa was born by Mālīni and the twin sister and brother Śūrpaṇakha and Khara were born by Rākṣa. By and by Khara became a famous archer. Rāvana, Kumbhakarna and Viśhīṣṭa performed penance to obtain boons and Khara and Śūrpaṇakha stayed with them to serve them. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 275).

2) Other brothers. Khara had two other brothers Dūṣaṇa and Triśiras. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

3) The slaughter of Khara. While Śrī Rāma, Sītā and Lākṣmī were staying in the forest of Daṇḍakāranya Śūrpaṇakha the sister of Khara came there once and tried to get one of the brothers Śrī Rāma and Lākṣmī as her husband. Lākṣmī cut off her nose and ears. She went to Khara, Dūṣaṇa and Triśiras and lamented before them. The three of them immediately started with an army of fourteen thousand giants and fought with Rāma and Lākṣmī and killed every one of them. (Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyakāṇḍa, Sargas 19 to 30).

KHARA II. Another giant who helped Rāvaṇa in the battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa.

In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285; Stanza 2, it is said that ‘Parvaṇa, Pataṇa, Jambha, Khara, Krodhavāṣa, Hari, Prarjuṇa, Aruṇa, Praghasa and others fought with Rāma.

KHARAJAṆGHĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 22).

KHARAKARMĪ. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 26).

KHASĀ. A wife of Kaśaya Prajāpati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa Amśa 1, Chapter 15).

KHASA. A wife of Kaśaya Prajāpati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa Amśa 1, Chapter 15).

KHAŚIRA. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 22).

KHAŚIRA. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 22).

KHAṬVĀNGA. 1) General Information. A king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty, known by the name Dilīpa also. Bhāgavata Skandha 9, states that Khaṭvaṅga was the son of the grandson of Kalmāśapāda. Aśīka was the son of Kalmāśapāda, Mālaka the son of Aśīka and Khaṭvaṅga the son of Mālaka.

Khaṭvaṅga who was a royal hermit once pleased God and understood how long he would live. From that day onwards he left all the work of administration in the hands of ministers and spent the remaining days in devotion and meditation. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 2).

2) Particular details. In Mahābhārata it is mentioned that Khaṭvaṅga was the son of the woman called Ilībilā and that he had the name Dilīpa also. Khaṭvaṅga was one of the sixteen famous Kings of Bhārata. The sixteen Kings were Marutta, Suhoṭra, Paurava, Śibi, Śrī Rāma, Bhagiratha, Khaṭvaṅga, (Dilīpa) Māndava, Yayati, Ambarīsa, Śaśābindu, Gayā, Rāntideva, Bharata, Prthu and Parasūrāma. Khaṭvaṅga performed one hundred sacrifices. At the time of sacrifice he made golden roads. Even Indra came to the sacrifice. The Devas blessed Khaṭvaṅga on that day. See under Dilīpa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 61).

KHILA. There is an appendix to Mahābhārata called Khila. This Khila is known as Harivaṁśa also. This portion too was written by Vyāsa.

KHYĀṬA. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 20).

KHYĀṬI I. A daughter of Prajāpati Dakṣa. The hermit Bhṛgu married her. A daughter named Lākṣmī and two sons named Dhātā and Viḍhātā were born to Bhṛgu by Khyāṭi. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 20).

KHYĀṬI II. Daughter of Kuru, who was born of the family of Druva. Six sons, Anśa, Sumanas, Svātī, Kṛatu, Anγīras, and Sibi were born to Kuru by his wife Āgeneyi. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Amśa 1, Chapter 13).

Khyāṭi was a daughter born to them.

KICAKA. Brother-in-law of Mātśya, king of Virāṭa and son of Kckaya, king of the Śūtas,
1) General information. To Kekaya, king of the Sūtas, was born of queen Mālavī, Kīcaka and other 105 sons younger to him called Upa-Kīcakas. Their only sister was called Sūdeṣṇā. (Bhārata, Southern text, page 1898). Kīcaka and Upa-Kīcakas took their birth from an aspect of Bauṇa, the eldest of the Asuras known as the Kālakeyas. (See Bhārata, Page 1893). Māṭya, the Virāṭa king wedded Sūdeṣṇā; and from that day onwards, the brothers too lived in the Virāṭa palace. Kīcaka was the chief tenant of Virāṭa’s army, and he had, many a time, defeated in war King Suṣarman of Trigarta. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 30).

2) Kīcaka and Pāṇcālī. During their life incognito, the Paṇḍavas lived in the Virāṭa palace after taking up various jobs. Pāṇcālī, under the assumed name Mālinī, served Sūdeṣṇā and her daughter Uttarā as their charpenter. Kīcaka fell in love with Pāṇcālī at first sight. But, Pāṇcālī resisted all his advances. Then, he sought the help of his sister Sūdeṣṇā to bring round Pāṇcālī to him somehow. Sūdeṣṇā asked Kīcaka to be ready on the New Moon day with liquor and rice and promised to send Mālinī (Pāṇcālī) to him. Ordered by Sūdeṣṇā, she went to Kīcaka with his plate of food much against her will. Kīcaka caught hold of her, but she ran when the former caught her by the hair, felled her on the floor and kicked her. A Rākṣasa, who was deputed for Pāṇcālī’s security appeared on the scene in a trice and felled Kīcaka.

3) Kīcaka’s Death. The very same night with tears in her eyes, Pāṇcālī told Bhima all about the indecent behaviour. He asked Pāṇcālī to invite Kīcaka to a secret meeting at a specified place the next night, and promised her that he would remain concealed there and kill Kīcaka. Accordingly Bhima concealed himself the next night in the dancing hall and, as requested by Pāṇcālī, Kīcaka came to the hall at midnight to spend a few hours with Pāṇcālī. Bhima was lying there on a cot, and Kīcaka, mistaking him for Pāṇcālī kissed him. Bhima caught him in his iron grip and crushed him to death. The next morning, it was the fate of Kīcaka’s brothers to lament over his death. The story also was spread that Kīcaka was killed by some Gandharva, the husband of Pāṇcālī.

The Upa-Kīcakas removed the dead body of their brother to the burning ghat. Proclaiming that Pāṇcālī, who was responsible for the death of their brother would also be burnt to death on the same pyre, the Upa-Kīcakas forcibly took her with them. Hearing the heart-rending cries of Pāṇcālī Bhima rushed to the spot and killed all the Upa-Kīcakas and saved Pāṇcālī from death. In the presence of the Virāṭa king the cremation of Kīcaka and the Upa-Kīcakas took place. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 13 et seq).

KIKĀṬA. A king born in the dynasty of Priyavrata, son of Manu. He was one of the nineteen sons of King Bharata, the other eighteen being Kuśavarman, Ila-varta, Brahmāvarta, Aryāvarta, Malayā, Bhadraketu, Sena, Indrasyrk, Vidarbha, Kapi, Hari, Antaraikṣa, Prabuddha, Pippalāyana, Avirhotra, Dṛmadja, Camasa and Karabhājana. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

KIKĀṬA (M). The country ruled by King Kikāṭa. The following story is told in Devi Bhāgavata as to how an ass in this kingdom attained heaven.

There was once in Kikāṭa a merchant who had an ass to carry his merchandise. Once the merchant was returning home from Bhadrācalā with his ass loaded with bundles of costly Rudrākṣas. The old ass fell down dead on the way, the weight of the Rudrākṣa bundles having been too much for it, and immediately it assumed the form of Śiva and went to Kailāsa. Even if a man does not know what he is carrying, if he carries sacred things he will certainly attain salvation, like the ass that attained salvation in this case. (Devi Bhāgavata, 11th Skandha).

KILĪ (PARROT). 1) Origin. About the origin of Kilīs (parrots) the following is stated in Canto 14, Aranya Kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa.

Kaśyapa, the grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici married the eight daughters of Dākṣaprājapati, one of them being called Tāmāra. Tāmāra had five daughters called Kruṇḍi, Bhāṣi, Śyen, Dṛtarāṣṭri and Śukī. Śukas or Kilīs (parrots) are the offsprings of Śukī.

2) Parrots acquire talking faculty. Lord Śiva agreed to beget a son to kill Tārakāsura, at the request of the Devas. The coitus between Śiva and Pārvatī for the purpose did not end even after a hundred years. Due to the pressure of the process the whole world shook, and when the world appeared to get destroyed the Devas asked Agnideva to persuade Śiva to stop. But, afraid of approaching Śiva Agni ran off and hid himself in the ocean. The Devas followed him, and animals in the water which were burning with the heat of Agni, told the Devas that Agni was hiding in the sea. But, Agni cursed them all to dumbness, and leaving the ocean hid himself on mount Mandara. The parrots revealed this secret, when Agni cursed them also and made their tongues fold inwards. The Devas and the parrots requested for redemption from the curse. Redemption was granted thus: "Though the tongue be turned inwards your sound will be melodious. Just like the voice of a child your (parrots’) sound also will be sweet and wonderful."

From that day onwards parrots began talking and singing. (Kathāsīrīṣāgāra, Lāvāṇakālambaka, Tārāṅga 6 and Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 85).

KIMPUṆĀ. A river in Devaloka. It worships Varuṇa in his assembly. (Sabha Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20).

KIMPUṆĀṢA.

1) General. A king called Agnīdhra was born in the dynasty of Priyavrata, son of Manu. He became lord of the Jambū island, and married an apsārā woman named Pūrvacitti. To them were born nine sons called Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hari, Ilāvyta, Ramyaka, Hiraṇmayā, Kalva, Bhadrāśva and Kêtumāla. Agnīdhra partitioned the kingdom among the nine sons. The land Kimpuruṣa ruled over was known as Kimpuruṣa or Kimpuruṣavārśa. It lay to the south of Hemaṅka mountain. It was here that Hanūmān spent his last days worshipping Śrī Rāma.

"The son of the wind God (Hanūmān) lives in the country called Kimpuruṣavārśa in the worship of Śrī Rāma." (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

According to the Sabha Parva (Chapter 23, Verses 1,2) Kimpuruṣavārśa guarded by the sons of Druma is situated to the north of the Himālayas facing the Dhavala mountain, and this country was once conquered by Arjuna.
2) Other information.
(i) Kimpuruṣas were the sons of Pulaha Prājāpati. (Adi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 8).
(ii) They witnessed Agastya drinking up the ocean dry. (Vana Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 21).
(iii) They guard the lotus ponds kept by Kubera to sport with his beloved ones. (Vana Parva, Chapter 15; Verse 9).
(iv) In his conflict with Ravaṇa, Kubera left behind him Lāṅkā and his Puspaśa Vīmāna, escaped towards the north and settled down on mount Gandhamādāna with the help of the Kimpuruṣas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 33).
(v) Yakṣa women were their mothers. (Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 25).
(vi) They were present at the aśvamedha of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 88, Verse 37).
(vii) Suka Brahmṛṣi reached Bhārata, crossing Kimpuruṣavāra. (Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 225).

KINDAMA. A great sage. Once sage Kindama and his wife were roaming in the forest in the form of deer. While hunting, King Pāṇḍu discharged his arrow against the he-deer. It assumed its original form as sage Kindama and told the King that it was wrong on his part to have hit him (the sage) while he was engaged in love play. “I am dying, but in future if you physically contact your wife you too will die.” After saying so the sage fell down dead. Pāṇḍu could never have children of his own from his wives due to this curse. He forgot all about the curse once, embraced Mādrī and fell down dead. (Adi Parva, Chapter 117).

KINDANĀ (M). A sacred place in Kurukṣetra. A holy dip here is productive of innumerable auspicious results.

KINDATTAKŪPA. A holy pond. He who sows gingly seeds in the pond is redeemed from the three Ṛnas (debts) i.e. Ṛṣī-Ṛṇa Pitr-Ṛṇa and Deva-Ṛṇa. The first is to be redeemed by Brahmacarī (celibacy), the second by house-holder's life and the third by yajñas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 88).

KINJAPYĀ. A particular holy place in Kurukṣetra. A bath here is productive of innumerable auspicious results.

KĪKĀNA. A King born in the lunar dynasty. Namo, Kīkāna and Vṛṣṇi were the three sons of King Mahābhṛja. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

KĪKARA I. A Rākṣasa. Śakti, the son of Vasiṣṭha and King Kālmāṣapāda of the solar dynasty once quarrelled with each other, and the King cursed and turned Śakti into a Rākṣasā. At this juncture Viśvamitra inyoked Kīkara, a Rākṣasa attendant of his, into the body of Kālmāṣapāda, and induced by Kīkara, Kālmāṣapāda killed all the sons of Vasiṣṭha. (Adi Parva, Chapter 175).

KĪKARA II. Name of Kāla's stick. It is with this stick that Kāla kills living beings. “Like Kāla who holds the stick Kīkara”. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 122).

KĪKARA (S). A race of Rākṣasas. After building the palace at Indra-prastha for the Pāṇḍavas Mayāśura put 8000 Kīkaras for guarding the palace (Sabha Parva, Chapter 3). These guards were able to remove the palace from one place to another, Yudhiṣṭhira, who started for the north to collect money is said to have met the Kīkāras on the Himalayas. (Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 6).

KĪNKINIKĀŚRAMA. A holy place. A bath here will lift one to heaven. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 23).

KINNARA(S). A sect of Devas all of whom hold Viṇās in their hands. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

KĪRĀṬA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhūṣma Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 51).

KĪRĀṬĀRJUNIYA. During the life in exile in the forest of the Pāṇḍavas, Arjuna performed penance to propitiate Śiva in the Himalayas. Disguised as a forest-hunter Śiva appeared on the scene and tested Arjuna's valour. Arjuna won in the test and was presented the Pāṣupatāstra by Śiva. The story is told in Chapter 167 of the Vana Parva. (See under Arjuna).

KĪRĪT I. A warrior of Skanda deva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 71).

KĪRĪT II. A synonym of Arjuna. (See under Arjuna).

KĪRMĪRA. A fierce Rākṣasa, brother of Baka and friend of Hīḍimba. Having heard about the death of Baka at the hands of Bhīma, Kīrmīra who was living in Kāṃyaka forest planned a revenge against Bhīma. After being defeated in the game of dice the Pāṇḍavas came to the forest, and they confronted Kīrmīra. In the duel with Bhīma, Kīrmīra fell down dead. (Vana Parva, Chapter 11).

KĪRTI I. Daughter of Śuka Brahmṛṣi, son of Vyāsa. Śuka wedded Pīvārī, the beautiful daughter of the Pītrs. Four sons named Kṛṣṇa, Gauraprabha, Bhūrī and Devasruta and a daughter Kīrti were born to Śuka and Pīvārī. Kīrti was wedded by Prince Aśu, son of King Vībhrama, and a son called Brahmadatta was born to them, who grew up to become a great scholar and an ascetic. On the advice of Nārāda, King Brahmadatta ultimately abdicated the throne in favour of his, performed penance at Badaryāśrama and attained salvation. (Devi Bāgavata, 1st Sākanda).

KĪRTI II. A daughter of Daksaprajāpati. Svayambhūva Manu wedded his own sister Sāturūpā, and to them were born two sons called Priyavrata and Uttanapāda and two daughters called Prasūti and Akūṭi. Daksaprajāpati married Prasūti, and they had twenty-four daughters who were Śraddhā, Lakṣṇī, Dhṛti, Tuṣṭi, Medhā, Puṣṭi, Kriyā, Buddhī, Lalā, Vapuṣ, Śānti, Siddhi, Kīrti, Khyāti, Satī, Sambhuṭi, Smṛti, Priū, Kṣamā, Sannatī, Anasūya, Urjā, Svāhā, and Svadhā. The first thirteen of the above twenty-five girls were married by Dharmadeva. The other eleven girls were married respectively by Bhṛgu, Śiva, Marīcī, Āṅgiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Atri, Vasīṭha, Agni and Pītrs. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 7).

KĪRTI III. The Devi who is the basis and cause of all fame and reputation. (Vana Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 38).

KĪRTIDHARMA. A Kṣatriya hero, who was a supporter of Dharmaputra. (Droṣa Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 39).

KĪRTIMĀN I. The first son born to Vasudeva and Devaki. As a celestial voice had warned Kaśa that the eighth son of Devaki would kill him he had ordered that every child born to her should be taken to him. Accordingly the first-born son of Devaki was taken to him, but was returned to the parents as Kaśa thought that he was not his enemy. He was brought up under the name Kirtimān. Afterwards Nārada visited Kāraṇa and explained to him about his former birth, the object of Kṛṣṇa's incarnation etc. This information so angered Kāraṇa that he got Vasudeva and Devakī chained in prison. Moreover he brought back the first-born son of Devaki and dashed him to death on a stone. Thus ended the life of Kirtimān.

Kīrtimān II. Mahāviśṇu mentally created a son called Viraṇa, and Kirtimān was his son. A son called Kardama was born to Kirtimān. (Sāntī Parva, Chapter 59, Verse 90).

Kīrtimān III. A Vīṣvadeva (universal deva).
(Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 31).

Kīrtimukha. A Śiva gaṇa born out of the matted hair of Śiva with three faces, three tails, three legs and seven hands. The Lord at first asked him to live on corpse, but later on, in appreciation of his valour granted him the boon that if anyone saw the Lord without thinking first about Kīrtimukha, he would meet with his down-fall. (Padma Purāṇa, Utṭara Khanda, Chapter 50).

Kīrtisena. Son of the brother of the Nāga chief Vāsuki. He made a love-marriage with Śrutāthā daughter of a brahmin, and a child was born to them.
(Kathāsaritāgāra, Kathāpithakalambaka).

Kīrtisenā. A heroine who has firmly established her reputation in Sanskrit literature. An exceptionally good woman, Kīrtisenā was the daughter of a merchant called Dhanapāla in Pāțaliputra, and was married by another merchant called Devasena. Once Devasena left the country for purposes of trade, and during his absence from home the mother-in-law of Kīrtisenā shut her up in a dark room. But, with the help of an iron rod, which fortunately came to her hands she made a hole in the room at night, and through it escaped from captivity. Hungry and thirsty, Kīrtisenā travelled a long distance in the forest, and at night climbed a tree and rested thereon. Presently a Rākṣasa woman with her children came to the foot of the tree.

During this period the King of Vasudattapura was suffering from pain in the head because a bug entered his ear and multiplied there in numbers. All the physicians gave up the case as incurable. But, the Rākṣasa at the foot of the tree advised the following cure for the King's illness to her children:—"Anoint the King's head with ghee and make him lie in the sun at noon. After that insert a small tube into his ear, and keep the other end of the tube in a pot full of water. Then the bugs will come out from the ear into the water, and the King will be cured of his ill-

Kīrtisenā, who heard this medical advice from her seat on top of the tree disguised herself as a physician, went to the palace and cured the King of his troubles.
In her disguise, she continued to live in the palace as a friend of the King. Shortly, her husband Devasena, came there and they were happily reunited. The King gave them costly presents. (Kathāsaritāgāra, Madana-mañjukālambaka, Tarāṇa 3).

Kīrṣkindhā. An ancient kingdom of the monkeys in South India. This kingdom is mentioned both in the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata.

During the Rāmāyaṇa period a monkey King called Kṛṣṇarāja was the ruler of Kīrṣkindhā. He was childless.

Once upon a time a son called Bāli was born to Aruṇi-devī by Indra, and another son called Sugrīva was born to her by Sūrya. (See under Aruṇa). Both the boys were brought up in the Aśrama of sage Gautama.
When they grew up, Indra handed them over to Kṛṣṇa-rāja, and thus Bāli and Sugrīva came to Kīrṣkindhā.
After the death of Kṛṣṇarāja, Bāli became King of Kīrṣkindhā and Sugrīva lived in the service of his brother.
At that time there was a very mighty Asura called Dundubhi. Finding no one fit to fight with, he challenged Varaṇa. Varaṇa directed him to Himavān, whose peaks he rent asunder, and played with. Then Himavān told Dundubhi that he was of a peaceful nature and that Bāli would be a match for him (Dundubhi).
Accordingly Dundubhi fought with Bāli and got killed.
Bāli cast away the corpse of Dundubhi. The blood oozing out from the nose of Dundubhi fell on the body of sage Mataṅga who was engaged in penance on the peak Rṣyamūkā. Bymeans of his divine powers, the sage found out the origin of the blood contaminating his body, and cursed that Bāli would die the moment he set foot on the mountain.

Dundubhi's son Māyāvi was enraged at the death of his father. He went to Kīrṣkindhā to take revenge on Bāli, but got defeated by the latter in fighting. Māyāvi took to his heels; Bāli followed him, and Sugrīva followed his brother. Māyāvi took refuge in a cave followed by Bāli, and Sugrīva waited at the mouth of cave. Even after one year neither Bāli nor Māyāvi emerged out of the cave, but Sugrīva saw blood coming out of the cave and heard Māyāvi roaring. Taking it for granted that Bāli was killed, Sugrīva closed the mouth of the cave, returned to Kīrṣkindhā, and at the instance of his subjects assumed kingship.

But, Bāli forced open the cave, hurried back to his kingdom, and interpreting the action of Sugrīva as one purposely done to usurp the throne, drove Sugrīva away and took for himself Sugrīva's wife. Thus Bāli became again King of Kīrṣkindhā.

There is a mountain called "Bāli-kerā-mala"—mountain prohibited to Bāli—in the eastern region of the former princely kingdom of Travancore. Is it in any way con-

Sugrīva founded a new kingdom at Rṣyamūkā mountain. Mainda, Dvivida, Hanūmān and Jāmbavān were the ministers of Sugrīva. It was while Sugrīva was thus living on Rṣyamūkācala that Rāma and Lakṣmana came that way in the course of their search for Sītā.
In accordance with the agreement made between Sugrīva and Rāma, the latter killed Bāli and crowned Sugrīva as the King of Kīrṣkindhā. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Kīrṣkindhā Kāṇḍa, and Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 280).

During the triumphal tour of Sahadeva in the South he fought against Kīrṣkindhā, and after seven days' fighting the monkeys saw Sahadeva off with a present of costly gems. "Sahadeva fought against the monkey chiefs like Mainda, Dvivida etc. for seven days, but neither of them got exhausted, and the monkey chiefs, with affection and gratitude asked Sahadeva to depart with gems."

(Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31).

During this period nothing was heard of Sugrīva, Hanūmān and Jāmbavān in Kīrṣkindhā. Might be Sugrīva was no more. Hanūmān, after the death of Śrī Rāma, lived in Gandhamādana in Kimpuruṣa-varṣa. (Bhāratas and Bāgavata, 10th Skandha). From the story of Praśena it may be seen that Jāmbavan left Kīśkindhā and lived in another cave with his sons and other relations. It was the other two ministers of Sūtrīva, Maṅda and Dvivida, who were ruling Kīśkindhā when Sahadeva went there. The power and prestige of Kīśkindhā had begun to set by then, and in course of time Kīśkindhā ceased to exist but in name.

Kīśkindhāghū. A mountainous region in Dvāḍ district in South India. Certain scholars hold the view that this was the actual Kīśkindhā.

Kīṭaka. A king born from an aspect of the Aśura called Krodhavasa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 60).

Kīṭava (S). An ancient tribe of people. They once visited Yudhiṣṭhīrā with many presents. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 12).

Kohala. A Brahmin scholar. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 4, that this Brahmin was present at the ‘Sarpa Satra’ (sacrifice to kill serpents) of Janamejaya. Once Bhagratīva gave this hermit as alms one lakh of cows with calves. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 136, Stanza 27).

Koka. (Cakravāka bird), Ruddy Goose. To know the Purāṇic story about the origin of this bird (Ruddy goose) see under ‘Arayanna’ (Swan).

Kokāmakha. A holy place. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 153, that those who bathe in this holy bath will get the faculty of remembering their previous births.

Kokanada I. A Kṣatriya King of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, that at the time of the regional conquest of Arjuna, this King fell at his feet and sought refuge.

Kokanada II. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Sahā Parva, Chapter 27).

Kokava. A country in ancient India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

Kokila. See under Dīṇḍika.

Kokilaka. A warrior of Skanda. (Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Stanza 73).

Kolagiri. A mountain of South India. (Mahābhārata Sahā Parva). Sahadeva conquered the people of this mountain.

Kolahala. A famous Aśura. In the battle between the Devas and the Aśuras carried on by Subrahmanyā, this Aśura confronted Mālyavān and was killed. (Padma Purāṇa; Part IV, Chapter 13).

Kolasvṛūpa (Kolattunādu). After the decline of the second Cera empire in Keralā, several royal families such as Perumpaṭṭappu, Neṇuvirippu, Kolasvṛūpa, Venṭuṭu etc. came into power. Some details regarding the family of Kolasvarūpa are given below.

In ‘Keralā Māhātmya’, it is given that Paraśūrama had made a Soma-Kṣatriya, as King of Cīrakkal or Kolattunādu. According to ‘Keralotpatti’ it was Cera-mān Perumāl who did this. Logan says that Kolasvarūpa came into being from the children born to the last Perumāl of the Venṭuṭu family. In the edicts Vira-rāghavapattaya or Jūṭasāsana no mention is made about Kolattunādu. Both the families of Venṭuṭu and Kolattunādu, from very early times had observed the customary rites of taint, pollution, defilement etc. It is said in ‘Keralamāhātmya’ that Paraśūrama had enthroned the sons of two sisters in both the kingdoms.

But no documents are available to prove that there was any connection between the two families till the 5th century M.E. (Malayālam Era). i.e. 14th century A.D. See under Kollavarśa.

Kolika (Kokila). This is the name of a rat. Kokila is a character in the story known as Biḍālōpākhyāṇa, told by Nārada to Dhiṭārāṣṭra. Once a cat began to perform pincanc holding up both of its hands, on the bank of the Gaṅgā. After a long time birds and rats began to come very close to it believing that it would not hurt them. They made the cat their leader. The wicked cat daily ate a rat secretly. Thus the body of the cat grew stronger day by day and there appeared a steady decrease in the number of the rats. Among them there was a wise rat called Kokila. He understood the deceit played by the cat. So proclaiming independence he and his fellows ran away and saved themselves. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 160).

Kolisarka. A tribe. Formerly this tribe was of Kṣatriya Caste. A Brahmin once cursed them and made them Sudra. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 33, Stanza 22).

Kollagireya. An ancient country in South India. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 83, that Arjuna conquered this country.

Kollavarśa (Malayālam Era). Several opinions have been brought forward about the starting of the Malayālam Era. There is great controversy as to the causes of starting this new era. The opinion of Saṅkūṇi Menon is as follows. The King Udayamārtanda-varmā called together at Quilon, an assembly of the learned men and astronomers of the time, in Kalivarṣa 3926 (A.D. 825) and made astronomical researches and taking into account the movements and positions of the various planets in the solar system, started a new era beginning with the month of Ğiṅiṅam (August-September). This new era commenced on the 15th of August 825 A.D. All the learned men and scholars of the time welcomed this Malayālam era. The neighbouring kingdoms also recognized this new era. Reckoning of dates based on this Malayālam Era is seen in the ‘Madura and Tinnevelly Stone-edicts and copper edicts.’ On the fifth day of Ğiṅiṅam of the first year of M.E., five royal families of Travancore met together and took a decision that the festival days of the temples should be reckoned according to the Malayālam Era. The controversy is not about the starting of the new Era, but the reasons for starting the new era.

Logan says that the Malayālam Era was started in commemoration of the conversion of Ceraṁān Perumāl to Islam and his pilgrimage to Mecca. But there is impropriety in thinking that the Hindu subjects of a King would commemorate the conversion of their King into Islam religion. Some say that the new era was started to commemorate the erection of a Saivist temple. Another argument is that a new era was started in memory of the exhortation of Śrī Saṅkaraçārya to the Brahmins of Quilon, to do away with the irregularities seen in the Hindu religion. The period of Saṅkaraçārya has not yet been decided definitely. The opinion accepted by scholars on this subject is that of K.B. Pathak, according to whom Saṅkaraçārya lived from 787 to 819 A.D. If this is accepted as true, the exhortation made in 825 A.D. should be by somebody else and the Malayālam Era should have been established for some other reasons.

Another opinion is that the new era was established to commemorate the independence given to the two Kolattiri Kings (North and South) by the Perumal. The North Kolattiri family should have begun the new era on the first day of Kanni (the second month) and the South Kolattiri family on the first day of Ciñoa (the first month). (Because in Malabar area, the era commences on the first day of Kanni.) Another opinion that is prevalent is that Kollavarṣa was started to commemorate the erection of the two towns of Quilon (North and South). But even two centuries before A.D. 825 the town of South Quilon had become famous. So it is an objection to this argument. Some are of opinion that a new era was started in commemoration of Śaṅkarāvijaya (the victory of Śaṅkarā) due to the fact that the Brahmins of the north and the south alike accepted the teachings of Śaṅkarācārya. But it is difficult to believe that the northerners and the southerners accepted the teachings of Śaṅkarācārya on a particular date and issued a declaration to that effect and started a new era. Some connect the starting of the New Era with the ‘Tiruvonam’ a grand festival of the Malayāḷe. But it cannot be believed that a national festival was started by a single man. According to Logan it would appear that the grand festival of Tiruvonam was started to commemorate the journey of Perumāl to Mecca. But the conversion episode is more likely to be considered as a blasphemy and the Kings and people of Malayāḷa land are not likely to commemorate it. Prof. Sundaran Pillai has cut all the arguments given above and brought forward a new theory. His inference is that the new era is the transformation of an old era known as Saptaśrjavatsara (year of the seven sages) or Śástrasaṅvatsara (scientific year) which prevailed throughout India and is still in force in Kaśmīra. In A.D. 897 Saptaśrj-

Vatsara was 4972 and it was known as merely 72, and that if all the hundreds are taken away, the remaining figure will be the same as that of the Kollavarṣa. That is, at the expiry of each century the Saptaśrjavatsara begins as one, two and so on. But the Saptaśrjavatsara begins in the month of Metam (9th month) whereas Kollavarṣa begins in Ciñoam. He explains this difference also. His opinion is that the Nambūṭiri Brahmins took some time to reach the country of Malayāḷa from North Indian countries and they had been using their Saptaśrjavatsara up to the time of their arrival in Malayāḷa and after their arrival they adopted some slight modifications in the era according to the requirements of the new settlement, and renewed the Saptaśrjavatsara. Gopala lyer, the great exponent of the Vedānta philosophy, says as follows about Kollavarṣa in his ‘Chronology of Ancient India’: “Kaliyuga and Kollavarṣa commenced in B.C. 1176.” But Kollavarṣa is divided into groups of recurring thousands. This has a close connection with Saptaśrj Vatsara, which also might have commenced in B.C. 1176. The year mentioned above completed 2000 by A.D. 824. The third recurring thousand begins in A.D. 825, under the name Kollavarṣa. Princent, Buchanan and Burnell are the three memorable western scholars who have expressed their opinions about Kollavarṣa. Princent connected Kollavarṣa with Paraśurāma. Buchanan said that the Malayāḷe have a recurring of every millennium. Burnell has stated in his book “South Indian Paleography”, that the theory of recurring Millennium is wrong.

An astronomer who was a contemporary of the King who established the Malayāḷam era has stated in his work called ‘Śaṅkarānārayaṇya’ (a manuscript in Palm leaves) that an astronomical movement was reckoned and a new era was started at Quilon. This palm leaf manuscript is kept in the Manuscripts Library at Trivandrum.

KOṆKĀṆA. An ancient country of South India. (Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

KOPAVEGA. A hermit. This hermit had served Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16).

KOṢĀ. A river. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 27, that the water of this river was used for drinking by the ancient people of Bhrārata.

KOṢAKĀṆA. See under Niśākara II.

KOṢALĀ I. The King and the people of the country of Kosala are called by the name Kosala.

KOṢALĀ II. One of the wrestlers of Karṇa. The famous wrestlers of Karṇa were Cāṇūra, Muśīka, Kūṭa, Śala, Kosala and others.

KOṢALĀ.

1) General information. A wealthy and prosperous country on the banks of the river Sarayū. Ayodhyā was the Capital of this kingdom. This city was built by Manu, the father of Ikṣvāku. This city was twelve yojanas long with a breadth of three yojanas. It is understood from Vālmīki Rāmāyana, Bālākāṇḍa, Sarga 5 that during the time of Daśaratha this city was modified to such an extent as to be on a par with any modern city.

2) Other details. (1) Bhīmasena once conquered Uttara Kosala (north Kosala). (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30).

(2) Sahadeva during his regional conquest, subdued Dakṣiṇa Kosala (South Kosala). (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 12).

(3) Śri Kṛṣṇa once conquered the country of Kosala. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 15).

(4) Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna, killed the King of Kosala in the battle of Bhrārata.

(5) Karṇa once conquered this country for Duryodhana. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 19).

(6) During the time of the battle of Bhrārata a King named Kṣemadarśi ruled over Kosala. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 82, Stanza 6).

(7) At the time of the Svayaṁvara (marriage) of Ambā, Bhīṣma defeated the King of Kosala. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 38).

(8) Arjuna who led the horse for sacrifice conquered the country of Kosala. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 83).

(9) Those who bathe in the holy bath of Rṣabha tirtha in Kosala, will obtain the fruits of giving one thousand cows as alms. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Stanza 10).

KOŚALĀ (S). The Kṣatriyas of the country of Kosala. These Kṣātriyas once fell to the southern countries KOŚŤHAVĀN. A mountain. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 43 that this mountain was the overlord of many other mountains.

KOṬARĀ. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 14).

KOṬARAKĀ. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 12).

KOṬIKĀŚYA (KOṬIKA). A King who was the follower of Jyādrat a. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Kāṃkṣa forest once they went out leaving Pāṇḍalī alone in the hut. At that time Jayadratha the King of Sindhu, the son of Vṛddhakṣatra came there and saw Pāṇḍalī. He sent his follower Koṭikāśya to entice Pāṇḍalī, who did not succumb to temptation. At last Jayadratha carried Pāṇḍalī away by force.

This Koṭikāśya was the son of Śuśratha and was the King of Trigarta. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 265).

KOṬILĪNGA. This word was added to the names of the members of the Koṭuṅnālur royal family. Especially, Kuṇjikृṣṭan Tampuran is denoted by the name 'Kotilingesvar.' in some of his poetic works. The word 'Kotilīnga' is the Sanskrit form of the Dravidian word Koṭuṅnālur. This city was the capital of the Cera Kings.

KOṬIṢĀ. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Stanza 5).

KOṬIṬIRTHA. A holy bath. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, that those who bathe in this holy bath will get the fruits of performing the horse sacrifice.

KOṬTÜVĀ. (Yawning, Gapc). In Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 6, there is a story explaining how the living beings began to yawn. After getting boons from Brahmā, Vṛtṛāṣura swallowed Indra. The Devas were filled with fear and approaching Brahaspati they represented their grievance. According to the instruction of Brahaspati the Devas caused Vṛtṛāṣura to gape. After opening the mouth he found it difficult to shut, and the mouth remained open. In the meanwhile Indra jumped out of Vṛtra through the mouth. Gape came into existence from that time. (For details see under the word Vṛtra).

KRAMAJIT. A Kṣatriya King who was a constant follower of Dharmaputra. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 28).

KRAMAPA. A son born to Pulaha by his wife Kṣamā. Kramapa had a brother named Sahiṣṇu. (Agni Purāṇa Chapter 20).

KRAMAPĀṬHA. A method of teaching the Vedas. It is due to the insistence on strict adherence to this method of teaching that even after thousands of years variations have not crept into the original texts of the Vedas which form the earliest literature. There is a portion called 'word study' (Pada Pāṭha) in the Vedas (the scripture). Every word in the Veda is separated from its prefixes and suffixes. The second step is Krama-pāṭha or the study of joining prefixes and suffixes to each word got by the first step. Next step is Jaṭāpaṭha in which words are combined with their prefixes and suffixes. To guard against the creeping in of mistakes in this step, the next step which is known as Ghaṇapaṭha is taught. In this step the first step of Padapāṭha and the second step of Krama pāṭha are mixed together and intermingled from beginning to end and end to beginning. There are rules to make combined words by using prefixes and suffixes. These rules are called Prātiṣṭhakhya. Because the Vedas are taught in this way with so much attention and care, their texts have never been subjected to changes and variations.

KRATU I. A Kṣatriya King. He was the rebirth of an Asura called Krodhāvāsa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 61). See under Jyāmāgha.

KRATU II. A King defeated by Bhīmasena during his regional conquest. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Stanza 7).

KRATU III. A hermit. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga-Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 27 it is stated that this hermit visited Śrī Kṛṣṇa on his way to Hastinapura.

KRATU IV. There was a warrior named Kratha on the side of the Kauravas. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 120, Stanza 10).

KRATU V. A warrior of Skandadeva. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 70).

KRATU VI. A Yakṣa. (Demi-God). When Garuḍa reached the world of Devas he had to fight with this Yakṣa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 32, Stanza 18).

KRATU VII. An Asura (demon). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67 Stanza 57 that this Asura was born as King Śūryākṣa on the earth in his re-birth.

KRATU VIII. Name of a son of Dhiṛtarāṣṭra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 116, Stanza 11).

KRATU I. A famous King in Ancient India. The following details about this King are found found in the Mahābhārata. (1) He was the rebirth of an Asura called Rāhu, the son of Simhikā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 40).

(2) Kratha attended the Svayarīvara (marriage) of Draupadi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 186, Stanza 15).

(3) Śrī Kṛṣṇa defeated Kratha at the city of Jārūthi. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 50).

(4) In the battle of Bhārata this King attacked Abhimanyu. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 26).

(5) In the battle of Bhārata Kratha killed the prince of Kaliṅga, and a King from the mountain killed Kratha. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 15).

KRATU II. A King of the Puru dynasty. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 94, Stanza 58).

KRATU III. A captain of the army of monkeys. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 203, Stanza 19).

KRATU IV. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 70).

KRATU V. A famous serpent. At the time of the death of Balabhadra this serpent came there to lead his soul to Pātāla (nether world). (M.B. Mauṣala Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 16).

KRATU (M). An ancient country in India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21 that Bhīṣmaka the King of Vidarbha had conquered this country.

KRATU.

1) General information. One of the six mental sons of Brahmā. Marici, Aṅgiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu were the mental sons of Brahmā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65). Kratu is described as one of the 21 Prajāpatīs (lords of emanation).
KRAUNCHA I

2) Some details. (1) It is stated in Mahâbhârata, Âdi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 9, that the hermits called Bâlakhylas were the sons of Krânu. (2) Krânu was present at the birth-celebration of Arjuna. (M.B. Âdi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 32). (3) Krânu came to save the Râksha from the Râkhâsa sattrâ, (A great sacrificial fire meant for the Râksha (giants) to jump into and die by themselves) performed by the hermit Pârisâra. (M.B. Âdi Parva, Chapter 189, Stanza 9). (4) Krânu was a luminary in the councils of Brahma and Indra. (M.B. Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 17). (5) Krânu was present at the Birth celebration of Skandadeva. (M.B. Sâlya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 10). (6) There is a group of hermits called Citârikâhâpinda, of which Krânu is a member. (M.B. Sânti Parva, Chapter 335, Stanza 27). (7) By the blessings of Siva, Krânu got a thousand sons. (M.B. Anuâsana Parva, Chapter 14, Stanza 87). (8) Krânu went to visit Bhûma who was lying on the bed of arrows awaiting death in the beginning of Uttara-yanâ of the year. (M.B. Anuâsana Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 4).

KRAUNCHA I. An Asura. In Vâmana Purâna, Chapter 57 it is mentioned that this Asura was killed by Subrahmanya.

KRAUNCHA II. A mountain. There is a story about this mountain. Long ago there lived an Asura named Kraunca. He was leading a wicked life and was haughty and arrogant. Once Agastya went to Kailâsa and worshipped Siva. Kâveridevi also was standing close by, worshipping Siva. God Siva appeared before Agastya and told him that he might ask for any boon. He requested for the power to push down Vindhyâ with kicking and to establish a holy Thirtha (bath) on the earth. Siva granted the boons. For making the thirtha Siva turned Kâveri into a river and placed her in the water-pot of Agastya. As Agastya was returning from Kailâsa with Kâveri in his water-pot, Kraunca the Asura took the shape of a mountain and hindered his way. The Asura caused a heavy rain too. Agastya wandered through the forest without finding the path for days. At last he realized the cause. He took a few drops of water from his waterpot and with chanting of Mantras and meditation threw the drops at the Asura with the curse that he would stand there for ever as a mountain. He said that he would be liberated from the curse when pierced by the arrow of Subrahmanya, the son of Siva. From that day onwards Kraunca the Asura had been standing there as a mountain. That mountain was called ‘The mountain of Kraunca.’ (Skanda Purâna, Asura Kânta).

There is another statement in Harivâna, Chapter 18, that the mountain Kraunca was the son of the mountain Mainâka, the son of Menâ. Subrahmanya fought a terrible battle with the Asuras. Many died. Bânuasura, the son of Mahâbali, fled from the battlefield and hid himself inside the mountain Kraunca. Subrahmanya clef the mountain into two with the arrow given by Agni (Fire-god). Thus Kraunca was liberated from the curse. (M.B. Sâlya Parva, Chapter 46).

In ‘Mehadûta’ Kâlidâsa mentions about the cleavage in the mountain Kraunca. In Mahâbhârata, Vana Parva, Chapter 225, Stanza 33, mention is made that through this cleavage swans and vultures fly to Mahâmeru. (For the story of how Paraśûrama clef the Kraunca mountain see under Paraśurâma).

KRAUNCHA III. (A kind of snipe). A bird.

KRAUNCHADVIPA. (ISLAND OF KRAUNCHA). One of the Saptadvîpas (seven islands). The seven islands are Jambûdvipa, Plakasdvipa, Sâlmâlîdvipa, Kuśadvipa, Kraunca-dvîpa, Śâkadvipa and Puṣkaradvîpa. (Devi Bhâgavata Skandha 8). Kraunca-dvîpa is described as follows in Mahâbhârata, Bhûma Parva, Chapter 12:—In this island there are the mountains Kraunca, Vâmanaka, Andhakâra, Mañikâka, Govinda, Nabîda, and Viśkambha. The various countries in this island are Kušala, Manonuga, Ușa, Prâvaraka, Andhakâra, Munidesa, Dundubhivasana etc.

KRAUMCANIŚUDANA. A holy place on the banks of river Sarasvatî. It is mentioned in Mahâbhârata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 160 that he who bathes in this place would get a Vîmâna.

KRAUNCHAPADI. A holy place. He who makes oblations of balls of boiled rice in this place will obtain remission of sin of Brahmahatyâ (sin incurred by killing a Brahmín). (M.B. Anuâsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 42).

KRAUNCHARUNAVYÂHA. Another name of Kraunca-vyâha (strategic disposition of an army). Dhṛṣṭadyumna formed the Kraunca-runavyâha. (Mahâbhârata, Bhûma Parva, Chapter 50).

KRAUNCHAVYÂHA. A strategic formation of the army in the shape of Kraunca bird (snipe). In the battle of Bhârata, Bhûma made the formation of Kraunca. (M.B. Bhûma Parva, Chapter 75). The Kraunca disposition has eight strategic positions, the face, eyes, head, neck, stomach, left flank, right flank and thighs. In the disposition formed by Bhûma, Dropa stood at the face, Aâvatthâmâ and Kṛpa stood at the eyes, Hârdikya at the head and Sûrasena at the neck. The King of Prâjyotiṣa stood at the stomach of the formation. The Tuṣārâs, Yavanas, Sakas and Cûpuvas guarded the right flank. Śrâtyus and Bhûrîrâvas kept the thighs.

KRAUNCHI. A daughter born to Kaśyapaprajâpati by his wife Tâmrâ the daughter of Dakṣa. Five daughters, Kraunca, Bhâṣâ, Sîñenî, Dharârâṣtri and Sûki were born of Tâmrâ. From Kraunca, were born the owls, the Bhásas from Bhâṣî, the hawks and vultures from Śîñenî, the swans and ruddy geese from Dharârâṣtri and Nârâ, the mother of Vinatâ from Sûki. (Vâmiki Râmâyana, Sarga 14).

KRAVYÂDA (S). A particular group of the Manes or the deified ancestors that receive the souls of the deceased. Mention is made about the Kravyâdas in Mahâbhârata, Sânti Parva, Chapter 269, Stanza 15.

KRIVÂ. One of the daughters of Dakṣa. Dhamadeva married her and three sons Danâ, Naya and Vinaya were born to him of Krivâ. (Viśu Purâna, Aśâ 1, Chapter 7).

KRASHEYU. (KAKSHEYU). One of the ten sons whom King Raudrâva of the Pûru dynasty begot of the Apsaras called Mîrrakâ. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 10).

KRMI I. A King of the royal dynasty of Âniga. King Šûnâra had five wives named Nggâ, Nârâ, Krmî, Dââ and Drîvadvati, and of them were born respectively the sons Nṛga, Nara, Kṛmi, Suvarata and Śibi. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 227).

KṛMī II. A wife of Uṣīnara. (See under Kṛmī I).

KṛMī III. A Kṣatriya dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Verse 13).

KṛMī IV. A river. (Bhīma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 17).

KṛMĪBHOJANA (M). One of the twentyeight hells. (See Narakas under Kāla I).

KṛMILA. A king born in the Puru dynasty. There was a king in the dynasty called Bābhāyāva, who had five sons called Śṛṅjaya, Bṛhadiṣu, Mukula, Kṛmila and Yāvīnara. In later years they became famous as Pāṇi-cālas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KṛMĪSA. A hell known as Kṛmībhojana also. (See under Kāla I).

KRDHAI. A famous Asura born to Kaśyapa by his wife Kālā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 35).

KRDHAI II. It is stated in Bhāgavata that Krodha was born from the eye-brow of Brahmā. There is a story about this Krodha in the ‘Jaimini-Āsvamedha Ārva’. Once, while the hermit Jamadagni was performing sacrificial offerings to the Manes, Krodha came there and secretly put poison in the pudding prepared from the milk of the sacrificial cow. Even though the hermit knew this he did not get angry. Seeing this, Krodha became afraid of the hermit and approaching him said: “Oh, hermit! I thought that the Bhārgavas (those born of the family of Bhṛgu) would get angry quickly. Now I understand that it is wrong.” Jamadagni pardoned him and said: “But you have to appease the anger of the Manes”. The Manes cursed him that he would have to take birth as a mongoose. But he was given remission that he would be liberated from the curse, when he narrated the story of the Brahmin Uññechavṛtī at the palace of Dharma in the presence of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Thus Krodha regained his former form.

KRDHAHANTĀ. A famous Asura. He was born to Prajāpati Kaśyapa by his wife Kālā. The notoriouś Vṛtrāṣura was the brother of Krodhahantā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65).

KRDHANA. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 6).

KRDHANA. A hermit of great importance in the palace of Indra. (Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 11).

KRDHASATRU. A famous Asura who was born to Prajāpati Kaśyapa of his wife Kālā. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Stanza 35).

KRDHAVARDHANA. An Asura. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 46, it is mentioned that in later ages this Asura was reborn under the name Dandadhara.

KRDHAVASA. A follower of Indrajit. In the battle between Rāvaṇa and Śrī Rāma this Asura made himself invisible and attacked the monkeys. By the help of Vibhiṣaṇa, who was an expert in the art of vanishing, the monkeys killed Krodhavāsa in the battle. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 269).

KRDHAVASA. Wife of Prajāpati Kaśyapa. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kanda, Sarga 14). The Asuras who were born to Krodhavāsa are also called Krodhavasas. Most of these Krodhavasas were employed to guard the lotus-lake of Kubera. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 154). Bhimasena once entered the lotus-lake of Kubera and plucked the “Saugandhika” flower. The Krodhavasas ran to Kubera to inform him of this theft. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 2 that these Krodhavasas were present in the army of Rāvaṇa.

KROSANĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 17).

KROSTā. A son of Yadu, Sāhasrada, Payoda, Kroṣṭā, Nila and Ājikā were the five sons of Yadu. (Harivāmśa, Chapter 38).

KRPA I. A King in ancient India. He never ate flesh. (Aṇuṣṭāna Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 64).

KRPA II. (KRPAČARYA).

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahmā—Atri—Candra—Buddha— Purūravas—Ayus—Nahuṣa—Yayāti—Puru—Janamejaya—Prācinvān—Praśīrā—Namasyu—Vitābhaya—Suṣūṅḍu—Bahuvidha—Saṁyāti—Rahovādī—Raudrīśva—Matiñāra—Sanuṭroda—Duṣyanta—Bharata—Suhoṭa—Gala—Garda—Suketu—Bṛhātkaṭera—Hasti—Ajamidhār—Nila—Śārī—Suṣānti—Puruja—Arka—Bhāvyāvā—Pāṇīcāla—Mudgala. A daughter called Ahāyā was born to Mudgala. Mahārṣi Gauṭama married her. To Gauṭama was born Satānanda, to him Satyadhṛi, to him Saradvān and to Saradvān was born Kṛpācārya. The Purāṇas refer to the generation preceding Gauṭama only in the maternal line. It is said in verse 2, Chapter 130 of the Ādi Parva, that Saradvān was the son of Gauṭama. According to Agnī Purāṇa, Bhāgavata etc. Saradvān, father of Kṛpa was the son of the great-grand son of Gauṭama and grandson of Satānanda. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

2) Birth of Kṛpa. Though born in a family of Sages Saradvān evinced more interest in Dhanurveda. He performed penance in the forest, with bow and arrows deposited by his side. As his penance gathered intensity the Devas got alarmed. To break his penance Indra deputed the Devata called Jānapadī to the earth and she appeared before Saradvān and danced, dressed only in one piece of cloth. Emission occurred to him. But, wisdom dawned on him immediately and leaving behind him the bow, arrows and deer skin he quit the place. The semen discharged by him fell on the arrow which broke into two giving birth to a male child and a female one.

3) Kṛpa in the Palace. One of the attendants of King Santanu, who had come to the forest to hunt, saw the children and took them to the King. The King felt Kṛpa (pity) for them and brought them up in the palace and as they were thus brought up due to his Kṛpa they came to be called Kṛpa and Kṛpī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 130).

4) Kṛpa’s mastery of Dhanurveda. While living in the forest engaged in penance Saradvān, with his divine power understood that the two children forsaken by him were growing up in the palace. He went to the palace and told the king details about the children. He also lived there in secret and taught Kṛpa everything contained in the four branches of Dhanurveda and the various usages in archery. Gradually Kṛpa became an aṣārya (master) in Dhanurveda. Not only the Pāṇḍavas the Kauravas, the Yādavas and the Vṛṣṇis but also kings, who came from various regions of the country learned archery at the feet of Kṛpa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 23).
5) Kṛpa at the trial of skill in archery of the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas. When the training of the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas in archery was over, a test was arranged for them. Spectators crowded to see it. Drona, Kṛpa, Somadatta, Bālhika, Bhīṣma and Vidura and other great ones took their seats in the stadium. Arjuna and Karna entered the arena for contest when Kṛpa intervened and said that Arjuna was the youngest son of Kuntī but Karna should specify his parentage. At this Karna stood stunned, and it was then that Duryodhana declared Karna to be the King of Aṅga. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 136).

6) Activities of Kṛpa upto the great war. (i) He attended the Rājāśyā yajña of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 8).

There he acted as the custodian of money and distributed daksinās (monetary presents). (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 7).

(ii) It was he who instructed the spies deputed by Duryodhana as to how to detect the Pāṇḍavas during their life incognito. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 29). He also detailed to Duryodhana the various aspects of politics.

(iii) Kṛpa once told Duryodhana that he was powerful enough to annihilate the Pāṇḍava army within two months. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 193).

7) Kṛpa in the war. (i) On the first day of the war he fought with Bṛhatśeṣṭra. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45).

(ii) In the fight with Cekitāna he fell down and fainted. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 31).

(iii) He wounded Sātyaki. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 40).

(iv) Fought a duel with Sahadeva. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 110, Verse 12).

(v) He fought with Arjuna and Bhīma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 113, Verse 114).

(vi) Fought with Dhṛṣṭaketu. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 33).

(vii) Fought with Vārdhakṣemi. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 41).

(viii) His flag floated in the air and could be seen from anywhere in the battlefield. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 105).

(ix) He killed the body-guards of Abhiramanyu. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 42, Verse 38).

(x) Fighting with Arjuna he fainted and fell down. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 147 Verse 9).

(xi) During the fight he ridiculed Karna. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 13).

(xii) He advised Aśvatthāmā to prevent Duryodhana from confronting Arjuna. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 77).

(xiii) In the battle that ensued he defeated Śikhaṇḍi. (Droṇa Parva Chapter 169, Verse 39).

(xiv) When Droṇa fell down dead he fled from the battlefield. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 193, Verse 12).

(xv) He was defeated by Sātyaki. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 20 Verse 33).

(xvi) He killed Suketu, son of Citraketu. (Karna Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 28).

(xvii) Defeated Yudhāmanyu. (Karna Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 55).

(xviii) He killed the Kalinda prince. (Karna Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 6).

(xix) He advised Karna to enter into a compromise with the Pāṇḍavas. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 4).

(xx) He ran away from the battlefield to Dvaiḍāyan lake. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 9).

(xxi) Yudhīṣṭhira came to the lake with an army and Kṛpa ran away from there. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 60).

(xxiii) He fought during the night along with Aśvatthāmā. (Saūptika Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 35).

(xxiv) He killed the soldiers who ran away from the Pāṇḍava camp. (Saūptika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 106).

(xxv) He set fire to the camp of the Pāṇḍavas. (Saūptika Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 109).

(xxvi) He cried at the pitiable condition of Duryodhana. (Saūptika Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 10).

(xxvii) He went to Hastināpurā after telling Dhrta-rāṣṭra and Gāndhārī that both the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas would be ruined. (Strī Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 21).

8). End of Kṛpa. The great war ended. Duryodhana and others were killed and, when Dhrta-rāṣṭra left for the forest with Gāndhārī, Kṛpa desired to accompany them. But, Dhrta-rāṣṭra did not permit it. Yudhīṣṭhira, as advised by Dhrta-rāṣṭra, put up Kṛpa with him. (Āśramavāsīka Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 5). Before the Pāṇḍavas set out on their great journey Yudhīṣṭhira appointed Kṛpa as the preceptor of Parīkṣit, the son of Arjuna. (Mahāprasthāṇa Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 4).

During his last days Kṛpa went into the forest for penance and there he breathed his last. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 296, Verse 14).

9) Synonyms for Kṛpa. Ācārya, Ācāryasattama, Bhāratacārya, Brahmarshi, Sāradvata, Sāradvataputra, Gautama, Kṛpa.

KṚSĀNU. The sage who stood guard over Soma at the Yajña conducted by sage Kutsa. (Rgveda, Manḍala 1, Anuvāka 16, Sūkta 112).

KṚSĀSAVA I. The Prajāpati called Kṛśāva married Jayā and Suprabhā the daughters of Daksaprājapati and to both were born fifty sons each. All the sons were really arrows called Samhāra. Viśvāmitra, by the power of penance made these hundred sons (arrows) of Kṛśāva his own. It was these arrows, which Viśvāmitra gave to Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākanda, Cantos 21 and 26).

KṚSĀSAVA II. A king of the solar dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skanda).

KṚSĀSAVA III. A King who served Yama in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 17).

KṚŚṬIVALA. An ancient sage who lived in Indra’s court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 13).

KṚŚNA (ŚRI KṚŚNA). Born in the Yadava dynasty as the son of Vasudeva and Devaki, Śrī Kṛṣṇa was the ninth of the ten incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu.

Ten sons called Vasudeva, Devabhāga, Devārāvasa, Anaka, Śrījaya, Kākānika, Śyāmaka, Vasa, Kāvaka and Vasu were born to King Śrūvāsa by his wife Māriṣā. Of those ten sons Vasudeva married Devākī, the sister of Kārtvīrya. He had also a second wife called Rohiṇī and she was the mother of Balabhadrārāma.

2) Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s former births. Owing to a curse of Varuṇa, Kaśyapaprājapati was born on earth as Vasudeva and his (Kaśyapa) wives Aditi and Surāsā were born as Devaki and Rohiṇī. (See under Kaśyapa and Aditi). Like this Śrī Kṛṣṇa also had previous births. Once upon a time from the heart of Brahmatā is born the Prajāpati called Dharma, who was very truthful and wedded to righteous living according to the injunctions of the Vedas. He wedded the ten daughters of Daksaprājapati, and four sons called Hari, Kṛṣṇa, Nara and Nārāyaṇa were born to him. Hari and Kṛṣṇa turned out to be great Yognis, and Nara and Nārāyaṇa ascetics. Naranārāyaṇas performed penance to please Brahmatā for a thousand years at Badarikāṣrama in the valley of the Himālayas. Celestial women, whom Indra had deputed to break their penance, approached them and requested them to take them (celestial women) as their wives. Ascetic Nārāyaṇa who got angry at the celestial women’s request was about to curse them when sage Nara intervened and pacified him. Then sage Nārāyaṇa told them thus:—“You must protect my Vṛtta (penance) in this life. In that case, in the next birth I shall satisfy your desire. In the 28th Dvāpara-yuga I will be incarnating on earth on behalf of the Devas. Then you also may be born as princesses. I shall incarnate as Kṛṣṇa in the Yadu dynasty and marry all of you.” (Bhāgavata, 4th Skanda).

Accordingly sage Nārāyaṇa was born as Śrī Kṛṣṇa in the Yadu dynasty, and sage Nara was born as Arjuna to be his companion.

The curse of Bṛghu the great sage also contributed to Mahāviṣṇu’s incarnating himself as Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Once in a war which lasted for 100 years between the Devas and the Asuras most of the latter were killed. Then Śrūvāna, preceptor of the Asuras went to Mount Kailāsa to secure exceptional weapons, and the Asuras took refuge under Kāvya-mātā, the mother of Śrūvāna. Devendra sought Mahāviṣṇu’s aid, and he cut off Kāvya-mātā’s head with his Cakra (discus). Bṛghu was enraged at this killing of a woman. He cursed that Mahāviṣṇu should be born as man. Owing to various reasons like the above Mahāvīṣṇu happened to be born as man in the Yādava dynasty, as the son of Vasudeva. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skanda).

3) Vasudeva’s wedding. To Śrūvāsa, the Yādava King of Mathurāpuri was born a son called Vasudeva, and Devākī was born as the grand-daughter of Devāka, the brother of Ugrasena, another Yādava King. Devākī was the sister of Kāraṇa. Devākī was given in marriage to Vasudeva with a dowry of twelve bhāras (a particular weight) of gold and a chariot. Kāraṇa acted as charioteer in the wedding procession during which a celestial voice addressed Kāna as follows:—“Asyaḥ tvām aṣṭamagarbha hantā.” (Her eighth son will kill you). As soon as he heard the celestial voice Kāna stood up in the chariot ablaze with rage. He caught hold of Devākī by her hair and raised his sword to cut her throat. All the conciliatory words of Vasudeva failed to pacify Kāna. Then Vasudeva promised to hand over to Kāna all the children born to Devākī immediately after their birth. Accordingly Kāna left them alone.

4) First-born son of Vasudeva. The first-born child of Vasudeva was duly handed over to Kāna. But, he returned the child to its parents as, according to the celestial voice the first-born child was not to be his enemy. Vasudeva and Devākī brought it up under the name Kṛtirnā. On one of those days Nārada visited Kāna and told him about his previous life, the object of Kṛṣṇa’s incarnation etc. Then it was that Kāna realised how fatal to him was the existence of Vasudeva and Devākī, and he hurried up to them and killed the child by dashing its head against a rock. He also kept them chained in prison.

5) Kāna’s excitement. The information imparted by Nārada upset Kāna much. He shut his father Ugrasena in prison and himself became King. He deputed Asuras like Pralambha, Cāṇūra, Trāṇavarta, Mūṣṭika, Aṛiṣṭa, Kesi, Dhenuka, Agha, Vividha and Pātanā to harass the Yādavas, the Andhakas and the Vṛṣṇis. After the death of Kṛtirnā, Devākī, in the prison, delivered five sons. (See under Kāna. Para 2 for the previous history of the first six sons of Devākī). Kāna killed all the five children as soon as they were born.
6) Birth of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The Asuras killed in the old Devāśura war were later born as cruel and evil Kings on earth. The burden of such Kings having become too much for her, goddess Earth, in the guise of a cow complained about it to Brahmā who took her to Śiva who too could not find a solution to the problem posed by Bhūmidevi. So, all of them accompanied by the Devas approached Mahāviṣṇu and prayed for the redress of their grievance. Mahāviṣṇu sent them back comforted by the assurance that he would be born as the son of Vasudeva and Devaki to solve the problem. He also arranged the Devas to be born as Gopas and the Apsaras women as Gopikās on earth for his assistance.

Devaki conceived for the 7th time, and it was an aspect of Ananta. Mahāviṣṇu instructed Māyādevi thus: “You go to the earth and transfer the child in Devaki’s womb to that of Rohiṇī, the second wife of Vasudeva and after that, at the very time of my birth you should be born as daughter of Yaśodā, wife of Nandagopa. You would be worshipped by the world in various names like Ambikā, Nārāyaṇī, Candra, Durgā, Bhadrakāli etc. The child transferred by you to the womb of Rohiṇī will become known as Saṅkarṣaṇa, Balabhadrada and Rāma.

Accordingly Māyādevi transferred the child in Devaki’s womb to that of Rohiṇī, and it was given out that the seventh child of Devaki was aborted in the womb. Devaki conceived for the eighth time, and on Aṣṭamī day in the month of Sīthā (Leo, August-September) when the Brāhma stars were collected on the same day was Śrī Kṛṣṇa born. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated himself as Kṛṣṇa with the conch, the discus, the club and the lotus flower in his four hands. Vasudeva saluted the marvellous child, and the chain that bound himself and Devaki broke asunder, and the newborn child spoke thus to Vasudeva:—“In Svāyambhuva Manvantara the Prajāpāti called Sutapas with his wife Prśīni meditated upon me for 12,000 years, and when I appeared to them and asked them to choose any boon they prayed for my being born as their son. In the next life Sutapas was born as Kaśyapa and Prśīni as Aditi, and I incarnated in the form of Vāmana (Dwarf) as their son. Afterwards Kaśyapa and Aditi took various births, and I too took various births as their son. Now also, Kaśyapa and Aditi, are born as Vasudeva and Devaki. Just at this time a daughter has been born to Nandagopa and Yaśodā at Gokula. You shall make me over there and replace me with the child born at Gokula.” After having told Vasudeva the above facts, Kṛṣṇa assumed the form of an ordinary child and lay by the side of its mother. At mid-night when the guards at the prison house were deep in sleep, the doors of the prison opened by themselves. Vasudeva with the child Kṛṣṇa, started for Gokula and on his way the river Yaminī changed its course for him to proceed. The doors of Yaśodā’s house were open. Owing to the divine prowess of Māyādevi, the child of Yaśodā, everybody in the house went into deep sleep. Vasudeva placed Kṛṣṇa by the side of Yaśodā and returned home with her child. As soon as he had thus returned the prison-guards woke up and reported to Kaṁsa about the delivery of a child by Devaki. Kaṁsa rushed to the house, caught hold of the child and was about to dash it against the rock when lo! the child slipped free of his hands and rose in the sky wherefrom it spoke as follows:—

Oh! unrighteous and cruel Kaṁsa! thy prowess is not to be exhibited against women. Thy killer is born on earth, and search for him everywhere. (Śiva Purāṇa, Chapter 1).

7) Colour of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrarāma. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was dark in colour and Balabhadrada white. There is a story in the Mahābhārata to explain this difference in their colour. The Devas informed Mahāviṣṇu of their decision to incarnate themselves on earth for the annihilation of the evil and cruel people. Pleased at their decision Viṣṇu plucked from his head a black hair and also a white hair and threw them on the ground, and he said that the black hair would enter Devaki and be born as Kṛṣṇa while the white one would enter Rohiṇī and be born as Balabhadrada. Accordingly Kṛṣṇa became of the colour of the cloud (black) and Balabhadrada white in colour. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 199, Verse 31).

8) The incidents during the childhood of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

(1) Pūtanaṁkṣa (Salvation to Pūtana). Pūtana, a Rākṣasa and one of the assassins deputed by Kaṁsa to search out and kill Kṛṣṇa, went to Kṛṣṇa’s house disguised as a Gopa woman and fed him on her breasts. But the child extracted her life also with her breast-milk, and she assumed her original form and fell down dead.

(2) Śaṅkāśura killed. Kaṁsa next deputed the Asura called Śaṅkāśura to kill Kṛṣṇa. He approached the sleeping Kṛṣṇa in the form of a cart and raised great sound. Kṛṣṇa jumped awake and kicked the cart into hundred pieces. (See under Śaṅkāśura).

(3) Killed Trṇāvantāstūra. Trṇāvantara, son of Tārakāsura, at the behest of Kaṁsa went to Ambādi in an invisible (formless) manner. Yaśodā was then breast-feeding child Kṛṣṇa, and the child appeared to gradually increase in weight. Yaśodā tried to lay the child on the bed, but had to lay him on the ground as it was too heavy for her to lift up to the bed. At once, Trṇāvantara, in the form of a whirl-wind, rose up to the sky carrying Kṛṣṇa along with him. Ambādi (Gokula) was chokingly filled with clouds of dust; the Gopālas cried out. But, Śrī Kṛṣṇa clasped round the Asura’s neck and rested, and on account of the child’s weight he could not rise any more. The child hardened its hands around the Asura’s throat and he got killed and fell down with a thud on a rock. Yaśodā hurriedly took the child in her hands and covered it with kisses. (See under Trṇāvantara).

(4) Naming. During this period the famous sage Garga visited Kṛṣṇa at Ambādi, and he informed Vasudeva and Devaki of the actual facts relating to Kṛṣṇa. The son of Rohiṇī was brought there, and the sage named him Rāma, and Yaśodā’s child Kṛṣṇa, and blessed them. Thenceforth Rāma and Kṛṣṇa grew up in Ambādi as the apple of the people’s eyes. (See under Garga).

(5) All the worlds in Kṛṣṇa’s mouth. The Gopālas once saw Kṛṣṇa eating mud and informed Yaśodā of it, and she, in great anger, opened the child’s mouth to look for the sand when she saw there all the worlds including herself and she closed her eyes in great alarm. (Bhāgavata 10th Skandha).
(6) Kṛṣṇa drags Ulākhalā. (Mortar). Yaśodā was once breast-feeding Kṛṣṇa when she noticed milk flowing out of the boiling pan, and she put the child on the floor and went to attend to the boiling milk. Angry at this Kṛṣṇa broke the milk-pot by throwing a stone at it. Yaśodā then tried to bind the child to the mortar with a cord. But, any number of cords could not reach round the child’s waist. At this trouble of his mother Kṛṣṇa decided to oblige her and then the first cord itself sufficed to bind him round the mortar. But, Kṛṣṇa then began running, dragging the mortar behind him. Dragging the Ulākhalā behind him he passed through a narrow gap between two trees. The trees were shaken and at once the trees rose up in the sky as two Devas. The two trees were actually Nalakūbara and Maṇiṅgīrīva, the sons of Vaiśravaṇa, both of whom had been cursed into the form of trees by NĀrāda. (See under Nalakūbara).

(7) Vatsāsura killed. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārāma were one day, engaged in sports along with the Gopālās on the banks of river Kālindī. At that time an Asura sent by Kariṣṇa got into the ranks of the cows disguised as a cow. Śrī Kṛṣṇa understood it; Balabhadrā also pointed out the new ‘cow’ to him. Then Kṛṣṇa leisurely went towards the herd of cattle, lifted the new ‘cow’ by its legs and tail and dashed it against a peepal tree. The peepal tree and the one next to it were broken, and thus ended the life of Vatsāsura.

(8) Baka killed. On another occasion Karṣṇa deputed Bakāṣura, brother of Pūṭanā to kill Kṛṣṇa. He assumed the form of a bird, and lay there on the road with his fierce mouth wide open. The Gopālās were terror-stricken. But, Kṛṣṇa entered the cave-like mouth of the bird leaving his companions behind. The Asura closed his mouth, and the Gopālās cried out in fear and agony. But, Śrī Kṛṣṇa stirred round and round within Baka’s stomach and he was forced to vomit Kṛṣṇa out. Along with Kṛṣṇa he vomited blood and died. (See under Baka).

(9) Killed Aghāṣura. Aghāṣura, brother of Baka and Pūṭanā, deputed by Karṣṇa to kill Kṛṣṇa assumed the form of a serpent and with its mouth opened like a cave lay on the road used by the Gopālās. The stench that emanated from its mouth vitiated the atmosphere. The Gopālās including Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrā entered the serpent’s mouth, and immediately its entire body shook and it vomited blood. Life escaped through its broken stomach. The Gopālās came out of it and fell down unconscious. But, at the very sight of Kṛṣṇa they regained consciousness. (See under Aghāṣa).

(10) Brahmā placed in ridiculous situation. On another occasion Brahmā saw Mahāviṣṇu, in the assumed form of man, playing on the banks of the Kālindī along with Balabhadrā and his companions. To test whether God possessed powers in the assumed form of man also Brahmā carried away the cattle of the Gopālās. The Gopālās were naturally upset at the disappearance of their cows. After consoling them Kṛṣṇa searched for the cattle on the heights of mount Govardhana and in the forest. But, the cattle were to be found nowhere, and when Kṛṣṇa returned to the banks of the Kālindī the Gopālās too had disappeared. Divining the reason for the whole affair by his divine powers, Kṛṣṇa created both the Gopālās and the cows with his divine powers.

One year passed by thus, and one day Kṛṣṇa and his companions with their cattle went to the top of Govardhana. Brahmā was alarmed to find Kṛṣṇa with the artificially created Gopālās and the cattle, and while he was looking at them the colour of all of them began changing and within minutes they put on the form of Viṣṇu. Moreover, he saw another Brahmā and Brahmaloka. Upset and alarmed by the whole phenomenon he sang the praises of Mahāviṣṇu at which his illusion was lifted and he saw the actual Kṛṣṇa, the Gopālās and the cattle.

(11) Dhenukāsura killed. There lived in the Kadalf forest on the banks of the Kālindī an Asura called Dhenuka with his followers. The forest was thick with palm trees. Out of fear of the Asura nobody dared to travel in the forest. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrā having heard the story about Dhenuka one day went to the forest with their companions. Balabhadrā shook down a lot of the palm fruits; the Gopālās loudly cheered him. The Asura rushed forth challenging them when Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrā thrashed him to death.

(12) Suppressed Kāliya. There lived in Kālindī a fierce serpent called Kāliya with his wife and relations. The trees on the banks of the river were withered and had dried up on account of the poisonous breath emitted by the serpent. One day the Gopālās and their cattle drank water in the Kālindī and fell down dead. Then Kṛṣṇa climbed a tree on the banks of the river and jumped into its waters and Kāliya rushed forward to him with his hoods spread out. Kṛṣṇa stepped on the hoods and danced thereon. Kāliya vomited blood, got exhausted and prayed to Kṛṣṇa for mercy. At the instance of Kṛṣṇa the serpent with its family emigrated to the Rāmaṇaka island. (See under Kāliya).

(13) Kṛṣṇa swallows fire. When Kṛṣṇa came out of the waters after having suppressed Kāliya and taking with him the gem presented by Kāliya, the Gopālās covered Kṛṣṇa with embraces. People of Ambāḍi came to the banks of the Kālindī looking out for the children. As the sun had set by now the Yādavas spent the night there, when a wild fire enveloped them, and they cried out to Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa swallowed the entire fire. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(14) Killed Pralamba. While the Gopālās were playing once under the shade of a giant peepal tree called Bhaṅḍiraka an Asura known as Pralamba joined their games disguised as a Gopāla. Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrā understood the trick. They made all the others take the following pledge, i.e. that all of them would beat one another, and the vanquished should carry about the victor on his head. The beating began, and the Gopāla called Śrīdāman defeated Kṛṣṇa. Vṛṣabha defeated Bhadrāsena and Balabhadrā defeated Pralamba. According to the pledge Śrī Kṛṣṇa carried on his shoulders Śrīdāman, Bhadrāsena carried Vṛṣabha and Pralamba carried Balabhadrā. But, Pralamba rose up to the skies with Balabhadrā, who broke the former’s head, and Pralamba fell down dead in his actual form as an Asura.

(15) Again in wild fire. The Gopaalās were once again caught in wild fire at the Muṅja forest on the banks of the Kālindī. They cried out in great fear when Kṛṣṇa went to them and asked them to remain standing with eyes closed. They obeyed him, and he swallowed the fire as though it were nectar. The Gopālās were astonished to find themselves safe when they opened their eyes. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(16) Blessed the wives of Brahmins. Kṛṣṇa and his companions one day travelled a long way along the banks of the Kālindī. They felt very hungry and Kṛṣṇa advised them to request for food at brahmin houses. They begged for food the wives of brahmans, and the wives happy at Kṛṣṇa's presence there, came with food. Kṛṣṇa blessed them. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(17) Theft of clothes. Kṛṣṇa once picked up the clothes of the Gopa women who were bathing in the Kālindī and climbed to the top of a tree with the clothes and played on his flute. The Gopa women came out of the river and saluted Kṛṣṇa with folded hands. He then returned the clothes to them. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(18) Mount Govardhana used as Umbrella. Indra is the rain-God. The people of Ambāḍī used to perform yajña every year in favour of Indra for rain-fall. Kṛṣṇa opposed the custom saying that Mount Govardhana was the house-hold deity of the people of Ambāḍī and it was enough for them to worship the mountain. The people of Ambāḍī, therefore, offered the Yajña they had arranged that year for Indra to Govardhana. Angered at this Indra let loose heavy rains on Ambāḍī. Kṛṣṇa up-rooted and held Mount Govardhana like an umbrella lest the people should suffer from the heavy rains, and they took shelter under it. The rain did not stop even after seven days. Yet, due to Kṛṣṇa's kindness the people did not suffer any hardships. Beaten at his own game, Indra sang the praises of Kṛṣṇa. Devasurabhi (cow of the Devas) came and saluted Kṛṣṇa and anointed him, as the Indra of the Gopālas. The Devas addressed him 'Govinda' meaning, he who protects the cattle. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(19) Nandagopa abducted by Varuṇa. Once after having observed Ekaḍaśīvratā Nanda bathed in the river Kālindī. At the instance of Varuṇa a Deva abducted and took him to the abode of Varuṇa. People of Ambāḍī were distressed at the disappearance of Nandagopa. Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra dived into the Kālindī and rose up at Varuṇālaya. Varuṇa told them that he had abducted Nandagopa so that he might see Viṣṇu in person, and requested to be pardoned. Meanwhile the people of Ambāḍī, who came to Kālindī saw all the worlds reflected in it. Kṛṣṇa and Rāma returned to Ambāḍī with the melody of Kṛṣṇa's flute rendered the Gopa women love-lorn. He went to Vṛndāvana with his flute, and all the Gopa women, both married and unmarried followed him. Kṛṣṇa made a futile attempt to send them back to their houses. But, the love-sick Gopa women did not. Suddenly Kṛṣṇa disappeared from among them, and the Gopa women mad with love roamed about Vṛndāvana with Rādhā calling "O Kṛṣṇa! O Kṛṣṇa!" Suddenly Kṛṣṇa appeared before them. He entered the waters of the Kālindī with them and satisfied them. Śrī Kṛṣṇa thus explained Bhaktiyoga to the world. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(20) Rāsakṛṣṇī. At the advent of the spring the melody of Kṛṣṇa's flute rendered the Gopa women love-lorn. He went to Vṛndāvana with his flute, and all the Gopa women, both married and unmarried followed him. Kṛṣṇa made a futile attempt to send them back to their houses. But, the love-sick Gopa women did not. Suddenly Kṛṣṇa disappeared from among them, and the Gopa women mad with love roamed about Vṛndāvana with Rādhā calling "O Kṛṣṇa! O Kṛṣṇa!" Suddenly Kṛṣṇa appeared before them. He entered the waters of the Kālindī with them and satisfied them. Śrī Kṛṣṇa thus explained Bhaktiyoga to the world. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(21) Python swallowed Nandagopa. One day the Gopas performed Mahēṣvara Pūjā (worship) in Devī forest, and they spent the night without going to sleep on the banks of the Kālindī. A python from somewhere began swallowing Nandagopa. Though the Gopas tried their best the snake did not loosen its grip on Nandagopa. Then Kṛṣṇa gave it a kick and the snake transformed itself into a Deva called Sudarśana. He was a Vidyādhara, who had been converted into a python by the curse of sage Aṅgirās. (See under Sudarśana).

(22) Killed Atriśāsura. (Atriśāsura). During this period Atriśāsura, a follower of Kārmukha, came to Ambāḍī disguised as an ox, and people got terror-stricken at the sight of the fierce ox. Kṛṣṇa engaged himself in a duel with the ox (Atriśa) and killed it. (See under Atriśa).

(23) Killed Kesi. Kārmukha then sent an Asura called Keśi to Ambāḍī. He approached Kṛṣṇa in the guise of a horse into whose mouth the latter thrust his hand, which began growing in size with the result that the Asura vomited blood and expired. Kṛṣṇa got the name Keśaśava as he killed Keśi. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(24) Killed Vyomāsura. Vyomāsura, son of Mayāsura was the last of the Asuras deputed by Kārmukha to kill Kṛṣṇa. He joined the company of the Gopas disguised as a goat. Kṛṣṇa dragged him into a cave and killed him there. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

9) Śrī Kṛṣṇa quits Ambāḍī. When all the attempts of Kārmukha to do away with Kṛṣṇa failed he resorted to another trick. Kārmukha invited Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra, feigning great affection, to witness the dhanur yajña (worshipping the bow) being held at Mathurāpurī, the capital of the country. The invitation was sent through Akrūra, a great devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He went to Ambāḍī with a chariot and delivered to Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra Kārmukha's invitation to them for the fourteen days' dhanur yajña. The Gopas and Gopīs shed tears at the prospect of Kṛṣṇa leaving Ambāḍī. But, Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra took leave of them and started for Mathurāpurī in the chariot brought by Akrūra. On their way to Mathurā they bathed in the Kālindī and when they dived in its waters Akrūra saw the Viśvarūpa (Cosmic form of Kṛṣṇa). After the bath they continued their journey when Akrūra informed Kṛṣṇa in secret, about all the evil tactics of Kārmukha and requested him to kill the latter. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

10. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa in Mathurāpurī.

(1) Rajakavādha (the washerman is slain). Rāma and Kṛṣṇa duly reached Mathurāpurī, and in the evening they went out for a stroll in the city to view its beauties when they saw a washerman carrying the washed clothes of Kārmukha. They asked him for some of the clothes but the washerman not only refused them the clothes but also ridiculed them calling them cattle-breeders. Śrī Kṛṣṇa thrashed the washerman on the spot and distributed the clothes among the children who had gathered there, himself wearing a yellow cloth from the stock and giving a blue one to Balabhadra.

(2) Kārttikeyakāra (tailor) given salvation. Next, they saw a tailor who used to stitch shirts, turbans etc. for Kārmukha. He presented costly shirts and turbans to Rāma and Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa gave him salvation and distributed the clothes to the Gopas with him.

(3) Sudāman presents garlands. Then Kṛṣṇa and Rāma entered the house of Sudāman who gave them each a garland. Kṛṣṇa blessed him.

(4) Straightened the hunch-back Trivakrā. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa continued their walk when they saw a female hunch-back coming opposite to them with a beautiful vessel filled with aṅgarāga (fragrant things like sandalwood, musk etc. reduced into a paste to be smeared on the body. She told them that she was the maid-in-attendance of Kaśiṣa; her name was Trivakrā and the aṅgarāga in the vessel was for the use of Kaśī. She felt pure love for Kṛṣṇa and gave him the aṅgarāga along with the vessel. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa smeared their bodies with it. Kṛṣṇa stepped on her feet and with his right hand raised her chin upwards and she was cured of her hunch. Her lovc for Kṛṣṇa knew no bounds and she begged him to spend the night in her house. Kṛṣṇa promised to oblige her on another occasion and continued the walk.

(5) Kṛṣṇa broke the bow. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa continued their walk into the Yajña hall of Kaśī. A big bow was seen there, and Kṛṣṇa broke it with his left hand before the guards could approach him. With the broken pieces of the bow he killed the soldiers sent by Kaśī to take him and Rāma into custody. They again continued their walk. The sun set, and though they lay down to sleep thoughts about the underhand dealings of Kaśī kept them sleepless.

(6) Kṛṣṇa killed the fierce elephant. That night Kṛṣṇa dreamt many an inauspicious dream. The next morning Kaśī set up an arena for pugilistic combats. Yādava chiefs like Nandagopa, many other important persons in Mathurā and Kaśī took their seats on the dais. Famous pugilists like Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Kūṭa, Šāla and Kosaḷa also entered the scene. Kaśī had stationed a fierce elephant called Kuvalayāpīḍa on the way Rāma and Kṛṣṇa had to take to enter the arena for pugilistic competition. The mahout prompted the elephant to catch hold of Kṛṣṇa, and in the fight that ensued with the animal Kṛṣṇa killed it and gave one tusk of it to Rāma. Kṛṣṇa beat the mahout also to death with the tusk. After this they entered the scene.

(7) Kaśī killed. The pugilistic competition started. Cāṇūra fought against Kṛṣṇa and Muṣṭika against Rāma and both Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika were killed. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa killed three other famous pugilists too, who confronted them following the death of Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika. Thereupon the remaining pugilists ran away into the forest. Kaśī, burning with anger, jumped up from his seat roaring, "Annihilate the Gopālas, kill Nandgopa, drown Ugrasena, the friend of our enemies, in the Kālindī" etc. Responding to Kaśī’s war-cry Śrī Kṛṣṇa jumped into the former’s sofa and pushed him down. Kṛṣṇa jumped on to the back of Kaśī and killed him. Balabhadra killed with his iron club the eight brothers of Kaśī who rushed against Kṛṣṇa. After consoling the women, who lamented over the death of Kaśī and others Śrī Kṛṣṇa got their dead bodies duly cremated. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa released Vasudeva and Devaki and Ugrasena immediately from prison. Ugrasena was crowned King of Mathurā.

(8) Farewel to the people of Ambādi. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa saluted Nandgopa and Yaśodā, and entrusted to them their clothes and bows for safe custody. Then saying that they would return after strengthening the Yadu dynasty, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa sent their parents and the other Gopās home. (Bhāgavata, 10th Sandhā.)

(9) Education of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

(10) After bidding adieu to the people of Ambādi, Vasudeva, on the advice of sage Garga sent Rāma and Kṛṣṇa for their studies to the Āśrama of the great sage Sāndipani. During their education at the Āśrama Kṛṣṇa and Kucela became intimate friends. One day, at the instance of the wife of their preceptor, Kṛṣṇa and Kucela went into the forest to gather firewood. In the heavy rain and storm that followed they lost their track and wandered about in the forest. The next day the preceptor brought them back from the forest. Kṛṣṇa learned the sixty-four arts and dhanurveda (science of archery) at the feet of Sāndipani. (Bhārata, Southern Text, Page 802 ; Saṃhitā Parva, Chapter 38).

(11) Gauḍakaṇṭha (Preceptor’s fees). When Rāma and Kṛṣṇa completed their studies they asked the preceptor as to what he wanted by way of tuition fee, and the guru wanted to get back his son, who was, years ago, drowned in Prabhāśa, the sea. Accordingly Rāma and Kṛṣṇa went in their chariot to Varuṇa at the sea coast. Varuṇa told them that it was the Asura called Pańcajana, who lived in the sea in the form of a conch, who had killed their preceptor’s son. Śrī Kṛṣṇa entered the sea and killed the Asura. But the child was not to be seen inside the conch. Blowing this conch, which in later years became famous as Pańcajana, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa went to Yama’s abode, who on being told about the object of their visit returned the child to Rāma and Kṛṣṇa. They presented the child to their preceptor. He blessed them and they returned to Mathurāpurī.

(12) Uplo Kṛṣṇa’s return to Dvārakā. (1) Message through Uddhava. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa who returned to Mathurāpurī after their studies at Sāndipani’s Āśrama thought about the people of Ambādi. It was a long time since they had heard about them, So Kṛṣṇa sent a massage to Ambādi by his minister Uddhava. After duly delivering the message Uddhava stayed at Ambādi four or five months after which he returned to Mathurā with the presents given to Kṛṣṇa by Nandagopa, Yaśodā and the other Gopās.

(2) Visited Trivakrā. Kṛṣṇa had promised to visit the house of Trivakrā at the time he cured her of her hunch, and she had been for long awaiting Kṛṣṇa. But only now he got the opportunity to fulfil his promise. He accepted her hospitality at her house and thus ended her grief.

(3) Interested himself in the Pāṇḍavas. By this time Pāṇḍu had died. The Pāṇḍavas and Kuṇțī, sister of Kṛṣṇa’s father were living at Hastināpura along with the Kauravas. They were victims to all sorts of miseries. Hearing about the sad plight of the Pāṇḍavas Kṛṣṇa deputed Akrūra to Hastināpura to enquire about them. Kuṇțidevi, with tears in her eyes, told Akrūra about the injustice being done against the Pāṇḍavas by the Kauravas and the continuous attempts being made to kill Bhīma. Akrūra visited important persons like Vidura, Dhrtrāṣṭra etc. Akrūra exhorted Dhrtrāṣṭra, who had succeeded Pāṇḍu as King, to mete out equal justice to Kauravas as well as to the Pāṇḍavas. Akrūra returned to Mathurā and gave a report to Kṛṣṇa about his visit to the Pāṇḍavas.

(4) The Jărāśandha war. Asti and Prāpti, wives of Kaśī complained about the killing of their husband by Kṛṣṇa to their father Jărāśandha, King of Magadha. Jărāśandha, aided by such famous Kings as Śālva, Kaliṅga, Cediṛāja, Dantavakra and Śiśuṣāpa besieged Mathurāpurī with a big army. Yādava leaders like Kṛṣṇa, Balabhadra, Uddhava, Akrūra and Kṛṣṭavarma met the enemies in battle in which many kings got killed. Balabhadra met Jaräsandha in duel, but let him off on the request of Kṛṣṇa. But, Jaräsandha, supported by Bṛāśura and others besieged Mathurā again and again. When Balabhadra attempted to kill Jaräsandha, a celestial voice declared that it was not possible for the former to kill Jaräsandha, and the war, therefore, ended for the time being.

(5) Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra meet Paśurāma. The continuous war with Jaräsandha reduced the financial resources of the Yadavas and to replenish their treasury Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra started for mount Gomata and the repository of gems and on their way they saw Paśurāma engaged in penance under a pηetal tree. Paśurāma told them that there was a kingdom at the foot of the Gomata called Karavīra ruled by King Sṛgḍālośudeva and advised them to kill him and collect enough money and gems. Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra did so and reached Pravaraṇagiri with money and gems and so collected. There Garuḍa brought back to Kṛṣṇa his crown which had been, sometime back, stolen away by BāṢātura. Kṛṣṇa and Rāma returned to Mathurāpuri.

Since Sṛgḍālośudeva had been killed by Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, Jarāsandha attacked Mathurāpuri again, for the eighteenth time. Though during all the wars Jarāsandha was defeated, by that time the Yadava power had been weakened much and so Kṛṣṇa ultimately decided to leave Mathurā and found another kingdom somewhere else. Kṛṣṇa had two reasons to come to this decision. Firstly, Jarāsandha was the father-in-law of his uncle Kārīsa. Next, it was Jarāsandha’s object to conquer Mathurāpuri for Kārīsa’s sons. Taking into consideration the above two objects of Jarāsandha, Kṛṣṇa and Rāma voluntarily quitted Mathurā with the Yadavas and went and lived in the city built for them by Vīṣṇa-karmā on an island called Dvārakā in the western sea. (See under Kuśasthāli). (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

13) Kṛṣṇa killed Kālayavana. Kālayavana wanted to conquer Mathurāpuri for which purpose he performed penance and secured from Śiva the boon that none of the Yadavas would be able to kill him. Kṛṣṇa had shifted to Dvārakā, somewhat dejected by the thought that Kālayavana could not be killed because of the protection accorded by Śiva’s boon.

Another thing also happened at this juncture. King Mucukunda, son of Māndhātā had on the request of Indra gone to Devaloka and defeated the Asuras in war. Indra asked him to choose his reward for this service and Mucukunda wanted to be shown a place for him to sleep as he had not slept for a long time. Indra, accordingly showed him a cave on earth and told him that he who disturbed him in sleep would be reduced to ashes by his very look. Mucukunda went to sleep in that cave.

Kālayavana approached Kṛṣṇa to kill him and the latter, pretending to be in fear of Kālayavana, ran before him. Kālayavana followed Kṛṣṇa, who entered the cave where Mucukunda was sleeping and he followed Kṛṣṇa into the cave also. Kālayavana, mistaking Mucukunda for Kṛṣṇa, kicked him violently whereupon he jumped up from sleep and looked at Kālayavana, who was reduced to ashes. Then Kṛṣṇa appeared before Mucukunda who praised the former. On the advice of Kṛṣṇa he performed penance at Badarikāśrama and attained salvation. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

14) Śrī Kṛṣṇa escaped from fire. Balabhadra and Kṛṣṇa started for Dwārakā carrying all the riches of Kālayavana. They met Jarāsandha on their way and took to their heels. Jarāsandha followed them to the heights of Mount Pravaraṇa where they disappeared. Jarāsandha set fire to the four sides of the mountain when Rāma and Kṛṣṇa escaped secretly from the fire to Dvārakā. Jarāsandha returned to Magadha believing that both his antagonists were burned to death. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

(2) Kṛṣṇa-Rukmīṇi. King Bhīṣmaṇa of Vidarbha had five sons the eldest of whom was Rukmīṇi. His sixth child was a daughter and she was named Rukmīṇi. Stories about Kṛṣṇa kindled in Rukmīṇi love for him. Rukmīṇī, who hated Kṛṣṇa, wanted to give his sister in marriage to Siūpāla. Rukmīṇi sent through a Brahmin a message about the affair to Dvārakā. On the day of Rukmīṇi’s Svayānvarī Rāma and Kṛṣṇa also went to Kuṇḍinapuri, capital of Vidarbha, and Kṛṣṇa, in the presence of all Kings, carried Rukmīṇi away in his chariot. The Kings who, under the leadership of Rukmiṇi, attacked Kṛṣṇa were routed. A son called Pradyumna was born to Kṛṣṇa by Rukmīṇi. (See under Pradyumna).

(3) Kṛṣṇa-Jāmbavatī. Prasena, brother of the Yadava King Satrājit, went a hunting wearing on him the gem called Syamantaka presented to the latter by the Sun-god. Jāmbavān saw a lion carrying off the gem after killing Prasena. He killed the lion, recovered the gem from it and gave it to his children to play with. A rumour was spread that it was Kṛṣṇa who had killed and stolen the gem. Kṛṣṇa searched for the gem in the forest and found it out in the cave of Jāmbavān. In the duel that ensued between Jāmbavān and Kṛṣṇa the former was defeated. He recognised Kṛṣṇa to be the Lord, and presented Syamantaka and also his daughter Jāmbavatī to Kṛṣṇa and Jāmbavatī thus became Kṛṣṇa’s wife. (See under Syamantaka).

(4) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Satyaabhāmā. Śrī Kṛṣṇa returned Syamantaka to Satrājit and he, in return, gave his daughter Satyaabhāmā in marriage to Kṛṣṇa. Though Syamantaka was given to Kṛṣṇa by way of dowry he did not accept it. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

(5) Śrī Kṛṣṇa-Kālindī. The happy news that the Pāṇḍavas had escaped from the lac palace and were living at Khaṇḍavaprastha took some time to reach Kṛṣṇa, who had been pained to know that they were burned to death in the palace. As soon as Kṛṣṇa knew that the Pāṇḍavas were safe at Khaṇḍavaprastha he went to them along with Yadava chiefs like Śaṅčali and others. It was then that the fire-god Vahni, requested Arjuna for the Khaṇḍava forest for his food and Arjuna consented to it. It was Kṛṣṇa who drove Arjuna’s chariot in his fight with Indra at the burning of the forest by Agnideva. (See under Khaṇḍavadāhā). Arjuna saved Maya from the Khaṇḍava fire and Maya, in return for the kindness, built a palace for the Pāṇḍavas at Indraprastha. Kṛṣṇa also lived there for a few days. One day while Kṛṣṇa was strolling on the banks of the Kālindī in the company of Arjuna they saw a woman, who told them that her name was Kālindī and that she would marry none but Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa then took her as his wife. (See under Kālindī). After staying at Indraprastha for three or four months Kṛṣṇa returned to Dwārakā with Kālindī. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

2. Kṛṣṇa-Mitrāvindā. The King of Avanti had married Rājādhīdevī, sister of Kṛṣṇa’s father and they had two sons called Vinda and Anuvinda and a daughter Mitrāvindā, who had fixed in her mind Kṛṣṇa as her husband. Kṛṣṇa, who was present at her Svayaṁvāra carried her off on his chariot to Dwārakā.

7. Kṛṣṇa-Satāyī. King Nagnājīt of Kosala, father of Satāyī, had seven oxen like elephants in strength. The King proclaimed that his daughter would be married to the person who would tie down the oxen. Various Kings attempted the task but failed. Ultimately Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa went to Kosala and Kṛṣṇa assumed seven forms and tied down the oxen with cords. The seven oxen at once fell down. Kṛṣṇa took Satāyī for his wife.

8. Kṛṣṇa-Kaikēyī (Bhadrā). Kṛṣṇa married Kaikēyī, the daughter of Śrutākṛtī, sister of Kṛṣṇa’s father.

9. Kṛṣṇa-Lakṣmāṇā. Lakṣmāṇā, daughter of King of Madra chose Kṛṣṇa at her Svayaṁvāra and she became Kṛṣṇa’s wife.

10. Kṛṣṇa-16000 women. Brahmā had given the boon to the 16000 daughters of Narakāsura in their previous birth that Viṣṇu would marry them in their next birth. While even the Devas were suffering on account of Narakāsura, Śrī Kṛṣṇa along with Satyabhāmā mounted Garuḍa, went to Prājyotisa, the kingdom of Narakāsura, defeated him in fight and released his 16000 daughters from captivity. He returned with them to Dwārakā, assumed the guise of 16000 men and married those 16000 girls. He built a palace for each of his 16000 wives. (For details see under Narakāsura).

16. Kṛṣṇa’s 16008 wives. The eight women, i.e. Rukmīni, Jāmbavātī, Satyabhāmā, Kālindī, Mitrāvindā, Satāyī, Kaikēyī (Bhadrā) Lakṣmāṇā and the 16000 daughters of Narakāsura constituted Kṛṣṇa’s harem. (The 16000 daughters of Narakāsura are not mentioned by name in the Purāṇas). (See under Sudattā and Ketumān IV.)

17. Gave Salvation to Ghanṭākārṇas. Ghanṭa and Karna were two demon brothers. Kṛṣṇa met them at Badarikāśrama where he had gone after his marriage with Rukminī, to perform penance to Śiva for a child. Kṛṣṇa offered salvation to the two demon brothers, Ghanṭa and Karna.

19. Killed Murāśura. (See under Mura).

20. Killed Narakāśura. (See under Narakā).

21. Plucked away Pañjāṭā. During the period when Narakāsura was having his own ways on the earth and when he took away by force Indra’s royal umbrella and the ear-rings of Aditi, the Devamātā, Indra sought Kṛṣṇa’s help to suppress the Asura. Kṛṣṇa along with Satyabhāmā, mounted Garuḍa, went and killed the Asura and restored the royal umbrella to Indra and the ear-rings to Aditi. On their way back home Kṛṣṇa, as desired by Satyabhāmā, plucked by its roots the Pañjāṭa from Devāloka at which Indra fought Kṛṣṇa, but got defeated. The Pañjāṭa was brought to Dwārakā and planted in front of Satyabhāmā’s palace. It is stated that Pañjāṭa was thus brought and planted by Kṛṣṇa to alleviate the grief caused to Satyabhāmā by the return by Kṛṣṇa of Syamantaka to Satrājīt. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

22. Kṛṣṇa’s sons and grand-children. Ten sons were born to each of the eight chief wives—from Rukminī to Lakṣmāṇa—of Kṛṣṇa. Names of the chief among those eighty sons are given below.

2. Of Jāmbavatī—Śāmba, Sūmitra.

4. Of Kālindī—Sūtra.

5. Of Mitrāvindā—Vṛkhaṁsa.

6. Of Satāyī—Bhānucandra.

7. Of Bhadrā—Śaṅgrāmacālītta.

8. Of Lakṣmāṇa—Prañghoṣa.

A daughter called Rukmāvati was born to Rukmi, brother of Rukminī. Pradyumna married Rukmāvati and Aniruddha was their son. It was this Aniruddha, who wedded Uṣā, Ārut(da), the daughter of Rukminī was married by the son of Kṛśavan. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

23. Kṛṣṇa tested Rukminī While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was once having a chat with Rukminī he wanted to test her love for him. So he told her that he was penniless and helpless and was hiding from his enemies there at Dwārakā and that he would only be really glad if she married some other powerful King. Kṛṣṇa had not completed his sentences when Rukminī fell down unconscious. Kṛṣṇa then consoled her. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

24. Kṛṣṇa fought with Bāna. See under Bāna.

25. Kṛṣṇa killed Paunḍraka. See under Paunḍraka.

27. Śrīkṛṣṇa blessed Pañcālī at the time of her Svayaṁvāra (See under Pañcālī).

28. Subhadrā given in marriage to Arjuna. Arjuna had to go on a pilgrimage for one year as atonement for having got into the palace where Yudhīshṭhira was spending the days with Pañcālī. It was during this period of his pilgrimage that Arjuna married Subhadrā, who was the younger sister of Kṛṣṇa due to whose cleverness alone Arjuna got her as his wife. (For details see under Subhadrā).

29. Kṛṣṇa got the club called Kaumodakī and he saved Maya. See under Khanda-vadādhā.

30. Kṛṣṇa with the Pāṇḍavas. The rest of Kṛṣṇa’s life was intimately connected with the history of the Pāṇḍavas. Important roles played by Kṛṣṇa during the period up to the great war, are summarised below.

1. He conducted Yajña continuously for many years for the protection of Dharma (righteousness). (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 16). (Permitted Yudhīshthira to perform Rājasūya yajña. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva, M.B.).

3. Along with Bhīma and Arjuna, he went to Mathurā in the guise of a brahmin and killed Jārāsandha. (See under Jārāsandha).

4. He crowned Sahadeva, son of Jārāsandha, as King of Mathurā. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 24, Verse 43).

5. He gave a lot of money as donation at the Rājasūya Yajña of Yudhisṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 15).

(6) He was presented with ear-rings by Bhūmidevi (goddess Earth). (Sabhā Parva, Page 808, Southern text).

(7) He killed Śisupāla. (See under Śisupāla).

(8) He made the clothes of Pāṇcālī unwending when Duryodhana tried to strip her naked in the royal assembly. (See under Pāṇcālī).

(9) He fought Śālva and Saubha. (See under Śālva and Saubha).

(10) He once took Subhadrā and Arjuna to Dvārakā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 22; Verses 47, 48).

(11) He comforted the Pāṇḍavas at the Kāmyaka forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 16).

(12) He ate the bit of a leaf of greens from Pāṇcālī’s vessel and was pleased with her. (See under Pāṇcālī).

(13) Attended the wedding of Abhimanyu at Uppalavanyagara and gave a lot of money to Dharma-putra. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 72, Verse 24).

(14) He sent to the court of King Virāṭa a messenger, who explained to him the corrupt ways of the Kauravas and the righteousness of the Pāṇḍavas. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 1).

31) Tested by Nārada. Nārada wanted to know how Kṛṣṇa managed to satisfy all his 16008 wives. For this purpose he visited their houses and Nārada was wonder-struck to find Kṛṣṇa engaged in conversation with his wives in all the houses he visited. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

32) Kṛṣṇa blessed Kucela. See under Kucela.

33) The story of Sunātana-gopālān. See para 7 (d) under Arjuna.

34) Kṛṣṇa feigned sleep. The Kauravas refused to part with half the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas, who had returned from their exile in the forest. Both the sides began preparations for war. Duryodhana went to Dvārakā to invite Kṛṣṇa to his side, and seeing him at a distance Kṛṣṇa feigned sleep and lay down there. Duryodhana occupied a stool at the head of Kṛṣṇa’s bed. Arjuna, who also came to seek his help, stood with folded hands at Kṛṣṇa’s feet. It was Arjuna whom Kṛṣṇa first saw on waking up. But Duryodhana told him that it was he who had come first. Kṛṣṇa was in a fix, and he had to promise to help both the sides. He promised his entire army to one side and his personal help, himself without any weapons with him, to the other side, and Arjuna was asked to make his choice first as he was younger than Duryodhana. Arjuna chose Kṛṣṇa without arms and Duryodhana with his infantry. Kṛṣṇa agreed to act as Arjuna’s charioteer.

35) As messenger of peace in Kaurava assembly. Dharmaputra requested Kṛṣṇa to find out means to avoid war somehow or other and Kṛṣṇa sent a message to Dhṛtarāṣṭra through Sañjaya but nothing came out of it. Ultimately Kṛṣṇa himself decided to visit the Kauravas for which purpose he went first to Dvārakā in his chariot with Sañjaya. On his way Kṛṣṇa held talks with many a great sage. From Dvārakā he returned to Hastināpura where he visited and consoled Kuntī at Vidura’s house. He had his supper also there. The next day he attended Duryodhana’s court and strongly pleaded for the Pāṇḍavas. But Duryodhana and others ridiculed him and even attempted to take him captive. Śrī Kṛṣṇa at once exhibited his Viśva-rūpā (Cosmic form). The Kauravas were frightened to witness Brahmā on Kṛṣṇa’s forehead, Śiva on his chest, Aditya-Vasu-Rudras in his mouth etc. Śrī Kṛṣṇa granted the blind Dhṛtarāṣṭra divine eyes to see this Viśvarūpā and he sang the praise of Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa returned to the Pāṇḍavas after advising Karna to fight on the Pāṇḍava side in the impending war. (Udyoga Parva).

36) Kṛṣṇa in the great war. The parts Kṛṣṇa played during the Kuru-Pāṇḍava war are briefly given below.

(1) The Kaurava and the Pāṇḍava armies were gathered at Kurukṣetra in full battle array and Arjuna, at the sight of the thousands of relations in the opposite camp, became a prey to a great delusion and sat down. Kṛṣṇa then enticed him to fight by giving him advice, which came later to be known as the great Gītā. The Gītā contains the Śāṅkhya, Yoga, the characteristics of the wise people and the unwise, description about yājñas, greatness of knowledge, characteristics of Śāṅkhyas and nīṣkāmakarma, yogins, jñānayogas etc. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapters 26-42).

(2) At the commencement of the battle, Kṛṣṇa blew aloud his conch Pāñcicajaya. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 15).

(3) Kṛṣṇa rushed forward with his Cakrāyudha to kill Bhīṣma, who then praised Kṛṣṇa. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 65).

(4) He prompted Arjuna to kill Bhīṣma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 33).

(5) He received on his chest the Vaiṣṇavāstra shot by Bhagadatta against Arjuna. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 13).

(6) Consoled Arjuna, who was lamenting over the death of Abhimanyu. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 72).

(7) Consoled Subhadrā, who was sunk in sorrow at the loss of her son. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 77).

(8) Consoled the crying Pāṇcālī and Uttarā. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 78).

(9) Took Arjuna in a dream to Śiva and got Śiva’s blessing for him. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 80).

(10) He looked after the horses in the battle-field. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 100).

(11) Prompted Arjuna to kill Duryodhana. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 102).

(12) Kṛṣṇa created illusory darkness and prompted Arjuna to kill Jayadratha. (See under Jayadratha).

(13) He lifted the darkness after Jayadratha was killed by Arjuna. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 146).

(14) As it was not proper for Arjuna and Karna to be fighting with each other at mid-night he deputed Ghatotkaca to fight Karna. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 173).

(15) He consoled Dharmaputra, who was grieving over the death of Ghatotkaca. (Draupāda Parva, Chapter 153).

(16) He prompted Arjuna to kill Karna. (Karna Parva, Chapter 60).

(17) Withdrew Arjuna from confrontation with Karna on the pretext of attending to Dharmaputra, who had been wounded. (Karna Parva, Chapter 64).

(18) A sudden dispute arose between Dharmaputra and Arjuna, who drew his sword to kill the former. And Kṛṣṇa reconciled them by relating the story of Vyādha and Kauśika. (For the story see under Valākā).
(19) Arjuna got ready to commit suicide: Kṛṣṇa dissuaded him from the attempt. (Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 70).
(20) Kṛṣṇa again prompted Arjuna to kill Karna.
(21) In the fierce battle that ensued between Arjuna and Karna, Kṛṣṇa pressed down the platform of the chariot when the latter shot the nāgāstra (the serpent arrow). The arrow flew off with Arjuna's crown. (Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 90).
(22) Arjuna killed Karna after which Kṛṣṇa prompted Dharmaputra to kill Salva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 7).
(23) Kṛṣṇa prompted Bhīma to kill Duryodhana in an illusory battle. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 58).
(24) As requested by Yudhīṣṭhīra Kṛṣṇa left the battlefield for Hastināpura and returned after consoling Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhārī. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 62).
(25) Kṛṣṇa cursed Aśvatthāmā who released arrows against pregnant women. (See under Aśvatthāmā).
(26) Asked Bhīṣma to instruct Yudhīṣṭhīra on dharma (righteousness). (Sānti Parva, Chapter 51).
(27) He granted the boon to Bhīṣma lying on the bed of arrows that he would not feel hunger and thirst and that his intellect would function powerfully as long as he was discoursing on dharma. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 52).
(28) He related to Arjuna the root meaning of his various names. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 341).
(29) He explained to sages and Bhūmidevi some profound doctrines about God and the world. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167).
(30) He gave permission to Bhīṣma to die. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167).
(31) Consoled Gaṅgādevī who grieved over the death of Bhīṣma. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 168).
(32) He once again revealed the doctrine of the Gītā in the form of discussions between Siddhamahārūṣis and Kaśyapa. (Āsramavāsika Parva, Chapter 16).
(33) After the great war was over he went to Dwārakā with Subhadrā and Śātayakī with the consent of Yudhīṣṭhīra. (Āsramavāsika Parva, Chapter 57, Verses 54-58).
(37) Śrī Kṛṣṇa again at Dwārakā. When Kṛṣṇa returned to Dwārakā, Sage Uttānakī visited him. The sage was told details about the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas by Kṛṣṇa. He detailed to the sage spiritual principles too and showed him Viśvarūpa (Cosmic form). Kṛṣṇa participated in festival held by the Yādavas on the Raivata mountain. Afterwards when he went to Dwārakā he told his father Vasudeva details about the war. He himself performed the obsequies of Abhimanyu. (Āsvamedha Parva).
(38) Killed Hamsādhībhakas. See under Dībhaka.
(39) Kṛṣṇa brought back Parīkṣit to life. Kṛṣṇa again went to Hastināpura. There Utaṭā, wife of Abhimanyu, delivered, but the child was born dead as the arrow of Aśvatthāmā had hit her womb. Kṛṣṇa brought the dead child back to life on the request of Kuntī. It was this child, who became later famous as Parīkṣit. (Āsvamedha Parva, Chapter 66).

40) The evening of Kṛṣṇa's life.
(1) The curse of Gāndhārī. Most of the heroes and distinguished archers like Duryodhana had been killed in the great war, and Gāndhārī overwhelmed with grief and anger at the death of her sons lamented over them loudly. She realised that Kṛṣṇa was the cause of all the destruction and cursed him as follows:
"If I have gained any powers by my loyal and devout service to my husband, O! Kṛṣṇa I curse you on the strength of that power. Since you forsook relations like the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas who quarrelled with each other, you also will have to witness the killing of relations. Thirty-six years from today your relations, ministers and sons will be killed, and you too will be killed by a hunter in the forest. Your women-folk also will cry as we women cry now." (Śrī Parva, Chapter 25).

The curse of Gāndhārī that the Yādava dynasty would be annihilated after thirty-six years was fulfilled. In the thirty-sixth year another curse also befell the dynasty which contributed further to its annihilation.

(2) Curse of the sages. The sages Viśvāmitra, Kaṇva and Nārada came to Dwārakā once. Some Yādavas brought Śāmba dressed as a pregnant woman before the sages and asked them derisively what child, whether male or female, would Śāmba give birth to. Angry at this insult, the sages said that the 'pregnant woman' would deliver an iron rod, which would become instrumental for the destruction of the Yādava dynasty. Kṛṣṇa who was told about the curse said that it was as it was destined to be. Next day Śāmba delivered an iron rod. The Yādavas filed it into powder and threw the powder into the sea. Śrī Kṛṣṇa enforced prohibition of liquor in Dwārakā with the object of avoiding any untoward incidents in Dwārakā. It was declared that those who produced liquor would be hanged to death along with their families. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 1).

(3) Evil omens. Signs of the destruction of the Yādavas began appearing: Agents of Kāla visited house after house. Rats multiplied in numbers everywhere in the land, and they began gnawing the nails and hairs of people enjoying sleep. Sheep howled like jackals. Asses were born from cows and cats from mules. Dogs cohabited with rats. The Cakraśudha (Discus) given to Kṛṣṇa by Agnideva at the time of Kṛṣṇa's death appeared in the sky while the Yādavas were looking on. Thus symptoms of an all-round destruction were witnessed.

(4) Destruction of the Yādavas. Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Balabhadrā, Udhhava and others were about to go on a pilgrimage, and the Yadus, the Vṛṣṇis and the Andhakas began manufacturing and drinking liquor. They also began to quarrel with one another. The powder of the iron rod thrown into the sea was washed ashore and it grew up like arrow-like grass. The Yādavas fought with one another and many were killed. Kṛṣṇa got terribly angry at the death of Śātayaki, Pradyumna and others. He plucked a handful of grass and it transformed itself into an iron rod with which he beat to death those around him. Then all the people plucked up the grass which turned into iron rods. They fought amongst themselves with the iron rods and all of them got killed.

(5) Death of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa. During this period Balabhadrā went and seated himself under a tree in deep meditation. Kṛṣṇa stood near him. Dāruka and Bahubhī also arrived there. Kṛṣṇa depicted Dāruka to Hastināpura to inform Arjuna about the annihilation of the Yādava race. Then Kṛṣṇa went to the palace and consoled the women-folk there. When he told them that Arjuna would come and take care of them, his wives shed tears. Krṣṇa then took leave of Vasudeva and returned to Balabhadra. Krṣṇa saw even at a distance a white serpent coming out of Balabhadra’s mouth and moving away to Pātāla through the sea. The serpent which was the soul of Balabhadra was duly received by the prominent Nāgaś in Pātāla. Krṣṇa roamed about the forest for some time and then lay down on the ground immersed in Yoga with his feet raised up. An Asura called Jara, who saw Krṣṇa’s raised feet from a distance mistook the same for a deer and shot it with his arrows. Krṣṇa expired at once and rose up in the guise of Viśu to Vaikuṇṭha. (Mausala Parva).

(6) Reason for Krṣṇa’s foot being hit by arrow. Durvāsas once went to Dvārakā and enquired who was there to put him up as a guest, Krṣṇa invited him to his “palace and treated him as a very honoured guest. He began creating trouble there by breaking vessels, eating only very sparingly at times but eating all that he saw at other times. Kṛṣṇa and Rukmīṇi put up with the vagaries of the sage quite patiently. One day the sage expressed a desire to taste pudding, and accordingly Kṛṣṇa and Rukmīṇi cooked it and served it to the sage. After tasting some pudding he asked Kṛṣṇa to smear his whole body with the balance of it and Kṛṣṇa did so except the bottom of his feet. The sage asked him why he did not smear the nether surface of his feet with the pudding to which Kṛṣṇa humbly answered that he did not like doing so. Durvāsas smeared Rukmiṇi’s body with what remained of the pudding. He yelled Rukmiṇi to the chariot and rode off swiftly in it. On the way he whipped Rukmiṇi. Krṣṇa ran after the chariot so that he might be of service to the sage. After he had gone some distance the sage jumped out of the chariot and ran through the forest. Ultimately he turned round to Kṛṣṇa and told him as follows:—

“Oh! Kṛṣṇa! I am pleased with your service. Let Rukmiṇi have the first place among your wives. She will not be affected by old age. And, you will never meet with death by being hit at those parts of your body which have been smeared with the pudding.”

When Krṣṇa and Rukmīṇi returned to the palace the vessels which Durvāsas had broken were found to be in a more glittering condition than of old. Their welfare and happiness were also increased. Kṛṣṇa died hit by the arrow of the hunter on the lower surface of his feet as he had not smeared that part of the body with the pudding left over by Durvāsas. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 159), (There is another story to the effect that Jara, the hunter, was Bāli (whom Śrī Rāma had killed) reborn, and he killed Krṣṇa in retaliation for his former death).

(7) After Krṣṇa’s death.

(i) Arjuna came to Dvārakā and cremated Krṣṇa. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 31).

(ii) After his death Krṣṇa, lives in the guise of Nārāyaṇa in the divine sphere. (Svargaśāhana Parva, Chapter 5, Verses 24-26).

(iii) Anointed queens like Rukmīṇi and Jāmbavatī and some other wives of Krṣṇa entered his funeral pyre and ended their lives. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Verses 73 and 74):

(iv) While Arjuna was leading the remaining wives of Krṣṇa away from Dvārakā forest-dwellers attacked them on the way. But the women, to escape from their clutches, ran off and jumped into the river Sarasvatī and died in its waters. Their souls entered heaven (Svargaśāhana Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 25).

(8) Names of Krṣṇa.

(b) Synonyms of Krṣṇa in Amarakośa.

KRŚÑÁVAIPĀYANA. Vyāsa. (See under Vyāsa).

Kṛṣṇakesa. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 61).

Kṛṣṇānanda. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 13th century A.D. He is the author of Saḥādayānandā Kāvya which consists of fifteen cantos. The theme is the story of Nala.

Kṛṣṇānāja. Capital city of Nirṛti, one of the eight Guardians of the quarters. (Devi Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

KṛṣṇānubhautiKA. A great sage. He visited Bhiṣma on his bed of arrows. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 11).

Kṛṣṇaparvata. A mountain in Kuśa island very dear to Viṣṇu. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 4).

Kṛṣṇatreyā. A great sage of ancient India. It is said that this sage grasped the whole of Ayurveda and practised it by the strength of his penance (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 210, Verse 21).

KṛṣṇaVartman. Another name for Agni. Agni was addressed by this word at the serpent yajña by Āśīka. (M.B. Chapter 55, Verse 10).

KṛṣṇaVeni. A sacred river in South India. A bath in the Devakunda in this river (Jātismarahara) will kindle in one remembrance about previous life. (Śāhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 20). Agni is supposed to originate from this hrada. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222, Verse 26).

Kṛta. I. A King of Janaka’s dynasty. He was the son of Vijaya and father of Śunaka. (Bhiṣma Parva, 9th Skandha). Kṛta had seven beautiful daughters who, because of a sense of non-attachment and renunciation, forsook their father’s home for the cremation ground even while they were mere children. They lay down there declaring that they had left their bodies as food for the birds; and birds and wild beasts ate up their beautiful bodies. Because of this life of renunciation, they attained salvation. (Kathāśaritsagāra, Madanamañjukilambaka, Tāraṅga 2).

Kṛta II. A Viśvadeva (Universal Deva). (Anuāśā Karva, Chapter 91, Verse 31).

Kṛtacetas. A great sage of ancient days. (Vana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 22).

Kṛtadhvaja. A King of Janaka’s dynasty. (See under Vānisāvali).

Kṛtadyuti. Queen of King Citraketu. Though the King had many wives he had no children. He pleased Āngiras by means of his austerities and due to the latter’s blessing Kṛtadyuti delivered a son. But, her co-wives poisoned the child to death at which both Citraketu and Kṛtadyuti fell down unconscious. Though Āngiras and Nārada appeared on the scene and tried their best to console the King and the queen they refused to be comforted. Then Āngiras returned to them the soul of the dead child. The soul saluted them and spoke as follows:- “Oh elders, during various births I had been the son of various parents. And, you please point out to me the particular parent as whose son I am to live just now.” Nobody had any answer to this question, and the child went on its own way.

Afterwards Citraketu and Kṛtadyuti went round the earth as great devotees of the Almighty, and during this perambulation Citraketu came to the presence of Śiva on whose thigh Pārvatī was sitting then. Citraketu felt ashamed at the sight and questioned Pārvatī about her whereabouts upon whom she cursed and turned Citraketu into an Asura. The well known Vṛtradra was Citraketu thus reborn. Kṛtadyuti ended her life following the curse upon her husband. (Bhiṣma Parva, 6th Skandha).

Kṛtāgī. See under Dhanāśarman.

Kṛtāgni. A King of the Yadu dynasty. Descended from Yadu thus: Sahasrajit—Sṣatājī—Hṛdaya—Dharma—Kunti—Bhadrasena—Dhanaka—Kṛtāgni. Kṛtāgni was the brother of Kṛtavirya, who was the father of Kārtavīryājuna. Kṛtavirya had three brothers called Kṛtāgni, Kṛtaviryaś and Kṛtavijaya. (Kṛtāyas).

Kṛtasana. A King of Vṛṣṇi, who was a member in Yudhīśhṭhira’s court. He made a present of fourteen thousand horses to Yudhīśhṭhira. (Śāhā Parva).

Kṛtāmāla. The river in which Mahāvīṇa first appeared as fish. (See under Matsyāvātā).

Kṛtaparvā. A King of the Yādav dynasty. (See under Yādava Vasiṣṭha).

Kṛtāsaucam. A holy centre in Kuruksetra. He who bathes here will derive the benefits of conducting a Puṇḍarīka Yajña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 21).

Kṛtāśrama. A great sage, who had distinguished himself in the court of Yudhīśhṭhira. He lived a life of renunciation as a Vānāprastha and attained heaven. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 244, Verse 18).

Kṛtāśva. A great sage of ancient days. He was the son-in-law of Daksaprajāpati. Daksṇa had sixty daughters by his wife Viraṇi, thirteen of whom were wedded to Kaśyapa, ten to Dharma, twenty-seven to Candra, two to Bhṛgu, four to Arīṣanemi, two to Kṛtāśva and two to Aṁgiras. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

Kṛtāuajas. See under Kṛtāgni.

Kṛtavāk. A great sage, who was an admirer of Yudhīśhṭhira. (Vana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 24).

Kṛtavarmā. A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. In the previous generation of Vṛṣṇi also a Kṛtavarmā is noticeable. The genealogy of both is given below.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Vṛṣṇi thus: Brahmapati—Atri—Candra—Budha—Purūravas—Āyuṣ—Nahuṣa—Yāyāti—Yadu—Sahasrajit—Sṣatājī—Hṛdaya—Dharma Kunti—Sādājī—Dhanaka. Dhanaka had four sons called Kṛtavirya, Kṛtāgni, Kṛtavarmā and Kṛtāujas, and one of the four was the first Kṛtavarmā.

Hṛdiṅa had four sons, viz. Devavāha, Gaddādhanavan, Kṛtavarmā and Śūra. And, Śūra begot of his wife, Māriṣa ten sons, i.e. Vasu, Devabhāga, Devārvas, Anaka, Śrījaya, Kākāṇika, Śyāmaka, Vatsa, Kavika and Vāsudeva. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was the son of Vasudeva. The Kṛtavarmā referred to below was the brother of Kṛṣṇa’s grand-father.

2) Kṛtavarmā and Sṛyanantasaka. King Satrājī had in his possession the famous gem called Sṛyanantasaka. The King’s brother Praṣenā, went for hunting with this jewel on him. A lion killed Praṣena, and Jāmbavān killed the lion and got the gem. A scandal was circulated to the effect that Śrī Kṛṣṇa had stolen the gem. But, Kṛṣṇa got back the gem from Jāmbavān and handed it over to Sañjājit, who in turn, gave his daughter Satyabhāmā in marriage to Kṛṣṇa. Though Sañjājit wanted to give the gem—Syamantaka—to Kṛṣṇa as dowry, the latter did not accept it.

Akrūra and Kṛtavarman were bosom friends, and they incited another Yādava King Śatadhanvā, to grab the Syamantaka. Śatadhanvā killed Sañjājit and took possession of the gem. Hearing about this murder Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra set out to kill Śatadhanvā, who, in great alarm, started for north after entrusting the gem to Akrūra and Kṛtavarman. His horse died at Mithilāpurī and he began running. Balabhadra and Kṛṣṇa ran after him, caught and killed him. But, they did not get the Syamantaka.

Now Akrūra and Kṛtavarman began their penance at Kāśī. Seven years passed thus when famine broke out in Dvārakā. When once upon a time famine stalked Kāśī the king had brought Śvaphalka, father of Akrūra, over to Kāśī, and there was no more famine in the country. Therefore, when famine broke out in Dvārakā the Yadavas thought the presence of Śvaphalka’s son, Akrūra would dispel the famine. Accordingly Akrūra was recalled to Dvārakā, and along with him returned Kṛtavarman also. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra decided that Syamantaka should be kept by Akrūra himself.

3) Other information relating to Kṛtavarman.

(i) He was a very famous archer. (Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 81).

(ii) He was a great devotee of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 105).

(iii) He was present at the Svayamāvara of Pāṇcālī. (Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 18).

(x) As ordered by Sañjāyika he stationed himself at the city gates to protect Kṛṣṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 10).

(xi) On the first day of the great war he fought a duel with Sañjāyika. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 12).

(xii) Abhimanyu wounded him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).

(xiii) He was posted at the head of the Krāuṭācāriyas and the Kṛṣṇa hero set up by Bhīṣma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 17).

(xiv) Bhīmasena defeated him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 61).

(xv) Sañjāyika wounded him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 16).

(xvi) A duel was fought between him and Dhrṣṭadyumna. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 110, Verse 9).

(xvii) He fought with Arjuna, Bhīma and Sañjāyika. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 113, and Droṇa Parva, Chapter 14).

(xviii) He attacked Abhimanyu and killed his horse. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 48, Verse 32).

(xix) He fell down and swooned in the fight with Arjuna. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 92 Verses 16-33).

(xx) Afterwards he fought with Yudhāmasya and Uttamaujas. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 92, Verse 27).

(xxi) On another occasion he defeated Śīkhaṇḍi and Bhīma. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 114, Verse 59).

(xxii) He defeated Yudhīṣṭhira also in fighting. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 24).

(xxiii) Following the death of Droṇa he ran away from the battle-field. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 139, Verse 13).

(xxiv) He fought on the field in fight with Dhrṣṭadyumna. (Kāṛa Parva, Chapter 54). When he regained consciousness he met Duryodhana at Dvaiḍpāyasaras and induced him to fight. Dharmaputra followed him with the army.

(xxv) He also was present with śatvathāmā when he attacked those who were asleep during night. (Saุมptika Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 38).

(xxvi) It was he, who set fire to the camp of the Pāṇḍavas. (Saุมptika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 109).

(xxvii) He returned home after informing Dhrṣṭārāṣṭra about the death of Duryodhana, on the termination of the great war. (Sri Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 21).

(xxix) He was killed in the club-fight by the Yādavas. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 3, Verse 28).

(xxx) After death he joined the Marudgana and secured eternal fame. (Svargaśoraha Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 13.)

KṛTAVEGA. A very holy Rajarṣi. He was a member in the court of Yama. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 89).

KṛTAVIRYA I. Father of the famous Kārtavīryārjuna (For genealogy see under Kārtavīrya). He got a Soma Yajña conducted by the sages of the family of Bhṛgu and gave away a lot of wealth to people of Bhṛgu’s family (Adi Parva, Chapter 177, Verse 18). Kārtavīrya was a member of the court of Yamarāja. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 9).

KṛTAVIRYA II. Father-in-law of king Ahaṁyāti of the solar dynasty. He had a daughter called Bhānumatī. (Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 15).

KṛTAYUGA. There are four Yugas (Eras) called Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali yugas. (For the set up etc. of the Yugas see under Manvantara).

In the first Yuga, i.e. Kṛta yuga, people will be quite righteous. As the Yugas change righteousness will fade out in increasing measure till the world will be filled with unrighteousness and evil by the time it is Kaliyuga. When Kaliyuga is completed Mahāviṣṇu will incarnate himself as Kali and wipe out unrighteousness and establish Kṛtayuga once again.

KṛTAYUS (KṛTAUJAS). A brother of Kṛtāgni. (See under KṛTĀGNI).

KṛTEYU. A king born in the Aṅga dynasty.
KRTI I. A Sage who belonged to the order of the disciple of Vedavyāsa. Jaimini was the disciple of Vyāsa, and Śumantu the son of Jaimini. Śumantu had a son called Sūtvā, and Sukarmā was the son of the latter. He had two disciples called Hiranyanābha alias Kausalya and Pauspinī. Kṛṣṇa was a disciple of Hiranyanābha, and he composed twenty-four Sāṁhitās for the Sāṁveda and taught them to his disciples. (Viśṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 6).

KRTI II. A saintly King who flourished in the court of Yamarāja. (Sahā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 9).

KRTI IV. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 22).

KRTI V. A King of Sūkaraḍėśa. He presented hundred elephants to Yudhishṭhira. (Sahā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 25).

KRTI VI. A son of Nahuṣa. Nahuṣa had five other sons called Yati, Yayāti, Sāryāti, Āyati and Viyāti. Kṛṣṇa was the sixth son and the youngest of the lot.

KRTIKĀ I. When Subrahmaṇya was born the Devas deputed six mothers to breast-feed him, and they are called Kṛttikās. Certain Purāṇas hold the view that six faces were caused to Subrahmaṇya as he had to feed on six breasts at the same time while others opine that six mothers were deputed to feed him as he was born with six faces. Again, according to certain Purāṇas it was Pārvatī, who deputed the Kṛttikās. The child came to be known as Kārttikeya also as it was fed by the Kṛttikās. (Skanda Purāṇa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 37 and Kathāsārītāsāgara. Lāvāṇaka-lambaka, Tārāṅga 6).

After having fed Skanda the Kṛttikās entered into the sphere of the stars. (Vana Parva, Chapter 236, Verse 11). The star into which the Kṛttikās entered is called the Kṛttikā star. Nārada said once that if one feeds brahmins with ghee and puding on Kṛttikā day one may ascend to Devaloka. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 5).

KRTIKĀ II. A holy place. He who bathes here will derive the benefits of performing an Atirātra Yajñā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 51).

KRTIKĀNGARAKA. A holy centre. He who bathes here and observes fast for two weeks will be absolved from sins. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 22).

KRTIKĀSRAMA. A holy centre. One who bathes here and worships the Pīrs will be absolved from sins. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 22).

KRTIVASEVARA. See under Śiva.

KRTIVI. Kṛṭivī alias Kṛttimati was the daughter of sage Sūka. Āṇuha, born in the family of Ajamindha, married Kṛṭivī, and Brahmadatta was their son.

KRTYA (KRTYAKA) I. A Rākṣasī who is born when the black arts as enunciated in the Aṭhārvaveda are practised to annihilate enemies. Kṛtyā may appear in male form too. Some of the activities of Kṛtyā are given below.

(1) Carried off Duryodhana. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in exile in the forest, Duryodhana and others went in a procession to the forest. Though Duryodhana was taken into captivity in the forest by a Gandharva, Arjuna saved him out of fraternal consideration for him. Duryodhana returned to Hastināpura. Now the question was whether half of the kingdom should be given to the Pāṇḍavas or not. Śakuni and others advised Duryodhana to give it, but the latter remained adamant against it. Dhṛtarāṣṭra decided to end his life and for the purpose spread darbha grass on earth and sat thereon. The Asuras heard about these developments and created a Kṛtyā by mantras. The Kṛtyā took Duryodhana to Pāṭālā where the Asuras advised him against any compromise with the Pāṇḍavas. On the other hand they wanted him to intensify his hatred against the Pāṇḍavas, and they assured him all support. After that Kṛtyā took Duryodhana back to Hastināpura. (Vana Parva, Chapter 252).

(2) Kṛtyā born under the name Madana. Devendra once prevented the Asvinidevas from drinking Soma juice. (Devas drink a liquid-liqueur extracted from the soma creeper, during yajñas, and that is called Somapāṇa). Aggrieved at the orders of Indra the Asvinidevas wandered about the world in the course of which they approached sage Cyavana of the Bhārgava family. They restored sight to the blind Cyavana, who, in return, assured them that he would see to it that they got the right of drinking soma juice. Cyavana began a Yajña and Indra came for Somapāṇa. The sage invited the Asvinidevas also for Somapāṇa. Indra prevented them from doing so, and the sage opposed him. Then Indra drew his Vajrāyudha against Cyavana. The sage made Indra's hands paralysed. Further, he raised from the Yajñic fire a Kṛtyā which appeared in male form under the name Madana. Sharp molar teeth hundred yojanas long, other teeth each ten yojanas long, hands ten thousand yojanas long and as big as mountains, round eyes like the Sun and Moon, mouth spitting fire—such was Madana, the Kṛtyā, a really terrible being. Frightened at the sight of the terrible being Indra permitted the Asvinidevas to drink Soma.

(3) Kṛtyā against Ambariṣa. Ambariṣa once began the Ekādaśi Vrata and the Devas deputed Durvāsas to obstruct it somehow or other. Durvāsas came to Ambariṣa, who requested him to return after bath. But, though the vrata was over the sage did not return and Ambariṣa fed the Devas with the offerings (havis). Immediately after that Durvāsas returned and complained that what he was given was the left-overs of the havis. By means of black art he created a Kṛtyā, who charged against Ambariṣa's throat. Ambariṣa prayed and the Sudāraṇa Cakra of Viśṇu appeared and killed the Kṛtyā and drove Durvāsas round the three worlds. At last the sage sought refuge with Ambariṣa himself and thus saved himself. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

(4) Kṛtyā opposed Śrī Kṛṣṇa. While Kṛṣṇa was ruling Dvārakā, Paundrakavāsudeva was the King of Kārūṣa. Once he sent a messenger to ask Kṛṣṇa to go and bow down before him as he was the real Vaṣudeva. Enraged at this insolent demand Kṛṣṇa cut off Paundrakas's head with the Sudāraṇa Cakra. The dead King's son, Sudakṣiṇa, to gather power enough to fight Kṛṣṇa went to KāŚi and performed penance to please Śiva. Śiva appeared and taught him the method of creating Kṛtyā. Accordingly he created from fire, a Kṛtyā, who dashed against Kṛṣṇa roaring like hell. Kṛṣṇa used the Sudāraṇa Cakra, which burnt to death not only the Kṛtyā, but also Sudakṣiṇa.
KṚṬYĀ II

(5) Kṛṭyā against Prahlāda. To change the nature of Prahlāda, a great devotee of Viṣṇu, his father Hiranyakaśipu deputed Asura preceptors. But, severe punishments like poisoning, throwing into fire etc. did not succeed in changing the devotee’s character. At last, the preceptors raised Kṛṭyā from fire. The Śūlam, which Kṛṭyā thrust against the throat of Prahlāda was broken into hundreds of pieces. Kṛṭyā then got angry and turned against the preceptors, who had sent her against Prahlāda. The preceptors fell down unconscious on the verge of death. But, Prahlāda touched their bodies and they became alive again. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 16).

KṚṬYĀ II. A river. Indians used to drink water from this river. (Bṛhaṣṭha Parva, Chapter 9 Verse 18).

KRŪRĀ (KRODHĀ). A daughter of Prajāpati Daśaka. She became the wife of Kaśyapa. A large number of Asuras were born to her. They all were very cruel and were called Krodhaśaśa. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 32).

KRŪRA. A country in Ancient India. (Mahābhārata, Bhīma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 65).

KṢAMĀ. Wife of Prajāpati Pulaха. Three sons Kardama, Uравrīyān and Saņiṣu were born to Pulaха of his wife Kṣamā. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Aṁśa I, Stanza 10).

KṢAMA. A King of the Puru dynasty. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

KṢATRADEVA. The son of Śiṅkhaḍi. He was a famous archer, Bhagadatta wounded the right hand of Kṣatradeva in the Bhārata-battle. He fought with Laksmana and Drona. Laksmaṇa killed him. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapters 57 and 171; Bhīma Parva, Chapter 95; Drona Parva, Chapters 14, 21 and 23; Karṇa Parva, Chapter 6).

KṢATRADHARMAN. A son of Dhrṣṭadyumna. The teacher Drona killed him. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 125, Stanza 66).

KṢATRĀNGAYA. A son of Dhrṣṭadyumna. Drona killed him. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 186).

KṢATRAVARMAN. A son of Dhrṣṭadyumna. He fought with Jayadratha in the battle of Bhārata. Drona killed him. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 10, Stanza 53).

KṢATRIYA. See under Cātuvṛtanyā.

KṢATTĀ. Vidura.

KṢATTĀ II. See under the word Varṇa.

KṢEṢMA. A celestial maid. This celestial maid took part in the birth celebration of Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Stanza 66).

KṢEMA. A King in Ancient India. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 65, that this King was the rebirth of the Asura Krodhaśaśa. In the Bhārata-battle this King took the side of the Pāṇḍavas and was killed by Drona. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 53).

KṢEMADARŚI. A King of Kosalā. There is a story in the Mahābhārata stating how the hermit Kālakavṛkṣiśya saved this King from the trap laid by his favourites. The treasury-keeper spent the money of the King lavishly on himself. The subjects began to consider how to inform the King about this. Finally the hermit Kālakavṛkṣiśya began to travel throughout the country with a crow kept in a cage. As if the crow was speaking, the hermit began to tell the past, present and future fortunes of the people. The crow became famous and people began to have faith in the crow. Once Kālakavṛkṣiśya and the crow reached the palace and under the pretence that the crow was speaking, the hermit disclosed all the secret dealings of the treasury-keeper. The servants of the King stealthily put the crow to death that night. When the King knew this he made Kālakavṛkṣiśya the minister and the country began to prosper. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 62).

On another occasion the treasury of the King Kṣemadarśi became empty. At this time King Janaka had come to war with this King. According to the sincere advice of Kālakavṛkṣiśya the King married the daughter of King Janaka. From that day onwards his country became prosperous. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 106).

KṢEMADHĀNVĀ. A famous archer who fought on the side of the Kauravas. This archer led Duryodhana in the battlefield. (M.B. Bṛha Parva, Chapter 17, Stanza 27).

KṢEMADHŪRTI I. A Kṣatriya King of Ancient India. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 64 that this King was born from a portion of the Asura called Krodhaśaśa. The King ruled over the country called Kulūṭa. In the battle of Bhārata he fought on the side of the Kauravas and was killed by Bhīmasena. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 44).

KṢEMADHŪRTI II. A King who took the side of the Kauravas. This King who was the brother of Bhratata, fought with Sāṭyaki in the Bhārata battle. (M.B. Śāla Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 8).

KṢEMAGĪRĪ. Another name of Bhadrakāli (a goddess). In Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 12, it is mentioned that Āryā, Durgā, Vedagārbhā, Ambikā, Bhadrakāli, Bhadrā, Kṣemā and Naikabāhō are also synonyms of Bhadrakāli.

KṢEMAKA I. A Rākṣasa (giant). In Brahmiṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 2, it is mentioned that this Rākṣasa had lived in Kāśi and that the King Divodāsa killed this Rākṣasa and built a city there.

KṢEMAKA II. A serpent (Nāga) born to Kaśyapa- prajāpati of his wife Kadrū. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 11).

KṢEMAKA III. A King who was a luminary in the palace of Yudhiṣṭhīra. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 24, that the Pāṇḍavas had sent invitation to this King for the battle of Bhārata.

KṢEMAMŪRTI. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 100).

KṢEMĀNKARA. A King who was the friend of Jayadratha. This King ruled over the country of Trigarta. Nakula killed this King. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 265 and 275).

KṢEMAṢARMĀ. A warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas. Kṣemaṣarmā stood and fought at the neck of the Garuḍavyūha (the formation of the army.
KṣEMAVĀHA

into the shape of an eagle) made by Karna. (M.B.
Droṇa Parva, Chapter 20, Stanza 6).
KSEMAYA. A warrior of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 66).
KSEMAYRDDHI. The minister of King Sālva. He was both minister and general of the army at the same time. Samba, the son of Śri Kṛṣṇa defeated Kṣemayrdhī. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 16).
KSETRA (S). Sacred spots. In Malayālam it means Temple’s also.
1) General Information. The temples of India are reflections of the outward form or body of man. As the soul lives in the body of man, God dwells in the temple. The stone, rock, marble, metals etc. are equal to the bones of the body of a man.
2) Two types of temples. Temples are of two types.
One type is the Grāmavedatā temples. These are temples in which goddess Bhadrakāli is consecrated and worshipped for the protection of villages and cities. The second type is of special temples. These are temples specially meant for a particular god or goddess. Thus there are temples for Viṣṇu, Śiva, Gaṇapati and so on.
3) Grāmavedatā temples. Worship of Bhadrakāli existed in India from very early times. When Mohanjodaro and Harappa were excavated idols of Devī (goddess) more than 4000 years old, were obtained from there.
During the prevalence of Buddhism in India the goddesses Yakṣi and Hărīti were worshipped in India. Later when Hinduism was revived these goddesses took their places in it as the goddesses of Hindu Purāṇas and epics. The Kāli temples of Ujjaiyni and Calcutta are famous. In the Cidambara temple also the main deity is Kāli. The legend is that Paramaśiva defeated Kāli in a dance. In Mysore Cāmuṇḍi (Kāli) is worshipped as chief goddess or family goddess. Kāmākṣī in Kāñeṣi, Mīnākṣī in Madura (South India), Mūkāmbikā in North Karnāṭaka and so on are the gentle and peaceful forms of Kāli.
4) Devas (gods). In many of the temples in South India, Munīśvaran and Karuppan are the grāmavedatās (village gods). In some places Bhairava also is worshipped as grāmavedatā. In certain other places Vīran, Iruṇan, Kāreṇṭi, Nōṇḍi and Paṇcarulī are worshipped. Sāsta or Ayyappan has a prominent place among the village gods. Importance is attached to Sāsta or Ayyappan mostly in Kerala and Tamil Nādu.
KETRAPĀLA. Ketrapāla is consecrated on the South East corner of the temple, for protecting the villages and cities. This is a large image with three eyes. There are figures which are Sattwika, Rājasa and Tāmasa (having the attributes goodness, ostentatiousness and sloth). In some places figures having two or four or eight hands are seen. It is presumed that this deity is a portion of Śiva. It is stated in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51 that Ketrapālas should be figures having trident in the hand.
KŚIRASĀGARA. Sea of Milk. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Udvyoga Parva, Chapter 102, that Brahmā drank too much of Amṛta and vomited. From the vomit the cow Surabhi came into being. The milk of Surabhi flowed and collected into a sea. This sea is called the milk-sea or Kṣirasāgarā.

KṢIRAVATI. A holy bath. Those who bathe in this holy bath will obtain the fruits of performing the sacrifice of Viṣṇu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84).
KṢIRIN. A tree in the family of the Uttra Kurus.
This tree has six tastes. Milk flows ceaselessly from this tree. It is said that from the fruit of this tree we could get cloth, ornaments etc. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 7).
KṢITIKAMPANA. A captain of the army of Skanda.
(M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 59).
KṢUDRAKĀ. There was a country known as Kṣudraka in Ancient India. Those who inhabited this country were called Kṣudrakas. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 52 that the Kṣudrakas had brought gifts to Dharmaputra. In the battle of Bhārata Duryodhana protected Śakuni with the help of the Kṣudrakas. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 16).
It is stated in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 19 that the Kṣudrakas attacked Arjuna at the behest of Bhīṣma. Many Kṣudrakas were killed when Paraśu-rāma exterminated the Kṣatriyas. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70).
KṢUPA I. A Prajāpāti. There is a story about the birth of this Prajāpāti in Mahābhārata. Once Brahma wished to perform a sacrifice. But he could not get suitable priest as the performer of the sacrifice. So Brahmā decided to create a befitting person as Rtvik (the priest who does the rituals of the sacrifice) and he got pregnant in his head. After a thousand years he sneezed and a Prajāpāti came out of the head of Brahmā. That Prajāpāti was Kṣupa. He made Kṣupa his Rtvik. (Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 122).
Rudra Bhagavān made him Prājāpāti (the Lord of all subjects).
KṢUPA II. A King who was the son of Prasandhi, and the grandson of Vaivasvata Manu. He was the father of Tskvāk. In Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, it is mentioned that Kṣupa stayed in the Palace of Yama after his death. In Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 166 it is stated that this King had received a sword directly from Vaivasvata Manu. Kṣupa was not in the habit of eating flesh. (M.B. Anuśāsan-Parva, Chapter 159, Stanza 67).
KṢURAKARMI. An attendant of Skanda. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Stanza 25).
KUBERA. 1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahmā—Pulastya—Viṣṇu—Kubera.
2) Birth. Pulastya Prajāpāti wedded Mānini alias Havir-bhū, daughter of sage Trāpabindu, and a son called Viṣṇu was born to them, Viṣṇu married Illibil alias Daivavārṇini, daughter of Bharadvāja. Rāvaṇa Kumbhakarṇa and Vībhīṣaṇa were the sons of Viṣṇu by another wife. (Refer to the genealogy of Rāvaṇa).
Viṣṇu was childless for long, and the above mentioned four sons were the fruits of the boon granted him by Brahmā, whom he pleased by austerities. (For details see under Viṣṇu, Para 1).
3) Kubera’s attainment of eminence. Once during Kṛtayuga the Devas went to Varuṇa, and after performing a Yajña for Kubera they told him thus: “In future you live in the ocean itself as deva of all rivers, and let the ocean and the rivers obey you. As in the case of the moon you too will experience waxing and waning.”
From that day onwards Kubera became the lord of KUBERA oceans, rivers, streams etc. and all of them together gave him immense wealth. Siva became a particular friend of Kuber. (Salya Parva, Chapter 47).

4) KUBERA in LANKA. Afterwards Kuber performed penance for ten thousand years in water with head submerged, to please Brah'ma. Yet, Brah'ma did not appear. Then he performed penance standing on one foot in the centre of Pañcegni. Brah'ma appeared and asked him to choose any boon. Kuber requested that he might be made a lokapālaka (protector of the universe) and the custodian of wealth, and Brah'ma responded by supplying Kuber the treasures Śāṅkha nidhi and Padmanidhi and also the Puṣpaka Vimāna as vehicle. He was also appointed one of the Aṣṭadikpālakas. (Indra, Agni, Yama, Nirṛti, Varuṇa, Vāyu, Kubera and Iṣa are the eight protectors of the eight regions). Kuber's city is called Mahodaya. Kuber felt really happy and told his father Viśravas about his new status and dignity. The father also blessed the son. Kuber requested his father to get a city built for him to live in, and his father asked him to settle down in Lānka built by Maya on top of the mountain Trikūṭa in the middle of the south sea. From that day onwards Kuber took his abode in Lānka. (It was originally built for Indra).

5) Old history of LANKA. Once upon a time when Brah'ma was repeating the Vedas he felt hungry. He was annoyed that at that untimely hour he should have felt hungry, and from his angry face emerged the Rākṣasa called Heti. From his hunger emerged the Yaksā called Praheti. The Rākṣasa turned out to be an unrighteous being, and the Yaksā a righteous person. Heti married Bhayā, daughter of Kāla, and a son Vidyutkesa was born to them, who wedded Sālakataṅkā, daughter of Sandhyā. To them were born a child, whom they forsook in the valley of mountain Manthara and went their own way. Siva and Pārvati came that way just then, saw the forsaken child and blessed it. At once the child became a youth. Siva named him Sukeśa, and he married Devavati, the daughter of a Gandharva called Maṇimaya. To them were born three sons called Mālīyavān, Sumālī, and Mālī. Thanks to the blessings of Śiva all of them became youths as soon as they were born. By means of penances they secured from Brah'ma the boon to conquer the three worlds. They then returned to their father. They did not relish the advice of their father to lead a righteous life. They went round the three worlds harassing people. Maya built for them the city called Lānka on the top of the mountain Trikūṭa.

There is a story about the origin of Trikūṭa. Once a controversy arose between Vāsuki and Vāyuvahagavān as to who was the greater of the two. To prove that he was greater than Vāyu, Vāsuki enveloped with his body mountain Mahāmeru so that Vāyu (wind) could not enter it, and Vāyu tried to blow off the mountain with the result that a dust storm concealed the whole world from view. The Devas took refuge in Viṣṇu, who pacified Vāsuki, and he then unwound one coil round the mountain. Vāyu took advantage of the opportunity and swept off one peak of the mountain to the South into the sea, and that peak is Trikūṭa.

Mālīyavān, Sumālī and Mālī settled down in Lānka, and they married Sundari, Ketumati and Vasudhā, the three daughters of Narmadā, a Gandharva woman. Seven sons called Vajramuṣṭi, Viśrūpākṣa, Durmutkha, Supatgāna Yajñakośa, Matta and Unmatha and a daughter called Nalā were born to Mālīyavān and Sundari. Ten sons called Prahaṣṭa, Akampa, Viṣṇu, Kālakānumkha, Dhumāraka, Daṇḍa, Supārśva, Senshirāda, Prakṛtā and Bhāṣakarṇa and four daughters called Vekā, Puṣpotkaṭa, Kaṅkasi and Kumūṇāśi were born to Sumālī and Ketumati. Four sons called Anala, Anīla, Aha and Sampāti (these four were the ministers of Viśbhiṣaṇa) were born to Mālī and Vasudhā. When the harassments of the Rākṣasas became unbearable, the Devas sought protection from Śiva, and Indra detailed to him about the unrighteous actions of Mālīyavān, Sumālī and Mālī. Śiva directed the Devas to Viṣṇu, who set out, to fight against the Rākṣasas. Mālī cut at Garuḍa, and Viṣṇu killed him (Mālī) with his Sudarśana Cakra. The other Rākṣasas retreated to Lānka. As their presence in Lānka was dangerous to the Devas, Viṣṇu directed the Sudarśana Cakra to go to Lānka every day and kill the Rākṣasas in groups. The Cakra began its work, and the remaining Rākṣasas escaped to Pāṭalā. Lānka became thus deserted and Kubera took his abode there. The Rākṣasas, born from the hunger of Brah'ma roamed about without a leader and ultimately settled down in Lānka under the leadership of Kubera. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

6) KUBERA left LANKA. The other sons of Viśravas like Rāvana returned with boons from Brah'ma for the conquest of the earth, and the first thing Rāvana did was to drive away his brother Kubera from Lānka. He also took by force the Puṣpaka Vimāna of Kubera, who cursed Rāvana thus: "This will never be your vehicle, but will become that of his, who kills you." Kubera, with the Yaksas, Kinnaras etc. went north and settled on mount Gandhamādana. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275).

7) KUBERA's sabhā. The assembly hall of Kubera is 100 yojanas in length and 100 yojanas wide. High walls surround the city. In the centre of the city is a beautiful mansion studded with gems where Kubera sits surrounded by thousands of women. Mārutā Deva carrying fragrance from Kalpavṛkṣa worships him. Gandharvas and Apsaras women entertain Kubera with music. Miśrakesī, Rambhā, Menakā, Urvaśī, Citrascena, Sucismitā, Gṛhtri, Punjikāsthāla, Viśvācī, Sahajāyana, Pramlōca, Vargā, Saurabheyyī, Sāmīcī, Budbudā, and Lātā are the chief among them. Maṇibhadra (Maṇibhadrā), Dhanada, Āśveta, Bhadra, Guhyaka, Kaśeraka, Gandālkaṇḍu, Pradyota, Mahābala, Ka, Tumburu, Piśāca, Gajakarna, Viśāla, Varāhaṅkara, Tāmrasthāla, Halakakṣa, Halodaka Hainacṣu, Saṅkhāvarta, Hemanetra, Viśbhiṣaṇa, Puṣpāṇa, Pinala, Sopitoda, Prāvalaka, Vṛkṣaṁpaniketa, Cīravadakṣa and Nalakābara are the chief members in the court of Kubera. Siva, a good friend of Kubera, very often visits him. Gandharvas and sages like Viśvavasu, Hāha, Hūhā, Parvata, Tumburu and Sairiṣa live in Kubera's assembly. Nārada told Dharmaputra that the Kuberasabha was thus always sweet and pleasant. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10).

8) FIGHT between KUBERA and RĀVANA. Kubera got secret information that the Devas and the brahmins had decided jointly to complain to Mahāviṣṇu about their unbearable harassment by Rāvana. He sent a messenger to his brother Rāvana warning him to lead a more righteous life. Rāvana got so much enraged at the advice of his brother that he cut the messenger into pieces and served as food to the Rākṣasas.

Rāvana mobilised his army against Kubera and the Devas, and decided first to attack Kubera. At the head of a huge army led by heroes like Mahodara, Prahasa, Mārica, Sūka, Sārana, Vajrādāśī, Dhāmārāka, Virūpākṣa, Yūpākṣa, Mahāpārśva, Maṭa, Unaṭṭa, Vīkaṇṭha, Suptaghna, Yajñāṅkita, Makaraṅga, Kumbha-karṇa, Aṭikāya and Aśaṅgamāra, Rāvana marched to Alakāpūrī where a fierce battle ensued between Rāva-ṇa’s and Kubera’s armies. Many Yaksas were killed by Rāvana’s army, and the Yaksā hero Maṇicara killed a large number of Rākṣasas. As a last resort Rāvana thrashed Maṇicara on the head with a club and this turned the hair on his head to one side. But, the Yaksas brought two Vīmānas and carried Kubera to the palace. Rāvana plundered Kubera’s palace and carried off to Lāṅkā a lot of costly gems and other wealth. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa)

9) Kubera became a Chameleon. King Marutta once performed a Maheśvara yajña to which were invited Indra, Varuṇa, Kubera and Kāla. While the yajña was progressing Rāvana came that way with his army. Indra and the others, in great fear, ran away and escaped disguised in various forms, Kubera assuming the form of a chameleon. After resuming his own form Kubera gave the Chameleon the gift to change its colour. It was further blessed that to the onlookers it would seem that there was gold on its cheeks. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa)

10) Kubera cursed Virūpākṣa. Kubera had a yaksā called Virūpākṣa as Manager, and he was in charge of Kubera’s treasures also. Virūpākṣa had employed a gigantic yaksā to look after the treasures outside the capital. One day a brahmin called Pāṣupata came in search of treasures to Alakāpūrī. He knew a very peculiar art, viz. he would go about with a lamp lighted with the ghee of men (oily substance extracted from human body) and the lamp would tumble down from his hands on earth exactly on spots where treasures lay hidden. Pāṣupata tried to unearth Kubera’s treasures by the above means, and Virūpākṣa, who got scent of the brahmin’s activities got him killed. Since a brahmin (Pāṣupata) was killed the sin of brahmanatya affected the Yaksā community, and angered at this Kubera cursed Virūpākṣa into a man, and he was born on earth as the son of a brahmin. Virūpākṣa’s wife complained about this curse to Kubera, who told her that she would be born as a daughter of the maidservant of the brahmin as whose son her husband was born, and that he (son) would marry her. Kubera, further told her that association with her would redeem Virūpākṣa from the curse and that both of them would return to him. Accordingly she lay as a human child at the gates of a brahmin maid-servant, who took her to his master. The child and the brahmin’s son grew up together in his father’s house, and in due course they were wedded to each other. They felt so happy as though at a reunion after a long separation. First the brahmin boy and after him his wife expired, and they returned to Alakāpūrī. (Kathāsaritsāgara)

11) Kubera and emperor Pṛthu. While emperor Pṛthu was ruling the land in the best interests of his subjects, mountains, trees, Devas, Asuras, Saptarṣis, Rākṣasas etc. came to the earth and sang his praises, and as ordered by the emperor the earth turned itself into a cow and they milked her. It was Kubera who served as calf when the Rākṣasas began to milk the cow. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 24).

The Devas crowned Pṛthu as emperor, and, on that occasion imperial symbols were presented to him. The throne was presented by Kubera; the royal umbrella by Varuṇa; the crown by Indra and the sceptre by Yama. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha Chapter 15, Verses 14 and 15).

12) Kubera cursed Tumburu. The Yaksā called Tumburu once displeased Kubera, who cursed him into a Rākṣasa. He was to be redeemed from the curse on his death at the hands of Śrī Rāma. Tumburu, who was born as Virādha, the Rākṣasa in Daṇḍākāranya attacked Rāma and Lakṣmana during their stay in exile in the forest and was killed by them. He was cremated in the forest. He resumed his former form as Tumburu and returned to Kubera’s palace. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Canto 4).

13) Kubera became Pīṅgalākṣa. Kubera once looked with jealousy at Pārvatī seated on the left thigh of Śiva, and therefore, he became blind in one eye. When Pārvatī regained her equanimity she turned that eye of Kubera into yellow in colour so that he might always remember the incident. Henceforth Kubera came to be known as Ekaḍāṅgalā.

14) Agastya cursed Kubera. Kubera also was invited to the chanting of mantras held by the Devas at Kuśāvati. Kubera was on his way to Kuśāvati with Maṇiṁāṇ when the latter spat on the head of Agastya, who was performing penance on the banks of river Kālindī. Agastya cursed them thus:—“Oh Kubera, your attendant Maṇiṁāṇ has insulted me. Therefore, he himself and the army will be killed by a man. You will grieve over their death. But, you will be absolved from this curse at the sight of the man, who had killed Maṇiṁāṇ and his army.”

Bhūmasena, who went to mount Gandhamāda in search of the Saugandhika flower could kill Maṇiṁāṇ and his soldiers because of this curse of Agastya. After killing Maṇiṁāṇ, Bhūma saw Kubera in person, and the latter got absolved from the curse. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161).

15) Other information about Kubera. (i) He comforted the Pāṇḍavas once during their life in exile in the forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 41).

(ii) During the war with Rāvana when Śrī Rāma fainted on the field, it was the water, purified by mantras, which Kubera sent through the Yaksā, Guhavyaka, which brought Rāma back to consciousness. (Vana Parva, Chapter 289, Verse 9).

(iii) Kubera once cursed the Yaksā called Sthūnakaṁra. He went to live in forest. Ambā the woman became a male by getting the penis of Sthūnakaṁra. (See under Ambā and Sthūnakaṁra).

(iv) Sūkraṁṛya once gave Kubera a lot of wealth. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 23).

(v) A King called Mucukunda once fought with Kubera. (Sāntī Parva, Chapter 74, Verse 4). See under Mucukunda.
(vi) Sukra once carried off all the wealth of Kubera, who complained to Siva about it. Siva, in anger, raised his śūla, when Sukra stood on its top and pressed it down. Siva threw Sukra off, but he fell into the palms of Siva who threw him again. Sukra then entered the stomach of Siva and roamed about there finding no path to get out. Siva waited with the śūla to kill Sukra the moment he came out of his (Siva's) stomach. Sukra came out as Siva's son, and Pārvatī prevented Siva from killing Sukra on the plea that it was not proper to kill one's own son. Sukra thus escaped and Kubera lost some of his wealth. (Śaṅti Parva, Chapter 289).

(vii) On another occasion Kubera entertained sage Aśṭāvakra. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 37).

(viii) Kubera should be installed in temples as seated on a goat with club in his hand. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

(ix) The name of Kubera's wife was Bhadrā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 198, Verse 6).

(x) Kubera is called Naravāhana also as he rides in a vehicle drawn by men. He is also called Rājārāja, as he is King of Kings. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 275, Verses 1-3).

(xi) Viṣṇu got angry with Kubera, and from that day he deputed three Rākṣasa girls to serve his father. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verses 1-3).

(xiii) Kubera's garden is called Caitraratha, his son Nalākūbara, his capital Alakā and his mountain-scats Kailāsān.

(xiv) Kubera once did tapas for hundred years when Śiva appeared and granted him the boon that he would become King of the Yaksas. (Padma Purāṇa, Ādīkhaṇḍa Chapter 16).

KUBERATĪRTHA. A holy place on the banks of the river Sarasvatī. Once the Devas appeared to Kubera at this tīrtha and granted him overlordship of wealth, friendship of Śiva, Deva-hood and rulership of the world. The Marudgaṇas crowned him King. He got the son Nalākūbara also there. The place, thus important in many ways came to be reputed as Kubera-tīrtha in later years. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 97).

KUHKĀ. A river mentioned in the Rgveda. Kubhā, Sindhu, Suvāstu, Vitastī, Asīkī, Parusū, Vipāś, Satadrū, Sarasvatī and Yamuna are the important rivers referred to in the Rgveda.

KUBJĀ. An ugly woman about whom the following story is told in Chapter 126, of Uttarakaṅṭha in Padma Purāṇa. Kubjā became a widow in her very childhood, and she spent eight years in observing auspicious ceremonies. As she took the 'Magha bath' every year she attained salvation. This was the period when Sunda and Upasunda were harassing the world, and to destroy them Kubjā incarnated as Tilottama and hooked them by her excellent beauty. They fought each other for her hand and got killed. Brahmā was pleased at this and granted Kubjā a place in Śūryaloka.

KUJBJAMRAKA. A holy place. A visit to this place is as good as offering a gift of a thousand cows. The visitor will also attain heaven. (Vana Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 40).

KUCELĀ. Sudāman, better known as Kucela was a brahmin class-mate of Śrī Ārjuna at the Ārāma of sage Sāndipani. One day Sāndipani's wife deputed Kucela and Kṛṣṇa to collect fire-wood from the forest, and they had to stay the whole night there as they could not find out the way back to the ārāma due to heavy rain, thunder etc. After their education was over these two thick friends left the ārāma and went their different ways in life.

Śrī Kṛṣṇa became the lord of Dvārakā, and Kucela a house-holder with many children, and starvation gripped the family. One day, at the instance of his wife, Kucela started for Dvārakā to visit Kṛṣṇa with a packet of rice flakes as a present to him. Kṛṣṇa received his old classmate most cordially, and ate one handful of rice flakes from the packet brought by Kucela. Rukmiṇī prevented him from a second helping of the flakes. After spending some time most happily with his old friend, Kucela started homewards. Only on his way back did he think that Kṛṣṇa had not given him any monetary help. But, by the time he reached home his old dilapidated house had converted itself into a beautiful mansion, and his wife and children were in great happiness. Śrī Kṛṣṇa's blessings thus converted poor Kucela into a very rich person. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUHA. A prince of the Sauvira kingdom. He was a follower of Jayadratha. (Vana Parva, Chapter 265, Verse 1).

KUHARA. A King of Kaliṅga. He was born from an aspect of the Asura called Krodhavāsa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 65).

KUHŪ. Daughter of Aṅgiras, one of the Prajāpatīs. To Aṅgiras, by his wife Śrītī were born four daughters called Sivīvāli, Kuhū, Rākā and Anumati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10).

KUJA. Kuja is an individual belonging to the Deva-gaṇa. His weapon is called Śakti. He wears the aksamāla. (Rudrākṣa garland).

KUJRMBHA. A very powerful and valiant Rākṣasa who possessed an iron rod named Sunanda. He had earned the boon that the rod would lose its power only on contact with women. He lived underground in a thick forest on the banks of the river Nirvindhyā. Once he abducted Mudavatī, the beautiful daughter of Vidūratha, King of Vaśiṇī. At last Vatsapī, the son of Bhalandana made Mudavatī touch the iron rod of the Asura, which became powerless because of the touch of a woman, and then he (Vatsapī) killed the Asura. Vatsapī then married Mudavatī. (Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa, Chapter 116).

KUKARDAMA. A wicked monarch of Pīṇḍarakaṇḍesā. He had to be born in Pretayoni (womb of a ghostess) due to his many sins, and once he came to the ārāma of Kahoḍa, and the sage recognised him as his former disciple and absolved him from his ghosthood. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttar Kaṅṭha, Chapter 139).

KUKKURA I. A King of the Lunar dynasty, the founder of the Kukkura dynasty.
KUUKURA II. A noble sage who distinguished himself in Dharma Purāṇa's court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 19).

KUKURA (M). An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 42).

KUKUTIKĀ. A female attendant of Skanda. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 15).

KUKUDMĀ. A son, Anarta, was born to King Saryāti, the son of Vaivasvata Manu. Revata, the famous Rājaṛsi, who ruled from his capital at Kuśāthali island, was the son of Anarta. Anarta had hundred sons, the eldest being Kukudmā, and also a daughter called Revatī. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

KUKURA I. (KUKURA). A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. From Vṛṣṇi the descendants are in the following order:—Yudhījīt—Śiṅi—Satyakā—Śāyakī (Yuyudhāna)—Jaya—Kuni—Anamitra—Pṛśi—Citraratha—Kukura. As Kukura was a very reputed King his successors were also called Kukuras. The Kṣatriyas of this dynasty were subject to the orders of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 28). Members of the Kukura and Andhaka dynasties became drunkards, and at last quarrelled with one another and died. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 3).

KUKURA II. A serpent born in the Kaśyapa dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Verse 10).

KUKURA (M). An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 60).

KUKŚI I. To Śvāyambhuva Manu the son of Brahmā, were born two sons called Priyavrata and Utānapāda by his wife Śatarūpā, and Kardama Prājapati married the daughter of Priyavrata. And, to them were born three sons called Samrāti, Kukśi and Virāṭ. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

KUKŚI II. A well known Asura King. An aspect of this Asura was later reborn as King Pārvatīya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 56).

KULĀCALA. (KULAPARVATA). Kulaparvatas are seven in number, viz. Mahendra, Malaya, Sahya, Suktimān, Rkśavān, Vindhya, Pāriyātra. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

KULADHARMA. The moral and ethical codes of conduct, especially with reference to family life. Arjuna told the following about Kuladharmas to Kṛṣṇa at Kurukṣetra. In the decline of a family, its time-honoured usages perish; with the perishing of such rites impiety overtakes the entire family. With the growth of impiety even the noble women become unchaste, and if women become corrupt, mixture of castes ensues. Hell is verily the lot of the family and family-destroyers through caste admixture; for, their ancestors fall deprived of balls of rice and libations. The ever-lasting caste virtues and the family merits get ruined because of the chaos in the caste system. We have heard that hell is verily the long-lasting abode of the men whose family religious practices have been broken. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 25 and the Gitā).

KULAMPUNĀ. A river which ought to be daily remembered. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 20).

KULAMPUNĀ. A holy place. A bath here brings about sanctification of the entire family. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 104).

KULATTHA. A holy centre in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

KULIKA. A prominent serpent born of Kadru. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 41).

KULYA. A Rṣi who belonged to the line of disciples of Vyāsa. (Bhāgavata, 12th Skandha).

KUMĀRA I. Skandra or Subrahmayya. (For details see under Skandra).

KUMĀRA II. A King in ancient India. He was invited by the Pāṇḍavas to help them in the great war. He was defeated by Droṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 24).

KUMĀRA III. A sage reputed as Sanatkumāra. (For details see under Sanatkumāra).

KUMĀRA IV. One of the prominent sons of Garuḍa.

KUMĀRA V. An urban region in ancient India. King Śrenimān of Kumāra was defeated by Bhīma during his triumphal tour. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 1).

KUMĀRA (S). Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumāra and Sanatsujāta were the sons of Brahmā endowed with eternal youthfulness. They are known as the Kumāras.

KUMĀRAḌĀṢA. A Sanskrit poet of the 7th century A.D. His chief work is the great poem called Jānakihasanam consisting of twenty cantos.

KUMĀRADHĀTRA. Guardian of the mother of the Vaiśya called Māśika. (See under Māśika).

KUMĀRADHĀTRA. A river which has its source in Brahmasaras. Those who bathe in the river will become intelligent and wealthy. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 149).

KUMĀRAKA. A prominent serpent born in the Kauravya dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent vajra of King Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 13).

KUMĀRAKOTI. A holy place. A visit to the place is as good as offering a gift of a thousand cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 117).

KUMĀRAVĀNA. (M). The place where King Sudyumna got changed into a woman. When once Sanaka and other sages went to Kumāravāna to see Śiva he was seated there with Pārvatī on his lap. Seeing the sages Pārvatī got angry and cursed that men who entered the forest in future would be turned into women. King Sudyumna went to hunt in the forest ignorant of this curse, and as soon as he set foot in the forest he was turned into a woman. Purūravas was the son born to this woman by Budha. (Devi Bhāgavata, 1st Skandha).

KUMĀRAVARSA. A place near mount Raivataka. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 26).

KUMĀRĪ I. A princess of the Kekaya kingdom. She was the mother of Pratiśravas, and wife of Bhīmaseṇa, a King of the Puru dynasty. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 43).

KUMĀRĪ II. In verse 31, Chapter 23 of the Vana Parva, it is stated that certain maidens were born from the body of Skanda. They were called Kumārīs and they used to eat unborn children in the womb of their mothers.

KUMĀRĪ III. Wife of the serpent called Dhanaśrava. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 17).

KUMĀRĪ IV. A river in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 36).
KUMBHALA

2) Birth. Pulastya, one of the Prajāpatis married Havirbhū (Mānini) and a son called Viśravas was born to them.

Rāvana and Kumbhakarna were born to Viśravas of Puspotaṭā, and Vibhiśaṇa was born to him of Rākā, and Khara and Śūrpānakāhā were born to him of Mālīnī. The above version is based on verses—1 to 8 in Chapter 275 of the Vana Parva. But, according to Uttara Rāmāyaṇa, Rāvana, Vibhiśaṇa and Kumbhakarna were born to Viśravas of his wife called Kaikaśī. According to the Agni Purāṇa, Puspotaṭā and Kaikaśī were one and the same.

3) Former births of Kumbhakarna. Rāvana and Kumbhakarna were originally the two Devas called Jaya and Vijaya. Viṣṇu appointed them as gate-keepers at Vaikuṇṭha. Once they stopped sages like Śaṅaka and others at the gates, and the latter cursed Jaya and Vijaya into Rākṣasas. When they complained about the curse to Viṣṇu he promised to welcome them back to Vaikuṇṭha after they had lived three births as Rākṣasas. Accordingly Jaya was born as Hiranyakaśipu and Vijaya as Hīranyaśakīśipu, both of them Asuras. Mahāviṣṇu incarnated himself as a Boar and killed Hīranyaśakī and as Narasimha he killed Hīranyaśakīśipu. Hīranyaśakī and Hīranyaśakīśipu were reborn as Rāvana and Kumbhakarna respectively. Mahāviṣṇu, during his incarnation as Śri Rāma killed both Rāvana and Kumbhakarna. Rāvana was reborn as Śīśupāla and Kumbhakarna as Dantavakra. Both of them were killed by Mahāviṣṇu during his incarnation as Śri Kṛṣṇa. Thus the Deva called Vijaya, on account of the curse of Śaṅaka and other sages, passed through three lives as Hīranyaśakīśipu, Kumbhakarna and Dantavakra and finally reached Vaikuṇṭha. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

KUMBHALA secured boons. Kumbhakarna spent his childhood with his brothers at the āśrama of his father on mount Gandhamadāna. Kubera was at the zenith of his glory at that time, having been crowned king of the Yaksas, and also having got the Puspaka Vīmāna. The reputation of Kubera kindled jealousy in Kumbhakarna and his brothers. They too performed penance in the forest on one foot for a thousand years. But, Brahmā did not appear. They continued the penance without eating any food. Khara and Śūrpānakāhā stayed there serving their brothers. Even after the second thousand years Brahmā did not appear. Then Rāvana cut off his ten heads and made offerings of them to Brahmā. Then Brahmā appeared. Brahmā restored his heads to Rāvana and feed the cows their keepers went with their live-stock every morning to Kumbhaka's place where summer had not yet even peaked in, and after feeding their cows there, they returned home in the evening. But, one evening they led back with them the cows used by the sage for his Pūjās. When the sun set, as usual the sage sat before the sacred fire for Pūjā. But, the cow had not come. With his divine vision he found out the reason for the absence of the cow. He cursed that the region where the keepers of the cows lived be turned into a desert, and the kingdom of Kāśī became a desert place, where-upon king Divodāsa went to the banks of the Gomati and founded a new kingdom there. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa Chapter 2).

KUMBHALA I. One of the three sons of Prahlāda, the other two being Virocana and Nikumbha. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 19).

KUMBHALA II. Son of Kumbhakarna, whose wife Vajrajavālā bore him two sons called Kumbha and Nikumbha. Both of them were very powerful, and Kumbha, in the Rāma-Rāvana war defeated the army of monkeys on various occasions. Many of the ministers of Śuṅgrīva tried to defeat Kumbha. Ahigada, son of Bāli also could not stand up to him. Then Śuṅgrīva fought against Kumbha and flung him into the sea when the water in it rose up to the level of mount Vindhyā. Kumbha came ashore from the sea roaring but was fists to death by Śuṅgrīva. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Canto 76).

KUMBHALA I. A warrior of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 75).

KUMBHALA II. (Nikumbha). A very reputed sage. If he visited any place at dusk he left it only after a thousand years. He visited Kāśi once when King Divodāsa was ruling the state after having killed the Rākṣasas called Kṣemaka, who had lived like a king there. Kumbha lived in a forest in Kāśi with his disciples. Prosperity reigned supreme within a radius of three Yojanas from where the sage lived. Neither wild beasts nor famine infested the area.

Once a fierce famine broke out in Kāśi, and the failure of min caused great havoc. Finding it impossible to and he was granted the boon that he would not be killed by anybody but a man. The Devas shuddered at the gift to Rāvana, and feared about the future in case Kumbhakarna too got such a boon. At their request Sarasvatī danced on his tongue at the time of Kumbhakarna’s request for a boon. Kumbhakarna wanted NIRDEVATVAM (Absence of all Devas). But by a slip of the tongue (caused by Sarasvatī) what he asked for was nidrāvatvam (sleep). Brahmacāda granted him nidrāvatvam; he said that Kumbhakarna would sleep for six months of the year continuously. Vībhīṣaṇa got the boon that he should remember righteousness in danger and use the Brahmāstra without any training in its use. The brothers returned home after securing the boons, and, after driving off Kubera, the lord of Laṅkā, Rāvana and his brothers took their abode there. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275 and Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

5) Death of Kumbhakarna. Kumbhakarna played a very important part in the Rāma-Rāvana war. Prominent warriors on the side of Rāma, like Sugriva, his ministers and Lakṣmaṇa fought with him. But, none of them could kill him. At last, Śri Rāma’s arrows killed him. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuḍḍha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 67).

Kumbhakarna is not to be viewed merely and purely as an evil character. His advice to Rāvana on various occasions shows noble traits of his character. When Śri Rāma with his army of monkeys appeared on the other side of the ocean Rāvana held a conference of his brothers, ministers and others at which Kumbhakarna spoke as follows:—“You abduced Śītā without consulting us, and we would not therefore be responsible for the consequences of that action of yours. But, it is not proper that the younger brother should keep away when danger faces the elder one, and on that principle here I am ready to fight Rāma.”

These weighty words of Kumbhakarna throw considerable light on the character of Kumbhakarna. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuḍḍha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 12).

KUMBHAKARṇAŚRAMA. A holy place. He who visits this place will enjoy the respect of others. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 157).

KUMBHĀNDA. Minister of Bāṇāsura. Citralekha, companion of Uṣā, the daughter of Bāṇa was the daughter of Kumbhānḍa. (See under Uṣā). (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda).

KUMBHAHARETAS (RATHAPRABHU, RATHADH-VĀNA). Bharadvāja, the first son of Sārīṇy married Virāṇa and an Agniideva was born as their son. This Agni is known by the names Kumbharetas, Rathaprabhu and Rathadhivāna. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 220, Verse 9).

KUMBHAŚRAVAS. An attendant of Skandadeva. (Śāla Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 26).

KUMBHAVAKTRA. A warrior of Skandadeva. (Śāla Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 75).

KUMBHAṆYOṆI I. Agastya. (See under Agastya).

KUMBHAṆYOṆI II. A Deva woman who danced in Indrasabhā when Arjuna came to Indraloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 30).

KUMBHĪṆADI. Daughter of Sumālī the Rākṣasa, by Ketumati. She was abducted by the King of Mathurā called Madhupa. Rāvana killed him. (See under Madhupa).

KUMBHĪṆASA. An asura and a notorious philanderer. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 39, Verse 7).

KUMBHĪṆASI I. Wife of Angrārapāṇa, a great Gandharva. When Arjuna was about to kill Cītrarakath Kumbhīṇasī requested Yudhiṣṭhira to save her husband, and he was accordingly set free. (For details see under Angrārapāṇa).

KUMBHĪṆASI II. A daughter born to Viśvāvasu of Analī. A Rākṣasa called Madhu abducted and made her his wife. The famous Lavaṇāṣura was their son.

KUMBHĪṆAṆA (M). One of the twentyeight narakas (hells). It is intended for the cruel folk, who kill for food harmless animals and birds. Since such cruel folk are roasted in Kumbhī fire the hell came to be known by this name. Big vessels full of boiling oil are kept there and the servants of Yama push the sinners into them. One who had killed an animal will be kept in the boiling oil for as many years as the number of hairs the animal killed by him had on its body. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skanda; also see under Pitṛṛthrā).

KUMŪDA I. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 15).

KUMŪDA II. A prominent monkey, who was an attendant of Sugriva. (Vana Parva, Chapter 289, Verse 4).

KUMŪDA III. A great elephant born in the dynasty of Śupratīka. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 15).

KUMŪDA IV. A son of Garuḍa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 12).

KUMŪDA V. One of the five attendants given by Brahmā to Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 39).

KUMŪDA VI. A warrior who fought with Skandadeva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 56).

KUMŪDA VII. A synonym of Mahāviṣṇu. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Verse 76).

KUMŪDA VIII. There are four mountains supporting Mahāmeru on its four sides, and Kumuda is one of those four mountains, Mandara, Merumandara and Supārśva being the other three. According to the 8th Skanda of the Devī Bhāgavata there are other twenty mountains on the four sides of Mahāmeru, viz. Kuraṅga, Kuraga, Kuśumbha, Viśaṅkata, Trīkūṭa, Śīśa, Patangā, Rucaka, Nila, Niṣadhā, Śītvāsa, Kapila, Śaṅkha, Vaidūrya, Cārudhi, Harīsa, Rāṣabha, Nāga, Kālāṇjara and Nārada.

KUMUDĀDI. One of those Vedic scholars, who belonged to the line of Vyāsa’s disciples. His forte was the Atharvaveda. Jaimini was a reputed disciple of Vyāsa. His son, Sumantu, taught his disciple Kābandha the Atharvaveda. Kābandha divided it into two between Devadāraśa and Pathya. Medhā, Brahmaṇī, Śaṅkāyāni and Pippalāda were the disciples of Devadāraśa, and Jābāli, Kumudādi and Saunaka were the disciples of Pathya. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 6).

KUMUDĀKṢA. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 15).

KUMUDAMĀLĪ (KUMUDAMĀṆI). One of the four attendants given by Brahmā to Skanda, the other three being Nandiseda, Ghaṇṭikārṇa and Lohitākṣa. All the four were very powerful, as swift and speedy as... wind and noted for their sexual energy. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 25).

KUMUDODARA. A particular region in the Śāka island. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 25)

KUMUDVATI. Wife of King Vīmarṣa of Kīrātadeśa. Kumudvati requested him one day, to put a stop to his cruelties against the people. His reply was as follows:—"Oh! dear wife, don’t feel sorry. In my past life I was a dog, and starved almost to death. I went to the gates of the Śiva temple at Pampāpura. It was Caturdāśī day, and thousands of people had gathered there, and I stood there looking at the Śivalīṅga. Then someone cried out, ‘Beat the dog to death’, and though, in mortal terror, ‘I ran thrice about the temple, people beat me to death. Since, although only by accident, I had run thrice around the temple, I was born as a King in the present life. I cherish the greatest devotion for Lord Śiva; but, as inherent tendencies do not die out so easily I possess certain characteristics of the dog and that is why I commit the present cruelties.”

On hearing her husband’s past history Kumudvati wanted to know about her past also, and Vīmarṣa said thus : “In the past life you were a she-dove. Once you sat on the top of a Pārvatī temple with a piece of flesh in your beak. Then another dove tried to snatch it from you, and with it you flew thrice round the temple. But, the other dove killed you and flew away with the piece of flesh. Since you flew around the Pārvatī temple thrice you are now born as a queen.” Vīmarṣa told her this also that in the next birth she would be born as the daughter of King Śṛijāya, as the daughter of the King of Kālīṅga in her third rebirth, as the daughter of the King of Magadhā in her fourth birth, as the daughter of King Daśārṇa in her fifth birth, as the daughter of Yayāti in her sixth birth, as the daughter named Vasumati of the King of Vidarbha in her seventh birth, and that ultimately she would attain salvation. Vīmarṣa in his next birth would likewise be born as the Sinhu King, as the King of Saurāṣṭra in his third birth, as the King of Gāndhāra in his fourth birth, as King of Avanti in his fifth birth, as King Anarta in his sixth birth, as King of the Pāṇḍyas in his seventh birth, and that ultimately he too would attain salvation. Thus Vīmarṣa taught his wife that both of them would ultimately attain salvation as they had gone round the temple. (Śiva Purāṇa, Caturdaśīmāhātmya).

KUMUDVATI II. Wife of Kuśa, son of Śrī Rāma. Kuśa lost the ornaments on his hands in water once while he was bathing in the river. Angry at the loss Kuśa was about to shoot his arrows at the Sarayu when the nāga called Kumuda not only returned to him lost ornaments but also gave Kumudvati as wife to him. (Ānanda Rāmāyaṇa).

KUNADIKĀ. A warrior of Skanda deva. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 58).

KUNDAVANTA. A Vidyā brahmin, Kuṇḍadanta gave up his worldly possession for the attainment of spiritual knowledge, and sought the help of sage Kadamba. Finding that he had not yet completely mastered the senses Kadamba sent him to Ayodhyā, where he lived with Śrī Rāma, and Vāsīṣṭṭha taught him the necessary texts on the subject so that he attained spiritual knowledge. (Yogavāśīṣṭṭha).

KUNDAHĀRA I. A son of Dhrtaṛāṣṭra. He is known as Kuṇḍodara also. Bhīmasena killed him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 88, Verse 23).

KUNDAHĀRA II. A serpent worshipping Varuṇa in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 9).

KUNDAHĀRA III. A cloud. None of the Devas condescended to bless a poor brahmin, who once performed penance in the forest when a cloud called Kuṇḍaḥāra appeared and told him that, if the Devas would permit, he (cloud) would bless him. Immediately the Deva called Mānībhadrā requested the cloud to bless the brahmin. The cloud did so and the brahmin attained salvation. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 271).

KUNDAJĀ (KUNDAHEDĪ). A son of Dhrtaṛāṣṭra; Bhīma killed him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 26).

KUNDA LA I. A serpent born in the Kaurava dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 16).

KUNḍAŚI. See under Kuṇḍalī III.

KUNDA ṬIKA. Great-grandson of King Kuru of the lunar dynasty, and son of Dhrtaṛāṣṭra. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 58).

KUNDINA. The capital of ancient Vidarbha. Damayanti was born and brought up in this city. (See under Damayanti).

KUNDĪVĀṢA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 50).

KUNDĪVRṢA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 9).

KUNḍODARA I. A son of Dhrtaṛāṣṭra. Bhīma killed him. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 88, Verse 23).

KUNḍODARA II. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 16).

KUNḍODARA III. Sixth son of King Janamejaya. The King had eight sons, Viz. Dhrtaṛāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu, Bāhlīka, Nīṣadha, Jambūnada, Kuṇḍodara, Padāti and Vāsīṭṭha. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 57).
KUNJARGA. A reputed sage. By severe austerities he increased his spiritual powers, created a girl by his mental power, and afterwards entered into Śamādhi. The girl, who did not relish the idea of marriage, began penance in solitude, and she grew old. In the Mahābhārata she is known as Vyḍḍhakanyā (Old Virgin). In the evening of her life she longed to give up her material body and to attain salvation. At this juncture Nārada told her that salvation was not for unmarried women. She, therefore, gave half the power of her penance to a young man called Śrīigāvāṇ and lived as his wife for one single night. She thus attained salvation (Śalya Parva, Chapter 52).

KUNINDA. A noble brahmin. He presented a divine conch to Yudhiṣṭhira at his Kajṣuṣya Yajña. (Śabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Southern text).

KUNJA. A reputed sage. Once he enjoyed the company of Pramlōca, the celestial woman. (See under Pramlōca).

KUNJALA I. A warrior of Skanda. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45).

KUNJALA II. A wise parrot which lived on the banks of the river Narmadā. The Padma Purāṇa (Chapter 85, Bhūmikhaṇḍa) has the following to say about the parrot.

Kunjala, the wise parrot, had a wife and four sons called Ujvala, Samujjvala, Vijvala and Kapitūjala. These brothers used to feed themselves on sweet fruits etc. on the planes, mountains and other places. They also used to carry tasty fruits to their parents. The four brothers thus led a happy life in every way. (See under Subāhu).

KUNJARA. A great monkey. Aṇjanā mother of Hanūmān was the daughter of Kunjara. (Valmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiśkindhā Kāṇḍa; Canto 66, Verse 9).

KUNJALA II. A well-known serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 15).

KUNJARA III. A prince of the Sāuvira country. He was a follower of Jayadratha, and was killed by Arjuna. (Vana Parva, Chapter 271).

KUNTAKA (KUNTALA). A Sanskrit poet who flourished in the eleventh century A.D. He was a contemporary of Abhinavagupta, and a critic who maintained that the 'life' of real poetry was Vakrōkti (expressing ideas in an artistically round-about way instead of in a blunt and plain manner).

KUNTALA. The King of the country Kuntala. Kuntalā was a Kingdom in ancient South India. The King of the country was called Kuntala and the people were known as Kuntalās. (Śabhā Parva, and Bhīṣma Parva).

KUNTĪ (PRTHĀ). Wife of King Pāṇḍu and the mother of the Pāṇḍavas, Kuntī is a noble heroine in the Mahābhārata.

1) Birth. Kuntī was the sister of Śrī Krṣṇa’s father Vasudeva. Her real name was Prthā. Vasudeva and Prthā were the children of King Śūrasena of the Yādava dynasty. King Kuntibhoja was the son of Śūrasena’s sister. He had no issues. Śūrasena had promised to give the daughter first born to him as the adopted daughter of Kuntibhoja, and accordingly his first-born daughter Prthā was given to Kuntibhoja, and Kuntī was brought up in his palace. From that day onwards Prthā came to be known as Kuntī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 111).

Kuntī, Mādrī and Gāndhārī were born from aspects respectively of the three celestial women Śīrdhī, Kṛti and Matī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 160).

2) Kuntī and the mantra. To treat brahmmins who came to the court of Kuntibhoja with worshipful offerings etc. was the duty of Kuntī. Once sage Durvāṣas visited Kuntibhoja, and as he knew that the sage was easily annoyed Kuntī was specially deputed for his service, and she served him to the utmost. One day, to test Kuntī, he asked her to be ready with his food by the time he took his bath, and he took practically no time to return after bath and sit for meals. By that time Kuntī had managed to cook his food, which she placed before him in a plate. The food was too hot and steaming, and the sage meaningfully looked at the back of Kuntī. Realising the meaning of the look, Kuntī turned her back to the sage for him to place the plate of food thereon. The sage placed it accordingly on her back and began eating. Though her back was really burning she showed no sign of it. Pleased at her behaviour the sage taught her a mantra and blessed her to the following effect.

"Repeating this mantra you invoke whichever Deva you like and thanks to his favour you will get children. (Kathāsaritsāgara, Lāvāpakalambaka, Tārānga 2 and Bhārata (Malayālām) Chapter 111).

3) Kuntī tested the mantra. After the departure of Durvāṣas from the palace, Kuntī developed an irresistible desire to test the efficacy of the mantra. and one day she invoked Sun-god with the mantra. Thereupon Śūrya approached her in the guise of a brahmin youth. Kuntī got alarmed. Owing to disinclination to become an unmarried mother Kuntī could not make up her mind to welcome the brahmin youth. But, Śūrya deva argued that his coming could not be in vain, and Kuntī had to yield. She requested Śūrya for a son adorned with helmet, ear-rings etc. (Vana Parva Chapter 207 Verse 17).

Śūrya assured Kuntī that even though a child was born to her from him, that will not affect her virginity and departed. Kuntī delivered a son in due course of time in secret. She locked up the child in a box and floated it in the Yamuna. An old charioteer called Adhiratha picked up the child from the river and brought it up as though it were his own son. That boy grew up to become the famous Karṇa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112).

4) Kuntī’s wedding. In due course Kuntibhoja celebrated Kuntī’s Svayaṁvara and she chose King Pāṇḍu of the lunar dynasty as her husband, and Pāṇḍu took her to Hastināpura in all pomp and glory. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112).

5) Kuntī’s wedded life. Pāṇḍu married another wife also called Mādrī, and all the three of them led a very happy life. During one of those days Pāṇḍu went on a hunting in the forest and arrowed to death sage Kindama, who was making love with his wife in the forest, both of them having assumed the forms of deer. The sage cursed Pāṇḍu with death the moment he touched his wives, and grief-stricken at the curse he told his wives about it and decided to take Sannyāsa. But, the wives told him that they would commit suicide in case he took to Sannyāsa. Ultimately Pāṇḍu went to Śataśīṛṅga with his wives, and there he began the performance of penances.

After some time Pāṇḍu asked his wives to become mothers by some noble persons. But, Kuntī and Mādrī did not agree to it. Then Kuntī told Pāṇḍu about the boon she had got from Durväas, and with his permission she bore three sons called Dharmaputra, Bhima and Arjuna respectively from the three Devas, Dharma, Väyu and Indra. As it had been ordained that the fourth and fifth children would bring sorrows and pain to the parents Kunti satisfied herself with three children (Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Verses 77, 78).

But, as Pându desired that Mädrî also should have children by Kunti's mantra she used the remaining mantra and two sons, Nakula and Sahadeva from the Asvinides were born to her.

6) Kunti widowed. During a winter when the forest was fragrant with flowers, Pându forgot all about the Sage's curse and indulged in sexual joys with Mädrî, and immediately he expired. Kunti and Mädrî competed with each other to end their life in the funeral pyre of their husband. But, as the sages and other relations insisted that one of them should live to bring up the children, Mädrî alone ended her life, and Kunti returned to Hastinapura with the five children. (Adi Parva, Chapter 125).

7) Kunti at Hastinapura. At Hastinapura differences cropped up between the Pândavas and the Kauravas. Kunti and the five Pândavas removed themselves to the 'Lac palace' built at Vāranāvata. When the palace was gutted by fire Kunti and her sons escaped through a secret tunnel to the forest, and Bhima carried the worn out Kunti on his shoulders. In the forest the Rākṣasa woman Hidimbî, requested Kunti to permit Bhima to become her husband, and Kunti advised Bhima to beget a child by Hidimbî, and thus was born Ghaṭotkaca. At the city named Ekaakrā, Vyāsa consoled Kunti. There the brahmins complained to Kunti about the depredations of Bakāsura. Kunti got Baka killed by Bhima and asked the brahmans to keep the matter secret.

On the advice of a brahmin who came there accidentally Kunti and others visited the Pāñcāla kingdom, and there Arjuna, having defeated all the Kings present at Pāñcālî's Śvayamvara wedded her. The Pāñcāla who returned with Pāñcālî at dusk time were asked by Kunti to enjoy that day's bhikṣā (Alms received) together among themselves. Accordingly Pāñcālî became the wife of all the five Pāñcālas. Vidura, at the court of the Pāñcāla King saluted Kunti and presented to her various varieties of gems. Kunti and Vidura talked about the painful incidents of the past, and Vidura escorted the Pāñcālas back to Hastinapura.

Arjuna led a solitary life in the forest for one year, and then returned to Hastinapura with Subhadrâ whom he had married meanwhile. Kunti received Subhadrâ heartily. In the game of dice with Durveyodhana, Dharmaputra was defeated, and the Pāñcālas again started for their life in the forest. During this period Kunti lived in Vidura's house. Meanwhile Śrī Kṛṣṇa one day visited Kunti, and she told Kṛṣṇa about the fate of her sons with tears in her eyes. Durveyodhana refused to give half of the kingdom to the Pāñcālas, who returned after twelve years' life in exile in the forest and one year's life incognito. Śrī Kṛṣṇa prompted the Pāñcālas to war with the Kauravas, and both the parties began preparations for war. (Adi Parva, from Chapter 135 to Sabhâ and Vana Parvans and Udyoga Parva, upto Chapter 137).

8) Kunti before Karna. War clouds grew thick and fast, and Kunti at Vidura's house got restless. Her heart trembled at the disasters of war as described by Vidura. She went alone to the banks of the Gaṅgâ where just then Karna was engaged in Japa with his hands raised and face turned to the east. Kunti waited for some time after which they began to talk. With tears in her eyes Kunti told Karna that he was her son and implored him to return to the Pāñcāva side to which Karna replied as follows: "Oh! noble lady, that is quite impossible. I have vowed to kill Arjuna. I will not kill the other four Pāñcāvas. You shall always have five sons alive. If Arjuna were to be no more I would be there for you in his stead."

Kunti shuddered at those terrible words of Karna, and thus did both of them part with each other. (Udyoga Parva, Chapters 145 and 146).

9) Last days of Kunti. The great war ended. Thousands of warriors on the Kaurava side like the mighty Karna were no more. On the Pāñcāva side also many were killed. Though the Pāñcāvas won the war their hearts no more enjoyed peace or happiness. Kunti suffered as though caught in a wild fire. She asked the Pāñcāvas to perform the obsequies for Karna also. When she let out the secret that Karna was her first-born child Dharmaputra burst into tears. Kunti consoled Subhadrâ and Uttarâ who were lamenting over the death of Abhimanyu. She requested Śrī Kṛṣṇa to cremate the dead son of Uttarâ.

Then Kunti went to Gāndhârî, who stood there bathed in tears. Grief-stricken, Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhârî started for the forest. Holding Gāndhârî's hand in hers Kunti led the way. The Pāñcāvas prevented their mother from going, but she did not yield. She advised Dharmaputra to have a special eye on Sahadeva, not to forget Karna's name and not to show any displeasure towards Bhima and Pāñcālî. But, the Pāñcāvas wanted to follow their beloved mother into the forest. Pāñcālî and Subhadrâ stationed themselves behind Kunti, who shed copious tears at the sight. Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhârî, who also felt deeply pained at the sight tried their best to dissuade Kunti from following them to the forest. But, Kunti consoled her sons and daughters-in-law by means of sympathetic words and followed Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhârî to the banks of the Gaṅgâ, where all of them lived together. The Pāñcāvas felt acutely the absence of their mother at home. They went to the forest and paid their respects to Kunti on the banks of the Gaṅgâ. Kunti embraced Sahadeva with tears in her eyes. Though Yudhîṣṭhira and Sahadeva wanted to stay with Kunti in her service she did not allow that. Kunti, Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhârî performed penance in the forest near the Gaṅgâ, taking food only once in a month. The three of them died there in a wild fire. (Āśrama-vāsika Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 31). Their relations immersed their bones in the Gaṅgâ and performed the necessary obsequies. (Śrī, Śānti, Āśrama-vāsika and Āśvamedhika Parvans).

10) Kunti in Devaloka. Kunti, Mādrî and Pându went to Devaloka. (Śvargarohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 15).

KUNTI II. A particular region in ancient India. The warriors there were known as Kuntis. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 11).
KUNTI III. An urban area in ancient India. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 27).

KUNTI IV. A King born in the Yayāti dynasty.

KUNTI BHĪJO. 1) General. A King of the Yadu dynasty; son of the sister of Sūrasena, who was the father of Vasudeva and grandfather of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (For genealogy see under Śrī Kṛṣṇa). Kuntibhoja was also the foster-father of Kunti, the daughter of Sūrasena. (See Para 1, under Kunti 1).

2) Other information. (i) Sahadeva, during his triumphal march over the southern kingdoms subjugated Kuntibhoja. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 16).

(ii) He participated in the Rājasūya Yajña of Yudhishṭhira. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 12).

(iii) The son of Kuntibhoja also became famous under the same name, and Purujit was the son of this Kuntibhoja. Both of them were uncles of the Pāṇḍavas. (Kṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 22).

(iv) On the first day of the Kurukṣetra war Kuntibhoja and his sons fought with Vinda and Anuvinda. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 72).

(v) It was Kuntibhoja who occupied the netrāsthāna (eye-position) of the Kruṇacā vyūha set up by Dhṛṣṭadyumna. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 47).

(vi) Kuntibhoja and Satānīka occupied the Pāda-āsthāna (foot position) of the Makuṟavāvyūha on the Pāṇḍava side. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 11).

(vii) He possessed a noble and high-bred horse. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 46).

(viii) In the great war he fought with Alambuṣa. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 16, Verse 193).

(ix) Ten of his children were killed by Aiṣvattāmā. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 18).

KUṬAṬA. An Asura son of Kaṇṣyapa by Danu. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 26).

KURĀṅGA. One of the mountains which encircle Mahāmeru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

KURĀṅGAKŚETRA. A holy place. He who bathes here and observes fast for three nights will attain salvation. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25).

KURANṆU. (The Malayālam word for monkey).

Kaṇṣyapa, the grandson of Brahmā and son of Marici married eight daughters of Dakṣaprajāpati and one of them Krodhavāsā delivered ten daughters. Monkeys and lions were born from Harī, one of those ten daughters. Thus they are brothers, and both are called 'hari'. (Valmiki Ramāyaṇa, Aranyaka Kāṇḍa, Canto 14, Verse 24).

KUṆAPARVATA. One of the mountains which encircle Mahāmeru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

KUṆCĀMUKHA. One of the sons of Viṣṇumitra.

They were Brahmavādins, (expounders of Brahmā) (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 53).

KŪRMA. I. A prominent serpent, son of Kadrū. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 41).

KŪRMA II. (Turtle). The second incarnation of Mahāvīru. (See under Avataras).

KŪRMAPURĀṆA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. (See under Purāṇas).

KUṆU I. A King called Kuru was born in Dhrūva's dynasty. Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus; Brahmā — Svāyambhuva Manu—Uttānapāda—Dhrūva—Śiṣṭi—Ripu—Cākṣṣuṣa (Cākṣṣuṣa Manu)—Kuru. King Kuru was the grandfather of the reputed Vena and the great grandfather of emperor Pṛthu. Anīga was the father of Vena. Not much is said about this Kuru in the Purāṇas. Kuru had ten brothers called Puru, Āru, Satādyumna, Tapasvī, Satyavāk, Śuci, Aṃgīṣṭha, Adhiratha, Śudyumna and Abhimanyu. Kuru had by his wife Aṭreyī seven sons called Āṅgī, Sumanas Śvātī, Kṛatū, Aṃgīrās, Gaya and Śibi, and to Aṅgī was born by his wife Sunīṭhā the son, who became reputed as Vena. Pṛthu was Vena's son. Pṛthu had five sons called Antarādhana, Vādī, Śūtra, Māgadhā, Pālita. To Antarādhana was born by his wife Śikhiṇḍini a son called Havirdhāna, to whom were born by his wife Dhiṣaṇā six sons called Prācīnabharīs, Sukra, Gaya, Kṛṣṇa, Vṛja and Ajiṇa. The above is the only information available about this Kuru dynasty in the Purāṇas. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 13).

KUṆU II. Two sons, i.e. Uttānapāda and Priyavrata were born to Svāyambhuva Manu of his wife Sātārūpā. One King Kuru born in the dynasty of Uttānapāda has been referred to above, i.e. Kuru I. Another King Kuru is noticed in Priyavrata's dynasty. To Priyavrata were born of his wife Bariḥṣmati fourteen sons called Aṅgīdhra, Idhmajihva, Yajñabāhu, Mahāvīra, Gṛhtapṛṣṭha, Sava, Hiraṇyaretā, Medhāthi, Viśhitroṣa, Kavi, Uṛjaspati, Uttama, Tāmāsa and Raivata. To Aṅgīdhra by his wife Purvavati were born nine sons called Nābhi, Kimpurṣa, Hari, Ilīṝa, Ramayaka, Hiraṇyakṣa, Kuru, Bhadrāvīśa and Ketumāla. One King Kuru appears among them; but nothing more than the fact that he married a woman called Nāri is known about him. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

KUṆU III. A King, the brother of Rāṇīdeva. (See under Rāṇīdeva).

To Kuru were born four sons called Parikṣīt, Sudhaṇu, Jahnū and Nisādhaṇa. The genealogy of the Kuru Kings is as follows: Sudhanus—Cyavana—Kṛṣṇa—Uparīcaravasu—Bṛhadṛathra—Kuṣāṇḍra—Ṛṣabha—Pūṣpavāṇa—Juhu.

Jarāsandha was another son of Bṛhadṛathra. Jarāsandha had four sons called Soma, Saḥadeva, Turya and Sruṭaṣru. From Jahnū, the following sons were born:—Sūratha—Viṣṇūratha—Sārvabhauma—Jayatina—Kaviya—Bhāvika—Cakrodha—Devatīthi—Ṛṣa—Śhīma and Pratāca. Purva had three sons called Devāṇi, Santānu and Bālīka. Santānu is known as Mahābhāṣak, also, Dhrtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu were the successors of Santānu, and they came to be known as Kauravas also as they belonged to the dynasty of Kuru. But, since the sons of Pāṇḍu were born of Devas they may not be called Kauravas.

2) Other Information. (1) Kurukṣetra became holy and sanctified on account of Kuru's tapas. (Adi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 80).

(ii) While Kuru was once ploughing a land in Kuruksetra Indra appeared there, and they had a talk. (Sālaya Parva, Chapter 53 Verse 6).

(iii) While Kuru was once performing a yajña at Kuruksetra, the river Sarasvatī went there under the name Sureṇu (Oghavatī) and watered the land. (Sālaya Parva, Chapter 38, Verses 26 and 27).

KURU V. One of the sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 8).

KURU VI. A son born to Sarvaranā of Tapati. The boy, following his naming and other consecratory rites, grew up like fire in which was offered havīs (ghee). At the age of ten he became omniscient. At the age of sixteen he married Saudāmini, daughter of Sudāman. (Vāmanā Purāṇa, Chapter 21).

KURUJĀNGALĀM (KURU). A kingdom in ancient India of which Ḥastināpura was the capital. This kingdom acquired the name Kurujāngala from Kuru. (Adī Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 49).

KURUKŚETRA.

1. General. Made famous by the Mahābhārata, Kurukṣetra is a sacred place situated to the south of the river Sarasvatī and north of Drṣadavatī. People who live in this region really live in heaven. (Arayakāṇḍa, Chapter 83, Verse 4).

According to Pulastya even those who come into contact with the dust blown by the wind from this place meet with auspicious end.

2. Other details. (i) Takṣaka lived on the banks of the river Ikṣumati in Kurukṣetra (Adī Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 139).

(ii) Kurukṣetra became a sacred place as king Kuru did tapas there. (Adī Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 50).

(iii) Two sons called Citrāṅgada and Vicitrārvya were born to Santanu of Satyavrata. Once while hunting in a forest Citrāṅgada met a Gandharva, whose name also was Citrāṅgada. The Gandharva got angry that a man bore his name and so he killed Citrāṅgada. The incident took place at Kurukṣetra (Adī Parva, Chapter 101, Verses 8 and 9).

(iv) Sunda and Upasunda, who conquered all the worlds lived in Kurukṣetra (Adī Parva, Chapter 209, Verse 27).

(v) Before the Khāṇḍava forest was burnt down Takṣaka left the place and went to Kurukṣetra and lived there. (Adī Parva, Chapter 226, Verse 4).

(vi) During their life of exile in the forest the Pāṇḍavas visited Kurukṣetra (Vana Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 1).

(vii) King Māṇḍhātā once conducted a yajña within the boundaries of Kurukṣetra. (Vana Parva, Chapter 126, Verse 45).

(viii) The reputed sage Mudgala lived here. (Vana Parva, Chapter 260, Verse 3).

(ix) Once a fierce fight took place here (Kurukṣetra) between Bhīṣma and Parashūrama. Parāśūrama wanted Bhīṣma to accept Ambā, daughter of the King of Kāśi as his wife.

(x) Bhīṣma lay wounded on the bed of arrows here. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 92).

(xi) Kurukṣetra had been formerly known as Samantapaṇḍaka. Since King Kuru made this place holy it came to be known as Kurukṣetra thereafter.

(xii) It was at Kurukṣetra that the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas waged a fierce war and it was here that Śrī Kṛṣṇa taught Arjuna the Gītā. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 258, Verse 42).

(xiii) Emperor Sudarśana, son of Agni, who was famous for his hospitality, lived here. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 40).

KURUPAṆCA. The combined name for Kuru and Pāñcāla in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KURUTA. A Sage mentioned in Rgveda. He is also known as Kṛṣṇa. (For details see under Kṛṣṇa).

KURUTĪRTIKA. A sacred place to the south of Taṁsāsī in Kurukṣetra. He who takes a bath here will enter Brāhma-loka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 166).

KURUVAMŚA. See under KURU.

KURUVARṆĀKA. An urban area in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KURUVARŚA (M) The country ruled over by Kuru came to be called Kuruvarśam.

KURUVINDA. An urban area in ancient India. The people of Kuruvinda were called Kuruvindas. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 87, Verse 9).

KUŚA I. A great sage of ancient India. He was as effulgent as burning fire. The famous Sage Viśvāmitra was born in Kuśa's dynasty. (For genealogy etc see under Viśvāmitra).

KUŚA II. One of the two sons of Śrī Rāma, the other, being Lava.

1) Birth. To Sītā forsaken by Rāma a son called Lava was born while she was living at the āsrāma of Vālmiki. One day Sītā took Lava to the stream to bathe him, and Vālmiki, who did not know about it was upset not to see the child in the āsrāma. He feared that it might have been eaten up by some animal, and fearing that Sītā might die when she missed the child he created a child with Kuśa grass and laid it where Lava was lying before. When Sītā returned to the āsrāma with Lava after their bath Vālmiki explained the whole situation to Sītā. Since the second child was created with Kuśa grass he was called Kuśa, and he was made the second son of Sītā (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa and Kathāsārītāgāra, Alāṅkāravatīlambaka, Tārāṅga 1).

2) Kuśa went to Ayodhyā. Śrī Rāma decided to conduct an Aśvamedha yajña. It was ordained that the emperor, who conducted a yajña should have his wife. As Sītā had been abandoned, Rāma had no wife for the purposes of the yajña. It was laid down that in the absence of the wife a statue of hers may be made with palāśa wood. But, Vasiṣṭha decreed that a statue of Sītā might be made with gold. The yajña was to be held in the Naimiṣa forest. During the triumphal tour of Śatrughna with the yājñika horse he reached the banks of the river Tamasā near the āsrāma of Vālmiki where
KUSA II

Lava and Kuśa captured the horse. Śatrughna could not defeat Lava and Kuśa, and they routed the additional force also which arrived under the leadership of Lakṣmana to help Śatrughna. Then Vālmiki intervened and the horse was returned to Śatrughna. Afterwards, Vālmiki, Sitā and Lava kuśas also attended Śrī Rāma's yajña where Lava and Kuśa recited the poem Rāmāyaṇa composed by Vālmiki. Rāma recognised the boys and they were made to live in Ayodhya. Thus did Kuśa visit Ayodhya.

The Kathāsaritsagāra tells the following story about Kuśa's visit to Ayodhya.

Vālmiki duly performed the thread-wearing ceremony of Lava and Kuśa and taught them, even in their very childhood, all arts and sciences including the secrets about divine arrows. The boys one day killed a deer in the āśrama and worshipped with its flesh the liṅga, which Vālmiki used to worship daily, and as a result of that the sage became ill. Sitādevī requested for penance for the action of her children, and Vālmiki said that Lava should bring golden lotus flowers from Vaśiśtraṇāja's pond and flowers of Kalpakavrka from his garden, and that Lava and Kuśa together should worship the Sivalīṅga with those flowers. Lava then went to mount Kaḷāśa and after killing many yakṣas collected the flowers. On his way back he rested for some time at the foot of a tree. Just then Lakṣmana, who was on the look-out for a human being for the naramedha (human sacrifice) of Śrī Rāma, also reached the spot. He decided to take Lava captive with him, and they fought with each other for some time. At last Lakṣmana took Lava captive by using mohanāstra (arrow which makes the opponent unconscious) and took him to Ayodhya. Sitā was pained that Lava had not returned yet, and Vālmiki with his divine vision understood the reason for his absence. He deputed Kuśa to Ayodhya to bring back with him Lava somehow or other. When Kuśa reached Ayodhya, Śrī Rāma was conducting the Aśvamedha yajña, and Kuśa, successfully confronting a number of people, got into the yajña ground. In the combat that ensued between Kuśa and Lakṣmana the latter was defeated, as he could not defeat Kuśa due to the greatness of Vālmiki. When Śrī Rāma asked Kuśa who he was he replied that he was the brother of Lava and that he had heard from his mother Sitā that both of them were the sons of Śrī Rāma. Rāma was overjoyed to hear that and he covered the boys with kisses. Sitā also was brought down from the āśrama of Vālmiki, and all of them lived very happily. (Kathāsaritsagāra, Alakāravatīlambakā, Tāragī 1).

3). Kuśa's reign. Following the demise of Lakṣmana Śrī Rāma divided the country between Kuśa and Lava. A city called Kuśavati was built in the Kosala Kingdom and Kuśa was crowned King thereof. Thirtytwo out of the sixtyfour akṣauhiniṣ of the kings of the solar dynasty, four out of the eight ministers and half of the movable property were allotted to Kuśa. Lava was crowned king of north Kosala where a city called Saravati was built for him, and the other half of the army, ministers etc. became his share. While Kuśa and Lava were ruling the country thus, Śrī Rāma immolated himself in the depths of the river Saravī (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KUNA III

A king born in the Kuru dynasty. To Kuru, who built Kuruksetra was born a son called Sudhanva, and to him was born Subotra, who became the father of Cyavana. Subotra begot of another wife Giriṅa seven sons called Bhṛادرatha, Kuśa, Yadu, Pratyagraha, Bala, Matsyakāla and Vīra. Kuśa was one of the seven sons. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 78).

KUSABINDU. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 56).

KUSACĪRĀ. A river the water of which Indians of ancient days used to drink. (Bhīṣma Parva. Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KUSADHĀRĀ. A river the water from which Indians used to drink. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 24).

KUSADHVAJA I. A brahmin, son of Bṛhaspati. Penniless and poor, the brahmin once sought the help of King Āśva. The miserly king did not give him anything. Thereafter he began worshipping Bhagavati with the object of making some money. While meditating upon Bhagavati a girl emerged out of his mouth. She was named Devavati. When she came of age an asura called Śambhu desired to marry her; but Kuśadhvaja did not agree to the proposal. Enraged at the refusal Śambhu killed Kuśadhvaja while the latter was asleep one night. But Devavati cursed and reduced the asura into ashes. Then she took herself to penance to secure Mahāviṣṇu as her husband when Kaiśa happened to be there, and he tried to make her his wife. But, she repelled all his attempts at which he caught hold of her by the hair. She escaped by cutting her hair. She then immolated herself in burning fire. It was this Devavati, who was, in her next life, born as Sītā, daughter of King Janaka (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

KUSADHVAJA II. Brother of King Janaka, father of Sītā. He lived on the banks of the river Ikṣumati. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bhilākanda, Canto 70). See under JANAKA I.

KUSADHVAJA III. A King. The following story about him is quoted from the Skanda Purāṇa. Kuśadhvaja was a monkey in his former birth, and as he had then performed the auspicious action of swinging Śiva in a cradle throughout day and night, in the next birth he was born as King Kuśadhvaja. One day the King abducted the daughter of the Sage Āgnivesa when she was bathing. The Sage cursed the King into the form of a vulture. He was promised redemption from the curse that he would regain his human form on the day on which he helped Indradyumna.

KUSADVIPA. One of the the seven islands. Kuśa island is rich in pearls. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 13). Jambu, Plakṣa, Śālmali, Kuśa, Krauṇḍa, Śaka and Puṣkara are the seven islands (Saptadvīpas). Śālmali island has double the area of Plakṣa. Each island, in this order, is twice as large as the preceding one. (Devī Bhagavata, 8th Skandha).

Kuśa island encircles the sea of Surā (Wine.) Jyotismān was the chief over the island. He had seven sons called Udbhida, Veṇuṁān, Vairatha, Lambana, Dṛṣṭi, Prabhākara and Kapila. The Subcontinents, are called by their names. In Kuśa island, along with Daityas and
The ancient Kusa.

Brahmadatta, have of Skandha daughter Sage. The few Kusa child its Krsna General. (Brahmanda Purusa, Chapter 57).

This statement is not quite correct. Certain other Purunas maintain that Gadh, the father of Visvamitra was the son of Kuśanābha, who was the son of Kuśika and brother of Kuśambha. (See under Kuśanābha).

Kuśānābha. A son born to Kuśa of Vidarbha. (For genealogy see under Visvamitra). Sage Kuśa had four sons, namely Kuśambha, Kuśanābha, Asutarmacar and Vasu, and Kušanābha built Mahodayapura and lived there. One hundred daughters were born to him of his wife Ghṛtacī. VAYUBHAGAVAN once asked the girls to marry him at which proposal they laughed at him in derision. He cursed them and made them hunch-backed ugly women, and Kušanābha felt very sorry about this cruel fate of his daughters.

To Somadā, daughter of a Gandharva woman called Urmilā, had been born a son, Brahmadatta, due to the mental power of the sage Cūli. Kuśanābha gave in marriage his hundred daughters to Brahmadatta, and they were cured of their hunch at the touch of Brahmadatta and became their previous beautiful selves.

Kušanābha conducted the yajña called Putrakāmeṣṭi, and Kuśa, who was so pleased by the yajña blessed him to have a son called Gadhī. Visvamitra was the son of this Gadhī. Visvamitra had also a sister Satyavatī, whom Rṣika wedded. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bālakanda, Cantos 32-35).

Kuśaplava (Kuśaplavanam). A holy place. He who bathes and spends three nights there will derive the benefits of an aśvamedha yajña. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 21). It was here that Diti, wife of Kaśyapa did tapas for a son who would be equal to Indra. Again it was here that Indra entered into the womb of Diti and cut into pieces the child in the womb. Kuśaplava became famous because of the above happenings. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bālakanda, Canto 46).

Kuśāstamba. A sacred centre in the Kuśa island. He who bathes here attains a place in heaven surrounded by Deva women. See under Kuśadvīpa. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 28).

Kuśasthali. The ancient name of Dvārakāpurī; an island. It was emperor Revata, son of Anarta, the grandson of Vaivasvata Manu, who first built a city in Kuśasthali and ruled the country. Their genealogy: Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahma—Marci—Kaśyapa—Viivasvān—Vaivasvata Manu—Sāyati (Sāyati)—Anarta—Revata. Certain Purūṇas state that it was Anarta, who first built forts at Kuśasthali. It would not be incorrect to say that Anarta built forts in this city first founded by his son Revata. The city was sunk in the sea after a few years. Afterwards the region remained as a forest for long years. It was later on that Śrī Kaśa built Dvārakā there. Following Kaśa’s death the Yādava dynasty got annihilated and the region was again swallowed by the ocean. Dvārakā is believed to have been an island situated in the sea to the west of Gujarat. Even today there is a place called Dvārakā on the coast of India to the west of Gujarat. (Devi Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha and Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

Kuśāsva. An Ikṣvāku King of King Sahadeva and father of King Somadatta. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bālakanda, Canto 47).

Kuśavān. A deep region in the lake called Ujjānaka near Mānasā lake. (Vana Parva, Chapter 130, Verse 18).

Kuśāvarta II. A holy place in ancient India. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 13).

Kuśavati. A city in Devaloka, where the Devas once conducted a mantra yajña. It was on his way to participate in this yajña that Agastya cursed Kubera and his attendant Maṇipān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 34).

Kuśēṣya. One of six great mountains in the Kuśa island. Durdharṣa, Dyutimān, Puspaśān, Kuśēṣyā, Kumuda and Hari are the six mountains. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verses 10 and 11).

Kuśida I. A sage belonging to the order of Vyāsa’s disciples. (Bhāgavata 12th Skandha).

Kuśida II. To live on the interest of money lent to others. Agriculture, breeding of cows, commerce and Kuśida are the professions ordained for brahmins in emergency. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 152).

Kuśika I. A very famous monarch in the Puru dynasty. He was the grandfather of Visvamitra and father of Gadhī.
1) Genealogy. Descended from Mahâviññu thus; Brahmadeva, Atri, Candras, Budha, Purûravas, Äyus, Nahuşa, Yayâti, Puru, Janamejaya, Prâcinâvan, Pravîra, Namasva, Vitabha, Sunu, Buvahvîdha, Saniyâti, Ravho-vi, Raudràva, Matînâra, Sânturodha, Dusyantasa, Bharata, Suhotra, Bharandputra, Ajmilha, Janhu, Balâkâsa, Kuśika.

2) Indra as son. Kuśika began tapas for a son who would be equal to Indra and could not be killed by others. Pleased with his tapas Indra voluntarily took birth as Kuśika's son. Gâdhi was that son; in fact he was an incarnation of Indra. (Śânti Parva, Chapter 49).

KUŚIKA II. A sage who came to see Pramadavâr who died of snake poison (Ādi Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 25). On his way to Hastinâpurâ he saw Sri Kṛṣṇa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 27).

KUŚIKAŚRAMA. A holy aśrama on the banks of the river Kośi where the sage called Kuśika is believed to have lived. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 131).

KUSMÂNDÂKA. A prominent serpent. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 11).

KUSTUMBURU. A Râkṣasa in Kubera's court. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 16).

KUSUMA. One of the five attendants given to Skandadeva by Dhātâ. Kunda, Kusuma, Kumuda, Dambara and Añâmbara were the five attendants. (Sâlya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 39).

KUSUMBHAPARVATA. One of the mountains around Mahâmeru. (Devī Bhâgavata, 8th Skandha).

KUSUMBHI. A forest near Dvârakâ. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 38).

KUṬA. One of the pugilists deputed by Kârma to kill Śri Kṛṣṇa and Balârâma when they went to Mathurâ to witness the dhanurvyajña. Cânûra, Muṣṭika, Śala and Kosala were the other prominent pugilists deputed by Kârma for the purpose. (Bhâgavata, 10th Skandha).

KUTAPA. Afternoon, considered to be auspicious for performing obsequies. The offerings made to Pîtras at Kutapa are the best. (Ādi Parva, Southern text, Chapter 93).

KUṬHÂRA. A prominent nâga. He was present among the nâgas who went to receive Balabhadra when he went, in the form of nâga, into the sea. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 15).

KUṬHÂRA. A nâga born in Dhârtarâśtra's family. It was burned to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 15).

KUTILA. See under Parvali.

KUTSA. Son of a Râjarśi called Ruru. Kutsa is mentioned with reference to Indra in many places in the Rgveda.

KUTTÅLA (M). Seat of a famous Śiva temple in South India, originally a Viṣṇu temple. There is a story about its conversion into the present Śiva temple as follows —

Agastya, on his journey to the south, reached Tirukkuṭâlam (Kutâlam) in the Tirunelveli Zilla on the southern borders of Tamil Nadu. The temple there was dedicated to Viṣṇu, and the Vaiṣṇavas (devotees of Viṣṇu) prevented Agastya from entering the temple with ashes on his forehead. At once he transformed himself into a devotee of Viṣṇu, and was permitted entry into the temple. As Viṣṇu wanted to show the world that he and Śiva were one and the same, and also the greatness of Agastya, the idol of Viṣṇu was all on a sudden changed into a Śiva Linga. Since then the temple has remained a Śiva Temple. (Skanda Purâṇa).

KUVALAYĀPIḌA. Name of the elephant posted at the gates of Mathurāpuri to kill Śri Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadradhama, who went there to witness the dhanurvyajña. But, they killed the elephant. (Rângadvarâm samisiddya, Asmaṇmavasthitam / Aṣṭapāṭat Kuvalayâpiḍâ / Kṛṣṇoṁ mbaṣṭhapracoditam) (Bhâgavata, Daśama Skandha, Chapter 48, Verse 2).

KUVRĀ. A river. (Bhâṣma Parva Chapter 27).

KUYAVA. An asura referred to in the Rgveda. (Rgveda, Mandala 1, Anuvâka 15, Sûkta 104).

L

LA (a). This letter means the Creator. (Chapter 348, Agni Purâṇa).

LABDHÂNAŚA. See under Pañcatantra.

LAGHUPATÂNÂ. A crow, a character of the storybook, 'Pañcatantra'. (See under Pañcatantra).

LAJÀ. One of the thirteen daughters of Dakṣaprajāpati. The other daughters were Śraddhâ, Lakṣmî, etc. (Chapter 7, Añśa I, Viṣṇu Purâṇa).

LÄKŚÂGRHA. The house of lac (a kind of red dye). (See for details under Arakillam).

LÄKṢÂNA. A. Daughter of Durvodhana. Wife of Śambha. (See for details under Śambha).

LÄKṢÂNA. II. A celestial maiden. This maiden took part in the birth day celebrations of Arjunâ. (Sloka 62, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva, M.B.).

LÄKṢÂNA (LÄKṢMAṆA) III. One of the eight queens of Śri Kṛṣṇa. Lakṣmaṇâ was the daughter of Bhratena, King of Madra. (Śrī Khaṇḍa, Padma Purâṇa). Śri Kṛṣṇa got ten sons of her some of whom are Prâghoṣa, Gâravâni, Śirhâla and Bala. (10th Skandha, Bhâga- vata).

LÄKṢMAṆA. Son born to Daśaratha of Sumitâ. 1) Short history. Since details about Lakṣmaṇa are included in the story under 'Râma' only a short description is given below:

Daśaratha, King of Ayodhyâ had three wives, Kausalyâ, Kaikeyi and Sumitâ. To obtain children Daśaratha performed a sacrifice named Putrakâmeṣṭi requesting the great sage Kâraṇâ to officiate at the ceremony. At the close of the ceremony a divine person rose up from the sacrificial fire with a pot of pudding and all the three wives became pregnant by eating the same. Kausalyâ gave birth to Śri Râma, Kaikeyi to Bharata and Sumitâ to Lakṣmaṇa and Satrughna. Lakṣmaṇa was an incarnation of Ananta and so Râma and Lakṣmaṇa had more attachment to each other.

Viśvâmitra once took Râma and Lakṣmaṇa to the forests to give protection to the sages against the demons who gave them trouble. In the course of that Viśvâmitra took them to the Svayamvara held at the court of Janaka and [Śri Râma married Sîtâ and Lakṣmaṇa married Urîmâlî.]
When the coronation of Śrī Rāma was about to take place, Kalkeyī demanded of Daśaratha, on the strength of the two boons granted to her on a previous occasion, to send Śrī Rāma to the forests for fourteen years and crown Bharata her son as King. Daśaratha was compelled to accede to her request and so Śrī Rāma went to the forests. Sitā and Laksmaṇa accompanied him. Laksmaṇa during the fourteen years of their exile followed his brother Rāma like a shadow. Laksmaṇa cut off the breasts and nose of Śūrpaṇaḥ, the demoness who made amorous overtures to them. Laksmaṇa acted promptly and bravely when the notorious trio, Khaṇḍa, Dūṣana and Trisūras attacked them and he was responsible for the slaughter of the three. Rāvana, coming to know of that, carried away Sitā to Lankā.

Grief-stricken, Rāma and Laksmaṇa roamed about in the forests searching for Sitā. At last they came to Sugriva with whom they made an alliance. Rāma and Laksmaṇa got back for Sugriva his kingdom of Kiskindha and Sugriva in return helped Rāma and Laksmaṇa to fight Rāvana. Accompanied by an army led by Sugriva Rāma and Laksmaṇa went to Lankā and defeating Rāvana took back Sitā to Ayodhyā. Śrī Rāma was crowned King and Laksmaṇa helped his brother in his duties. When there arose a scandal about Sitā from the people, Śrī Rāma asked Laksmaṇa to take Sitā away to the forest and leave her there. In the Asvamedha conducted by Śrī Rāma, Laksmaṇa led the sacrificial horse and the horse was blocked and captured by Lava and Kuśa and Laksmaṇa fought against them.

When the purgation of the incarnation of Rāma was over, god of Death in the garb of a sage approached Śrī Rāma for a private talk. Rāma and the sage were cloistered in a room and Laksmaṇa was asked to keep watch over the door with instructions not to allow anybody inside. After some time sage Durvasās came there and Laksmaṇa entered the room to give his brother the information of his arrival. Rāma was angry and abandoned Laksmaṇa and, feeling repentant later, Śrī Rāma jumped into the river and drowned himself before a huge crowd of weeping subjects. Laksmaṇa immediately ended his life by drowning himself at the same place where his brother did so.

2) Birth. Laksmaṇa was born on the day of Aśleṣā in the jāgaṇa of Kārkaṇṭaka. (Śloka 15, Chapter 18, Bāla Kānda, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

LAKṢMĀNA II. A very brave son of Durvodhana. He was a great archer. The Mahābhārata gives the following information about him.

(i) In the great battle Abhimanyu defeated this Laksmaṇa. (Śloka 32, Chapter 73, Bhīṣma Parva).
(ii) Laksmaṇa fought against Kaśaradeva. (Śloka 49, Chapter 14, Droṇa Parva).
(iii) Abhimanyu killed him in the battle-field. (Śloka 17, Chapter 46, Droṇa Parva).
(iv) After the great war when once, at the request of Kuntī and Gândhārī, Vyāsa by his yogic powers arrayed the dead warriors for Kuntī and Gândhārī to see, this Laksmaṇa was also among them. (Śloka 11, Chapter 32, Aśrama-Vāsika Parva).

LAKŚMAṆA. One of the queens of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 33, Sabhā Parva, Dākinsātityapāṭha).

LAKŚMĪ I. Consort of Mahāviṣṇu.

1) Origin. Devī originated from the left side of Paramātmā (Supreme Being). The beautiful Devī by a command from the Supreme Being divided herself into two enchanting damsels both equal in figure, splendour, age, majesty, adornment and love. One of these was Laksmaṇīdevi and the other Rādādevi. That born of the left was Rāmā and that of the right, Rādhā. Rādāwed herself to the two-handed Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Laksmaṇī also wanted the same person and so Bhagavān himself became two, Śrī Kṛṣṇa from the left side as a two-handed person and as four-handed Viṣṇu from the right side. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

2) Different incarnations of Laksmaṇī. Laksmaṇī had many incarnations and she had been on earth in different forms at different times. They are given below:

(i) Birth from the ocean of milk. Once the Devas became aged and afflicted with rugosity and grey hairs by a curse of Durvāsas. Indra lost his majesty and was ousted from Svarga. Śrīvaṇkalakṣmaṇī descended Devaloka and went to Vaikuṇṭha and merged with Mahālakṣmaṇī.

The Devas were greatly aggrieved on account of this plight of theirs and they went to Satyalaṅka and appealed to Brahma to find a solution to their difficulties. Brahmā was helpless in the matter and so they all together went to Vaikuṇṭha and represented their grievances before Mahāviṣṇu. Viṣṇu smiled and told Mahālakṣmaṇī thus: "You go and be born as Kṛṣṇa-sāgarāanyakā using a part of your inherent power and do give relief to the Devas." Accordingly when the Devas conducted the churning of the ocean of milk (Kṣīrābhdhimathana) Mahālakṣmaṇī, the goddess of beauty, wealth and prosperity arose from the ocean as Kṛṣṇa-sāgarāanyakā (Daughter of the ocean of milk) and blessed the Devas and put a Vanamālā (garland of wild flowers) on Mahāviṣṇu. The Devas got back all their lost wealth and prosperity and they, on going to Devaloka, worshipped Laksmaṇīdevi properly. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

(ii) Mahālakṣmaṇī was born as a marc. (See under Ekaṇīra, Para 2).

(iii) Mahālakṣmaṇī was born as the Tulaśī plant (Holy Basil. (See under Tulaśī).

(iv) Mahālakṣmaṇī was born as Sitā and Vedavati. (See under Sitā).

(v) Other births : Mahālakṣmaṇī was born as a daughter to the sage Bṛgu of Khyāti. When Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Śūrya, Laksmaṇī rose up from the lotus. When Viṣṇu became Paraśurāma, Laksmaṇī became the earth. When Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Śrī Rāma, Laksmaṇī became Sitā and when Viṣṇu was born as Kṛṣṇa Laksmaṇī became Rādā. Thus whenever and wherever Mahāviṣṇu changed his form, Mahālakṣmaṇī also changed hers to form part of the changed life. (Chapter 9, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

3) Mahālakṣmaṇī cursed Viṣṇu. Once Mahālakṣmaṇī cursed Mahāviṣṇu, her husband, that his head would drop off from his body. (See under Cītal).

4) Two forms of Laksmaṇī. Mahālakṣmaṇī has two forms, Viṣṇu-priyā Laksmaṇī and Rājyalakṣmaṇī. The former is the embodiment of chastity and virtuousness. The latter goes about courting Kings. Rājyalakṣmaṇī is sickle and unsteady. This Laksmaṇī enters all places where virtue and charity are found and as soon as these two vanish from any place Rājyalakṣmī will also vanish from that place.

5) Lakṣmī in cow-dung. The people of Bhārata consider cow dung as very sacred and there is a story in the 82nd Chapter of Anūśasana Parva as to how cow-dung became so sacred:

Once a herd of cows was grazing in a large grassy ground when Lakṣmī happened to pass that way. Mahālakṣmī was pleased at the cows and bade them ask for any boon they wanted. The cows were prosperity incarnate and contented and they rejected the offer of Lakṣmī and when pressed again by her, said that they would like to have prosperity deposited in their dung also. Mahālakṣmī did so and so even today it is believed that the cow-dung is embedded with prosperity.

6) Other details:

(i) Lakṣmī stays in the court of Kubera. (Śloka 19, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

(ii) Mahālakṣmī is installed in temples as an idol carrying a lotus in her right hand and a Bilva fruit in her left hand. (Chapter 50, Agni Purāṇa).

(iii) Lakṣmīdevī stays in the court of Bṛhaṁ also. (Śloka 41, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).

LAKŚMĪ II. A daughter of Dakṣa-prajāpāti. She was married to Dharmadeva. (Śloka 14, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

LAKŚMĪDĀSA. A Sanskrit poet who was the author of Śukasandesā.

1) Birth. He was born in the former state of Cochin in Kariṇgāmpilī Mana. This Mana (house) was near the temple of Trippūtāmangala in Vellārappilly in Cochin (Kaṇayannur taluk). The Kariṇgāmpilī Mana was bearing the position of Taliyāṭtiri in the village of Irāṅkikula. It is over two hundred years since that Mana became extinct. (The houses of Namboothiri brahmins are called Manas).

2) It is believed that the famous ‘Śukasandesā’ was written in 112 M.E. There is one set of historians who hold that it was written in 666 A.D. But the famous scholar and poet Ullūr states with authority that it was written in the 10th or 11th century A.D.

2) Stories about this poet. As usual there are legends regarding this poet also. That the poet was a very dull boy in his childhood and that he became bright and brilliant by the blessings of his guru is one legend. After writing his Śukasandesā the poet went on a pilgrimage in South India. One night he came to a brahmin’s house but was not given any food or a place to sleep. He slept in an open veranda on the outside. He was lying awake when he heard his ‘Śukasandesā’ being read inside by a few people. At a stage they were not able to follow the import of a verse when Lakṣmīdāsa shouted the meaning from outside. A door opened and a voice enquired in Tamil “Are you Kariṇgāmpilī?” When he said yes they were extremely happy and took him inside and treated him with respect.

4) Works. No major work other than Śukasandesā has been found. Two small poems are available. Śukasandesā has been written on the model of the famous Meghasandesā of Kālidāsa. Many commentaries on this have come to light; of these the one written by MāṇAVEDAN Rāja of Kozhikode Palace named Viḷāsinī is the best. Other commentaries named Varavarṇapī, Cintāmilaka and Vyākṛti are also worth mentioning.

LĀLĀBHAKṢĀM. A hell. (See under Kāla I).

LĀLĀMA. A division among horses. The white patch on the forehead of a horse is also called Lālāma and so horses with lālāma are called Lālāmās. (Śloka 13, Chapter 13, Droṇa Parva).

LĀLĀTĀKṢA. A country of ancient India. The King of this country was present at the yajña of Yudhīṣṭhira with very many valuable presents. (Śloka 17, Chapter 51, Sabhā Parva).

LALITA. See under PUNḌARĪKAMUKHA.

LALITA. A Gandharva. This Gandharva was born by a curse and by observing a vrata called Kāmadā Ḋākārā he obtained relief from the curse and became Gandharva again. (Uttara Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

LALITAKA. An ancient holy place of Bhrārata. If one bathes in a sacred pond there, one will be free from sins. (Śloka 34, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

LALITTHA. A country of ancient Bhrārata. The people of the place were called Lalitthas. They fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. Lalitthas boasted that they would kill Arjuna in the big battle. The King of the Lalitthas attacked Abhīmānyu. Arjuna killed them all in the battle. (Śloka 47, Chapter 5, Karṇa Parva).

LAMBĀ. A daughter of Dakṣa-prajāpāti. Asīkī wife of Dakṣa-prajāpāti got a hundred daughters and ten of them were married to Dharmadeva. Lambā was one of them. (Chapter 15, Arīṣa I, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

LAMBANI. A follower of Subrahmānya. (Śloka 18, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

LAMBAPAYODHARA. A follower of Subrahmānya. (Śloka 21, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

LAMPĀKA. A place of Purāṇic fame. In the great epic battle the people of Lampāka fought on the side of the Kauravas. They attacked Sātyaki and he destroyed the Lampākas. (Śloka 42, Chapter 121, Droṇa Parva).

LĀNGALI. A celebrated river of Purāṇic fame. This river worships Varuṇa in the form of a Devī. (Śloka 22, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

LĀNGHATI. A river of Purāṇic fame. This river sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him.

LĀNKĀ. The kingdom of Rāvaṇa.

1) Origin. It is believed that the present island of Ceylon was the Lāṅkā of the Purāṇas, the city of Rāvaṇa. This city of Lāṅkā was situated on the top of the mountain Trikūṭa. This Trikūṭa was a peak of Mahāmeru. Because of a fight between Vīṣṇu and Vāyūbhagavān this peak broke away from Mahāmeru and fell into the ocean. (See Para 5 under Kubera).

2) History. Vīṣṇakarmā constructed a magnificent city on the top of the mountain Trikūṭa for the use of Kubera. Kubera lived there adored and worshipped by all. One day Kubera travelled by air in an aeroplane of his. Kaṅkāśi, mother of Rāvaṇa, saw that and she became jealous. She called her son to her side and said that at any cost the city of Lāṅkā on the mountain Trikūṭa should be captured and given to her. Rāvaṇa along with his brothers went to the Himālayas and performed penance there and obtained several boons from Siva. Then Āvaṇa conducted a victory march as an arch-opponent of all living forces and drove away Kubera from Lanka and took possession of Lanka as the place of his abode. He took along with him all the demons residing in Patalaloka.

3. The design of Lanka. Vāsavadatta, the celebrated architect designed the beautiful Lanka and the supreme building ability of Maya brought into form the enchanting city. On the top of Tirikāta was the all important Nāgaratrīpīrga and on a spacious plateau on its top stood the majestic city of Lanka. In the centre was the ten-storeyed palace of Rāvaṇa and around it in eight different places stood the nine-storeyed buildings of the great ministers of Rāvaṇa. The nine edifices were like the Navagrahas (nine planets) of Lanka. Each of the nine edifices was built with one of the nine gems and the royal palace in the centre was built by using all the nine gems. Even the sun avoided passing over these buildings and changed his path either a bit to the north or to the south making what is known as the Dākṣiṇāyana and Uttarāyana. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

4. No sand in Lanka. The ancient belief is that there is no sand in Lanka. The fourth tārāṅga of Kathāmukha-lambaka of Kathāsārītāgāra gives a story relating to the reason for this belief.

Guruḍa flew to Devaloka to bring Aṃṭa (nectar) to redeem his mother from her servitude to his step-mother. On his way he took an elephant and tortoise from near the āśrama of Kaśyapa for his food. He sat on a huge banyan tree to eat them. On the ground below the Bīlakhilies were performing penance. The branch on which Guruḍa sat with his food sagged and before it broke Guruḍa took away the elephant and tortoise and deposited them on the mountain Gandhamadana near the ocean. The branch broke and fell into the ocean and the city of Lanka was built on the branch and that was why the ancient people believed there was no sand in Lanka.

5. Other details.
(i) Sahadeva sent Chārūkṛṣṇa to collect tribute from the King of Lanka for the Rājasūyavyāja of Dharma-putra. (Chapter 31, Dākṣiṇāyapāṭha).
(ii) The people of Lanka attended the Rājasūyavyāja of Dharmaputra and took charge of serving rice in the feast. (Śloka 23, Chapter 53, Vana Parva).
(iii) Hanumān once burnt the city of Lanka with a fire from his tail. (See under RĀMA).
(iv) It was Brahmā who gave Lanka at first to Kubera. (Śloka 16, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).
(v) After the death of Rāvaṇa, Vibhūṣaṇa was crowned the King of Lanka. (Śloka 5, Chapter 291, Vana Parva).

LANKĀLAKŚMĪ. A Devī who was relieved of her curse by a hard stroke of his hand by Hanumān.

1. How she came to Lanka. Lankālakśmi was Vijayalakśmi in her previous birth. She was the watch-girl of the treasury of Brahmā and one day finding her negligent of her duties Brahmā cursed her “Go to the earth and be the watch-girl of the palace-gate tower of Rāvaṇa”. She begged for relief and Brahmā said, “During the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Rāma his wife Sītā will be carried away by Rāvaṇa and Hanumān will come in search of her to Lanka. You will then block the way of that mighty monkey and he will then strike you down by a fierce blow of his hand. You will be then released from the curse and come back to me.”

Vijayalakśmi accordingly was born in Lanka and became the watch-girl of Rāvaṇa’s palace.

2) Release from the curse. Hanumān coming to Lanka in search of Sītā tried to find an opening through which to enter Lanka. Then he saw a huge tower-gate on the northern side of the mountain Suvelagiri. When he reached the gate he found it closed. The mighty monkey beat hard on the door and the strong door burst into two and fell on to the floor. Instantly a ferocious woman of enormous size rushed to the gate with a piercing roar and blocked it. Hanumān found the situation dangerous and so gave her a powerful blow and felled her. She then very politely asked Hanumān who he was and Hanumān revealed his identity and told her the purpose of his visit. Lankālakśmi then took leave of Hanumān and leaving Lanka went to Śri Rāma and worshipped him. Rāma blessed her and she returned to Satyaloka and started doing her duties as before. (Sundara Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

LAPETIĪKA. A holy place. If a man visits this place he would get the benefit of conducting a Viṣṇu yajña. (Śloka 15, Chapter 58, Vana Parva).

LAPIṬĀ. The second wife of a sage called Mandapāla. (See for details under Mandapāla).

LĀṬĀ. A celestial maiden. She was the companion of another Devī of name Vargā. Though she became a crocodile by the curse of a brahmin she was set free by Arjuna. (See under Paṇcatīrthī).

LĀṬA. A particular division of the Kṣatriyas. Because a set of the Kṣatriyas showed jealousy towards the Brahmins they became Lāṭas. (Śloka 17, Chapter 35, Anuśāsana Parva).

LĀṬAVEŚṬA. A mountain situated on the southern side of Dvārakā. It had five colours and so resembled the Indracāpa. (Chapter 33, Dākṣiṇāyātī Pāṭha, Sabhā Parva).

LAUHITYA I. A country of Purāṇic fame. This country of out-castes was conquered by Bhima and he took from there different kinds of diamonds. (Śloka 28, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

LAUHITYA II. A sacred place constructed by the powers of Śri Rāma. If one bathes in a pond there one would become golden in colour. (Śloka 2, Chapter 83, Vana Parva and Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

LAVA. A son of Sītā. (See under Kuśa II for more details).

LAVAṆA (M). A hell. (See under Kāla I).

LAVAṆA I. A demon. He was the son of a demon called Madhu. Madhuvana on the banks of the river Kālindī was the abode of this demon. This demon was a great oppressor of the Devas and Satrughna had to kill him. Satrughna then constructed a beautiful city there and lived there. In recognition of the increasing prosperity of the city it was named Madhurā. After the death of Satrughna his two sons lived there. (4th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

LAVAṆA II. A King who was a grandson of Hari-candra. He once conducted a Rājasūya in his imagination and became a Cudāla. (story in Jñānaviśiṣṭha). This story was narrated to Śri Rāma by Vasiṣṭha to teach him the truth that man does not realise that this whole universe is an illusion only because of his ignorance.
Lavaṇa was the King of Ṣaṅdhyāvāna, a country of great fame. He was the grandson of Hariścandra and wished to earn fame by performing a Rājasūya yāga as Hariścandra had done. Lavaṇa decided to perform the yāga in his mind only. He made grand preparations for the yajña. He invited the Rtvik and after invoking the devas inflamed the sacrificial fire. For one year he observed yāga like that and in the end gave gifts to the brahmans and the poor. It was all an imaginary performance that the King, had in the course of a single day when he indulged in a reverie. In the evening as usual he continued his day to day duties.

One who performs Rājasūya will have to bear woes and sorrows for a period of twelve years and since Lavaṇa had performed it mentally, Indra sent his agent to give Lavaṇa worries mentally. Indra’s agent appeared in the court of King Lavaṇa in the guise of a magician. The magician bowing before the King with awe said, “Lord, I shall show you a magic. See it sitting on your throne. It will be as astounding as if seeing moon rise on the earth”.

Saying this the magician took a bundle of peacock feathers and waved it against the face of the King. That bundle was capable of producing different objects and visions. The King fixed his eyes on the several glittering spots on the feathers and soon he saw a relative of the Saṅdhyāvāna King approaching the court. Behind him was a beautiful horse. Holding the horse by the reins the new-comer addressed the King thus, “Lord, this horse is as good as Uccaiśravas and it has been sent by the King of Sindhu to be presented to you. Best things should be given to the best people and only then the value of the thing would be correctly understood.” The magician who was standing near-by supported the statement of the new-comer. He said “Lord, what he says is true. This horse has wonderful powers. Take a tour of all the worlds riding on this horse”. The King sat staring at the horse and he sat thus for an hour and a half. The entire court was perplexed.

After some time the King awoke from his meditation and looking at his courtiers in wonder he said thus: “I shall tell you what happened to me during the short period I was sitting in meditation. While I was looking at the peacock feathers of the magician I felt a desire to go hunting riding on this horse. So I went to the forest alone riding on this horse. Very quickly the horse took me a long distance deviating from the main path and I soon found myself in the dark depths of a huge forest. By the time we reached that forest my mind and body were equally tired and still we went on moving till evening came. Somehow we crossed the forest and reached Jāṅgala. There I found a cluster of lemon trees and to ease my body I caught hold of a creeper hanging from one of the lemon trees. As I did so, to my horror, I found the horse running away from me and leaving me alone. Tired by the day’s travel I sat at a place and dozed. Darkness was creeping in and soon the whole place was in complete darkness. It was very cold also. Somehow I spent the night and when morning came, with hopes I walked around the place. The place was still and no living thing was in sight. As I roamed about I saw a forest-girl coming with a pot of rice. I approached her and asked for some rice. She did not pay any attention to my request and moved on. I followed her and she said she would give me rice if I promised to marry her. In despair I agreed to her condition and she was pleased with my reply. She gave me half of the rice and curry she was carrying to her father and also some lemon-juice to drink. After taking that food I rested for a while.

Her name was Hārakeyūrī. As soon as her father came from the fields she told him everything. The čaṇḍāla was immensely pleased to hear about our marriage and all of us went to their hut. The scene I saw at the hut was astonishing. At one place was the flesh of boars, horses, fowl and crows in a heap and on the intestines of animals hanging from ropes sat birds pecking at them. In the hands of children there were pieces of raw meat and flies hovered round them. The hut presented a disgusting atmosphere and yet I entered and sat on a leaf and my marriage with Hārakeyūrī was conducted there. The celebrations of the marriage lasted for seven days and all these days people danced and shouted amidst loud noises of drumming in a hilarious mood of drunkenness.

Eight months passed by very soon and Hārakeyūrī became pregnant. She delivered a girl first and soon we had two or three children more. I had to do many cruel and nasty deeds to feed my family and gradually I became old. My hair became grey.

At that time there occurred a great famine and those residing in the forests were put to great trouble. There was no water to drink as all ponds and lakes went dry. Some of us migrated to the vicinity of the Vindhya mountain where there were plenty of water-fountains. A few committed suicide. We also left the place and started walking, taking the children also along with us. After some time we sat under a palm tree completely exhausted. My wife began to weep profusely. She then kissed her children and lay down and started sleeping. Thirsty and hungry my children lay there awaiting death. Unable to witness the scene I jumped up from there deciding to commit suicide myself. Suddenly my vision faded and I was able to see this court and you all. This is the work of that magician”.

The courtiers sat dumb-founded at the incredible story of the King. Suddenly the magician disappeared. The magician after making the King experience the woes of twelve years in a very short time left for the court of Indra.

Next morning King Lavaṇa in the hope of seeing the place and people of his dream in reality near the mountain Vindhya started with his retinue on the false pretext that he was going to conduct a victory march. When he entered a big forest he met with many familiar places and hunters of his dream. Then he saw the hut where he had lived. The same men and women were there all around. Then I saw an old lady lamenting thus: “Oh my dear sons, where did you go from my lap? My dear daughter, have you forsaken me? Oh prince, you came here abandoning all luxury and the beautiful girls of your palace and married my daughter. But God did not allow even her to be your permanent wife. The river of life has to take worthless and mean paths forced by circumstances. A very virtuous King had to come and live with a caçãla girl.”
Hearing this the King went to her and asked her all details. When she repeated the story the King knew that the lady was the mother of his caçãla wife. The King and ministers were surprised to find that his vision was real and within that short period of his meditation he had lived a life of years. This perplexed the King. He then gave the old lady whatever she wanted and after consoling her started for the palace thinking about the wonderful happenings and mysteries of life.

LAVAṆA III. A demon who lived in the island of Râmañïyaka. He had come to the island long before the serpents came to that place. The serpents saw him when they went there to live. (Sloka 2, Chapter 27, Adi Parva).

LAVAṆA IV. Another King of the family of Hariś-candra. Yogavāsiṣṭha says that this King had participated in several Râjâsûya yajñas.

LÂVÂNAKA (LÂVÂNAKA). A place of Purânic fame near the country of Magadha. There are many forests in this place suitable for hunting and so several kings used to come and stay at Lâvânaka in times of old.

LÂVÂNÂŚVA. A sage. This sage showed very high respect to Dharmaputra. (Sloka 23, Chapter 26, Vana Parva).

LAYA. A King of old. He was a member of the court of Yama. (Sloka 21, Chapter 8, Sabhâ Parva).

LEKHA (S). A deva-gaṇa (set of celestial beings) of Raivata Manvantara. In this set there are eight Devas named Dhruva, Dhruvakṣiṭ, Prâghâsa, Pracetâs, Brhaspati, Manoejava, Mahâyâsas and Yuvanas. (Brahmañḍa Purâṇa, II, 36, 76).

LIKHITA I. An ancient sage. The King of that land cut off his hands on a charge of theft. But they grew into their original form by the power of the penance of his brother, (Chapter 23, Śânti Parva).

It was a time when the celebrated King Sudyumna was ruling over the country. On the banks of the river Bâhûdâ in that country there lived two sages, Saṅkha and Likhita, in two separate hermitages of their own. Once Likhita went to the Gârama of his elder brother Saṅkha and finding none but feeling hungry took some vegetables from there and started eating them. While he was eating his brother walked in and he deemed the action of his brother taking the vegetables without his permission as an act of theft. Cutting the hands of the culprit was the punishment accorded by the King at that time to the offender. Saṅkha sent Likhita to the King. The King received the sage respectfully and gave him a seat. The sage then told him all that had happened and then Sudyumna ordered the hands of Likhita to be cut off. Blood was oozing from his hands when Likhita went and bowed before his brother. The brother congratulated him on accepting the punishment for his crime and asked Likhita to go and take a dip in the Bâhûdâ river. Likhita bathed in that holy river and then he found both the hands growing like lotus-buds from his body. He rushed to his brother and showed him the hands and then Saṅkha said that it was due to the power of his penance that Likhita got his hands. Then Likhita asked his brother why he did not purify him by his power before. Saṅkha replied that the power of punishing was vested in the King and the King Sudyumna had become great by executing the law correctly.

LIKHITA II. An evil-natured priest of Harîsadvaja, the King of Campakapuri. Saṅkha his brother also was the King’s priest. Harîsadvaja blocked the sacrificial horse of the Aśvamedha yajña of Dharmaputra and Arjuna attacked the King to get the horse released. To mobilise an army the King announced that each and every soldier should assemble at the place by day-break the next morning and added that those who disobeyed would be put in burning oil.

By early morning the next day all the soldiers excepting the son of the King arrived at the palace. Sudhanvâ, the King’s son, was a general of the army and his absence annoyed the King. Harîsadvaja was hesitating whether his son should be punished when Likhita advised the King to execute the punishment.

The King put Sudhanvâ into a big cauldron of boiling oil but Sudhanvâ escaped from it unscathed to the surprise of all. Likhita and Saṅkha said that Sudhanvâ escaped because the boiling of the oil was incomplete and uneven. So they boiled the oil again and threw Sudhanvâ into it. At this moment a huge palm tree split into two and fell on them and they were killed. (Jaimini Aśvamedhaparva).

LILÂDHYA. A son of Vîśvâmitra. He was a Brahmavâdî (Sloka 53, Chapter 4, Anûṣâsana Parva).

LILÂTI-LÂKAM. The first book of Literary criticism in Malayālam. The author of the book is unknown. The book is divided into eight parts. Maṇiprâvâla, Maṇya-laâbadas, Aâṅkârâ, Kâvyâgûnas, Kâvyâdosas and Rasa are critically examined in this book.

LÎLÂVÂTI I. Wife of Dhruvasandhi, King of Kosala. (For details see under Dhruvasandhi)

LÎLÂVÂTI II. A prostitute who attained Svarga by simply observing the Sûkâla-tâmâvârata in the month of Prośhâpadā in which was born Râdhâdevi. Chapter seven, Brahmañḍâ Parâṇâ of Padma Purâṇâ contains the following story.

In times of old in Kṛtyayuga there was a beautiful prostitute of the name Lilâvati. Once she went away from her own town to another in search of better prospects. There she saw a big assemblage of people in a temple. They were observing Râdhâ-tâmâvârata and worshipping their deity with scented flowers and incense of sweet fragrance. Some were reciting prayers, some were singing and yet others were dancing. The whole atmosphere was filled with devotion. Lilâvati went to them and enquired about it. They told her that that day was the birthday of Râdhâdevi, the Sûkâla-tâmâ of the month of Prośhâpadā, and if anyone observed Vrata on that day worshipping Râdhâdevi he would be absolved of all sins.

On hearing that, Lilâvati decided to observe the Vrata. She joined the devotees of the temple and observed the Vrata with great devotion. Soon she died of snake-bite and the servants of Yama came to take her soul to hell because of the sins she had committed as a prostitute.

But before the Yamadutas could touch her, Pârsadhas of Mahâvîśyâ wearing the insignia of Saṅkha, Cakra, Gâdâ and Padma came to her with a chariot drawn by kingly swans and took her to heaven.

LIŚGAPURÂṆA. See under Purâṇas.
LIPI (ALPHABET, SCRIPT).

1) Origin. Lipi is the record in writing of the utterances by mouth. There are scientific and non-scientific statements about the origin of lipi. In the beginning people used figures of objects to express their ideas. They were called pictorial writings and are found even now in caves in Spain and France where the aborigines lived. Gradually the pictures vanished and letters took their place.

2) Ancient conception. Purānas give a different version. People of Java believe that the script originated from Java. The voice of Indonesia, a government organ, published once a purānic story relating to the origin of the script. Lipi came into being in 78 A.D. Ajaśikha, a saint among the Buddhists, was the originator of the lipi. He had two disciples named Dora and Sempādā. All the three went and stayed in a valley in the country of Kōntāṅg. The country of Menrāṅg-kāmanāl was then ruled by a King called Baka. Ajaśikha heard about this wicked King who had ordered one of his subjects to go to him daily for his food. The people were worried. They tried in secret to find out someone to subdue this tyrant. One day they approached Ajaśikha and requested him to find out a way to get relief from this cruel King. Ajaśikha sent them back promising to do something to help them.

Ajaśikha sat in meditation for some time and then told his disciples thus:— "I have decided to help the people of Menrāṅg-kāmanāl. Dora also should come with me. Sempādā should stay here keeping guard over my sword and clothes. Never give them to anybody but me. You should be prepared to give your life for it."

Ajaśikha and Dora went to see Baka. People discouraged them and advised them not to go to the King. But they did not heed that and straight away went to the presence of Baka. Baka started to kill them but then Ajaśikha said, "Oh King, you can eat me tomorrow. In return please give me today land as big as my headwear." Baka agreed to that and Ajaśikha spread his clothes on the ground. As Baka looked with wonder that small piece of headwear began to grow big and it grew in size to cover the whole of the country. Baka got furious at this and attacked Ajaśikha. But Baka was slain in the duel.

The people burst into joy and made Ajaśikha their King. Ajaśikha then sent Dora to his āśrama to fetch his sword and apparel, little thinking of the instructions he had given to Sempādā. Dora went and asked for the sword and apparel. But Sempādā did not give and a fight ensued in which both were killed.

Ajaśikha felt very sorry when he heard about the death of his disciples. He cursed himself for giving contradictory orders to his disciples and so wrote four lines, each containing five letters, to keep alive the memory of his dutiful disciples. Those twenty letters are the first ones written not only in Java but the whole world.

They were the following:

He no co ro ko — There were two disciples.
To so vo lo — They became enemies because they obeyed the orders of their guru.
Po dho jo yo ndo — Both of them were brave men.
Mo go bo do ngdo — Both of them died.

3) Bhārata lipis. Different kinds of lipis were prevalent in ancient Bhārata. Lalitavistara mentions about sixty-four kinds of lipis in Bhārata during the time of Buddha. From inscriptions on stones and other historical records it can be gathered that the basis of all the lipis had been two main lipis named Brāhmī and Kharoṣṭhī. Kharoṣṭhī was used in the northwest of Bhārata and became extinct by the 4th Century A.D. Brāhmī was the lipi universally used in Bhārata. This lipi had different forms in the north and south. The lipi in use in the south was called Drāvīḍī.

Kharoṣṭhī lipi was written from right to left and the Brāhmī from left to right. Even the Brāhmī was written first from right to left and gradually for the convenience of writing it was changed to one from left to right.

Linguists consider Brāhmī lipi as the base of all the lipis of Bhārata. It underwent changes in different parts and took different names. The scholars of Europe are of opinion that the Brāhmī lipi was borrowed from foreign traders in B.C. 800. Others say that the Brāhmī lipi was born out of the pictorial lipi of the Chinese. There are those who say that the Brāhmī lipi originated in Greece and Phoenicia. The great linguist Bulhar says that the Brāhmī lipi came from the Semitic languages. But Lassen and Cunningham refuted it.

There is a bundle of leaves in the hand of the idol of Brahmā in the temple of Bādāmi. Hindus believe that the Brāhmī lipi found in those leaves was written by Brahmā himself. The Aryans forgot that lipi and Vṛṣa found it out. This is a statement by the Arab traveller Albaruni who came to India in the 11th century A.D.

4) Keralā Lipi. The Brāhmī lipi came to South India by the 3rd century A.D. Many scholars on languages say that Veṭṭeluttu is a changed form of the Brāhmī lipi. The great lipi expert L.A. Ravi Varma says that "Etlu" has come from the word "Etlu" or "Alu" meaning "to mark by cuts". The common method of writing in South India was to use a pointed stick, long metal nail or chisel to make marks on leaves, rocks or copper plates. Writing by making marks with the pointed stick (Kol) got the name "Koleluttu". Veṭṭeluttu, Koleluttu and Malayāma were the three lipis in use in Kerala. Veṭṭeluttu was in vogue in Tamilnadu also. But the Pallavas who were using Prākṛta language when they conquered the northern Tamilnad introduced Granthākṣara and Granthatamil there. T.K.Krishna Menon says that Granthākṣara was a false creation to write Sanskrit easily. In Pāṇḍyaśa and Malanaṇa Veṭṭeluttu was in use even then.

The influence of the Pallavas began to wane and the Tamil lipi slowly rose into prominence. Even then Veṭṭeluttu was in vogue in the empire of Cera comprising of Malanaṇa, Mysore, Coimbatore, Salem and Tōṇḍaṃandalam. When Tamilnadu came under the emperor of Vijayanagara those kings introduced Nāgāri lipi there.

Veṭṭeluttu was called Nānam Monam also. In the south instead of using "Hari Śrī" people used to say "Namō nārayana" and the first syllable "Na" and the second one "Mo" were used to name the language "Nānam Monam".

When the Malayālis started liking the Maṇipravīḷā they started using "Arya etlu" a form of Granthali. This script was known as Tulu-Malayālam also. This was also born of the Brāhmilipi. Gradually Veṭṭeluttu and Koleluttu was in use in the north of Keral among Muslims. The Alphabets now in use by the different languages of South India took shape only about two centuries ago. The lipi of Malayalam now in use came into shape by the time of Eluttāśāṇ spreading the belief that it was Eluttāśāṇ who had made the alphabet. It is wise to believe that the Malayalam script came into use gradually from Arya elutu than to give credit to one individual for its origin.

LOBHA I. One of the spiritual sons of Brahma. Motya Puruṣa mentions that Lobha was born from the lip of Brahma while Bhāgavata mentions that he was the son of Maya.

LOHA I. An Asura. When the Pāṇḍavas were living in ignorance they kept their weapons in a secret place. Availing of this opportunity Loha made an attack on the Pāṇḍavas. At once the devas made him blind and thus helped the Pāṇḍavas. That place later became famous as Lohanapura. (Skanda Puruṣa I, 2, 65)

LOHA II. An ancient place of India. Arjuna conquered this place during his victory march. (Sloka 25, Chapter 27, Sahā Barva).

LOHAKANGHA. See under MAKARADAMŚTRA.

LOHAMEKLĀ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 46, Sloka 18, Sahā Barva).

LOHAVAKTRA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 75, Chapter 45, Sahā Barva).

LOHITA I. (ROHITA), Son of Hariścandra. (For details see under HARIŚCANDRA).

LOHITA II. A king of ancient India. This king was conquered by Arjuna. (Sloka 17, Chapter 27, Vana Barva).

LOHITA III. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Sloka 8, Chapter 9, Sahā Barva).

LOHTAGANĪ. A place of Purānic fame. Śri Kṛṣṇa killed five notorious demons like Paścaja and Virūpākṣa at this place. (Chapter 33, Dākṣiṇāyī Pātha, Sahā Barva).

LOHTAKSA I. One of the four Pārṣadas given to Subrahmanya by Brahma. The other three are Nandisena, Gaṇṭākaraṇa and Kumudamālī. (Sloka 24, Chapter 45, Sahā Barva).

LOHTAKSA II. A sage who was a Rtvik in the Sarpa-satra of Janamejaya. It was this sage who prophesied through a brahmin that the Sarpa-satra would never be complete. (Āśramavāsika Parva, Ch 45. Versc 15; Ch 51. Verse 6; Ch 53. Verse 12).

LOHTAKŚI. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 22, Chapter 46, Sahā Barva).

LOHTĀRANI. A river of Purānic fame of ancient India. (Sloka 18, Chapter 9, Bhūmija Parva, M.B.).

LOHTĀSVĀ (ROHITĀSVĀ). Son of Hariścandra. (See under HARIŚCANDRA).

LOHTAYANI. Daughter of Red Sea and one of the foster-mothers of Subrahmanya. Lohitāyani was a worshipper of the Kadamba tree. (Sloka 40, Chapter 280, Vana Barva).

DHUTYA. A great river. The present name of this river is Brahmputra. The devi of this river sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. (Sloka 22, Chapter 9, Sahā Barva).

LOKA.

(i) Origin of Loka. There are several views in the Purāṇas regarding the origin of Loka or the world (Universe).

(ii) In the beginning of the universe Mahāviśuṣu alone stood as the Eternal, unseen, unheard, unknown entity. Then there was neither sky nor day nor night. When the time of creation came Praṅgṛita entered Viṣṇu as Puruṣa creating emotion. From emotion arose Mahat or the Great Principle and from Mahat arose cosmic egoism (Ahaṅkāra). Ahaṅkāra divided itself into Vaikārika, Taṅjasa and Tāmasa. From Ahaṅkāra arose Ākāsa with the quality of sound and from Ākāsa came the air having the quality of touch and from air came fire having the quality of colour and from fire came water having the quality of taste and from water came earth with the quality of smell. All these were born of tāmasic egoism. From tājasic egoism came into being the organs of sense. From the Vaikārika egoism came the ten Vaikārika devas and the eleventh organ of sense, the mind. After that Mahāviśuṣu discharged his virility into water and that virility is life. (Chapter 17, Agni Puruṣa).

(iii) Mahāviśuṣu with a view to creating many different kinds of living things created water first and threw his whole energy into it. That energy grew into a golden mass of an egg and Brahma was born from that egg. Mahāviśuṣu broke that egg into two, making one half heaven and the other earth. Between the two halves he created the sky. The earth was floating on the waters and he fixed it by anchoring it at ten sides. Then he created Prajāpati, Kāla, Manas, Vāk, Kāma, Krodha and Rati. Then he created thunder, lightning, clouds, rainbows and birds. Then for yānāsiddhi he created from his face Rgveda, Yajurveda and Sāmaveda. He did sacrifices with them. From his hands he created the different Bhūtāgāmas and Sanatkumāras. He created Rudra out of Krodha. From his mind were born Marici, Atri, Anāgiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Vasiṣtha. He made these seven Brahmās. These seven Brahmās and Rudra began to create the prajās. Then Prajāpati divided his body into two. One half of it became man and the other woman. Brahma started creation through that woman. (Chapter 18; Agni Puruṣa).

(iv) In the beginning Mahāviśuṣu in the form of a child lay on a leaf of the Banyan tree. Lying there the Lord began to think like this, “Who am I? Who created me? Why was I created? What should I do here?” At once from the sky came a voice which said:

Sarvan khalvidambravam
Nānyadasti sanātanam /
(All these am I. There is nothing eternal except me). The Lord was surprised by the voice and there appeared before him Mahādevi with four hands bearing the Saṅkha, Cakra, Gaḍā and Padma one in each hand. She wore divine garments and ornaments and was accompanied by Prosperity as her maid. She was surrounded by such forces as Rāti. Bhūtā, Budhā, Mati, Kṛiti, Śrīmā, Dhrī, Śrrddhā, Medhā, Svadhā, Śvāhā, Kṣudhā, Nīdār, Dayā, Gati, Tuṣṭi, Puṣṭi, Kṣamā, Lañjā, Jīmbhā and Tāndrī. Devī then addressed Mahāviśuṣu thus: “Why wonder? You have always come into being whenever creation was started by the greatness of great powers. The Supreme Being is without quality of any kind. We are all with quality. You have predominance of Sattva-guṇa. From your navel will arise Brahma who will be dominated by Rajoguṇa and from the centre of the forehead of Brahma will be born Rudra with Tamoguṇa predominant in him. Brahma by the power of his pen. ance will acquire the energy to create and he will then create the world. You will be the protector of this world which will in the end be destroyed by Rudra. I am the sāttvic power to help you in your work and I am always at your service."

Accordingly Brahmā and Rudra were born and Brahmā started his creation. (1st Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

(iv) In times of old during the great deluge everything in this universe became extinct. It went on like that for some time and then the five elements and Brahmā were born. Brahmā was born in a lotus. Brahmā decided there should be mud beneath the lotus. He went down through the stem of the lotus and travelled for a thousand years and yet did not find the earth. He came back and sitting inside the lotus started doing penance. After a thousand years Madhu-Kaîtābha rushed to attack Brahmā (See under Kaîtābha). Fearing them Brahmā went under water again. As he went deep down he saw a great man sleeping there. It was Mahāviśṇu and then only he knew he was sitting on the lotus originating from the navel of Mahāviśṇu. Mahāviśṇu killed Madhu Kaîtābha and gave permission to start creation and Brahmā started his work of creation.

(v) Before the origin of the Universe the shapeless qualityless Parā-akti permeated everything. From it there were born three powers: Jñāna-akti, Kriyā-akti and Artha-akti. The power of Śattvaguna was Jñāna-akti, the power of Rajaguna was Kriyā-akti and the power of Tamoguna was Artha-akti. From the divine power of Tāmasa came the five basic things, sound, colour, touch, taste and smell. The quality of the sky was sound, the quality of air was touch, the quality of fire was colour, the quality of water was taste and the quality of earth was smell.

Rajoguna was born of Kriyā-akti. The five organs of senses, ear, eye, nose, tongue and skin and the five organs of work, hand, leg, speech, organ of excretion and the organ of sex and the five breaths, Praṣā, Apāna, Vyāna, Samāna and Udāna are the offsprings of Rājas. These are the forms of Kriyā-akti. These are controlled by the favourite activity of Cichakti. The five gods controlling the sense-organs like Vāyu, Śūrya, Pāśi and Aśvindevas and the four gods controlling intelligence, conscience etc. like Candra, Brahmā, Rudra, and Kṣetrajña and the mind are ten Tattvas (Principles) born of sāttvika empowered with Jñāna-akti. All the Tattvas were made into five basic elements through the process of Pañeṣkaraṇa and the Brahmāṇḍa originated from it.

2) The constitution of Brahmāṇḍa. The Brahmāṇḍa is made up of seven Kośas (coverings). The one in the extreme interior is very small. The second Kośa originates from the centre of the first Kośa. The third Kośa also has its origin from the first one. Each of them envelops the one before it. The seventh Kośa thus originating from the first Kośa and bursting forth through the other six Kośas spreads out for millions of miles around. If you cut the Brahmāṇḍa longitudinally the one in the extreme interior is the earth. Then come Bhūvar-loka, Svār-loka, Mahār-loka, Janalo-kha, Tapalo-kha, and Satyaloka in succession. The worlds in the lower half are called Pātāla, Raśātāla, Mahātāla, Talātāla Sutala, Vitala and Atala. From Satyaloka to Atala there are fourteen lokas. The Brahmāṇḍa consists of the Śūrya, Candra, Stars, Śukra, Budha, Aṅgāraka, Brahaspati, Śani, Saptarṣiṣ, Dhruva, Simūmāra and Rāhu, called the Jyotisoraka. Besides these there are twentyeight hells also. (Visūṇ Purāṇa, Atīśa I).

Rāhu is ten thousand yojanas below Śūrya. Ten thousand yojanas below Rāhu is the loka of Bhuddhividyādhāras. Below that up to the path of the clouds is the loka of the demons, gēnū and manes. Hundred yojanas below this is the Bhu-loka (earth). Ten thousand yojanas below the earth and as many yojanas below the world above each are Atala, Vitala Sutala, Talātāla, Mahātāla and Pātāla. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

3) Origin of life. Brahmā originated from the navel of Mahāviśṇu. Brahmā started creation after obtaining permission from Viśṇu. In the beginning Brahmā created from the mind Marīci, Aṅgiras, Atri, Vasishtha, Pulaha, Kṛatu, and Pulasta. They are therefore called the Mānasaputras of Brahmā. (Manas = mind, Putra = son). From his wrath came Rudra, from his lap came Nārada, from his right thumb Dakṣa, from his mind Sanaka and others and from his left thumb, Viṣṇu. Dakṣa married Viṣṇu.

Dakṣa got five thousand sons of Viṣṇu. They also got sons. When the population began to increase thus Nārada intervened and questioned the advisability of increasing the population before knowing the capacity of the earth. The sons of Dakṣa realised the sense in it and started to have a survey of the earth. Dakṣa was disappointed that the children left him without showing any interest in the work of creation. So he produced another five thousand sons and asked them to start the work of creation. But they were also sent away as before by Nārada. Dakṣa became angry and he created sixty daughters.

He gave thirteen daughters to Kasyapa, ten to Dharma, twentyseven to Candras, two to Bhṛgu, four to Arisṭa-nemi, two to Kṛṣṇa, and two to Aṅgiras. Of these most of the living things in the world were born to Kasyapa. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Kasyapa was the last of the Prajāpatis. Kasyapa married the daughters of Dakṣa named Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālikā, Tāmrā, Krodhavāsa, Manu, and Anālā. Aditi got thirtythree sons and their family consists of the thirtythree crores of Devas. From Diti were born the dāityas or asuras. From Danu was born the dānava Haya-grīva. Kālikā got two sons, Naraka and Kālaka. Tāmrā got five daughters, Kruaunci, Bhaśi, Śyenī, Dhṛta-rāṣṭri and Śukī. Kruaunci gave birth to owls, Bhaśi to Bhasas and Śyenī to Śynas (Vultures, Kites etc.). Dhṛta-rāṣṭri gave birth to Haris, Kalasa and Koka. Śukī gave birth to Natā and Nāta in turn to Vināta. Krodhavāsa gave birth to ten daughters; Mṛgi, Mrgamanḍa, Hari, Bhadrādah, Mātānī, Sārdūlī, Śvetā, Surabhi, Surasa and Kadrū. Of these Mṛgi gave birth to beasts, Mrgamanḍa to trees and plants. Lions and monkeys are the children of Hari. Bhadrādah got a daughter named Īravātī. Airavātī was the son of Īravātī. From Mātānī were born the elephants and from Sārdūlī the tigers. The Aṣṭadīgajas are the sons of Śvetā. Surabhi got two daughters named Rohiṇī and Gandharvi. Cows are the children of Rohiṇī and horses are the children of Gandharvī. Serpents are the sons of Surasā and Kadrū gave birth to snakes. From Manu were born men. Trees are the sons of Anālā. Vinātā got two sons named Aruṇa and Garuḍa. To Aruṇa were born two sons, Jāṭāyu and Sampātī.

4) The end of the World—There are different views in the Purāṇas regarding the end of the world. The different Purāṇas give different views. For knowing the views of Agni Purāṇa on the subject see under the heading ‘Pralaya’. The eleventh Skanda of Bhāgavata gives the following theory regarding the end of the world.

All the material objects of the world will become illusory. Fire will increase. There will be no rains for hundred years together. The World will be burnt by the heat. The heat will go down to the head of Ananta who holds this world on his head. The Saptameghas (Seven Clouds) will rise up in the sunshine infected with the poisonous breath of Ananta. Then rains will start pouring down in streams as thick as the trunk of an elephant. Everything will be drowned in that water. Viśṇu alone will be left above the vast expanse of water. (See under Manvantara).

LOKĀLOKA. There is a mountain between Loka and Aloka. This is called Lokālokaparvata and the land beside it is called Lokāloka. The mountain is as long as the distance between Mānasottara and Mahāmeu. This place is golden in colour and as smooth as glass. Not a single being lives there. God has created this as a boundary to the three worlds. All the planets like the Sun get light from the brilliance of this mountain. Brahma has posted four diggajas named Vṛṣabhā, Puṣpacuḍa, Vāmāna and Aparajīta in the four corners of this mountain. (8th Skanda, Devī Bhāgavata).

LOKAPALA. Indra, Agni, Yama and Varuṇa are called lokapālas. (Śloka 35, Chapter 57, Vana Parva).

LOKAPALASABHĀKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub-di- visional Parva of Sabhā Parva. The chapters five to twelve are included in this.

LOKODDHĀRA. A sacred place of Purāṇic importance in India, Lord Viṣṇu raised all the worlds at this place. If anyone bathes in a pond there he will be able to liberate the souls of other people from sins. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

LOLA. Son of a great sage called Siddhavirā. Lola in his later birth was born of a queen named Utpalāvāti. His name then was Tāmasama. (Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa).

LOMAHARASA. Father of Sūta who told Purāṇic stories. (1st Skanda, Devī Bhāgavata). He was a member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 12, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

LOMAPĀDA. (ROMAPĀDA). A King of the country of Āṅgā. (1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu: Brahmā—Atri—Candra—Buddha—Purūravas—Āyus—Nahuṣa—Yayāti—Kuruṇā—Sūrya—Kṛta—Agni. (2) Other details. (i) He was a friend of Daśaratha. (Śloka 53, Chapter 110, Vana Parva). (ii) Once there was no rain in the country of Lomapāda. It was due to a curse from the brahmins and to remove the curse Lomapāda brought Rṣyaśringa to his country. Sāntā, daughter of Daśaratha was living with Lomapāda as his adopted daughter at that time. Lomapāda gave her in marriage to Rṣyaśringa and made him live in his country. The country got rains from that time onwards. (See under Rṣyaśringa and Sāntā). (iii) Lomapāda constructed a new hermitage for Rṣyaśrīnga. (Śloka 9, Chapter 113, Vana Parva).

2) Birth. Rukmakavaca, grandfather of Lomapāda conquered many countries and gave them all as gifts to those brahmins who participated in his Arvamedha-yajña. He got five brave sons, Rukmeṣu, Pṛthivukma, Jyāmagha, Parīgha and Hāri. Of them he made Parīgha and Hāri live and rule in Vidēha. Rukmeṣu ruled his father’s country and Pṛthivukma helped his brother. Jyāmagha was sent out from his country and he lived quietly in a hermitage. One day as per the advice of a sage he left the place in a chariot with a flag flying to the shores of the river Narmadā. He had neither servants nor the means for his daily food. He lived on the mountain Rṣyaśrīn eating only roots and fruits. He was very old and his wife Śaibyā also was getting old. They had no sons and still Jyāmagha did not marry again.

Once when Jyāmagha gained a victory in a fight, he brought a girl and entrusted the child to his wife saying “This child is your daughter-in-law.” Śaibyā was surprised and enquired “How can that be when I have no son?” Jyāmagha replied, “She is to be the wife of a son who will be born to you soon.” By means of the hard penance of that girl, Śaibyā got a handsome son named Vidarbha. Vidarbha married her and got two wise sons, Kratha and Kaśīka and a third son Lomapāda, who was righteous, virtuous and wise. All the three were great warriors also. Descending in order from Lomapāda came Babhrut-Heti-Kaśīka-Cīḍī. From this Cīḍi came the Cedi dynasty of Kings. (Srṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa, Bhīṣmapulastya Sarīvāda).

LOMAŚA I (ROMAŚA) I. A sage, who was a great story-teller. Many of the stories found as episodes in the Purāṇas were told by this sage. Mahābhārata gives the following details about him.

(1) Lomaśa was very virtuous and longlived. (Śloka 18, Chapter 31, Vana Parva).

(2) Once Lomaśa entered the court of Indra and spoke to Indra about Arjuna sitting sharing a half of his seat before him. (Śloka 1, Chapter 47, Vana Parva).

(3) Lomaśa returned to Kāñcakavāna from the court of Indra and gave Yudhiṣṭhira the messages from Indra and Arjuna. (Śloka 33, Chapter 47, Vana Parva).

(4) He prophesied to Arjuna that he would get divine weapons from Śiva. (Śloka 10, Chapter 91, Vana Parva).

(5) Lomaśa consoled Yudhiṣṭhira when he came to the forests in exile leaving all his happy surroundings in the country. (Sloka 17, Chapter 94, Vana Parva).
(6) He told Dharmaputra the story of Agastya. (Chapter 96, Vana Parva).
(7) Lomaśa told Dharmaputra the stories of Śrī Rāma and Parāsūrāma. (Sloka 40, Chapter 99, Vana Parva).
(8) Asuras defeated all the Devas and the latter were perplexed. It was Lomaśa who then advised them to make weapons out of the bones of the sage Dadhiča. (Chapter 100, Vana Parva).
(9) Lomaśa mentioned to the Devas a trick to kill Vṛtrāsura. (Chapter 101, Vana Parva).
(10) The story of Bhagāratha, the episode of Rṣyasrīga etc. were all told by Lomaśa. (Chapters 103 to 113, Vana Parva).
(11) Lomaśa told Yudhiṣṭhira the story of the Yāga of King Gaya, the story of the river Payoṣṇi, the glory of the mountain of Vaiḍūrya and the river Narmadā, and the story of Cyavana the great sage. (Chapter 121, Vana Parva).
(12) He told the Pāṇḍavas the story of Māndhātā. (Chapter 126, Vana Parva).
(13) Lomaśa told Yudhiṣṭhira the story of Somaka and Jantu. (Chapter 127, Vana Parva).
(14) He praised the glory of the holy place Yamanā-tirtha, known as Plaśasparsravaṇa also, near Kuru keśtra, Chapter 129, Vana Parva).
(15) It was Lomaśa who told the story of the emperor Śibi who gave his own flesh to protect a dove which went to him for refuge. (Chapter 130, Vana Parva).
(16) Lomaśa told the story of the sage Aśṭāvakra to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 133, Vana Parva).
(17) He described the story of Yavakrīta and Medhāvī to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 135, Vana Parva).
(18) Dharmaputra heard the stories of Bharadvāja, Raibhya, Arvāvasu and Parāvasu from Lomaśa. (Chapter 137, Vana Parva).
(19) Lomaśa told Dharmaputra the story of Narakaśura and the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Varāha. (Chapter 142, Vana Parva).
(20) Lomaśa visited Bhisma lying on his bed of arrows. (Śanti Parva).
(21) Lomaśa praised the glory of giving rice as charity, (Sloka 10, Chapter 67, Anuśasana Parva).
(22) Lomaśa was a sage from the north. (Sloka 46, Chapter 165, Vana Parva).
(23) Lomaśa relieved many nymphs like Pramohini from their curses. (See under Pramohini).
LOMAŚA II. A cat. (See under Diṇḍika).
LOPAŅUDRA. Wife of Agastya. (For details see under Agastya).
LUṢA. A Ṛgvedic hermit. It is mentioned in Ṛgveda that Luṣa and Kutsa were rivals to win the mercy of Indra.
Once Luṣa and Kutsa invited Indra at the same time. But Indra refused Luṣa and put him in prison. Even from the prison Luṣa prayed to Indra to visit him. (Ṛgveda, Maṇḍala 10, Anuvāka 88, Sūkta 5; Jainaṇya Brāhmaṇa 1.128).

MA. This letter has the following three meanings—Prosperity, honour and mother. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 349).
MACAKRUTA. A sacred place on the border of Kurukṣetra. A Yāṣa of name Macakruta keeps guard over this plac. If one bows down before this Yāṣa one will have to his credit the benefit of a thousand Godānas (giving away cows in charity). (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, M.B.).
MADA I. An Asura. This demon came out of the sacrificial fire of Cyavana to kill Indra. (See under Cyavana).
MADA II. One of the Mānasaputras (spiritual sons) of Brahmā. Mātsya Purāṇa states that Mada was born of the Pride of Brahmā.
MADADHĀRA. A mountain. Bhūmasena, while on his victory march to the east conquered this mountain. (Sloka 9, Chapter 30, Sābhā Parva).
MADĀLAŚĀ I. A Vidyādhara. She was married to a Vidyādhara named Campaka. (See under Campaka).
MADĀLAŚĀ II, Wife of Rādhvaja, King of Kāśī. Once a demon named Pāṭalāketa carried away Madālasā and Rādhvaja took her back after defeating Pāṭalāketa in a fight. Alarka was the son of this couple.
MADANAMĀLĀ. A celebrated prostitute of the city of Pratiṣṭhāna. Narasimha, King of Pratiṣṭhāna, did not surrender himself to Vikramadītya, emperor of Pāṭaliputra. The resourceful Vikramadītya went to Pratiṣṭhāna and caught hold of the prostitute Madanamālā first and then through her subdued the King Narasimha. After that Vikramadītya took Madanamālā to his place and made her stay there. (Taraṅga 4, Ratnaprabhālambaka, Kathāsāraṅga).
MADANAMĀNCUKĀ. A heroine of 'Vatsarājacarita'. Her mother was a nymph in her previous birth. By a curse of Devendra she was born on earth as Kaliṅgasenā and lived serving in the palace of Udāyana, King of Veda. She desired to make Udāyana her husband. In the meantime a Gandharva named Madanavega fell in love with Kaliṅgasenā. Knowing that Kaliṅgasenā was in love with Udāyana the Gandharva followed her to the garb of the King Udāyana and at last they were married. Kaliṅgasenā soon delivered Madanamaṇcukā, an incarnation of Raidevi. When she grew up she married Naravāhanadatta, son of Udāyana, (Madanamaṇcukālambaka, Kathāsārāṅga, Taraṅga 8).
MADANAVEGA. A Gandharva. (See under Madanamaṇcukā).
MADANIÐA. A nymph, a daughter of Menakā. A demon named Vidvudrūpa married her. But Kandhara of the family of Garuḍa killed Vidvudrūpa and took Madanikā for himself. They got a child named Tārkṣī. (Mārkandeya Purāṇa, Chapter 2).
MADAYANTI. Wife of King Kaliṃsapāda. He was known as Mitrāsaha and Saudāsa also. When Kaliṃsapāda lay cursed Vasiṣṭha begot a child of Madayanti named Asmaka. Madayanti gave her ear-rings to the sage Uṭṭaṅka. (For details see under Uṭṭaṅka and Kaliṃsapāda).
MĀDHAVA I. A synonym of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Because Śrī Kṛṣṇa could be properly understood by Maṇana, Dhyāna and Yoga he got the name Mādhava. (Sloka 4, Chapter 7, Udyoga Parva).
MĀDHAVA II. Son of Vikrama, King of Tāladhvaja. The Kriyā Khaṇḍa of Padma Purāṇa gives the following story about him. Mādhava desired to marry a beautiful and good-natured Kaṇṭhiya girl named Candrakalā. She was not prepared for that and she informed Mādhava thus:

"There is a princess in the island of Plakṣa named Sulocanā. She is far more beautiful than myself and is fit to be your consort. Do try to get her."

Mādhava accepted the advice of Candrakalā and started for the island of Plakṣa with a servant of his named Praceśa. The news that welcomed him when he reached the island was that the marriage of Sulocanā had been fixed with one Vidyādhara. Undaunted Mādhava sent a love-letter to the princess mentioning his arrival in the city, seeking her hand in marriage. In reply to that Sulocanā wrote that if Mādhava appeared on the marriage-dais in time she would accept him as her husband.

The marriage day arrived and Mādhava waited for the time of the function. But when the auspicious hour came Mādhava was asleep. Praceśa, his servant, took advantage of the opportunity and carried away Sulocanā. But Sulocanā was determined to marry only Mādhava and she escaped from the custody of Praceśa and reached the palace of a King called Suṣeṇa and stayed there as a servant wearing the robes of a male, calling himself Viravara.

Viravara, i.e. Sulocanā in disguise, saved Vidyādhara and Praceśa from committing suicide. At that time Mādhava also in despair was about to commit suicide when Sulocanā appeared before him in time and stopped him from doing it. Sulocanā then told him all that had happened and they were happily united as husband and wife.

MĀDHAVA III. A son born to Yadu of his Nāga wife Dhūmārvānī. The renowned Yādava dynasty was established by this Yadu and his son Mādhava. (Harivaṁśa)

MĀDHAVA IV. A virtuous brahmin. Once when he was about to sacrifice a goat in the sacrificial fire the goat in human voice told the story of its previous birth and requested the brahmin to sacrifice it after reciting the ninth chapter of the Gītā. Mādhava did so and the goat got salvation. (Uttara Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa)

MĀDHAVĪ I. Daughter of King Yāyāti. A lady recluse she always wore dest-robe as her garment and went on observing a Vrata called Mṛgavrata: Yāyāti gave this daughter in marriage to Gālava. (Śloka 12, Chapter 145, Udyoga Parva). Mādhavī bore a son named Vasu-māna alias Vāsunanās to Haryāśa, King of Ayodhya. She got of Divodāsa, King of Kāśi, another son named Pratardana; of the King of Uśinara she got a son named Śibi. Besides these she got a son named Aśṭaka of Vīśvāmitra. (See under Gālava). When the accrued merit of Yāyāti was exhausted and he fell down from heaven Mādhavi consented to part with half of her stock of merit to Yāyāti. (See under Yāyāti).

MĀDHAVĪ II. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 7, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

MĀDHU I. One of the Asuras born from the ear-wax of Mahāviṣṇu. The other was named Kāṭjabha. (For details see under KĀṬJABHA).

MĀDHU II. Once there lived in a forest-garden on the shores of the Yamunā an Asura of name. Madhu. Śatrughna killed this Madhu and established there a city called Mathurāpurī. (Uttara Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). While Indrajit, son of Rāvaṇa, was performing penance Madhu carried away a demoness named Kumbhānaśi and there ensued a fight on that account between Madhu and Rāvaṇa in which Madhu was killed.

MĀDHU III. A king who used to sit in the court of Yama and worship him. (Śloka 16, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

MĀDHUCCHANDAS. A sage who observed correctly the Ātrama of Vānaprastha. He was one of the Brahmanādī sons of Vīśvāmitra. (Śloka. 50, Chapter 4, Anu-śāsana Parva). Vīśvāmitra had a hundred sons like Madhucchandas. (10th Skanda, Bhāgavata). The first Sūkta of Rgveda was written by this sage.

MĀDHUKAITABHA(S). Two Asuras named Madhu and Kaitabha. (See under KĀṬJABHA).

MĀDHUKUMBHA. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

MĀDHULIKĀ. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

MĀDHUMAN. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 53, Chapter 9, Bhāṣa Parva).

MĀDHUPARKA. One of the children of Garuḍa. (Śloka 14, Chapter 11, Udyoga Parva).

MĀDHURA. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 71, Chapter 43, Sālya Parva).

MĀDHURASVARA. A celestial maiden. She once conducted a dance performance in honour of Arjuna. (Śloka 30, Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUŚAKTA. An Asura. During the time of the emperor Prēhu, the earth was turned into a cow and people milked from her the things they wanted. Madhulakta was the person who did the milking for the Asuras.

MĀDHUŚRAVA. A sacred place in Kurukṛṣṭa, situated near another holy place called Prṛhūḍaka. If one bathes in a pond there one will have to his credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. (Śloka 15, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUSŪDANA. Another name for Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Because he killed an Asura named Madhu he was called Madhusūdāna. (Śloka 16, Chapter 207, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUSYANDA. A sage who was the son of Vīśvāmitra. (Sarga 62, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀDHUVANA. A forest-garden owned by the great monkey-King Sugriva. After finding out the whereabouts of Śītā, Hanūmān and Aγhada accompanied by other monkeys entered this garden and drank honey to their heart's content. (Chapter 202, Vana Parva and Sundara Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀDHUVARNA. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 72, Chapter 42, Sālya Parva).

MĀDHUVATI. A sacred place on the border of Kurukṛṣṭa. If one bathes in a sacred pond there and worships the Manes one will have to one's credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (giving away cows in charity). (Śloka 94, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀDHUVIDYA. A special mystical lore of the Devas. This was imparted to the sage Dadhiya by Indra. (See under DADHYA).}

MĀDHUVALA (MĀDHUVILĀ). A river which flows in the neighbourhood of Kardamila kṣetra. This river has another name Samāṅga. This is a very sacred tirtha. Indra who became a Brahmanātś-sinner by killing Vṛtrāsura was absolved of his sins by taking a bath in this river. Aṣṭāvakra, the sage with eight bends in his body, got himself perfect by taking a bath in this river obeying the orders of his father Kahoḍaka. (Chapter 135, Vana Parva).
MADRÀ. Wife of Vasudeva, father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Vasudeva had seven wives named Rohini, Bhadrāmānī, Madrā, Hā, Rocanā, Pauravī and Devakī (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata). Of these Devakī, Rohini, and Bhadrā abandoned their lives by jumping into the funeral pyre of Vasudeva. (Śloka 18, Chapter 7, Māusala Parva).

MADRĀKṢA (MADRĀSV) I. A brother of Virāṭa, King of Maṭśya. When the Kauravas made Trigarta carry away the cattle of Virāṭa it was Madrākṣa who faced Trigarta in a fight. A great fight ensued between Trigarta and Madrākṣa. He had shown as one of the chieftains of the army of King Virāṭa. He was a very charitable man well-versed in Dhanurveda (archery). He was killed in the big battle by Dronācārya. Chapters 33, 32, 31, 30, 29, 28, 27, 26, 25, 24, 23, Virāṭa Parva; 171, Udyoga Parva and 9, Karpa Parva).

MADRĀKṢA II (MADRĀSV) A king of the dynasty of Ikṣvāku. He was the son of King Daśāśv. Madrākṣa was a saintly king well-versed in archery. He was a very righteous person also. (27-8, Anuśāsana Parva). Madrākṣa had a son named Dyutimān and a daughter named Sumadhīyā. (2, 8, Anuśāsana Parva.) After giving Sumadhīyā in marriage to a sage, named Hiraṇyāhasta Madrākṣa attained Śvarga. (226: 34 Śānti Parva, and 137 : 24 Anuśāsana Parva).

MADOTKĀṬA A ferocious lion mentioned in Pañcatantra (See under Pañcatantra).

MADRĀ. One of the ten wives of Atrimahārśi. Atri got of Madrā a son named Soma. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

MADRĀ (M). An ancient place of habitation in Bharata. This is situated near the river Jhelum. Madrī, the wife of Pāṇḍu was a princess of this place. Bhūṣma went to Madra and brought Mádrī for Pāṇḍu. (Chapter 112, Adi Parva). At the time of Arjuna’s birth there was a voice from heaven which said, “This child will grow up and capture many countries like Madrā”. Aśvapati, father of Sāvitrī, was a king of Madra. Karṇa condemned Madra and Vāhika as countries which had fallen low in virtue. (Chapter 44, Karpa Parva).

MADRĀKA I. A Kṣatriya king of ancient Bharata. He was born of the partial spirit of the demon Krodhavāsa. (Śloka 59, Chapter 67, Adi Parva).

MADRĀKA II. Soldiers of the country of Madra were called Madrakas. Madrakas were included in the Kaurava army. (Śloka 7, Chapter 51, Bhūṣma Parva).

MADRĀKALĀNGA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 42, Chapter 9, Bhūṣma Parva).

MADRĀVATĪ I. Wife of Parīkṣit, son of Abhimanyu. She was the mother of Janamejaya. (Śloka 85, Chapter 95, Adi Parva).

MADRĀVATĪ II. Another name for Mádrī, wife of Pāṇḍu. (Śloka 56, Chapter 52, Sābhā Parva).

MADRÉYAJĀNGALA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 39, Chapter 9, Bhūṣma Parva).

MADRĪ. Mádrī who was the second wife of Pāṇḍu was a daughter of the King of Madra. She was the sister of Saliya. Nakula and Sahadeva took birth from Mádrī. Pāṇḍu expired when he embraced his wife Mádrī. It was because of a curse of the hermit Kindama. Mádrī ended her life in the pyre with her husband. (For further details see under the word PĀΝԴU).

MADYA. Wine. There is a story in the seventh Skandha of Devī Bhāgavata showing how Madya happened to be an intoxicant. Once Indra sent out the Aśvinidevas from Devaloka and banned wine to them. They took refuge in Cyavana a great sage. Cyavana conducted a special Yāga and invited the Aśvinidevas to partake of the Yajñāna. Indra objected to this and Cyavana had to face Indra in a fight. Then Cyavana produced from the sacrificial fire a demon named Māda and he rushed at Indra to kill him. Indra then bowed down before Cyavana and craved for pardon. Cyavana withdrew the demon and tearing him into four pieces put each one in dice, hunting, wine and women. That was how all the four became intoxicating.

In ancient India there were certain social conventions regarding drinking of alcoholic preparations. All those drinks which were intoxicants were not listed as ‘Alcohol’. Wine, honey, toddy, juice of sugarcane, juice of Iruppa and Kusampuli, and sweet toddy of palm tree were not considered alcohol. Surā (liquor) chiefly meant Paisī (liqour made out of rice paste). Drinking of Surā was banned to the three castes, Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya and Vaiśya. If they drank Surā they had to perform a penance for a year drinking only water or eat long pepper for a year. To be free from the sin of drinking Surā one should wear dress made of animal hair. Even if one drinks water in a pot in which Surā was taken, one should observe Vrata for seven days. (Chapter 173, Agni Purāṇa).

MAGĀ (S). The brahmans residing in the island of Śaka are generally called Magas. The Brahmāparva of Bhaviṣya Purāṇa and the Śāmba Purāṇa speak about the Magas thus: Śāmba, son of Kṛṣṇa, did severe penance to please Śrāvadeva and pleased with the unwavering devotion of Śāmba, Śūrya gave him a luminous replica of himself for worship. Śāmba constructed a beautiful temple by the side of the Candrabhāgā river and installed the idol there. He then brought from Śākadvipa the brahmans called Magās for conducting the ceremonies of the temple. All the eighteen families of Maga brahmans came and stayed near the temple at the request of Śāmba.

MAGADHA. A famous city of ancient India. Its present name is Rājagṛha. The Purāṇas mention many great Kings who had ruled Magadha. Bhṛdrathra was once King of Magadha. (Śloka 30, Chapter 63, Adi Parva) Jayatėna one of the Kālakayas was once the King of Magadha. (Śloka 48, Chapter 67, Adi Parva). Pāṇḍu father of the Pāṇḍavas once attacked Magadha and Dirgha the then King of Magadha was killed by Pāṇḍu. (Chapter 112, Adi Parva). While Bhṛdrathra was ruling Magadha he passed an order that each and every house should worship the demoness Jarā as a house-goddess. (Śloka 10, Chapter 13, Sābhā Parva). During the time of the Mahābhārata Jarāsandha was the King of Magadha. Śrī Kṛṣṇa made Bhīma to kill Jarāsandha. After his death Śrī Kṛṣṇa made Sahadeva brother of Jarāsandha the King of Magadha. (Śloka 43, Chapter 24, Sābhā Parva). Bhīmasena conquered this country during his victory march. The people of Magadha offered gifts to Yudhīṣṭhīra at his Rājasūya. (Śloka 18, Chapter 52, Sābhā Parva). The King of Magadha and the people there fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas in the great battle. (Śloka 2, Chapter 53, Udyoga Parva).

MAGADHAS. A particular tribe of people. If the work of Śūtas was to drive chariots and the work of Pulkasas to hunt, the work of the Magadhās was that of an adulter. (Chapter 151, Agni Purāṇa). This work of a flatterer was given to them by Brāhmaṇa. When the emperor Prthu was born. Brahmā conducted a Yāga. On the day of sutyā at the place of Somābhiṣava of the Yāga a very intelligent Sūta was born. At the same yāga a Māgadhā also was born. He was a great scholar. Then the sages told Māgadhā and Sūta thus: “Praise this king Prthu, who is the valorous son of Vena. Praising is the fittest work suited to you both. Prthu deserves praise.” Then the Sūta-Māgadhās placing their hands on their breasts with respect said, “What do we know of the qualities and capabilities of a king just born? His fame is not known. Based on what should we sing praises of him?” Hearing this the sages said that they should praise him for the qualities which he would be possessing in future. The king was pleased to hear that. Sūta-Māgadhās started singing eulogistic songs based on the qualities and exploits of a Prthu to be. Prthu then appointed Sūta as his charioteer and Māgadhā as his adulator. From then onwards the Sūta family became charioteers and the Māgadhā family flatterers.

MĀGADHĪ. A river which flows through the middle of five mountains. (Sarga 32, Bāla Kaṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MAGHĀ I. A sacred place. If one visits this place one would get the benefit of performing the yajñas like Agni-stoma and Atirātra. (Śloka 51, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MAGHĀ II. One of the twentyseven constellations. The importance of this constellation is mentioned in the Mahābhārata in several places.

(i) When the planet Kuja (Mars), during its retrograde motion, comes near the constellation of Maghā many unhappy incidents occur in the world. (Śloka 14, Chapter 3, Bhīma Parva).

(ii) If Candra stays near Maghā it is an ill omen. (Śloka 2, Chapter 17, Bhīma Parva).

(iii) If one gives away land in charity on the day of Maghā one will be rich in children and cattle. (Śloka 12, Chapter 64, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iv) If one gives pudding to the poor on the day of Maghā which comes in the black half of the month of Tulā (October) the Manes will be pleased. (Śloka 7, Chapter 88, Anuśāsana Parva).

(v) If one worships the Manes on the day of Maghā sitting in the shade of an elephant, the manes will be satisfied. (Śloka 8, Chapter 88, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vi) If one conducts the obsequial rites and acts of charity on the day of Maghā one would become the most excellent member of the family. (Śloka 5, Chapter 89, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀGHA. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 7th Century A.D. The only work of his which has come to light is Sīvāpadavāda known popularly as Māgha.

Upāma Kālidāsasya
Bhārava-rathagauravam /
Daṇḍināḥ padālālītyarīṇi
Māghe sānti trayo guṇāḥ //

This is a very famous verse meaning thus: “The simile of Kālidāsa, the depth of the meaning of the words of Bhāravi and the simplicity of language of Daṇḍin are all present in Māgha”. This indicates how great a poet Māgha was.

From the last part of this Kāya it can be surmised that Māgha was the son of Dattaka and grandson of Suprabhadrā. Suprabhadrā was the minister of a King called Dharma-deva. Māgha was born in Gujarāt. A literary critic named Jacobi fixes the period of Māgha as the 6th century A.D. while others fix it as the 8th century A.D. Māgha has made references to the drama ‘Nāgānanda’ written by Harṣa. Harṣa was a King during the period 606 to 649 and that is why the period of Māgha is fixed after that period.

MĀGHA. A month (February). This is so called because it is closely associated with the constellation Maghā. This month is between the months of Pauṣa and Phālguna. Mahābhārata makes some statements about the importance of the month of Māgha.

(i) He who bathes at Prayāga during this month will be free from all sins. (Śloka 37, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

(ii) He who gives gingly as gift to Brahmins during this month will never go to hell. (Śloka 8, Chapter 66, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iii) If one takes food only once a day during the whole of this month one will be born very rich in the next birth. (Śloka 31, Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iv) If one worships Śrī Kṛṣṇa fasting on the Dwādaśī day of Māgha one will get the benefit of conducting a Rajasūya yajña. (Śloka 5, Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

(v) Bhīma expressed his desire to Kṛṣṇa to end his life on the aṣṭamī day falling in the bright fortnight of the month of Māgha. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 167, Śloka 28).

MAHĀJVĀLA. A hell. (See under Kāla 1).

MAHĀKĀDA MBĀ. A tree standing on the tall peak of Śuṇārśva mountain. The Purāṇas declare that five big rivers take their sources from the hollow trunk of this big tree. These rivers fall on the top of Śuṇārśva mountain and flow through the western side of Śuṇārśa. The region around this place to a distance of a hundred yojanas is filled with the fragrant air breathed out by the gods who feed upon the essence of the waters in these rivers. The Devī who lives in this sacred place is called "Dhāreśvari". (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

MAHĀKĀLA I. A Sīva pārśada. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 34 mentions that Sīva Pārśadas known as Mahākālašas flourished in the assembly of Kubera.

MAHĀKĀLA II. A sacred place situated in the Siśrī river valley in Ujjain. The Śivalīga in-talled in this place is called "Mahākāla," Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 49 says that those who take a bath in the Koṭītīrtha at this place, get the same effect as that of an Āvamadha yāga.

MAHĀKAPĀLA. A minister of the Rākṣasas Dūṣaṇa. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyu Kāṇḍa, 23rd Sarga).

MAHĀKAPĀLA II. A Rākṣasa who attacked Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa at Paṇcavaṭi. In Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyu Kāṇḍa, 26th Sarga we read that when Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa fought with Khara, Dūṣaṇa and Triśiras there were three terrible Rākṣasas named Mahākāpāla, Sthūlākṣa and Pramāthin.

MAHĀKĀRṆI. A wicked minister of Ambuśe, King of Magadhā. There is a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 203, Verse 19.

MAHĀKĀYA. A woman follower of Lord Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse, 24).

MAHĀKĀRŪṆCA. A mountain in the Krauṇḍa island. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 7).

MAHĀLAYA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 54 mentions that one who observes a fast at this holy place for one month, will be absolved of all sins.

MAHĀMĀLI. A Rākṣasa hero of Rāvaṇa's army. He was killed in the battle at Paṇcavaṭi between Rāma and Laksmaṇa on one side and Khara, Dūṣaṇa and Triśiras on the other, over the affair of Śīraṇākha. Mahāmāli appeared on the scene as a commander of Khara's army. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyu Kāṇḍa, 26th Sarga).

MAHĀMĀNAS. Grand-son of Janamejaya, a King of the Anga dynasty. Mahāśāla was the son of Janamejaya and Mahāmānas was the son of Mahāśāla. Uśīnara was the son of Mahāmānas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

MAHĀMATI. The seventh son of the sage Āngiras. There is a reference to him in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 218, Verse 7.

MAHĀMERU. The golden coloured peak of Himāvīn. The seat of Lord Śiva, according to the Purāṇas.

1) General features. Mahāmeru surpasses even the sun in its dazzling golden brilliance. Devas and Gandharvas attend on it on all sides. It is inaccessible to sinners. There are celestial herbs and serpents at its base. It is Mahāmeru that keeps Heaven in its place by supporting it. The atmosphere there, is always alive with the sweet songs of various kinds of birds. Precious stones are scattered all over its surface. All the 33 crores of gods dwell on the sides of this Mountain. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 17).

Saptarśis like Vasiśtha rise and fall on Mahāmeru. Mahā Viśṇu and Brahmā have their places in Mahāmeru. Viśnu's place is in the east. There is a special place there for the residence of Mahārṣis. Those who go to Mahāmeru never return. The Sun and Moon go round Mahāmeru everyday. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 163).

There are twenty mountains surrounding Mahāmeru. On the eastern side there are two mountains, Jāra and Devakūṭa. On the western side there are two mountains, Pavamāna and Pārīvātra. On the southern side are the two mountains, Kaśīvātra and Karavīrā and on the northern side, the two mountains, Triśirīga and Mākara-giri. Thus Mahāmeru shines like the sun in the midst of eight mountains. In the middle of Mahāmeru is situated Brahmaloka, the abode of Brahmā in a square extending over 10,000 yojanas. This region is of inexpressible splendour. At eight places around this Brahmavāṇi, are situated the eight posts or abodes of the Aṣṭādikāpālas, each of the abodes being 25000 yojanas in extent. Thus there are nine Purūs or Cittīs... on the top of Mahāmeru. They are:— (1) Brahmā's Manovati in the centre. (2) Due east of it, Indra's Amaranātī. (3) In the south-east corner, Agni's Tejovatī. (4) On the southern side, Yama's Saṅhyamāni. (5) In the south west corner, Nīru's Kṛṣṇājana. (6) On the western side, Varuna's Śraddhāvatī. (7) In the north-west corner, Vāyu's Gandhavatī. (8) On the northern side, Kubera's Mahodaya. (9) In the north east corner, Iśān's Yaśovatī. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

2) Mahāmeru and Laṅkā. Rāvaṇa's place of abode Laṅkā was really a peak of Mahāmeru. (For further details, see the previous history of Laṅkā in Para 5 under the word Kubera).

3) How Mahāmeru got its golden colour. The Purāṇas declare that the sun keeps going round Mahāmeru. Once, while the sun was thus going round, he wished to take a little rest. He asked permission to place the axle of his chariot for a short while on Mahāmeru. The mountain agreed to it. The grateful Sun-god (Sūrya) blessed Mahāmeru that it would thenceforth have golden colour. Until it received this blessing, Mahāmeru had the colour of ordinary mountains.

4) Other details.
(i) Two daughters named Ayati and Niyaṭi were born to Mahāmeru. They were married by Dāhāta and Vidhāta respectively. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10).
(ii) Vasiṣṭha had an ṛṣiṇa near Mahāmeru. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 6).
(iii) Mahāmeru attends on Kubera in Kubera's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 73).
(iv) The extensive Jambū Vṛka stands on the southern side of Mahāmeru. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).
(v) At the time of Emperor Prthu, the earth was turned into a cow and all living beings obtained all their necessities by milking her. It was Mahāmeru who stood as 'milking man' on behalf of the mountains. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 69, Verse 18).
(vi) In Tripradadhana, it was Mahāmeru which was erected as the flag-staff in Siva's chariot. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 202, Verse 78).

MAHARLOKA. A world which was believed by the ancient people to be situated one crore yojanas above the "Dhruvapada". Viśṇu Purāṇa, Part II, Chapter 7 says that it is there that sages like Bhṛgu live till the end of Kalpa.

MAHĀROMĀ. A King of the Solar dynasty. He was the son of Kṛṣṭrīra and father of Svarāroma. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MAHĀŚĀLĀ. A King of the Aṅga dynasty. He was the son of Janamejaya and father of Mahāmanas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

MAHĀŚĀNKHA I. A crocodile celebrated in the Purāṇas. He had a wife named Śaṅkhiṇī. The seven children born to Śaṅkhiṇī became the Maruts in the Sāvṛcīsa Manvantara. There is a story in Chapter 72, Vāmanā Purūṇa about these children who became Maruts.

Ṛṭadhvaja, son of Sāvṛcīsa Manu had seven heroic sons. They went to Mahāmeru and began to worship Brahmā for gaining Indra's place. Indra was alarmed. He sent the Apsaras woman Pūtanā to the sons of Ṛṭadhvaja to obstruct their tapas. There was a river flowing by the side of their āśrama. Ṛṭadhvaja's sons came to the river to take their bath. Just at that time, Pūtanā also came there and began to take bath. At her sight, the young men had an involuntary emission of semen. Śaṅkhiṇī, wife of the crocodile Mahāśānkha swallowed it. The princes whose tapas was interrupted returned to the palace. Pūtanā returned to Indra and reported the matter.

After some years, Śaṅkhiṇī happened to be caught in a fisherman's net. The fisherman caught her and informed Ṛṭadhvaja's sons about his catch. They took her to the palace and put her in a tank there. In due course Śaṅkhiṇī gave birth to seven children. Immediately after that she attained mokṣa. The children began to cry for mother's milk, moving about in the water. Then Brahmā appeared to them and told them not to cry and assured them that they would become the Devas of "Vāyu Skandha". He took them up to the sky and put them in Vāyuskandha. These children were the Maruts of the Sāvṛcīsa Manvantara.

MAHĀŚĀNKHA II. A Nāga, Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha says that this Nāga revolves along with the sun in the month of Mārgaśīra.

MAHĀSENA I. Another name for Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 225, Verse 27).

MAHĀSENA II. A prince of Ujjayini. (See under Aṅgaraka I).

MAHĀŚĪRAS I. An ancient sage. In Mahābhārata. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 10 we find that this sage shone in the assembly of Dharmaputra.

MAHĀŚĪRAS II. A Nāga. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9 states that this Nāga worships Varuṇa in Varuṇa's assembly.

MAHĀŚRAMA. A holy place. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, says that a person who spends a night here observing a fast, would obtain "Subhaloka". One who spends three months like that will become a "Paramasiddha". (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 17).

MAHĀŚŪRA. One of the Asura leaders who fought against Subrahmanyā. (Skanda Purāṇa, Asura Kānda).

MAHĀŚVĀ. A King celebrated in the Purāṇas. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19 says that this King now lives in Yama's assembly.

MAHĀŚVĀNA. A follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40, Verse 26).

MAHĀṬALA. A section of Pāṭala. The descendants of the serpent Kāḍrī live here. These serpents are many-headed and terrible monsters. Chief among them are Kāhaka, Tākakā, Sūṣeṇa, Kāliya and others. All these serpents have long and slender bodies, large holes and are of very cruel nature. Still they are all afraid of Garuḍa and so live quietly with their families in Mahāṭala. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

MAHĀṬAPAS. A great sage. Varāha Purūṇa states that this sage advised King Suprabha to worship Viśṇu.

MAHĀṬEJAS. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 70).

MAHATT. Nārada's Viṇā (Lute). It was this Mahātt which became the lute in the world, as the result of a curse. (See under Nārada).

MAHATTARA. One of the five sons of the Agni Pāṇca-janya. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 22, Verse 9).

MAHĀUJAS I. A King of ancient Bhārata. The Pāṇḍavas had invited this King to take part in the great battle. (Śloka 22, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).

MAHĀUJAS II. A dynasty of Kṣatriyas. King Varuṇa was born in this dynasty. (Śloka 13, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).

MAHĀVEΓĀ. A woman follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 16).

MAHĀVĪRA I. A son of Priyavrata. Śvāyambhuva Manu had two famous sons named Priyavrata and Uttānapāda. Of them, Priyavrata married Śūripañ and Barhiṃṣatī, the two beautiful and virtuous daughters of Viśvakarma Prajāpati. By his first wife Śūripañ, Priyavrata had ten sons, namely, Agnideva, Idhmayājīva, Yajñabahu, Mahāvīra, Rukmaśakura, Gṛhtapṛṣṭha, Savana, Medhātithi, Vīthotra and Kavi. The youngest of his children was a daughter named Urjjasvatī. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

MAHĀVĪRA II. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 68, refers to a Mahāvīra, who was the re-birth of the Asura Krodhavāsa.

MAHĀYAŚAS. A woman follower of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 28).

MAHENDRA I. Father of the princess Pāṭali. (See under Pāṭaliputra).

MAHENDRA II. One of the holy mountains. This mountain has great Purāṇic importance.

1) After slaughtering the Kṣatriyas to extinction sage Parasurāma made Mahendra his place of abode. (Śloka 53, Chapter 129, Ādi Parva).

2) Once Arjuna visited the mountain Mahendra. (Śloka 13, Chapter 214, Ādi Parva).

3) The presiding deity of this mountain sits in the court of Kubera worshipping him. (Śloka 30, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).
MAHENDRA VIKRAMAVARMA

(4) If one bathes in the pond of Rāmatirtha on the top of this mountain one would get the benefit of performing an Aśvamedhayāga. (Sloka 16, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

(5) Brahmā once went to this mountain and conducted a yāga there. (Sloka 22, Chapter 87, Vana Parva).

(6) Yudhishtīra during his pilgrimage visited this mountain. (Sloka 30, Chapter 114, Vana Parva).

(7) Parasurāma gave a dārāṇa (Interview) to Yudhishtīra on a Caturdāśi day on this mountain. (Sloka 16, Chapter 117, Vana Parva).

(8) Hanumān when he was going in search of Sītā visited this mountain also along with the other monkeys. (Sundara Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

MAHENDRA VIKRAMAVARMA. A Sanskrit instructor in histrionics who lived in the 7th century A.D. He was a Pallava King and ruled his country during the period 600 to 630 A.D. He is the author of the drama Mattavilāsa. Many verses from Mattavilāsa have been quoted later in many other books. Kāṇḍa was the capital of Vikramavārma.

MAHESA. An incarnation of Śiva. When once Vetāla, his gatekeeper was born on earth, Śiva and Pārvatī incarnated as Mahēsa and Sāradā on earth. (Satarudra, Saṁhitā, Śiva Purāṇa).

MAHĒSVARA. Another name of Śiva.

MĀHĒSVARAPURA. A holy place. If one worships Saṅkara (Śiva) at this place, all desires would be fulfilled. (Sloka 129, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀHĒSVARĪDHĀRA. A holy place. Who ever visits this place would have to his credit the benefit of doing an Aśvamedhayajna. (Sloka 117, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀHEYA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Sloka 49, Chapter 9, Bhūṣama Parva).

MĀHDĪSA. An ācārya (Preceptor). He is believed to be the author of “Aitareya Brahmaṇa” and “Aitareya Araṇyaka”.

According to Chāndogyopaniṣad and Jaiminiya Upaniṣad Brahmaṇa, Mahīdāsa lived for 117 years. Although this ācārya was a victim of diseases he was quite indifferent to the painful sufferings caused by them. (Chāndogyopaniṣad 3; 16; 7–Jaiminiya Upaniṣad Brahmaṇa, 4; 2; 11).

MAHĪJIT. A King of Māhiṣmati who lived in Dvāpara Yuga. He was childless and got a son by observing Vrata on the Ekādaśi day falling in the bright lunar fortnight in the month of Śrāvaṇa (August). (Uttarakhanda, Padma Purāṇa).

MĀHIKA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Sloka 46, Chapter 9, Bhūṣama Parva).

MAHILĀROPYA. See under Pañcatantra.

MAHMĪNAN. An Ādiyā. Bhāgavata 6th Skandha says that Mahīmān was the son of Bhaga by Siddhi.

MAHMĪMĀSHA. A Sanskrit critic who lived in India in the 11th century A.D. His chief work was entitled “Yaktivicēka”, a treatise on “Alaṅkāra”. The book is divided into three parts. He was a scholar in logic also. He was the author of another book “Tattvoktkiśā”.

MAHIRATHA. A King who earned great merit by observing Vrata in the month of Vaśākha (May). This King gave to those in hell his one day’s puṇya and all of them were released from hell.

Mahīratha was a King who became prosperous by accrued puṇya. Kaśyapa was his guru. The King entrusted the affairs of the state to his ministers and led a very immoral life. The country began to decay day by day and one day Kaśyapa gave Dharmopadeśa to Mahīratha. The Guru said: “Oh King, your body which was in a state of sinning has attained a state of virtue by your association with me. Those well-versed in the Vedas say that the body is of three different kinds. Firstly there is the one which is evil-natured without either virtue or knowledge. Secondly, there is the virtuous one with good conduct. Thirdly, there is the agonising body which hides both virtue and evil. The body without virtue and salvation is always a body of sins. Your body has now become virtuous by becoming devotional to your guru and attending to my words. You are now fit to do virtuous deeds and I shall now make you enjoy the benefits of Vaśākhasnāṇa (a bath with religious rites in the month of Vaśākha).

After that Kaśyapa made him take the bath and worship with proper Vedic rites in the month of Vaśākha. The King became old and died. At once the servants of Kāla (King of Death) came to fetch the soul of Mahīratha. But angels from Mahāviṣṇu came and thrusting aside the agents of Kāla took charge of the soul of Mahīratha. Nymphs from above sang in praise of the King whose sin had waned because of Vaśākhapratassāṇā (early morning bath in the month of Vaśākha). The angels from Viṣṇu carrying the soul of the King to Svarga took him through hell. The King heard the agonising cries of those suffering from different kinds of torture in hell. The King made enquiries and feeling compassionate requested those in charge of the hell to release those there in hell then by accepting a portion of the puṇya acquired by him. The angels agreed to that and the King gave away the Puṇya he had acquired during one day by observing the Vaśākhasvātra. At once all those in hell were released from the agony and were sent to heaven. (Vaśākhamahāhātmayaprakaraṇa, Padma Purāṇa, Pātalakhanda).

MAHIṢA. An Asura.

1) Birth. Long ago there was a famous Asura King named Danu. Two sons named Rambha and Karambha were born to him. Having no issue, they decided to worship Mālavata yakṣa, praying to be blessed with children. They started tapas, Karambha, in the middle of water and Rambha in the middle of Paśćāgni. Indra was alarmed at their tapas. He took the form of a crocodile and went into the water in which Karambha was standing and caught hold of his feet, pulling him down. Karambha was drowned. The mighty Rambha who was enraged at the death of his brother, decided to cut off his own head and offer it as sacrifice in the fire. He drew his sword and was about to cut off his head, when Agni, the god of fire, appeared before him and stopped him saying:—“Do not kill yourself. Killing another person itself is a sin. Suicide is a more serious sin. Ask for any boon you wish to have; I shall grant it. Do not put an end to your life.”

Then Rambha replied:—“If you are prepared to grant me a boon, let me have a son who is more brilliant than yourself and who will be the conqueror of all the three worlds. He should not be defeated by Devas or Asuras, and he should be as mighty as the wind, handsome and an expert archer.” Agni replied:-

“You will have such a son by the woman who wins your heart”.

When god Agni had left after saying this, Rambha went to visit Mālāyakṣa, who was attended to by Yakṣas. There, they had a treasure known as Padma and numerous animals like elephants, horses, buffaloes, cows and sheep. Among them was a three-year-old she-buffalo of exceptional charm and Rambha fell in love with her. She was also irresistibly attracted by him. As fate would have it, a sexual union took place between them.

The she-buffalo became pregnant and Rambha took her with him to his own house in Pātāla. There, the other Dānavas, his kinsmen who came to know of his connection with the she-buffalo, expelled him from their midst as one who had committed a forbidden act. So he returned to Mālāvajayakṣa. The pretty she-buffalo accompanied her husband to the holy Yakṣa-manḍala.

While they were living there, she gave birth to an attractive buffaloid calf. After that, a he-buffalo came across her. But she remained loyal to her Dānava husband who drew his sword and rushed towards the he-buffalo. The terrible beast with his mighty horns attacked Rambha who fell dead on the ground. The widowed Mahiṣa (she-buffalo) sought the protection of the Yakṣas. They saved her from the Mahiṣa (He-buffalo). The disappointed and love-stricken Mahiṣa drowned himself in a holy lake and was reborn as a mighty and heroic Asura named Namara. The Mahiṣa spent some time under the protection of the Yakṣas. When they cremated Rambha’s body, she jumped into the funeral pyre and burnt herself to death. At once from the middle of the fire there arose a monstrous being. That terrible monster, armed with a sword drove away the Yakṣas and killed all the Mahiṣas. Mahiṣa who was the son of Rambha alone was spared. He was the Asura named Raktabija. He defeated all gods like Indra, Rudra, Sūrya, Vāyu and others.

Mahiṣāsura became the King of the Asuras. The alarmed Devas (gods) abandoned their posts of honour. All the worlds were plunged in darkness. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 17).

2) Mahiṣāsura’s Reign. Mahiṣāsura who was intoxicated with pride on account of the boon he had received, became the undisputed and sole emperor of the three worlds. He formed a strong council of Ministers. Cīkṣura who was puffed with pride and an expert in military Science, was installed as War-Minister and Tāmra, the gifted economist, as Finance Minister. The Prime Minister was Asilomā. Bīḍāla was Foreign Minister. Udarka became Military Commander. Bāṣkala, Trinētra and Kālabhandhaka were assigned the posts of Members of the Executive Council. Sukraćārya was the Education Minister. Mahiṣa strengthened his army. The State Treasury overflowed with wealth. Kings of the neighbouring states paid tribute and bowed their heads to him. The Brāhmaṇas offered the share of yajñā to Mahiṣāsura and prostrated before him. (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

3) Outbreak of War. After strengthening his position as Emperor of the world, Mahiṣa contemplated the conquest of Heaven. He sent a messenger to Indra. The messenger ordered Indra to surrender to Mahiṣāsura. Indra answered with utter contempt to the messenger and his master Mahiṣa. The messenger returned and reported the matter to Mahiṣāsura who began to tremble with anger.

Although Indra sent away the messenger with scorn, he had no peace of mind. He called together the Devas and discussed what was to be done. They decided to declare war on Mahiṣāsura. Brahmā and Indra, accompanied by the other Devas set out to Kailāsa. From there, taking Paramāśiva with them, they proceeded to Vaikuṇṭha. On arrival there, they offered prayers to Mahāviṣṇu who appeared before them. They submitted to him their grievances and sufferings under the rule of Mahiṣāsura. After deep deliberations, Mahāviṣṇu supported the proposal for war. Thus the war between Devas and Asuras started.

4) Devāsura Tāuddha. It was a dreadful war. Mahiṣa himself appeared on the scene of battle. He struck at Indra with his mighty club. Before he received the blow, Indra broke the club with his Thunderbolt. The Asura named Andhaka encountered Mahāviṣṇu. The five arrows of that Asura were broken to pieces by Mahāviṣṇu in the sky itself. Then they started a terrible fight with various weapons such as sword, spear, axe, arrow, discus etc. It lasted for about 50 days without a break. Bāṣkala fought against Indra, Mahiṣa against Rudra, Trinētra against Yamadharmā, Mahāhanu against Śrīda, and Asilomā against Pracetās. In the course of the battle, Andhaka, struck a blow at Garuḍa with his cudgel. Garuḍa, the vehicle of Viṣṇu was stunned by the blow, but Viṣṇu restored his energy by stroking him gently with his right hand. After that he took up his bow Śārīga and tried to kill Andhaka with a shower of arrows. But the Dāitya warrior countered all of them with 50 arrows which he shot at Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu smashed all of them and sent his destructive weapon “Sudarśana Cakra” against Andhaka. Without the slightest fear, Andhaka stopped it with his own Cakra weapon and kept Viṣṇu’s weapon at bay and shouted in triumph. Finding that Viṣṇu’s weapon had failed and hearing the scornful shout of Andhaka, the Devas were filled with panic. At this critical moment, Viṣṇu took up his club “Kaumodakī” and rushed into the midst of the Asuras and struck Andhaka with it. Under the blow, the Asura hero reeled and fell down unconscious. At his fall, Mahiṣa himself rushed forward to Viṣṇu with a terrible roar. Then there ensued a bitter fight between Viṣṇu and Mahiṣa. Each began a shower of arrows on the other. But not a single arrow injured either. In the thick of the battle Viṣṇu struck a blow on Mahiṣa’s head and he dropped down unconscious. But ere long the Dānava rose up and taking up his iron pestle aimed a mighty blow at Viṣṇu’s head and brought it down with deadly effect. Under the blow, even Viṣṇu fell unconscious on Garuḍa’s back. Viṣṇu’s condition made Garuḍa withdraw from the scene of battle temporarily, with Viṣṇu on his back. Indra and the other gods began to cry aloud. Śiva, who saw this desperate plight of the Devas, at once came to the battlefield, carrying his trident, ready to fight against Mahīśa. When he tried to pierce the Asura’s chest with his trident, the latter thwarted the blow with his own lance and aimed it at Siva’s breast. Although it actually hit him, Siva disregarded it and gave another thrust to Mahīśa with his trident. By this time Mahāviṣṇu had recovered from his swoon. At once he returned to the field of battle and joined Siva in his attack on Mahīśa. When Mahīśa saw that both Siva and Viṣṇu were launching a combined attack against him, in his wild fury he assumed his own buffalo form and lifting up his tail and shaking his head rushed towards his mighty adversaries. With his terrible horns he lifted up mountain peaks and hurled them at the enemy. But the Deva leaders stopped them with their shower of arrows. Viṣṇu sent his Cakra against him and it made the Asura chief drop down senseless. But he soon recovered and rushed forward to renew his attack with a terrible roar. Viṣṇu then sounded his divine conch “Pāñcājaṇya” and drowned the sound of his roar. Just as the roaring of the asura frightened the Devas, the sound of Pāñcājaṇya struck terror in the minds of the Asuras.

5) Mahīśa’s Death. The Asuras were terrified at the sound of Pāñcājaṇya. In order to encourage them, Mahīśa assumed the form of a lion and rushed into the midst of the army of Devas roaring. Even the Trimūrtis were alarmed for a short while when they saw the fierce beast advancing through their battle-array killing and mauling hundreds of the Devas on either side. Mahāviṣṇu at once sent his weapon Cakra against the lion. The lion was reduced to ashes by it, but Mahīśa rose up again in the form of a buffalo and rushed forward. He gave a severe cut on Mahāviṣṇu’s chest with his long and powerful horn. Mahāviṣṇu started fleeing to Vaikuntha. At the sight of this, Siva concluded that Mahīśa was proof against killing and so he also fled to Kailāsa riding on his bull. When Viṣṇu and Siva took to their heels, Brahmā also flew to Satyaloka, riding on this swan. Although the leaders left the field, the rest of the Devas under the leadership of Indra, encountered Mahīśa again. Indra drew his Vajra. The Aśatādikākās assisted him. The battle raged fiercely again. The Devas began to flee for life. Taking this opportunity, Mahīśa’sura forced his way into Heaven. He planted his Daitya flag high. He drove out all the remaining Devas. In this way the Asuras took possession of Devaloka. The Devas took shelter on the tops of mountains. Several centuries passed. The Devas assembled and prayed to Brahmā. He took them again to Vaikuntha. Siva also arrived there. The Devas submitted their grievances to Viṣṇu. They prayed to him to devise some method by which Mahīśa could be killed. Brahmā had given him a boon that no Man was capable of killing him. Mahāviṣṇu said to them:—“By Virtue of the boon, Mahīśa could be killed only by a woman. If we can create a woman who is part of the Devas with their power and glory, we could kill him with her help. So let us try to create such a mighty woman, concentrating all our powers on her. After her creation, we must give her all our weapons.”

As soon as Mahāviṣṇu spoke these words, a figure with dazzling effulgence issued forth from Brahmā’s face. Both Viṣṇu and Siva were amazed at the sight of this figure radiating beams of light which were partly cool and partly warm. Similar figures, embodying the peculiar powers and qualities of Viṣṇu, Siva, Indra, Kubera, Varuṇa and all other gods, emanated from them. In a moment all these figures merged into a single figure and transformed themselves into a single woman with celestial beauty and having eighteen arms. This woman of exquisite beauty combining all the powers and glories of all the Devas was Devī herself. The devas supplied her with jewels and ornaments and gorgeous clothes. Decked in all glory and with fascinating beauty, riding on a lion, she took her stand at the entrance of Devaloka and challenged Mahīśa. At the very first sight of Devī, Mahīśa fell in love with her. She declared she would become the wife of the person who could defeat her in battle. So Mahīśa made up his mind to defeat her in a fight. It was a terrible battle. All the Ministers of Mahīśa, like Bāṣkala, Durmukha, Tāmra, Cāikṣura, Asilomā and Biḍāla were slain. At last Mahīśa himself appeared on the scene to fight with Devī. Mahīśa started with a shower of arrows and Devī countered them all with her own arrows. In the end she attacked him with Viṣṇu Cakra. The Cakra cut off his throat and he dropped down dead. The devas raised a thunderous shout of joy and triumph. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

MAHIṢĀDA. A woman follower of Lord Subrahmanya. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 28).

MAHIṢĀKA. (MAHIṢĀKA): A special tribe. They were once Kṣatriyas but they became Śūdras by their evil mode of living. (Ślokas 22, 23, Chapter 38, Anuṣāsana Parva). Arjuna during his victory march conquered this tribe in the south. (Chapter 83, Aśvamedha Parva).

MAHIṢĀKA (M). The name given by the Ancient people to modern Mysore. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 59).

MAHIṢĀKṢA. An Asura who came into conflict with Subrahmanya. (Skanda Purāṇa).

MAHIṢĀNĀNĀ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 25, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MAHIṢMĀN I. A King of the Hēhaya royal family. It was this King who constructed on the banks of the river Narmadā, Māhiṣmati, the capital city of Kārtavīryārjuna. It got the name of Mahīṣmati because it was constructed by Mahīṣmān (Chapter 2, Brahmānda Purāṇa).

MAHIṢMĀN II. A King of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. He was the son of a King called Kuṇi. (Kuṇi is called Kuṇi in some of the Purāṇas). Kuṇi had three other sons named Sabhājī, Bhadrasena and Durdama. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAHIṢMĀTĪ. Sixth daughter of Anīgiras. Mahīṣmati was known as Anumati also. (Śloka 6, Chapter 218, Vana Parva).

MAHIṢMĀTĪ. An ancient city on the banks of river Narmadā. There is reference to this place in many places in the Purāṇas and a few of them are given below:

(i) King Nila was reigning in a country with Māhiṣmatī as its capital. Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas during his victorious march to the south conquered this country. (Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
MAHODARA I. A serpent born to Kaśyapa of his wife Kādru. (Sloka 16, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

MAHODARA II. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtaraṣṭra. Bhīmasena killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 19, Chapter 157, Droṇa Parva).

MAHODARA III. An ancient sage. (See under Kapālamocana).

MAHODARA IV. An army chief of Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

MAHODĀRA V. A friend of Ghaṭotkaca son of Bhīma. When Ghaṭotkaca started for Prājyotisapura to conquer Kāmakaṭṭakaṭa, Mahodāra also followed him. (Skanda Purāṇa).

MAHODARA VI. One of the sons of Rāvaṇa. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mahodāra fought first with Aṅgada and later in a combat with the monkey soldier Niḷa, he was killed. (Sargas 70, 81, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARA VII. The minister of Sumāli, grandfather (maternal), of Rāvaṇa. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mahodāra accompanied Sumāli when he came to help Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARA VIII. One of the sons of Viśāvras born of his wife Puspatkā. Hanūmān killed this demon in the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 70, Verse 66, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MAHODARYA. A King who is worthy of being thought of every morning. (Sloka 55, Chapter 155, Anuśāsana Parva).

MAHODAYA. One of the sons of Vasiṣṭha. Once Trīṣaṅkū, King of Ayodhyā, conducted a yāga with Viśvāmitra as Ṛtvik and for that yāga Viśvāmitra invited Vasiṣṭha and his son Mahodāya also. But Mahodāya refused to respond to the invitation and sent a message picturing both Viśvāmitra and Trīṣaṅkū as Caṇḍālas. Enraged at this insulting message Viśvāmitra cursed Mahodāya to become Śūdra. (Verses 20-21, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Chapter 59, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MAHODAYAPURI. The capital city of Kubera. This is called Alakāpurī also. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MAHOTTHA. A Janapada of Purānic fame in Bhārata. The chief of this place, Akroṣa was conquered by Nakula during his victory march. (Sloka 6, Chapter 32, Sabhā Parva).

MAINĀKA I.
1) General information. A mountain. This mountain was the son of Himavān and father of Krauṇca. (Sloka 13, Chapter 18, Harivaṇsā).
2) How the mountain helped Hanumān. There is an unbreakable tie between Maināka and the Kings of Iksvāku family. There is a story in Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa that the sāgara (ocean) was constructed by the sixty thousand sons of the King Sagara of Iksvāku family. This sāgara once gave refuge to Maināka and brought it up. There is a reason for that :—

In the early yugas mountains had wings and they used to fly and drop to the ground as they liked. People used to live in fright always and at the request of the people Indra made the mountains stand in a row and cut off their wings. At that time the god Vāyu (wind) took away his friend Maināka and put him in the ocean. From that day onwards Maināka and the ocean developed an intimacy which even death could not wipe off. Hanūmān was the son of Vāyu, the friend and saviour of Maināka. It was because of that that Maināka gave refuge for Hanūmān on his way to Lanka. Because the ocean gave refuge to Maināka after its escape from the sword of Indra and because the ocean (Sāgara) was the creation of the sons of Sagara, a King of the Iksvāku race, Maināka felt indebted to Sagara and the entire race to which he belonged. Maināka thus had great respect for Śrī Rāma who belonged to the Iksvāku race. This was also responsible for Maināka giving relief to Hanūmān on his way to Lanka. (See under Parvata).

2) Other details.
(i) This mountain is situated near the lake Bindusarovara which was to the north of Kailāsā. Bhagiratha did penance to bring Gaṅgā to the earth on this mountain. (Chapter 3, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) Pāṇḍavas who went to the north crossed the mountain Maināka and went further. (Sloka 1, Chapter 139, Vana Parva).
(iii) The mountain Maināka shines with golden peaks. (Sloka 44, Chapter 145, Vana Parva).

MAINĀKA II. A holy place on the west coast on the banks of the river Narmadā. This is also on a mountain. (Sloka 11, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).

MAINĀKA III. Another mountain. (This is in Krauṇca Śaiva. (Sloka 18, Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAINDA. One of the monkeys who helped Śrī Rāma in the search for Sītā. Purāṇas give the following information regarding this monkey:
(i) Mainda lived in a cave in Kiṣkindhā. While he was living there Sahadeva one of the Pāṇḍavas came that way during his victory campaign in Daḵṣiṇa Bhārata and fought with him. Sahadeva was defeated. But Mainda was pleased with him and gave him many valuable presents and advised him that no difficulties should be put against Dharma and achieving his object. (Sloka 18, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) Mainda was the minister of Sugrīva, King of the monkeys. He was mighty, intelligent, and kind to others. (Sloka 23, Chapter 28, Vana Parva).
(iii) Mainda was one of the leaders who led the monkeys who went in search of Sītā. (Sloka 19, Chapter 263, Vana Parva).
(iv) In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Mainda and others also fainted along with Lākṣmaṇa and others. It was only when they washed their faces with the water given by Kubera that they could see things clearly.
(v) Mainda was the son of A’śvinīdevas. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MAITRA I. A Demon tribe. Once a sage named Loma’sa persuaded Dharma to attack this tribe.

MAITRA II. An auspicious time (Muhūrtā). Śrī Kṛṣṇa started on his historic journey to Hastināpura at Maitramuhūrtā. (Sloka 6, Chapter 83, Udyoga Parva).
MAITRA III. A constellation. Kṛtavrāma joined the Kaurava side on the day of this constellation. (Śloka 14, Chapter 35, Salya Parva).

MĀTRA VARUṆA. Another name for Vasistha. Agastya also is known by this name. Because they were born as the sons of Mitra and Varuṇa they got this name. How they came to be reborn as the sons of Mitrāvṛuṇa is told in Devī Bhāgavata.

There was once a celebrated emperor named Nimi in the Iṣvāku line of kings. Nimi was the twelfth son of Iṣvāku. The agrahāra found near the āśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi, called Jayantapura was constructed by Nimi. Once Nimi decided to perform a big yāga and after taking the consent of his father made preparations for the same. He invited such great sages as Bhūrgu, Aṅgiras, Vāmadeva, Pulastya, Pulaha and Rśka. He then went to their family preceptor Vasiṣṭha and requested him to be the chief priest. But Vasiṣṭha had already promised Indra to conduct a yāga for him and so advised Nimi to postpone his yāga to a later date. But Nimi was unwilling to postpone his yāga and so he performed it with Gautama Mahārṣi as the chief priest. It took five hundred years for Nimi to complete the yāga. After five hundred years Vasiṣṭha after completing the yāga of Indra came to see Nimi and found that he had already conducted the yāga without him. Vasiṣṭha was angry and he cursed Nimi saying that Nimi would become bodiless. But powerful Nimi cursed Vasiṣṭha also and separated his soul from his body.

Grievedstricken, Vasiṣṭha went to Brahmā and complained to him. Brahmā said, “Oh son, you go and merge with the brilliance of Mitrāvṛuṇa and stay there. After some time you will be able to be born without being in a womb; you will then have a memory of the past and you will be very learned and will be worshipped by all”.

Vasiṣṭha was pleased to hear that and he circumsambulated Brahmā and prostrated before him and then went to the āśrama of Mitrāvṛuṇa. He then abandoned his body there and merged with the brilliance of Mitrāvṛuṇa. One day Urvāśi with her companions came to the āśrama of Mitrāvṛuṇa and attracted by her charm they spent a night with her. Their semen at one time fell into a jar nearby and from it were born two people, Agastya and Vasiṣṭha, (Skandha 6, Devī Bhāgavata).

MĀTRA Y. A sage of great brilliance of ancient India.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu:—

2) Other details.

(i) Once Mātra went to Hastināpura and told Duryodhana that he should behave kindly to the Pāṇḍavas. Duryodhana who did not much relish the advice sat tapping on his thighs with his hands, not seriously attending to the sage. Mātra was displeased at the discourtesy and cursed that Bhīma would one day break Duryodhana's thighs. (See under Duryodhana).

(ii) Mātra was a courtier of Yudhisṭhira. (Śloka 10, Chapter 4, Sāhā Parva).

(iii) Mātra was one among the sages who visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 6, Chapter 47, Sānti Parva).

(iv) Once he discussed with Vyāsa topics on Dharma. (Chapter 120, Anuśādana Parva).

(v) When Śrī Kṛṣṇa died, the spiritualistic ideology of Dharmaputra became more dominant and he approached Vidura for Dharma. Vidura sent him to Mātra. Dharmaputra went to the Āśrama of Mātra on the banks of the river Gaṅgā and after paying respects to him accepted Dharma. (Instruction in law, duty and morals) from him. (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MĀTRA YI. Wife of the sage Yājñavalkya. She was one of the most learned and virtuous women in ancient India. There are innumerable references to her in the Purāṇas. (For details about her splendour see under Candrāṅgada).

MĀTRA. Daughter of Dakṣa. Thirteen daughters of Dakṣa were married to Dharmadeva. Mātra was one of them. Mātra bore a son named Abhaya to Dharmadeva. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MĀJANA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 70, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MĀKANDI. A city of the King Drupada. This city was on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. (Śloka 73, Chapter 137, Ādi Parva). See under KAPATABHIKSU.

MĀKARADAMŚTRA. A prostitute of Mathūrā, the birth place of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The story of this woman who had made prostitution and cheating her aim in life was told to Vāsavadātī wife of Udayana by Vasantaka. The curbing of the arrogance of Makaradāṃśṭrā by a poor brahmin of name Lohajangha with the help of Vibhīṣaṇa, emperor of the demons, is the theme of the story. Makaradāṃśṭrā had a daughter named Rūpiṇīkā. The mother tried to make the daughter also a prostitute. Once Rūpiṇīkā went to a far-off temple for worship as instructed by her mother. There she met a poor brahmin named Lohajangha and Rūpiṇīkā was attracted to him by his handsome features. She sent word through her maid requesting Lohajangha to come to her house. Rūpiṇīkā came back and waited for her lover to come. After some time Lohajangha came. Makaradāṃśṭrā scrutinised the new-comer with suspicion but Rūpiṇīkā took him to her bed-room. Both of them remained there making love. Makaradāṃśṭrā finding her daughter going against the principles of a prostitute called her to her side and said: “Dear daughter, why do you keep this poor brahmin? Is this the duty of a prostitute? Love and prostitution never go together. We are like ducks. The twilight of love remains for a few seconds only. So do send away this brahmin who has no money.”

Rūpiṇīkā discarded the advice of her mother and Makaradāṃśṭrā felt annoyed. She decided to send out Lohajangha somehow. One day a prince came that way and Makaradāṃśṭrā enticed him to her house and requested the prince to accept Rūpiṇīkā and send Lohajangha out of her house.

The prince accepted the request of the mother-prostitute. At that time Rūpiṇīkā had gone to the temple and Lohajaṅgha for a walk. After some time Lohajaṅgha came as usual and entered the house and Makaradāṃstrā introduced Lohajaṅgha to the prince. At once the servants of the prince beat Lohajaṅgha and carrying him away out of the house put him in an excrcement pit. Lohajaṅgha somehow escaped from there and ran away. He was sorry to part with his love and he went on a pilgrimage. He walked for a long distance in the hot sun and feeling tired searched for a shady place to take some rest. Then he saw the carcass of an elephant. Jackals entering through the buttocks had eaten all flesh and the animal lay hollow inside with the skin in tact on the skeleton. Lohajaṅgha entered the inside of the elephant and slept there. That night it rained heavily and the hole at the buttocks contracted with little space for Lohajaṅgha to get out. The rains continued, the water-level in the river Gaṅgā rose and soon the carcass of the elephant was carried away to the river and it gradually reached the ocean. At that time a great kite taking it to be flesh for food drew it up and took it to the other side of the ocean. When it pecked it open it found a man inside and frightened left it there and flew away. By this time Lohajaṅgha awoke from his slumber and while he was looking around him in surprise he saw two demons approaching him. The demons thought he had come to the place crossing the ocean like Śrī Raṁa to bring disaster to them and so they immediately ran up to Vibhīṣaṇa and told him of the incident. Vibhīṣaṇa asked his servants to bring Lohajaṅgha before him and when he was brought before him enquired very politely who he was and why he had come there and how he had come. In reply to the enquires Lohajaṅgha said thus: “I am a brahmin from Mathurā. I did penance to please Viṣṇu to get relief from my poverty and one day Viṣṇu appeared before me in person and said, ‘Go to my devotee Vibhīṣaṇa, and he will give you enough wealth to live happily’. It was in a dream and when I awoke I found myself on this shore. I do not know how it all happened.”

Vibhīṣaṇa was immensely pleased to hear the story of Lohajaṅgha and gave him immense wealth including many precious diamonds, golden replica of the emblem of Viṣṇu consisting of Śaṅkha, Cakra, Gaṅga and Padma and a small kite from the mountain of Svārṇamūla. Accepting all these Lohajaṅgha flew on the back of the kite back to Mathurā and allighted at a deserted place there. Keeping all his valuable articles in a secret place he took one diamond and selling it acquired some cash and with that purchased some ornamental dress for himself. At dusk he dressed himself and holding the emblem of Viṣṇu flew on the back of the kite to the house of Rūpiṅkī and addressing Rūpiṅkī in private said, “I am Viṣṇu. I have come to you for a union because you are virtuous”. Hearing that Rūpiṅkī respectfully surrendered herself to him. Before dawn Lohajaṅgha left the house and flew back to the deserted place. Rūpiṅkī felt herself to be a goddess and did not speak to anybody in the morning. The mother was perplexed to find her daughter observing a vow of silence and questioned her. Rūpiṅkī then told her mother all that had happened on the previous night. Makaradāṃstrā wanted to confirm the story of her daughter and so she kept awake that night to see what took place. She found Lohajaṅgha arriving as Viṣṇu on the back of Gaṇḍa and fully believing him to be Mahāviṣṇu was overjoyed at the fortune of her daughter and running to her the next morning said “Oh, dear daughter, by the grace of Śrī Nārāyana you have become a goddess. How fortunate am I? You should do one thing for me. You must send me to heaven with this body of mine along with your husband-god.”

Rūpiṅkī agreed to do so. That night she told the fake Viṣṇu the desire of her mother. Then Lohajaṅgha said: “Your mother who is a great sinner is not eligible to go to Svarga in her present state. Day after tomorrow on the Dvādaśī day the gates of heaven will open. Early morning on that day the goblins of Śiva would enter Svarga. I shall then try to send your mother along with them. But your mother should then appear as a goblin. The hair on the head should be shaved at five places and the remaining hair locked to form five tufts of hair. She should wear a garland of bones and the body should be painted black on one side with charcoal and red on the other side with saffron. The painting should be in oil and she should not wear any clothes. This would make her appear like a goblin of Mahēśvara (Śiva) and then there will be no difficulty for me to allow her to enter Svarga.

Lohajaṅgha left the place early in the morning and Rūpiṅkī told her mother all that her husband told her. Makaradāṃstrā dressed herself as instructed by Lohajaṅgha and awaited the arrival of the fake Mahāviṣṇu. Lohajaṅgha came at night and Rūpiṅkī showed him her mother dressed as desired by her husband. Lohajaṅgha took Makaradāṃstrā on the back of his kite and flew up. As he rose high he saw a tall flagstaff of a temple nearby. It had a wheel on its top. Lohajaṅgha placed her on the wheel and said, “Do sit here for a while. I shall soon come back to you and bless you”. To the people assembled in the temple he spoke from the air, “Citizens, today the goddess ‘Mārti’, destroyer of everything, will fall on you. If you want to avoid that, remain in this temple and worship Viṣṇu”.

People were frightened when they heard the warning from air and all remained in the temple chanting prayers and reciting devotional songs about Viṣṇu. Makaradāṃstrā sat there for a while dreaming about the happiness in store for her in Svarga and awaiting her daughter’s husband to come and take her. But Lohajaṅgha had come to the temple in an ordinary dress and was with the crowd in the temple. Time dragged on and it became midnight and Makaradāṃstrā sitting on the wheel of the flagstaff felt uneasy. She could not sit there any longer and she cried aloud, “Oh, I am falling”. People mistook her for Mārti and cried back, “Oh, goddess, do not fall”. It became morning and in the sunlight they saw a figure sitting on the top of the flagstaff and were surprised. The King was informed and he came to the temple and so also all people in the place. When the people on scrutinising the figure knew it was Makaradāṃstrā, they all clapped their hands laughing loudly. Hearing the news Rūpiṅkī also came to the temple and she somehow got her mother down from the flagstaff. The King then made the prostitute tell her story and when it was finished he declared thus: “Who has thus played fraud on this prostitute who had throughout her life cheated other people? If he comes before me now I will give him my crown and Kingdom.

Hearing that Lohajangha appeared before the King and confessed that he had done the mischief. He then narrated his story to the king and placed before the king the golden Scal of Visuś’s emblem which Vibhīṣaṇa had given him. The king as per his promise gave Lohajangha his kingdom and Rūpīpiṇā once more became his. The arrogance of Makaradaṅṣṭrā was thus curbed.

(Kāṭhāmkdhambaka, Kāṭhāṣārīstāgara).

MAKARAGIRI. A mountain near Mahāmeru. Mahāmeru is two thousand yojanas long and six hundred yojanas high and stands in the midst of eight mountains two on each of the four sides. Makaragiri and Triṣṇagīra are on the north side. On the east are Jaṭhara and Devakūta, on the south are Kailāsa and Karavīra and on the west are Pavamāna and Pāryāṭra. (8th Skandha, Devi Bhaṅgavata).

MAKARAKŚA. Son of the demon Khara. In the epic battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa after the death of Kumbha and Nikumbha the most prominent fighter who entered the battle-field on the side of Rāvaṇa was Makarākśa. He gave a great fight to Rāma but was in the end killed by him. (Sarga 79, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MAKARADHĪVĀJA I. A son of Hanūmān. He was born to a crocodile living in the ocean as the perspiration droplets fell on her from Hanūmān. (Sārakāṇḍa, Ananda Rāmāyana).

MAKARADHĪVĀJA II. One of the sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great battle by Bhīmascena. (Chapter 92, Droṇa Parva).

MAKARI. A river of Purāṇic fame. (Śloka 23, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAKŚOPETĀ. A dāitya. This dāitya whirls round along with an ādiyuṭa, known as Viṣṇu in the month of Kārttika. (November) (12th Skandha, Bhaṅgavata).

MĀLĀ. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 39, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

Mālādā. One of the wives of Sage Atri. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 38 Verses 74-87).

Mālādā (Ś) A community of people who lived in ancient India. From Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 27, we learn that they were the partisans of the Kauravas.

MĀLĀJA. An ancient town celebrated in the Purāṇas. It is also known as “Aṅgamaḷāja”. (See under Aṅga-MĀLAJA).

MĀLĀTIKA. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 4, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MĀLĀVĀ. A Purāṇic river to be remembered. (Śloka 25, Chapter 165, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀLĀVA. An ancient country on the west coast of India. Mahābhārata contains the following statements regarding Mālāva:

(i) The people of Mālāva participated in the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Śloka 11, Chapter 34, Sābhā Parva).

(ii) Armed young Kṣatriyas of Mālāva presented Yudhiṣṭhīra with great wealth. (Śloka 15, Chapter 52, Sābhā Parva).

(iii) Karnā conquered Mālāvadēśa. (Śloka 20, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

(iv) Mālāva was one of the prominent and renowned countries of ancient India (Śloka 60, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

(v) Obeying the order of Bhīṣma the people of Mālāva attacked Arjuna. (Śloka 76, Chapter 59, Bhīṣma Parva).

(vi) Śri Kṛṣṇa once conquered Mālāvadeśa. (Śloka 16, Chapter 19, Droṇa Parva).

(vii) Paraśurāma exterminated the Kṣatriyas of Mālāvadeśa. (Śloka 11, Chapter 70, Droṇa Parva).

MĀLĀVA(S). The Kṣatriyas born to king Aśvapati of his wife Mālavī are known as Mālavas. (Śloka 49, Chapter 297, Vana Parva).

MĀLĀVĪ. The queen of Aśvapati king of Madra. She was the mother of Sāvitrī. Aśvapati begot of Mālāvī a hundred sons called Mālavas.

Yama took to Kālapurī the soul of Satyavān who was short-lived. Sāvitrī, wife of Satyavān, followed Yama. Yama blessed Sāvitrī and said she would have many children and gave life to Satyavān again. Yama said “Satyavān will live for four hundred years and you will get a hundred sons of him. Your father Aśvapati also will get a hundred sons of Mālāvī and the earth will get the name of Sāvitrī also”. Accordingly Mālavī got a hundred sons and they were called Mālavas. (Chapter 297, Vana Parva).

MĀLĀYA I. A son of King Rṣabhadeva belonging to the Priyavrata dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

MĀLĀYA II. A son of Garuḍa (M. B. Sābhā Parva Chapter 99, Verse 14).

MĀLĀYA III. A son of Garuḍa. (Śloka 14, Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

MĀLĀYA IV. A mountain in South India. The following pieces of information are gathered about this mountain from the Purāṇas:-

(1) The sovereign deity of this mountain attends on Kubera in Kubera’s assembly. (M. B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 32).

(2) The Pāṇḍya and Cola Kings collected Sandal Paste essence from the Malaya and Dardura mountains, filled them in golden pots and presented them to Yudhiṣṭhīra. (M. B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 33).

(3) The monkeys who went in search of Śītā crossed this mountain. (M. B. Vana Parva, Chapter 209, Verse 44).

(4) Malaya is considered as one of the seven chief mountains of India. (M. B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Vers 11).

(5) Once Mrtyu deity performed tapas on this mountain. (M. B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 26).

(6) In Tripuradahanā, Siva used this mountain as the flagstaff of his chariot. (M. B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 73).

MĀLĀYA V. In Mahābhārata there is a description of another Malaya mountain besides the Malaya mountain of South India. When the sage Śuka ascended Heaven, he saw a Malaya mountain on the way. The celestial women, Urvāśī and Viprācittī used to dance there daily. This Malaya is somewhere above Kailāsa. (M. B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 332, Verse 21).

MĀLĀYADHIVĀJA (PĀNDYA). In Mahābhārata, Karṇa Parva, Chapter 20, we read about a Pāṇḍya King named Malayadhivāja who took part in the Kurukṣetra battle and was killed in the fight against Aśvathāmā.

MĀLĀYAPRABHA. A King celebrated in Purāṇas. He ruled over Kurukṣetra. Once when there was a famine in the land, King Malayaprabha exempted his subjects from all taxes. The greedy ministers did not like it and they advised him against it. The King yielded to the advice of his ministers. On one occasion Malayaprabha’s son Induprabha pleaded with his father and told him that he should not oppress his subjects at the instigation of his evil ministers. He added that the King was their “Kalpavrksa” and the subjects were his “Kamadhenu.” But the King did not heed the advice of his son. He jokingly said that Induprabha was also their “Kalpavrksa.” Stung by this taunt, Induprabha took a solemn oath that he would either become a “Kalpavrksa” or lay down his life in the attempt. He left the palace at once and began an austere tapas. Indra was pleased and appeared before him. Receiving his blessing, Induprabha returned to his capital and stood there as a “Kalpavrksa.” He fulfilled the desires of the people. A few days later, Indra came to the tree to test Induprabha. He told Induprabha: “Your mission of service is over; now you may come to Heaven”. But he insisted that his subjects also should be taken with him to Heaven. Indra was pleased at the devotion and love of Induprabha for his subjects and agreed to take all his subjects also with him. Induprabha gave up the form of the tree and resuming his own shape, accepted “Bodhisattvacarya”. (Katharatriśāgara, Saśāṅkavati lamāraka, 5th Tārāraja).

MALAYA(S). The collective name of the ministers of Vibhiṣaṇa. The four ministers were: Anala, Anila, Hara and Sampātī. (Uttar Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa)

MĀLI. A demon of great valour. 1) Genealogy and birth. There were two very brave brothers in the demon tribe named Heti and Praheta. They were inseparable companions of Mahābali. Praheta was unmarried and spent his time in religious pursuits. Heti married Bhayā, sister of Kāla and got a son named Vidyutkeśa. Vidyutkeśa married Sālakaṇḍā daughter of Sandhyā and got a son named Sukesa. Sukesa married Devavaṭī, daughter of Grāmāṇi, alias Maṇimāyā. Devavaṭī delivered three sons, Mālī, Sumālī and Mālyavān.

2) Boon to Mālī. ‘The three brothers, even while young decided to acquire great strength and started performing penance. When their penance became very fierce Brahman appeared before them in person and asked them what boon they wanted. They said, ‘We must be invincible, we must be destroyers of our enemies, we must have long life, we must become rich and powerful ever remaining friendly with each other’, Brahman granted the boon asked for.

3) Family life. After obtaining the boon they went to Viśvakāraṇa and asked him to construct a place of abode for them. Viśvakāraṇa was frightened and he hastened to suggest a beautiful place for them to live. He said, ‘There is a mountain named Trikūṭa on the shores of the southern sea. There is a mountain on it called Subala. Its main top grazes the sky. Its four sides have been beautifully chiselled. No birds fly to its top. I have constructed there at the request of Indra a beautiful city surrounded by walls of gold and adorned on all sides with festoons of gold. That city is called Laṅkā and you, demon-lords, can stay there. You will get glory and prestige which even Indra could not acquire in his Amarāvati. If you live in Laṅkā with your followers you will be unconquerable’. The happy demons with their people went to Laṅkā. They married the daughters of a Gandharva woman named Narmadā. Mālī married Vasudhā; Sumālī, Ketumati; and Mālyavān, Sundarī. Mālī begot of his wife Vasudhā four sons named Anila, Anala, Hara and Sampātī. Sumālī got of his wife Ketumati ten sons named Prahasta, Akampaṇa, Viṅgata, Kālaṇkumukha, Dhūmrakaṇḍa, Danda, Supārśva, Saṁjñārāda, Prakāvātī and Bhāsaṅkarṇa and four daughters named Vēkā, Puspotkaṭā, Káltasī and Kumbhināsī.

MALINĪ I. A river which flowed by the side of the aśrama of Kaṇva Muni. The river Cukka which flows through the district of Saharanpur today was the Malinī of old. Some believe that Malinī starts from the Himālayas. Sakunṭalā was born on the shores of this river. (Sloka 10, Chapter 72, Ādi Parva).

MALINĪ II. One of the seven mothers of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 10, Chapter 228, Vana Parva).

MALINĪ III. A demoness. This maiden was sent to serve Viśravas, father of Rāvaṇa, by Kubera. Vibhiṣaṇa was the son born to Viśravas of Malinī. (Sloka 3, Chapter 275, Vana Parva).

MALINĪ IV. A city of Purānic fame in the country of Aniga. Varasandha gave this city to Karna. (Sloka 6, Chapter 5, Sabhā Parva).

MALINĪ V. The name of Sabari in her previous birth. (See under Sabari).

MALINĪ VI. A nymph born to Puṣkara of Pamlacō. (Chapter 8, Verse 14, Viśrā Parva). King Ruci married this nymph and they got a son named Raucya. The lord of Raucyanvananta was this Raucya. (Mārkandeya Purāṇa).

MALINĪ VII. A brahmin woman of very bad character. Because of her evil deeds she was born as a dog in her next birth. It observed then the Śuklavādāśi Vrata and so was born again as the nymph Urvaśī. (2. 7. 24, Skanda Purāṇa).

MALLARĀṢTRA. A country in ancient India. The capital of Mallarāṣtra was the present city of Kuśi. At the time of Mahābhārata, this country was ruled by a King named Pārthiva. There is a statement in the Mahābhārata that this King was defeated by Bhīmasena. When the Pāṇḍavas discussed the countries in which they were to live “incognito”, the name of Mallarāṣtra was also mentioned. (Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 3 ; Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 44; Viśrā Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 13).

MĀLYAPINDAKA. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MĀLYAVĀṆ I. A Pārśada of Siva. The most intimate friend of Mālyavān was Puṣpadanta.

1) Curse of Mālyavān. Once Śiva was telling Pārvatī a story of the Gandharvas and Puṣpadanta heard it as he sat hiding in a place nearby. Pārvatī got angry and was about to curse when Mālyavān intervened and recommended for mercy. Pārvatī got angrier and cursed them both to be born on earth as men. They begged for relief and Pārvatī said: “In the deep depths of the forest of Vindhyā mountains there lives a Yakṣa named Supraṭṭika who has been turned into a devil called Kaṇabhūti by a curse. Puṣpadanta should narrate the story he has now heard to Kaṇabhūti and he will then be released from the curse. Kaṇabhūti would narrate to Mālyavān what he has heard from Puṣpadanta and Kāñabhūti would then be released from his curse. Mālyavān should then make public the story he has heard and then he will also be released from the curse'. Puspadanta was born as Vararuci in the city of Kauśāmbi and Mālyavān as Guṇādhyā in the city of Supraṭiṣṭhita. (See under Guṇādhyā).
2) Another curse to Mālyavān. By another curse Mālyavān was born as a spider and Puspadanta as an elephant in the south of Bhārata. (See under Puspadanta).
3) Part in Devāsura battle. Released from curses Mālyavān reached the presence of Śiva. It was the time of the Devāsura battle and Mālyavān fought on the side of the devas. Mālyavān played a prominent part in the battle. Mālyavān had to fight against a fierce archer named Kolāhala. Kolāhala sent three arrows one each on the forehead and the two shoulders. Mālyavān returned the fight with arrows. Then Kolāhala showing his swiftness of hand tormented him with several different weapons. Unmindful of this vehement attack Mālyavān plucked a billow and threw it at Kolāhala. Then suddenly a fierce figure blazing with fire having nine pairs of hands and feet and three heads looking yellow in colour jumped out of the demon and made Mālyavān faint by the terrible heat it gave out. Mālyavān accepted defeat and ran away to the mountain. (Chapter 13, Part 4, Agni Purāṇa).

MĀLYAVĀN II. Son of the demon Sukeśa. He was the brother of Māli and Sumāli. This Mālyavān was the father of Rāvaṇa's mother. They were all living in Pāṭāla but when Rāvaṇa obtained his boon he sent away Kubera from Lāṅkā and became the ruler of Lāṅkā. Mālyavān and other demons followed Rāvaṇa to Lāṅkā and stayed with him confirming his sovereignty over the place.

In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Sugrīva stole the crown of Rāvaṇa and kicked him on his face. Ashamed of the insult Rāvaṇa went back to his palace and the first person he saw was Mālyavān. The old man had come to advise Rāvaṇa to give back Sītā to Śrī Rāma. But Rāvaṇa did not like the advice and tore to pieces the letter of advice. (For more details see under Māli).

MĀLYAVĀN III. A mountain. This mountain is situated between the mountains of Meru and Mandara in the country of Iļaṛṭa. This mountain shines like gold. (Chapter 7, Bhiṣma Parva).

MĀLYAVĀN IV. Another mountain near the Hīṁalayas. The Pāṇḍavas visited this mountain on their way to the mountain Gandhamādāna from the āśrama of Ārṭiṣeṇa. (Chapter 153, Vana Parva).

MĀLYAVĀN V. A mountain situated in the country of Kiśkindhā. The fight between Bāli and Sugrīva took place near this mountain. This is on the banks of the river Tiugabhidrā. Uttra Rāmāyaṇa states that the palace of Sugrīva was on the top of this mountain. Śrī Rāma stayed on the beautiful peak of this mountain for four months. (Śloka 40, Chapter 280, Vana Parva).

MĀMĀŅKAM. Māmāṇkam was a very important national festival of Kerala. This festival used to be conducted on the sandy beach of Tirunāvāya. It represented the crowning ceremony of the sovereign of Kerala. There used to be a grand assembly of all the artistes of Kerala. There was an exhibition of the arts, trade and commerce of the land attracting a huge crowd of people from different parts of Bhārata. Scholars believe that the word Māmāṇkam is derived from the Sanskrit word 'Mahā-maghā'. Some say that it was so called because it was conducted on the day of Mahagḥa in the month of Māgha.

The festival was conducted under the auspices of the supreme power in Malabar. For a long period Perumāls were in power in Malabar and so Māmāṇkam was conducted under the control of the Perumāls. The last of the line of Perumāls handed over the right to the then mighty chief, the King of Vālauvanād and for several years Māmāṇkam was conducted under his auspices. The foreign traders who came to Malabar, the Mohammadans and the Portuguese, persuaded Sāmūtiri (zamorin) to take control of this festival and with the help of the foreigners Sāmūtiri wrested from the King of Vālauvanād the right of conducting the Māmāṇkam. After some time the King of Vālauvanād made an attempt to get back the right from Sāmūtiri. This enraged Sāmūtiri and there ensued a fight between them resulting in much shedding of blood. An agreement was reached that after twelve years each would relinquish the right in favour of the other. So after twelve years Sāmūtiri was compelled to relinquish his right but by resorting to many sly tactics he retained the right. The strength of Sāmūtiri increased and he became a great power in Malabar. He was bold enough to send away the Portuguese from the coast and Sāmūtiri maintained his position till the advent of Tippu Sultan to Malabar in the year 1788 A.D. Every twelve years Sāmūtiri had to show his might to retain the right of the Māmāṇkam and those days of exhibiting strength were ghastly.

The place of this Māmāṇkam was at Tirunāvāya in Tirūr taluk. A Śiva temple of historic fame stands on the shores of the river Bhārata flowing through Tirūr taluk. There was an expansive sand beach on its shores, become famous by being the scene of many socio-political events there. It was the venue of the mighty Nambūdiris of Malabar to discuss mat.ers of socio-political importance. Every year on the full-moon day in the month of Māgha all the ruling chiefs of Kerala would assemble there and on a special dais there Sāmūtiri would sit with royal robes and a sword in his right hand presiding over the assembly. The sword was given to the Sāmūtiris by Geramān Perumāl and was considered the symbol of undisputed sovereignty of Kerala. It was also a sanction to conduct the Māmānkam. The Sāmūtiris came prepared to give a fight if their authority was challenged by anybody. The ruling Sāmūtiri would send an invitation to all chiefs of Kerala. On either side of Sāmūtiri would sit the relatives and friends of Sāmūtiri. There would be an army of Nahrs and Tiyas ready outside and only after defeating them could anybody approach the dais of Sāmūtiri. The dais was called Nilaipāṭutara. The whole atmosphere would resound with drummings and shots from pop-guns. Majestic elephants adorned with golden headdresses would be arrayed there. The conference of the chiefs would last for twelve days and the festival for twenty-four days. The Māmāṇkam attracted a huge crowd from far and wide because there were then many items of interest and information. The Māmāṇkam commenced on a fixed day at an auspicious hour in the morning when the caparisoned elephants started moving to the accompaniment of drums and pipes. The last Māmāṇkam was in 1735 A.D. By the time of Mārtanda Varmā the centre of power shifted from Malabar to the south. Even today the memories of the same are brightening spots in the history of Malabar.

MAMATĀ. Mother of the sage Dirghatamas. (See under Dirghatamas).

MAMMATĀ. An Indian scholar who lived about 1100 A.D. He was a great scholar and critic in Sanskrit and was born in Kashmir. His masterpiece was a great book "Kāvyā Prakāśa". It is divided into ten chapters. Each chapter is entitled "Ullāsa". There is a view expressed by some people that Mammata wrote only the first nine chapters of this book and the last chapter was written by another scholar named Alaka. Numerous commentaries on Mammata’s Kāvyā Prakāśa have been published. It is said that Patanjali’s commentator Kayāta was the brother of Mammata. "Sabda Vyāpāra Vīcāra" is another book written by Mammata.

MĀMĪTI I. The disciple of Gautama and the guru of Ātreya. (Ṛṇādānāyaka Upānisad).

MĀMĪTI II. A devotee of Śiva. He was the father of the famous Kālabhūti. (See under Kālabhūti).

MĀNAGARVĀ. A celestial maiden who was born as a she-monkey in the vicinity of the Himālayas by a curse of Brahman. She became the wife of a monkey named Kesari. She was named Athānā and was the mother of Hanumān. (For details see under Hanumān).

MĀNASA I. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 5, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MĀNASA II. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛta-rāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MĀNASĀVĀ. A lake on the peak of the Himalayas. Arjuna visited this lake once. (Śloka 4, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva). In the precincts of this lake many devotees conduct Śiva-worship. They believe they would merge with Śiva at the end of the yuga. Those who bathe in that pond would acquire mokṣa. Mānasaras is called Ujjānaka also. Vasīṭṭha and Arundhati became realised souls at this place. (Śloka 14, Chapter 130, Vana Parva). A sage who lived in Mānasaras in the form of a swan visited Bhīma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 98, Chapter 119, Bhīṣma Parva). Once a Dēvī named Upāṣruti pointed out Indra who was hiding amongst the lotus stems in Mānasaras. It was Brahman who made this lotus lake and the river Sarayū starts from here. (Bālākāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀNASĀDEVĪ. A devi born of the mind of Kaśyapa Prajāpati. She is known as Jaratkaru also. (For details see under Jaratkaru II).

MĀNASĀDVARĀ. A mountain near Mānasaras. Because the entrance to the lake of Mānasaras was through this mountain it got the name of Mānasadvarā. In the centre of this was an aśrama of Parasūrāma. (Śloka 12, Chapter 130, Vana Parva).

MĀNASAPUTRĀS. The Prajāpatis created by Brahman from his mind are called the Mānasaputras or spiritual sons of Brahman. They are Bhṛgu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Āṅgiras, Marīcī, Dakṣa, Atri and Vasīṣṭha. They are nine in number. (Chapter 7, Arīśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa). They are all Prajāpatis and their wives are in order Khyāti, Bhūti, Sambhūti, Kṣamā, Priti, Sannāti, Ujjā, Anasūṭā and Praṣūtī.

MĀNASVINĪ. A daughter of Dakṣaprājapatī. She became the wife of Dharmarāja. Gandhāra was born of this Manasvinī. (Śloka 19, Chapter 66, Vana Parva).

MĀNASYU. A King of the Pūru dynasty. He was the grandson of Pūru and the son of Pravīra. His mother was Śarasenī. Manasyu begot of his wife Sauvī the three sons named Śaktā, Sāṃhāna and Vāṃgī. (Śloka 6, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

MĀṆĀVA. A scholar and an authority on Dharmāśāstra. He was the author of three books namely, Mānava Upapurāṇa, Mānava-ratnāṭṭūra and Mānava-vāsulakṣaṇa.

MĀṆĀVARĀ. She was the wife of Arthalaṅka who was the house-keeper of Bāhubala, King of Kānci. This Mānāvarā divorced her husband to marry one who was more wealthy. (Kathāsārītāgara).

MĀṆĀVARJĀKA. A place of habitation of ancient India. (Śloka 50, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆAVĪ. A prominent river of ancient India. (Śloka 32, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆAVĀ. A place in the island of Śaka. The Śūdras who reside there are all virtuous people. (Śloka 38, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀKA I. One of the sons born to the Yakṣa Manibhadra of his wife Pūpyajāni.

MĀṆĀKA II. A place of habitation of Purānic fame in ancient India. (Śloka 43, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀṆĀKARṆI (SĀTAKARṆI). A sage. Once this sage spent ten thousand years in a pond performing penance. Devas were bewildered and they sent five beautiful celestial maidens to divert the attention of the sage from his severe austerities. They enticed him and the sage constructed a grand and palatial house for them and stayed there with them. There was always music and dance there. The pond was thereafter known as ‘Pañcāparsa’. Rama and Lakṣmaṇa during their exile in the forests, with Sītā visited this place. (Sarga 11, Aranyākāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀṆĀKINĪ I. A maid who fell in love with Bhāṛtrhari. (See under Bhāṛtrhari).

MĀṆĀKINĪ II. A river which flows near the mountain of Cītrākūṭa. If one bathes in this river one will have to one’s credit the benefit of performing one Āśvamedha yajña. If one lives there bathing in that river daily, one will become possessed of Rājaalakṣīṇi (wealth and majesty of a King). (Śloka 29, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀṆĀKINĪ III. A river celebrated in the Purāṇas, taking its source from the chain of Kedadāra mountains in Uttarākhāṇḍa. It is also known as Mandāgni and Kālīganga. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 89, Verse 34).

MĀṆĀKINĪ IV. Kubera’s park. Since this park is watered by Gaṅgā it acquired the name Mandākini. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 82).

MĀṆĀKINĪ V. Ākāśa Gaṅgā.

MĀṆĀKINĪ VI. One of the two wives of Viśravas, son of Pulastya. A son, Kubera was born to her by the blessing of Śiva. (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭāla Khaṇḍa).
MANDALAKA. A scorpion born of the family of Takṣa. This was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 8, Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

MANDAPĀLA. A sage. This sage went to the land of the Manes by his powers of penance but returned to earth unable to obtain merit there. He then married a bird and led a family life. (For details see 8th para under Kṛṣṇadavādāha).

MANDARA I. A tortoise which is a character in the book Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

MANDARA II. A brāhmaṇa who is greatly extolled in Śivapurāṇa. (See under Śrībhūta).

MANDARĀ. One of the wives of Viśvakarmā. The monkey named Nala was the son of Mandarā. This monkey was the chief of those who helped Śrī Rāma to build a bridge to Lāṅkā. Viśvakarmā had once blessed Mandarā saying that her son would one day become great. (Sarga 22, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MANDARA I. Eldest son of Hiraṇyakaśipu. Receiving a boon from Śiva he fought with Indra for crores of years. Mahā Viṣṇu’s weapon Cakra and Indra’s weapon Vajra, were smashed to pieces when they hit his strong body. (M.B. Anuśāsanā Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 32).

MANDARA II. A son of the sage Dhaumya. He married Śamikā, the virgin daughter of the Brāhmaṇa Auruva who was a native of Mālava land. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa, 2.34.14).

MANDARĀLAṆŚMI. Queen of the King named Sīrśahadhvaja. (See under Sīrśadhvaja).

MANDARAPARVATA (MANDARĀCALA). A mountain of Purāṇic fame. The following information is gathered from Mahābhārata regarding this mountain:
1) This mountain rises up to ten thousand yojanas and also goes down to ten thousand yojanas. (Chapter 18, Śloka 17, Adi Parva).
2) During the time of the churning of Kṛṣṇārdhaṇi (ocean of Milk) the serpent Ananta brought this mountain as per instructions from Mahāviṣṇu. (Śloka 6, Chapter 18, Adi Parva).
3) It was this mountain that was used as the Mantha (churning stick) when the milk-ocean was churned. (Śloka 13, Chapter 18, Adi Parva).
4) During the time of churning the Milk-Ocean many inhabitants of Pātāla and animals in the ocean were killed because of the rubbing of this mountain. (Śloka 26, Chapter 18, Adi Parva).
5) This mountain resides in the court of Kubera as Devātmā. (Śloka 81, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).
6) This mountain is situated near Kailās. Eighty-eight thousand Gandharvas and four times as much of Yāsakinnaras reside on the top of this mountain along with Kubera and a yakṣa named Manivara. (Śloka 5, Chapter 139, Vana Parva).
7) Once in a dream Arjuna conducted a trip to Kailāsa accompanied by Śrī Kṛṣṇa and on his way he halted at this mountain. The mountain then shone with the presence of nymbhs and heavenly songsters. (Śloka 33, Chapter 80, Droṇa Parva).
8) In destroying the notorious demon trio called Tripuras, Śiva used this mountain as a bow. (Śloka 76, Chapter 202, Droṇa Parva).
9) Once when the Sage Aśṭāvakra was conducting a tour of the northern parts he stayed on this mountain for some time. (Śloka 54, Chapter 19, Anuśāsana Parva).

MANDARĀVAṬI. A heroine in Kāthāsārisāgara. She is the heroine of the story told by the second Vetāla to King Trivikramasena. (See under Vetāla).

MĀṆḌĀVĪ. Wife of Bharata. Rāma married Sītā; Bharata, Māṇḍāvī; Lakṣmāna, Urmilā and Satrughna, Śrutakīrti (Sarga 73, Bālakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). Māṇḍāvī, Urmilā and Śrutakīrti were the daughters of Kuśadēvaja, brother of Janaka. (Bāla Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). Bharata got two sons of Māṇḍāvī named Subhā and Śūrāsenā. Both of them defeated the Gandharvas and established cities one on each side of the river Sindhu. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANDAVISARPINĪ. A louse, a character in a story of Pañcatantra. (For details see under Pañcatantra).

MĀṆḌĀVYA. A sage. He is known as Anjāmāṇḍāvya also. Once Rāvaṇa beat Māṇḍāvya because of his not respecting Rāvaṇa. That day Māṇḍāvya cursed him saying “You will also be beaten like this by a brave monkey”. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). (More details can be had from the entry Anjāmāṇḍāvya). The āśrama of Māṇḍāvya is considered a holy place. Once the King of Kāśi went to this āśrama and performed severe penance there. (Chapter 106, Udyoga Parva).

MANDEHA(S). See the 2nd para under Pakal.

MĀṆḌHĀṬĀ. A King of pre-eminence in the dynasty of Ikṣvāku.
2) Birth. Yuvanāśa, father of Māṇḍhāṭā had a hundred people. Still he had no children. Greatly grieved by the lack of a son he went to the forests to see people of virtue and piety. During his wandering in the forest he happened to reach a club of sages. Yuvanāśa went and sat in their midst. He was happy to be in their midst but was worried in his mind and so he sent up deep sighs as he sat there sad and silent. The sages asked him why he looked so sad and the King crying like a child told them the cause of his grief. The sages took pity on him and made him conduct the yāga ‘Indradaiva’. They brought a jug of water made potent by recitals of mantras to be given to the queens to make them pregnant and placed the pot in the yāgaśālā. The yāga was coming to an end. One day the King felt unusually thirsty and unwilling to disturb the sages who were taking rest the King entered the yāgaśālā and finding a jug there full of water drank from it and quenched his thirst, little knowing that it contained the water made potent for a specific purpose by mantras. The next day when the sages went to the yāgaśālā they found the jug almost empty and were worried and started making enquiries. The King then confessed what he had done. The sages said that it was futile to fight against fate and somehow finished the yāga and went to their āśramas.

The King became pregnant and after ten months a child came out bursting open the right side of his stomach. The King consulted his ministers as to what should be done with the child and on their advice the child was taken to the forests and left there. But the child was protected by the Devas and they enquired among themselves as to whose breast-feeding it would get when Indra appeared and said “Mām Dhātā”, meaning it would drink me. That was how the child got the name ‘Māndhātā’. Indra thrust the child’s big toe into its mouth and the child began to suck milk through it. Māndhātā who grew thus drinking its own toe became a mighty man of renown. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

3) Administration of the state and marriage. When Māndhātā became a man of great strength his father died and he ascended the throne and became an Emperor of great fame. He conquered many kingdoms. He made his enemies flee from him. Because he intimitated the dasyus he got the name Trasadasya. He married the perfect-figured chaste daughter Bindumati of Śaṭābindurājā. She got two sons named Purukutsa and Mucukunda.

The Purāṇas state that Māndhātā had another son named Ambarīṣa and fifty daughters who were all married to a sage named Saubhari.

4) How he caused rains in the country. Māndhātā ruled the country very virtuously without at any time going against truth and justice and his country became prosperous. Once it so happened that there were no rains for three successive years in the country and the greatly worried King went to the forests to know from the great sages there the reason for such a calamity. The sages told the King thus: “Oh King, of all yugas Kṛta-yuga is the best. This yuga is a brahmin-predominant one and Dharmar stands on four legs. Penance is for brahmmins only and no man of any other caste can do penance in this yuga. But in your country a Sūdra is performing penance and that is why the clouds refuse to shower rains. Kill him and then the evil will go”. Hearing this Māndhātā replied, “I will never kill an innocent ascetic. Teach me my duty at this peril”. The sages were pleased at the reply of the King and advised him thus: “Oh King, start observing Vrata on the ekādaśī day. (Eleventh day in each half of a month). The ekādaśī which falls in the bright half of Bhādrapada is called ‘Padmanābha’, and if you observe it by its cogency you will get not only rains but prosperity and happiness free from misery of any kind. You must persuade your subjects also to observe this”. The King on returning to his palace started observing ‘ekādaśī’ along with his subjects of all the four castes and then it started to rain. Rains came in plenty and all the crops were rich. The subjects became happy.

(Chapter 59, Padma Purāṇa).

5) Other details.

(i) Māndhātā had to fight once against Lavaṇāsura but had to accept defeat before the god-given spear which Lavaṇāsura possessed. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

(ii) Āsvinīdevas once helped Māndhātā in his work as an owner of land. (Śākti 112, Anuvāka 16, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

(iii) Māndhātā became pure by yajña and attained Svarga. (Śloka 5, Chapter 257, Vana Parva).

(iv) Once Nārada spoke to Sañjaya about the greatness of Māndhātā. (Chapter 62, Droṇa Parva).

(v) At another time Śrī Kṛṣṇa spoke in glowing terms about the yajña of Māndhātā. (Śloka 81, Chapter 29, Śānti Parva).

(vi) Once Mahāviṣṇu came to Māndhātā disguised as Indra and conversed with him on ‘Rājadharmā’ (duties and responsibilities of a King). (Śloka 16, Chapter 64, Śānti Parva).

(vii) Uutatlīya, son of Aṅgiras, once taught Māndhātā the outlines of Rājadharmā. (Chapter 90, Śānti Parva).

(viii) Māndhātā conquered the whole world in one day. (Śloka 16, Chapter 124, Śānti Parva).

(ix) On another occasion Bṛhaspati conversed with him on the subject of Gōdāī. (The giving away of cows as gifts). (Śloka 4, Chapter 76, Anuvāsaṇa Parva).

(x) Māndhātā gave away as gifts millions of cows. (Śloka 5, Chapter 85, Anuvāsaṇa Parva).

(xi) Māndhātā hated non-vegetarian food. (Śloka 61, Chapter 115, Anuvāsaṇa Parva).

MāNDODAŘI I. (MāNDODAŘI). (In South India the name Maṇḍodāṛi is current). Wife of Rāvana. The Uttara Rāmāyaṇa contains a story about the previous history of Maṇḍodāṛi. Maya, an asura, was born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Danu. Once Maya went to Devaloka to see the dances of the celestial maidens there. Devas came to know that Maya was in love with the nymph Hemā and they married her to Maya. Maya went to the southern valley of Himavān and lived there with Himā constructing there a city called Hemapura. They got two sons Māyāvalī and Dundubhi. But they grievéd over the lack of a daughter and she went to a side of Himavān and started penance there to get the blessings of Śiva.

Once a celestial damsels named Madhurā after observing Somavāravarta went to Kailāśa to pay obcsiance to Śiva. Pārvatī was absent from the place then, having gone to attend the birthday celebrations of one of her sons. So Madhurā met Śiva sitting lonelily and this led to a clandestine sexual union between them. When Pārvatī returned she saw traces of the ashes from the body of Śiva on the naked breast of Madhurā and Pārvatī in her anger cursed Madhurā to live in a well for twelve years as a frog. Śiva was stupefied at the curse and he went to the well and consoled her by saying that she would after the twelve years of life as a frog become a very beautiful maiden and would be married by a man of great fame and valour. It was near this well that Maya and his wife were performing penance to get a daughter.

After twelve years the frog changed itself into a beautiful maiden and cried loudly from the well. Hearing the cry Maya and Hemā, who were nearby peeped into the well and seeing the young girl took her home and brought her up giving her the name Maṇḍodāṛi. Rāvana returning after his victory march by that way visited Maya and seeing the girl fell in love with her and married her according to Vedic rites and took her to Lankā. Rāvana got three sons of her, Meghaṇāda, Aṭikāya and Aṇaṭakumāra.

Māṇḍodāṛi was a very beautiful woman. Hanumān when he entered the bed-room of Rāvana in search of Sītā was dumb-founded at the beauty of Maṇḍodāṛi and mistook her for a second for Sītā. (Valmīkī Rāmāyaṇa).

MāNDODAŘI II. A virtuous princess of the kingdom of Sīhala. She determined to live an unmarried life but was forced by destiny to marry a cruel and uncharitable husband. The story of this Mandodari as related to Devi by Mahiṣāsura is given below.

Candrasena, King of Sīhala, got of his wife Guṇavatī a very beautiful daughter named Mandodari. Even when she was ten years old the King started searching for a suitable husband for her. He found out Kambu-grīva son of Sudhanvā, King of Madraḍeṣa and informed his daughter about his desire to make him his son-in-law. But Mandodari replied that she never intended to marry and desired to spend her life worshipping God. Candrasena felt miserable at her reply.

Years went by and Mandodari became a blooming lady and yet she remained firm in her determination. One day she was playing in the royal gardens with her companions when the prince of Kosala, Vīrasena came that way by mistake. The extraordinary beauty of the princess attracted him and he made a request to her through her companions to marry him. But Mandodari refused.

Time rolled on and soon the marriage of her younger sister Iṣumati came. Candrasena invited all the neighbouring Kings for that. The King of Madraḍeṣa was also present for the marriage. The King was very charming to look at but was very bad in character. Mandodari was attracted by his external beauty and she expressed her willingness to marry him. Her father was immensely pleased and on the nearest auspicious day she was given in marriage to Cărudeṣa. Mandodari went to the palace of Cărudeṣa and they lived happily for some time. One day she saw her husband having sexual acts with the wife of one of the palace servants. She reproached his husband and yet two days later she saw her husband with another servant girl. She was greatly disappointed and she left the palace for the forests where she started performing penance.

MĀNDŪKA. A class of horse. These highclass horses helped Arjuna in his campaign of victory. (Śloka 6, Chapter 28, Sābhā Parva).

MĀNDŪKA (S). A tribe. The King of this tribe was Āyus. The daughter of Āyus, Suśobha was married to Parikṣit of Iksvāku dynasty. They had three sons, Śāla, Dala and Bala. (Chapter 190, Vana Parva).

MĀNGALA. A deity in the form of Kuja or Planet Mars. There are different versions in the Purāṇas regarding the birth of Maṅgala.

(1) Satī committed suicide at the Dakṣāyāga and Śiva greatly grieftestricken at the loss of his wife started penance. A sweat drop fell from the forehead of Śiva doing severe penance and Maṅgala was the son born of that drop. Śiva then installed Maṅgala among the Navagrahas and according to the science of astrology this Graha is considered the protector of the landed property and the wife of a person. (Śiva Purāṇa, Rudra Sāṁhitā 1-10 and Skanda Purāṇa 4-17).

(2) Śiva married Vīkeṣé daughter of Hīranyākṣa. One day while they were engaged in sexual plays Agni came to their presence. Enraged at this the eyes of Śiva blazed with anger and a drop of hot water from his eyes fell on the face of Vīkeṣé and she became pregnant. After some days Vīkeṣé found it impossible to bear the embryo of Śiva thus formed and she aborted it. A child was born and the goddess of earth took it and fed it with breast milk. It was that child who later on became Maṅgala. (Skanda Purāṇa).

(3) Maṅgala was born of the blood drops of Śiva. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

(4) Maṅgala was the son of Bharadvāja. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa).

(5) Maṅgala was the son of Bhūmidevi. Devas, sages, Brahmāṇas, Manus and Gandharvan all worshipped Bhūmidevi at the time of Varāhakala. It is also said in the Vedas that Bhūmidevi is the wife of Mahāviṣṇu's incarnation as Varāha. Maṅgala alias the planet Mars was born to Bhūmidevi of Mahāviṣṇu as Varāha. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MĀNGALACANDIKĀ. A devī. Vedas and Vedavids alike praise this goddess who is always interested in granting the requests of her devotees. Because she showers prosperity on her devotees she became known as Maṅgala-candikā. There is another version that she got the name because she was worshipped by Maṅgala (Kuja) and because she grants the requests of Maṅgala. Yet another version is that she got the name because she was worshipped by the King Maṅgala chief of the seven islands. Born of the species of Durgādevi she is very kind and affectionate to her devotees. Paramāśiva worshipped this Devī before he went to destroy the demon-trio Tripuras. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MANI I. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MANI II. A sage. This sage was a member of the Brahmasabhā. (Śloka 24, Chapter 11, Sābhā Parva).

MANI III. One of the two Pārśadas given to Subrahmanya by Candrasena. The other one was named Sumanī. (Śloka 32, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MANI IV. A son born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Kadrū. Maṇi lived near the city of Gīrivarāja. This serpent did penance to please Śiva and obtained a boon that Gāruḍa should give refuge to him. (31:6, Ādi Parva and Brahmanḍa Purāṇa).

MANI BHADRA I. A Yakṣa. He who worships this Yakṣa would get his desire fulfilled. This Yakṣa is installed in a temple near the city of Tāmralipti. If anybody commits adultery in that place Maṇi Bhadra would take him to the temple and keep him there for the night. Next morning he would take the couple before the King and exposing the sin would get them killed by the King.

Once a Vaiṣya named Samudradatta committed adultery and another house-holder found it out and took them to the temple of Maṇi Bhadra and kept them there. Saktimāti, the virtuous wife of Samudradatta came to know of the mishap to her husband and the intelligent woman went to the temple with materials for worship and under the pretext of worshipping made the priest of the temple open the doors. When she entered Samudradatta felt ashamed and sat with his head bent down. Saktimāti gave the other woman her own dress and took hers in return and sent her out as Saktimāti without raising the least suspicion in the priest. Then she remained with Samudradatta, and when in the morning officers of the King came to take them they were surprised to find that the culprits were really husband and wife. The house-holder was punished for giving wrong information and Samudrada was set free with his wife. (Kathāmukhalambaka, Kathāśaritsāgara).

MANIBHADRA II. A King of the Lunar dynasty. This King had many children of his wife Kavikā. Of these seven sons learned magic from Maya. The seven palm trees which Śrī Rāma broke by an arrow while on his search for Śītā were but the cursed forms of these seven sons. The Purāṇa story relating to Śrī Rāma giving them relief from the curse is narrated in the Kiṃkindhi Kāṇḍa of Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.

The seven sons of Maṇibhadra after learning magic from Maya created a huge cobra and travelled all over the world on it. One day they reached a mountain near Ṛṣyamūkācala. They saw the sage Agastyā coming that way and just to tease him they coiled that cobra and hid it beneath the ground in the form of a circle and they themselves stood on it as seven palm trees in a circle and caused obstruction to the sage in his path. The sage as he came near the trees knew by his spiritual powers what trick had been played on him and said cursing, “May you stand like this for ever”. The princes knew the hideousness of the curse and pleaded for redress and the sage said, “After centuries the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Śrī Rāma would come and give you salvation”. The princes stood there as trees grown to unusual heights with round black trunks casting shades all around. Underneath grew a shrubbage deep and thick and the seven trees stood there presenting to the onlookers a sight of wonder.

Śrī Rāma and party reached the place of the seven trees. Suddenly Rāma took his bow and arrows and pressing his foot on a stone beneath sent an arrow and to the wonder of all, the seven trees standing in a circle fell all together and the arrow returned to his quiver. When Rāma pressed the stone on the ground with his foot he was pressing on a vital point on the head of the cobra lying coiled in a circle under the ground bearing the seven trees. The cobra got a shock and instantly straightened itself for a second and the trees thus came in a row straight on the path of the arrow of Śrī Rāma. They were all cut at once and before they had time to fall down the serpent coiled itself again and regained his original position and so the trees fell down in the circle in which they stood. All these happened so quickly that nobody was able to see what happened and so every body was surprised to see all the seven trees in a circle falling down by a single arrow. The princes were thus relieved from the curse.

MANIBHADRA III.

1) General information. A Yakṣa. He was a deity of merchants and travellers. (Śloka 130, Chapter 64, Vana Parva).

2) Other details.
   (i) He stays in the court of Kubera. (Śloka 15, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).
   (ii) Once this Yakṣa on the request of a cloud named Kuṇḍadhāra gave a boon to a brahmin. (Śloka 21, Chapter 171, Sānti Parva).
   (iii) The sage Aṣṭāvakra once welcomed this Yakṣa. (Śloka 33, Chapter 19, Anuśāsana Parva).
   (iv) When Arjuna went to Marutta to bring his wealth Arjuna worshipped this Yakṣa and the Yakṣa blessed him. (Śloka 7, Chapter 65, Aśvamedha Parva).

MANIBHADRA. A Pāñcada of Śiva. (See under Candraśena II).

MANICARA. A Yakṣa. In the fight between Rāvana and Kubera this Yakṣa helping Kubera created great havoc in the army of Rāvana. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANIDVIPA. The abode of Devī. Devī resides in this island which is far beyond Kailāsa. (3rd Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

MANIGRIVA. A brother of Nalakūbara. (See under Nalakūbara).

MANIJALĀ. A prominent river in Śakadvipa. (Śloka 32, Chapter 11, Bhīma Parva).

MANIKANÇÃO. A land portion of Śakadvipa situated near Śyāmagiri. (Śloka 26, Chapter 11, Bhīma Parva).

MANIKUTTIKA. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 20 Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MĀNIKAYAVĀCAKAR (MĀNIKKA-VĀSAHAR). A devotee and poet who lived in Tamilnādu. He is believed to have lived during the period between the eighth and ninth centuries A.D. He was born in Tiruvāvudāvūr in an Ādīśāva brahmin family. Tiruvāvudāvūr was a village near Madura, the capital of Pāṇḍya kingdom. His father was Ṣambhupāḍāśrita and mother Śivājānāvatī. The name given by his parents to Māṇikyavāacakar is still unknown. Because he was born in Tiruvāvudāvūr everybody called him Tiruvāvudāvūr. He became a scholar in his sixteenth year. The Pāṇḍya king called him to his palace and appointed him as his minister. He gave him the honour of the title ‘Tennavar Brahmaidāy’. Māṇikyavāacakar showed more interest in devotional matters than in matters of the state.

Once when the King was holding his durbar he got information that in one of the eastern ports had landed a set of good war-horses for sale. He sent Tiruvāvudāvūr to that place. The minister, when near the port of Tirupperundurai, heard a sound of Vedic utterances and he immediately went to the place from where the sound came. He saw Lord Śiva sitting under a tree in the guise of a Guru. Forgetting all state affairs he became engrossed in the meditation of Śiva. Suddenly he developed a talent for poetry and music and started composing poems in praise of Śiva starting flowing from his tongue. Śiva was immensely pleased and gave him the name Māṇikyavāacakar meaning that every Vācaka (sentence) coming out of his tongue was equal in value to a māṇikya (Ruby). The guru gave him a ruby too. Māṇikyavāacakar in the garb of a mendicant joined a troop of Śiva devotees and spent all the money he had for the service of the devotees of Śiva and also for the reconstruction of a dilapidated Śiva temple in Tirupperundurai.

Māṇikyavāacakar reached Madura and informed the King that the horses would arrive at the palace on the day Āvani-mālā (Mālā star in the month of Śrīvāna) and presented the king with the ruby which his Guru had given him. The king was not satisfied and imprisoned him. On the Āvani-mālā day at the stipulated time the horses arrived at the palace. The horses were led by strange foreigners. It was Śrī Paramesvara himself who had come as the chief of the horsemen. Māṇikyavāacakar was released from jail and he also came to see the horses. The King gave the leader of the troopers a silk shawl as present. The head of the troopers received it by the end of his whip. The King resented this but the troopers went back without any trouble. The horses were put in stables and Māṇikyavācakar went to his āśrama.

At midnight all the new horses in the stables turned into jackals and roamed about in the streets howling loudly and disturbing everyone. After some time they all disappeared. The anger of the king knew no bounds. He imprisoned Māṇikyavācakar again. The servants of the king took him to river Vaigai. That day there was an unusual flood in the river and the city of Madura was submerged in waters. The king then realised his mistake and begged pardon of Māṇikyavācakar. Māṇikyavācakar asked the king to repair the dam in the Vaigai. The king ascended to the proposal but to save money the work was entrusted to the citizens of Madura.

At that time there was an old woman in Madura called Vanti. She earned her livelihood by selling sweetmeats. The servants of the king ordered her also to join the work of the dam. She prayed to Paramāśīva and then a young man came to the old woman and offered to work for her in her stead. The young man representing Vanti went to Vaigai and started to work for her. When the king came to inspect the work he found the young man not doing his work satisfactorily and struck him on his back with a whip. A basketful of sand the young man was carrying fell down and the work of the dam was instantly completed. Not only that; all the persons including the king felt as though they were struck. Vanti attained Svarga and Māṇikyavācakar went to Gidambaram. The king repented.

Māṇikyavācakar saw Śiva in person several times. Many wonderful events happened at the Gidambaram temple after the arrival of Māṇikyavācakar there. The King of Lanka hearing about the greatness of Māṇikyavācakar brought his dumb daughter to him and she gained the power of speech. The Buddhist saints of Lanka came to Māṇikyavācakar and entered into philosophical discourse with him. They became dumb. The king of Lanka and his followers became devotees of Śiva. Māṇikyavācakar sat in his āśrama and composed divine songs. Once Śiva in the guise of a brahmin came there and copied the songs written by him. Even while he was reciting his divine songs to the devotees his soul left his body and merged with that of Śiva.

The divine songs in praise of Śiva by Māṇikyavācakar constitute the eighth Khaṇḍa of Śaivite hymns by name "Tirumurāi". They include "Tiruvācakam" and "Tirukkōvaiyār". The Tiruvācakam contains 654 verses in 51 hymns and the Tirukkōvaiyār contains 400 verses. All these are songs in praise of Śiva sung on different occasions. (Divyacaritam).

MANIMĀN I. A king, Mahābhārata gives the following details about him.

(i) Māṇimān was born of an aspect of Vṛtra, son of the asura Danāyū. (Śloka 44, Chapter 67, Adi Parva).

(ii) This king was present at the marriage of Draupadi. (Śloka 22, Chapter 183, Adi Parva).

(iii) Bhīmasena while on his early victory march defeated this king. (Śloka 11, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

(iv) This king fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas during the great Kurukṣetra battle. (Śloka 20, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).

(v) Māṇimān was killed in the fight between Māṇimān and Bhirűravas. (Śloka 53, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

MANIMĀN II. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Śloka 9, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

MANIMĀN III. A sacred place. If one spends a night there one would get the benefit of performing an Agni-ṣṭoma yajña. (Śloka 101, Chapter 82, Vana Parva).

MANIMĀN IV. A Yaka who was a friend of Kubera. Once the sage Agastyā cursed him that he would be killed by the hand of a man. The Yaka was killed by Bhīmasena. (Śloka 59, Chapter 160, Vana Parva and see under AGASTYA, Para 10).

MANIMĀN V. A mountain. Once, when Arjuna went on a pilgrimage to Śiva's presence with Krṣṇa in a dream, he saw this mountain Māṇimān. (Śloka 24, Chapter 9, Droṇa Parva).

MANIMĀN VI. A pārśada of Śiva. This pārśada joined hands with Vyūhabhadra to injure the sage Bṛghu at the Dakṣayāga. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MANIMĀNTHA. A mountain. (Śrī Krṣṇa performed penance here to please Śiva for cures of years together. (Śloka 33, Chapter 18, Anuśāsana Parva).

MANIMĀTIPURI (MANIMATPATTANAM). A meeting place of the asuras. The notorious asura Ivala lived here for some time. (Śloka 4, Chapter 94, Vana Parva). The demons Nivātacakavas hid here in this city and Rāvaṇa challenged them to a fight after coming to the gates of the city. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANIMAYA. Father-in-law of a demon called Sukēśa. Sukēśa married Devavatī daughter of Māṇimāya and had three sons, Mālāyāvī, Sumālī and Mālī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MANINĀGA. 1. A serpent born to Kaśyapa Prajāpati of his wife Kadru. This serpent resides near Giriśvara. (Śloka 50, Chapter 21, Sabhā Parva).

MANINĀGA II. A sacred place. If one spends a night here one would get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. If one eats from the offerings made to a deity there one would be free from the effects of any snake-poison. (Śloka 106, Chapter 84; Vana Parva).

MANINI. Mother of Viṣṇūśaras, father of Rāvaṇa. She was the daughter of the sage Tṛṇabindu. (See under Tṛṇabindu).

MANIPARVATA. A mountain of Purānic fame. Narakāśura kept the sixteen thousand and one hundred maidens he had stolen in this mountain. (Dākṣiṇātyā Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

MANIPRAVALA. A kind of language formed by mixing Sanskrit and Malayālam together. "Bhāṣāśāskṛta-yogo maṇiprāvalām". This is its definition. A great many of the important literary works in Malayālam are in Maṇiprāvalām.

MAŅIPURA (MANIPUR). The birth place of Citrāṅgadā wife of Arjuna. Arjuna during his pilgrimage came to this place and after marrying Citrāṅgadā stayed there for three years. Bābhruvāhana was the son of Citrāṅgadā. (See under Citrāṅgadā).

MAŅIPUSPAKA. Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas, used to blow a conch named Maṇipuspaka. (Śloka 16, Chapter 25, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAŅISKANDHA. A serpent born of the family of Dhratrāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Chapter 52, Adi Parva).
MAṆĪVĀhana. Another name for King Kūśāmba. (Chapter 63, Ādi Parva).

MAṆIVAKRA. One of the sons of the Vāsū, Āpa.

MAṆIVARA. One of the sons born to Rajatanātha of his wife Manivāra. This Yakṣa married Kṛuṭūśāla's daughter Devajāni. The sons born to them are called 'Guhvākas'. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, 3.7.127-131).

MAṆIVARA. A Yakṣa. He lives on the mountain of Mandara. (Śloka 3, Chapter 139, Vana Parva).

MAṆIVĀṬṭAPĀ. A rock of Purānic fame. Rāvana spent one night on this rock with Rambhā. Rambhā was going to her lover Nalakūbara one night alone and Rāvana seeing her on the way carried her away to this place. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

MAṆJULĀ. A river of Purānic famc. (Śloka 34, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAṆṆUGHOŚĀ. A nymph. The sage Medhāvi cursed this nymph and made her into a devil. (See under Medhāvi).

MAṆKA. A place of habitation in the island of Śāka. This place is inhabited mostly by dutiful brahmans. (Chapter 11, Bhīṣma Parva).

MAṆKĀŅA (MAṆKĀNA). A barber of Vāraṇasī who was a great devotee of Gaṇeṣa. During the time of King Divodāsa II Śiva wanted to destroy the city of Kāśi and deputed his son Gaṇeṣa (Nikumbha) for the same.

Gaṇeṣa came to Kāśi and appearing in person before his devotee Maṅkāna, asked him to build a temple on the outskirts of Kāśi. Maṅkāna completed the temple and Gaṇeṣa (Nikumbha) installed himself in that temple getting for it the name Nikumbhamandira. Devotees began to flow into the temple and Nikumbha sitting there answered the prayers of all. But he never fulfilled the prayer of the King to have a son. This annoyed Divodāsa and he destroyed the temple and then Nikumbha cursed that the city of Kāśi would become desolate. Śiva's desire thus became fulfilled. (92, 33, Vāyu Purāṇa and 3; 67, 43, Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa).

MAṆKAṆĀKA (MAṆKAṆĀKA). A sage

1) General information. He was born to Vāyubhagavān of his wife Sukanyakā. (Śloka 58, Chapter 38, Śalya Parva).

Vāmana Purāṇa, 38th Chapter states that Maṅkāna was one of the spiritual sons of Kaṭyaṇaprajāpati.

2) Juice of potherbs flows from finger. The sage was living in Saptasārasvatīrtha and one day by accident his thumb was cut off from his hand by the sharp, edge of Kuṭa grass. But instead of blood, the juice of potherb began to flow from the thumb and the sage, overjoyed at this strange phenomenon, started dancing. Along with Maṅkāna the earth and the sky also started dancing and the dancing showed no signs of stopping. Śiva then appeared before Maṅkāna and asked him the cause of his non-stop dancing. Śiva was in disguise and Maṅkāna, did not recognise the new-comer and the sage told him about the strange phenomenon. As they were talking Śiva touched the thumb of the sage with his little finger and let the flow from the finger changed from potherb juice to sugar-candy juice. Vāmana Purāṇa states that it was ashes which flowed from the finger. The hermit was ashamed. He understood that the guest was Śiva and he felled at his feet. Śiva blessed the hermit and granted him boons.

MANOGUNA. Man may do many things, right or wrong, good or bad, but it is the purity of your mind that matters. The following story is to illustrate how much your life depends on the quality of your thoughts (Manoguna).

Once on the shores of Gaṅgā a Brāhmaṇa and a Caṇḍāla sat side by side and performed penance. After some days of foodless penance the Brāhmaṇa felt hungry and his thoughts went to the fishermen he had seen earlier. He thought thus, "Oh how happy are these fishermen. They catch good fishes and eat to their heart's content and are happy. They are the luckiest people of this world". The thoughts of the Caṇḍāla also went to the fishermen. But he thought thus: "Oh how cruel are these fishermen! How many innocent lives do they destroy to fill their belly. They must be demons to do so." Both of them died after some days and the Brāhmaṇa was born as a fisherman and the Caṇḍāla as a prince. Both of them were re-born near their abodes in their previous birth and both remembered their previous lives. The Caṇḍāla was happy but the Brāhmaṇa regretted his fault. (Taraṅga I, Madanamaṅcukālambaka, Kathāsārītāgāra).

MANOHARĀ I. Wife of the Vasu, Śoma. Varcas was born of her first. Then she had three more sons named Śiśira, Prāça and Ramaṇa. (Śloka 22, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MANOHARĀ II. A nymph of Alakāpūrī. Once when Astāvakra went to the court of Kubera this nymph gave a performance in dancing in honour of that sage. (Śloka 45, Chapter 19, Anuśasana Parva).

MANOJAVA I. The eldest son of the Vasu Anila. Anila begot this son of his wife Śivā. (Śloka 25, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MANOJAVA II. During the Manvantara of Čakṣuṇa, the sixth Manu, Indra was Manojava, the leader of the Devas. (Anīśa 3, Chapter 160, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

MANOJAVA III. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 17, Chapter 46, Sālaya Parva).

MANOJAVA IV. A sacred place situated in Vyāsavana in Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a pond there one will have to one's credit the benefit of making a thousand Godānas. (Śloka 93, Chapter 93, Vana Parva).

MANONUGA. A place near the mountain Vāmana in the island of Krauṅča. (Śloka 11, Chapter 12, Chiśma Parva).

MANORAMĀ I. Wife of Dhrusvanadhi King of Kosala. (See under Dhrusvanadhi for details).

MANORAMĀ II. A celestial woman. She was the daughter of Kaśyapa Prajāpati, born of his wife Pradhā. (Śloka 50, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva). She participated in the Janmotsava of Ārjunā. (Śloka 62, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

MANORAMĀ III. Once by his spiritual powers the sage Uddālaka brought the river Sarasvatī to his place of yajña and that diversion was then known as Manoramā. (Śloka 25, Chapter 38, Sālaya Parva).

MANORATHA. A calf once created by Śrī Kṛṣṇa by his spiritual powers. (See under Surabhī).

MANOVATI. The city of Brahmā. This city is situated in the centre of the nine cities on the top of the mountain Mahāmeru. Around it are the cities of the Aṣṭadikpālakas. (8th Skanda, Devi Bhāgavata).

MANTHARĀ I. A maid of Kaikēyī the wife of Daśaratha. This hunchbacked woman was born of the species of a Gandharvī named Dundubhi. (Śloka 10, Chapter 276, Vana Parva). When everything was made ready to crown Śrī Rāma as the heir-apparent of Ayodhya, it was Mantharā who persuaded Kaikēyī to go to Daśaratha and ask him to send Śrī Rāma to the forests. Had not the cruel tongue of Mantharā played like that, the history of the solar dynasty itself would have been different. (See under Kaikēyī).

MANTHARĀ II. Daughter of Virocana. (Sarga 25, Bālakāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). Indra killed this Mantharā.

MANTHINI. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 28, Chapter 46, Sālaya Parva).

MANTRA. See under Veda.

MANTRAPĀLA. See under the great King Daśaratha. The other seven were: Jayanta, Dhrṣṭi, Viśaya, Asidhārtha, Arthasādaka, Aśoka and Sumantra. (Sarga 7, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MANU I. See under Manvantara.

MANU II. Son of the Agni Pāñcājanya. Pāñcājanya had three wives Supraja, Bṛhadbhāsa and Niṣā. He got of his first two wives six sons and of his third wife Niṣā, a daughter and seven sons. (Chapter 223, Vana Parva).

MANU III. A celestial maiden born to Kaśyapa of Pradhā. (Chapter 59, Verse 44, Ādi Parva).

MĀṆUṢAṬĪRTHA. A sacred pond lying on the outskirts of Kurukṣetra. There is a legend showing the origin of this pond. Once a hunter wounded a deer with his arrow and the deer ran and dropped itself into the pond. When it rose up from the water it became a man. From that day onwards the pond became holy and got the name Mānuṣatirtha. (Śloka 65, Chapter 86, Vana Parva).

MANUSMṚTI. A code of conduct written by Manu alias Māṇavācārya who was the father of man-kind for the harmonious existence of a social life. The book contains twelve chapters. The first chapter deals with the origin of the Smṛti and the origin of the world. No other Smṛti begins like this and so it is believed that this chapter must have been added to it later. The contents of each of the other eleven chapters are given below:

Second chapter. It deals with the sense organs and stresses the importance of conquering and controlling them. It describes the qualities of a brahmin.

Third chapter. It contains the duties of a householder after his course of study of the Vedas. Eight different kinds of marriages are described in it. It also deals with methods of giving protection to women and children.

Fourth chapter. Duties of a brahmaṇa, study of the Vedas and responsibilities of a Śnātaka are all described in this chapter.

Fifth chapter. This deals with pure and impure foods, impurity and methods of purification, women and their responsibilities.

Sixth chapter. This contains the duties of those who have entered the āśrama of Vānaprastha and also of ascetics.

Seventh chapter. It deals with the duties of Kings and ministers.

Eighth chapter. It deals with law and justice. It contains laws for the proper conduct of justice and includes ways and means of settling disputes and handling cases of debts, sale without right, partnership, duels, theft, prostitution, boundary disputes and all such matters as are to be decided by a court of law.

Ninth chapter. It deals with the duties of a husband and wife. It also contains matters relating to property rights, partition and the duties of a King with regard to these.

Tenth chapter. It deals with the duties of the different castes, mixed castes and the duties of one in times of danger.

Eleventh chapter. It deals first with penance, observation of Vratas, Yāgas, Yajnas and fee to the priests. It then deals with punishments of crimes, expiation for murder, prostitution etc.

Twelfth chapter. It deals with the theory of births and describes how your deeds in the present life are directive of the nature of life of your next birth. What deeds would fetch you what life is also explained. It contains instructions on Ātmajāṇāna and the way to obtain mokṣa (absolute bliss).

The basis of the present Hindu Law is Manusmṛti and it is believed to have been written in B.C. 500.
MANUŚYA (MAN) The Purāṇas have not given a definite explanation regarding the origin of Man, the most important of all living beings. Many stories regarding the origin of Man were current among the ancient people. According to Hindu Purāṇas Man was born of Svāyambhuva Manu who in turn was born of Brahmā. According to Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa (Sarga 14, Aranya Kānda) all the living beings including man were born to Kaśyapa-prajāpati of his eight wives, Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālikā, Tāmārā, Krodhavāsā, Manu and Anālā. From Aditi were born the devas; from Diti, the daityas; from Danu, the dānavas; from Kāli, the asuras Kālaka and Naraṇa; from Tāmārā, the bird-flock Krauṇḍī, Bhāṣī, Śyenī, Dīrtarāṣṭri and Sukī; from Krodhavāśā the animal flock, Mṛgī, Mrgamandā, Hari, Bhadramadā, Mātaṅgī, Sārdūli, Svetā and Surabhi; from Manu, mankind and from Anālā, the flora.

There is basis to believe that the Greeks and the people of Bhārata accepted with slight modifications the theory of evolution. The Daśavatāra of Viṣṇu almost represents the progressive changes in the form of a living thing from a fish into man. The theory of Darwin that life was first formed in water was current among the sages of ancient Bhārata, even from very early times.

Apa eva sasarjādu
Tāsau vīryamāpaśajat ||
(He created water first and cast virility therein).

In the Daśavatārās (ten incarnations of Viṣṇu) the first avatāra is Māṭya (Fish). The next one is Kūrma or Tortoise which is a progress in the form of fish. The third is Varāha or boar which is another step forward in evolution. The fourth is Narasīhāna (Man cum lion) which is the first step towards the formation of Man. That avatāra has got the traits of both man and animal. The next one is Vāmana or a small man. Then Śrī Rāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa, both fully grown men but with different kinds of culture.

MANVANTARA (M).

1) Kalpa, Manvantara and Caturyuga. The Prāpāṇa (universe) is perishable. At one time, it takes its origin, at another time it perishes. Brahmā, the creator of the universe has birth and death. The period between the birth and death of a Brahmā is known as a “Mahākalpa”. The flood that comes at the death of a Brahmā is called “Mahāpralaya”. One day of Brahmā is called Kalpa-kāla. In the Purāṇas one Kalpa or one day of Brahmā is divided into fourteen parts. The master or ruler of each of these divisions is a Manu. There are fourteen Manus. The life span of each Manu is called a “Manvantaram”.

There are seventy one Caturyugas in each Manvantara. The four yugas namely Kṛta-yuga, Tretā-yuga, Dwāpara-yuga and Kali-yuga make up one Caturyuga. At the end of seventyon such Caturyugas, that is, at the end of every two hundred and eighty-four (71 × 4) yugas, a Manu completes his life-span. Along with that, the Devas who were born at the time of the birth of that Manu, also come to the end of their lives. Fourteen such Manvantaras make one day of Brahmā. It is at the end of that day that the original universe perishes. Brahmā’s life-span is 120 years. At the end of that period, that Brahmā perishes. That is to say, at the end of every 42,200 divine days (120 × 360) which is the life-span of a Brahmā, a deluge takes place. Thus in one Brahmā’s time 42,200 Kalpas take place. A Brahmā’s life span is known as “Mahākalpa” and the close of a Brahmā’s period is called “Mahāpralaya”.

2) Human year (Manuśya vraja) and Divine year (Deva vraja). When two leaves are placed one over the other and they are pierced by a needle, the time required for the needle to pass from the first leaf to the second is called “Alpakāla”. Thirty such alpakālas make one “Truti”. Thirty truti make one “Kalā”. Thirty Kalās make one “Kāsthā”, which is also known as “Nimiṣa” or “Nōti” or “Mātṛa”. Four “Nimiṣas” make one “Gaṇita”. Ten Gaṇitas, one “Neṭuvīrppu”. Six Neṭuvīrppus, one “Vināzhīka”. Sixty vināzhīkas one day (day and night together). Fifteen days, one “Pākṣa”. Two Pākṣas, one “Candra māsa” (lunar month). One Cāndramāsa for human beings is one “ahorātra” (one day and night making up one full day) for the pitṛs. Twelve Cāndras māsas make one year for human beings. One year for human beings is one ahorātra for the gods. Three hundred ahorātras of gods make one “Deva Vatsara” or “Divya vatsara”. 4,800 divyavatsaras make one Kṛtayuga. 3,600 divyavatsaras make one Tretāyuga, 2,400 divyavatsaras make one Dwāparayuga, 1,200 divyavatsaras make one Kaliyuga. 12,000 divyavatsaras comprising a set of Kṛta, Tretā, Dwāpara and Kaliyugas make one Caturyuga. A Manu’s period is completed at the end of 71 Caturyugas. With that, the first group of gods also comes to an end. At the end of fourteen such Manus, one “Kalpa” is over and a deluge takes place. The whole of this period comprises one night for Brahmā. Night is the time of complete inactivity. With the end of the night, creation is started again. When 360 such ahorātras of Brahmā are completed, he completes one year. After completing 120 such years, a Brahmā perishes. Again a period of absolute inactivity follows for the length of a Brahmā’s life-span. After a period of 120 Brahma varṣas (the life-span of a Brahmā) another Brahmā comes into being. The life-span of Brahmā is shown in the following tabular form:

It is said that a Manu’s period of reign is 4,32,000 Manuśyavarṣas. (Bhāgavata, 3rd Skandha).

3) The caturyuga scheme. A caturyuga consists of the four yugas, namely Kṛta, Tretā, Dwāpara and Kali yugas. At the end of each Caturyuga, the Vedas perish Then the “Saptarṣi” (seven sages) come down from heaven to the earth and restore them again. Manu who is the propounder of Dharma śāstra, is also born in every Kṛtyaguya. The Devas of each Manvantaram feed upon the share of Havis (offerings at sacrifices) of the yāga till the end of that Manvantara. During the whole period of the Manvantara, the earth is protected and preserved by the sons of Manu and their descendants. Thus Manu, the Saptaśīs, Devas, Indra and the Kings who are the sons of Manu are the authorities of the Manvantara. After 14 Manvantaras a Kalpa of about 1,000 yugas, comes to an end. After that there is a night extending over the same period in duration. At that time Mahāviṣṇu sleeps on his bed Ananta in the ocean of deluge. After that, he wakes up again and performs creation. Manus, Kings, Indra, Devas and Saptaśīs are the Sātvika aspects of Mahāviṣṇu, who performs the work of protecting the world. In Kṛtya yuga, Mahāviṣṇu assumes the form of Kapila and others and preaches "Paramājñāna". In Tretā yuga he assumes the form of an emperor and destroys the wicked people. In Dwāpara yuga, he assumes the form of Vyāsā and after dividing the Veda into 4 sections, classifies each of the sections into the various branches. At the end of Kalīyuga, Mahāviṣṇu assumes the form of Kalki and restores the vicious to the path of righteousness. This is the "Caturyuga scheme" of Mahāviṣṇu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

4) The fourteen Manus. The names of the fourteen Manus of one Kalpa are given below:

(1) Svāyambhuva (2) Svārociṣa (3) Uttama (Uttamī)
(4) Tāmasa (5) Raivata (6) Cāksuṣa (7) Vaivāsvata (8) Sāvarṇī (9) Dakṣasāvarṇī (10) Brahmāsāvarṇī (11) Dharmsāvarṇī (12) Rudrasāvarṇī (13) Raucya-devasāvarṇī (14) Indrasāvarṇī.

Each of the above Manus is described below:—

(1) Svāyambhuva.
   (a) General. Svāyambhuva was born as the spiritual son of Brahmā. This Manu got his name because he was "Svāyambhuva" or born from Brahmā. He married the goddess Sātarūpā, the spiritual daughter of Brahmā.
   After that, he went to the shore of the ocean of milk, made an image of Mahādevi there and worshipped her by chanting Vāgbhya mantra and performed an austere penance. After a hundred years of such worship the goddess was pleased. She appeared before Svāyambhuva and granted him boons. She blessed him to attain the highest place in Heaven (Paramapada) after begetting vast progeny. Then the goddess went to Vindhyā mountain and became the deity of Vindhyā. Svāyambhuva returned and started his reign by worshipping the goddess.

   This Svāyambhuva is regarded as the author of the famous work "Manusmrītis". Kālidāsa says that the Kings of the Raghu dynasty lived in strict obedience to the laws laid down by this Manu. (Devī Bhāgavata, Daśama Skandha).

   (b) Other details.
   (i) The Saptaśīs of first Manvantara were—Maricī, Aṅgirās, Atri, Pulaha, Kratu, Pulastya and Vasuṭa.
   Devas are known as Yamas. The first Manu had ten sons namely Agnīdhra, Agnibhū, Medhā, Medhā-tithī, Vasu, Jyotisām, Dvurīmān, Havya, Savana and Putra and they ruled over the country. (Harivaṇa, Chapter 7).
   (ii) Emperor Prthu turned Svāyambhuva Manu into a calf and obtained medicine from Bhūmi by milking her as a cow. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skandha).

   (iii) Born from Virāṭ aṇḍā. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 1, Verse 32).

   (iv) Sage Cyavana married this Manu’s daughter.
   (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 46).

   (v) This Manu taught Soma, the art of Cāksuṣi. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 169, Verse 43).

   (vi) Since this Manu had blessed the clouds of the Magadha country they sent periodical rains to that region. (M.B. Sābhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 10).

   (vii) Manu came to the world, riding in the chariot of the gods to see Arjuna’s fight. (M.B. Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).

   (viii) This Manu had a wife named Sarasvatī (Satarūpā). (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117, Verse 14).

   (ix) This Manu lives in Bindusaras. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 46).

   (x) He came at the time of Subrahmanya’s birth. (Sālya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 10).

   (xi) Manu held discussions with Siddhas. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 36).

   (xii) He was the King of men. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 21).

   (xiii) This Manu is called “Prajāpati Manu”. Once he had a talk with Bhṛaspati on the subject of Dharma.
   (Sānti Parva, Chapter 201).

   (xiv) Upamanyu saw Svāyambhuva Manu sitting by the side of Śiva. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 280).

   (xv) He talked with the sage Suparna about the greatness of flowers, fumes, lights, offerings and gifts. (Ādi-Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 45).

   (2) Svārociṣa.

   (a) General. Svāyambhuva had two great sons Priya-vrata and Uttanapāda. The second Manu was the son of Priyavrata and his name was Svarocīṣa. He was a glorious and adventurous man. He went to the banks of the river Kālīndī, made a hermitage there, installed an idol of Devī made of earth and offered worship most fervently. At the end of 12 years of tapas when he ate only dried leaves, Devī appeared before him in her dazzling brilliance and blessed him. The name of this Devī was "Dhārīṇīdevī". After a reign of many years this King went to Heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

   (b) Other details.
   (i) Pāravatas and Tūsitas were the Devas in this Manvantara. The mighty Vipaścit was Devendra. The Saptaśīs were Īrjā, Stambha, Prāṇa, Rāma, Ṛṣabha, Niraya, and Parivān. Caitra, Kimpurūṣa and others were the sons of Svarocīṣa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 1).

   (ii) In Harivaṇa, Chapter 7 we read that the Saptaśīs of this Manvantaram were Aurvā, Stambha, Kaśyapa, Prāṇa, Bhṛaspati, Datta and Nṛṣyavana.

   (iii) Brahmā taught this Manu, Sāvatadvarma.
   Svarocīṣa taught this dharma to his son Śaṅkhavadana.
   (Sānti Parva, Chapter 348, Verse 36).

   (3) Uttama (Uttamī).

   (a) General. Uttama was also the son of Priyavrata.
   He went to Gaṅgā tīrtha and offered worship to Devī for three years with Vāgbhya mantra. At the end of it, Devī was pleased and blessed him with worthy sons and a kingdom without the threat of enemies. After a happy reign of many years, at the close of the Manvantara, he reached the highest place in Heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).
(b) Other details. Suṣānti was the name of the Devendra of this Manvantara. There were five groups of Devas, namely Sudhāmans, Satyas, Japas, Prātardanās and Śivas, each group consisting of twelve Devas. The seven sons of the sage Vasiṣṭha were the saptarśis of this Manvantara. These seven sons of Vasiṣṭha by his wife Urjā were Rajas, Gatra, Ārdhavābāhu, Savana, Anagha, Sutapas and Śukra. Aja, Pāraśūdipata and others were the sons of the Manu Uttama. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 1).

(4) Tāmaṣa.
(a) General. The fourth Manu Tāmaṣa was the son of Priyavrata. That King performed penance to Devī on the northern bank of the river Narmadā with Kāmarāja mantra. As a result of Devī’s blessing, he obtained a prosperous Kingdom and worthy sons. After a long reign he attained heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(b) Other details. At the time of this Manu, there were four groups of Devas, namely—Supārasas, Hāris, Satyas, and Sudhīs. Each of these groups contained 27 Devas. Śibi who had performed a hundred yāgas was the Indra. The Saptarśis of this Manvantara were Jyotirmān, Prthu, Kāvya, Caitra, Agnivakana, and Priyara and Nara, Khyaṭi, Keturūpa, Jānūjaṅgha and others were the sons of Tāmaṣa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 1).

(5) Raivata.
(a) General. The fifth Manu Raivata was the younger brother of Tāmaṣa. He worshipped Devī with Kāmabhīja mantra on the banks of the river Kālindī. With the blessing of Devī he ruled for many years and then attained Heaven. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(b) Other details. The name of the Indra of this Manvantara was Vibhū. There were four groups of Devas—Amitābhas, Bhūtarayas, Vaikuṇṭhas and Sumedhas. Each of these groups contained fourteen Devas. The Saptarśis of Raivata Manvantara were—Hiraprayorām, Vedasāri, Ārdhavābāhu, Vedavāhu, Sudāmā, Parjanya and Mahāmuni. The sons of Raivata Manu, Balabandhu, Sambhāvya, Satyaka and others were mighty Kings. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 1).

(6) Čakṣuṣa.
(a) General. This Manu was the son of Aiṇga. Once he went to the Rājarṣi (royal saint) Pulaha and prayed for prosperity, mastery of the whole world, invincible power and profound scholarship. Pulaha sent him to Devī. The Rājarṣi taught him the worship of Devī. After acquiring the mantra Čakṣuṣa went to the banks of the river Virājā and offered worship to Devī. At the end of twelve years, Devī appeared before him and blessed him with “Manuhood”, mastery of the Manu kingdom and brilliant sons. After many years he distributed his kingdoms among his sons and at last attained “Devipada”. (Devī Bhāgavata, Daśāma Skandha).

(b) Other details.
(i) The following account is given in Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 13, about the birth of Čakṣuṣa Manu. Dhrusva and his wife Śambhu had two sons, namely Śiṣṭi and Bhavya. Śuccāya, the wife of Śiṣṭi gave birth to five sons, Ripu, Ripuṇjaya, Vipra, Vṛkala and Vṛkatejas, who were all sinless. Čakṣuṣa was born to Bṛhati, the wife of Ripu. Čakṣuṣa begot Manu by Puṣkariṇī, daughter of Viśrūṇa Prājapati. This was the sixth Manu. By his wife Nādvala, the daughter of Vairāja Prājapati, he had 10 sons, namely, Kuru, Puru, Satadyumna, Tapisvi, Satyavān, Śuci, Agniśṭoma, Atriśtra, Sudūyumna and Abhimanyu. Āgneytī, wife of Kuru, gave birth to six sons who were Aiṅga, Sumanas, Khyāṭi, Kṛata, Aṅgiras and Śibi. Sunīṭā, wife of Aiṅga, gave birth to Vena. Prthu was the son of Vena. He is also known as “Vaiṇya”.

(ii) The Indra of that period was Manojāva. There were five groups of Devas—Ākhyas, Prastūtas, Bhavyas, Prthukas and Lekhas, each group consisting of eight Devas. The Saptarśis of this Manvantara were—Sumedhas, Virājas, Āviṣmān, Uttama, Madhu, Atinnāman and Sāhishnū. Satadyumna and other mighty Kings were the sons of Čakṣuṣa Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 3).

(iii) The sons of this Manu became famous under the name “Varisṭhas” (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 18, Verse 20).

(7) Vaiśavāvata.
(a) General. He was born from Sūrya. It is this Manu who rules the world today. All living beings that we see today were born from him. Vaiśavāvata Manu is Satyavrata Manu who escaped from the last deluge. To save him Viṣṇu took up the incarnation of Matsya (fish). Vaiśavāvata Manu was also the first of the Kings of the Sūrya vannis (Solar Dynasty) who ruled over Ayodhyā.

(b) Other details.
(i) In Devī Bhāgavata, Saptama Skandha, we see that the sons of Vaiśavāvata Manu are Iksväku, Nabhāga, Dhṛṣṭa, Saryāṭi, Narisāyaṇa, Prāṁśu, Nṛga, Diṣṭa, Karūṣa and Pṛśadha are also called Manus.

(ii) This Manu worshipped Devī and received her blessing and attained Heaven after a long reign. (Devī Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(iii) Vaiśavāvata Manu had another name, “Śraddhadeva.” The Devas of this Manvantara are Ādīṣṭhas, Vasūs and Rudras. The name of the Indra of this period is Purandara. The Saptarśis are, Vasiṣṭha, Kaśyapa, Atri, Jamadagni, Gautama, Viśvāmitra and Bharadvāja. The nine Dhārmikas (virtuous ones), Iksväku, Nṛga, Dhṛṣṭa, Saryāṭi, Narisāyaṇa, Nabhāga, Ariṣṭa, Karūṣa and Pṛśadha are the sons of Vaiśavāvata Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 8, Chapter 1).

(iv) Ten sons were born to this Manu who were Vena, Dhṛṣṭa, Narisāyaṇa, Nabhāga, Iksväku, Kārūṣa, Saryāṭi, Ila, Pṛśadha, and Nabhāgarisṭa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 15).

(v) Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Matsya for the sake of Vaiśavāvata Manu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 187).

(vi) He received Yogāvīda from Sūrya and Iksväku received it later from him. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 38).

(vii) At the beginning of Tretāyuga, Sūrya taught “Śātvata Dharma” to Manu and Manu taught it to Iksväku for the protection of all creatures. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 348, Verse 51).

(viii) The sage Gautama taught Śivasahasranāma to Vaiśavāvata Manu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 17, Verse 177).
(8) Sāvārni.
(a) General. Even in his previous birth he was a devotee of Devi. In his former birth (during the period of Śvārociṣa Manvantara) Sāvārni was born as a King of Caitranvasa under the name Suratha. The origin of the dynasty known as Caitranvasa is as follows:—Atri, son of Brahmā had a son named Nīṣākara. This Nīṣākara became an emperor by performing Rājaśyā. Emperor Nīṣākara had a son Budha and Budha had a son named Caitra, both of whom were greatly renowned.

It was Caitra's family which later on became the reputed Caitra dynasty. The son of that Caitra was Viratha. Viratha was the son of Viratha. This was the previous birth of Sāvārni Manu. Suratha was a great hero and poet. Once another King besieged his city and defeated him. Suratha left his kingdom and went alone on horseback and took shelter in a dense forest. While wandering in the forest like a mad man with a broken heart, he happened to reach the āśrama of the sage Sumedhas. The sage advised him to worship Devi in order to retrieve his lost kingdom and prosperity. Accordingly the King worshipped Devi who was pleased and restored to him his kingdom and prosperity. Besides, she blessed him that in his next birth he would become Sāvārni, the King of the Solar dynasty and would be revered as the eighth Manu. Thus the eighth Manu Sāvārni will be the second birth of Suratha. (Devi Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

(b) Other details. Sāvārni is also the son of Śūrya. How he came to be called Sāvārni is explained below:—Śūrya had three children Manu, Yama and Yamī by Sārījñā, the daughter of Viśvakarmā. This Manu was Vaivasvata Manu, the seventh Manu. Unable to bear the intense heat of Śūrya, Sārījñā once sent her maid Chāya to Śūrya in her own disguise and went to the forest for tapas. Śūrya had three children by Chāya, Sanaścara, another Manu and Tapata. This Manu is known as Sāvārni who will become the eighth Manu. In his time there will be three groups of Devas—Sutapas, Aṃitabhās and Mukhyas. Each of these groups will consist of twelve persons. The Saptarṣis of the eighth Manvantara are Dīptumān, Gālava, Kāma, Kṛpa, Aṣvathāmānā son of Droṣa, Vyāsa son of Parāśara and Rṣyaśriga. Mahābali, son of Virocana will be the Indra. Virājas, Urvarīyān, Nirmoka and others are the Kings who are the sons of Sāvārni Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

(9) Dakṣa Sāvārni.
General. At the time of this Manu there are three groups of Devas namely, Pāras, Maricigarbhās and Sudharmans. Each of the groups contains 12 Devas. The Indra who is the king of those Devas is the mighty Adbhuta. The Saptarṣis of this Manvantara are:—Savana, Dyuṭimān, Bhavya, Vasu, Medhātithi, Jyotimān and Satya. Dhṛtaketu. Dīptikutu, Paṇcahaṭa, Nirāmaya, Pṛthuṣravas are the sons of Dakṣaśāvārni Manu. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

(10) Brhma Sāvārni.
General. In this Manvantara, the Devas are Sudhāmans and Viśuddhas. Each of these groups will contain 100 Devas. Their Indra will be the heroic Śanī. The Saptarṣis will be Ṣaṭvarṣi, Sukra, Satya, Tapomūrti, Nabhāga, Apratimaṇjas and Satyaktu. Bramha Sāvārni will have ten sons, three of whom are, Sukṣetra, Uttama-Tuṣitas. In Uttama Manvantara that divinity Tuṣita him self was born again under the name of Satya as the son of Satyā in the group of Devas called Satyas. When Tāmasa Manvantara began, that divinity was born again as the son of Haryā as a Hari in the group of Devas called Harīs! It was that divinity Hari himself who was born in Sambhūti under the name of Mānas among the Devas called Raivatas in Raivata Manvantara. In Cākṣuṣa Manvantara that Viṣṇu Bhāgavān took birth in Viśvūṭī as one of the Vaiśvūṭīs. In the present Vaiṣvavata Manvantara, Viṣṇu has incarnated in Aditi as Vāmana, the son of Kaśyapa. That great Vāmana conquered all the three worlds and presented them to Devendra. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part III, Chapter 2).

Besides the fourteen Manus mentioned above, certain other Manus are also referred to in the Purāṇas. Some details about them are given below:—

1) It is seen from Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kāṇḍa, 14th Sarga, verse 11, that Kaśyapa had a wife named Manu.

2) There is a reference to a Rājārṣi (Saintly king) named Manu in Rgveda, first Maṇḍala, 16th Anuvākā, 112th Sūkta.

3) A son named Manu was born to the Agni Tapa or Pāṇiçajanyā. This Manu has another name Bhānu. He had three wives named Suprājā, Bhṛadbhāsa and Niśā. Six sons were born to him by the first two wives. By his third wife he had one daughter and seven sons.

(M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 4).

4) In Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 57, verse 43, we find a reference to another Manu named Pracetas.

MĀNYAVATĪ. Wife of Avikṣit, son of Karandhama. Mānyavati daughter of Bhimarāṇya was carried away by force by Avikṣit from the marriage hall on the marriage day. (Mārkandeya Purāṇa).

MANYU I. A Vedic god. The origin of this god is described in Brāhma Purāṇa as follows:—

Once a terrible war broke out between Devas and Asuras. The Devas who were defeated, went to the Gautamī river valley and performed penance to Śiva praying for victory. Śiva produced Manyu from his third eye and presented him to the Devas. In the battle which followed they defeated the Asuras with the help of Manyu.

MANYU II. A king of the Pūru dynasty. Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha states that Manyu, the son of Bharadvāja, had five sons including Bhaktasvayam.

MANYUMĀN. Second son of the Agni Bhānu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 11).

MARAṆA (M) (DEATH). Death is a goddess whose name is Mṛtyu. The Purāṇas state that there was no death in the world before the birth of this goddess. In Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 53 there is the following story about the circumstances in which Brahmā created Mṛtyu.

Living beings multiplied endlessly on earth. As they had no death, the goddess Earth found their weight too much for her to bear. She went weeping to Brahmā and prayed for his help. At that time, Rudra and Nārada were present in Brahmā's assembly. Brahmā said that he did not like destroying living beings. Because of the pressure of Rudra and Nārada, Brahmā created out of Viṣvaprakāṣa (Cosmic Light) a woman. She was born from the south and Brahmā gave her the name "Mṛtyu". He gave her permission to destroy human beings.

When she heard that she was to kill living beings, she shed tears and Brahmā gathered those tears. She went to Dhenukārama and other places and performed tapas. At last Brahmā called her back and assured her that it was not against Dharma to kill living beings. He changed the tears he had gathered from her face into the various diseases and returned them to her. He gave those diseases and the god Yama as her companions. Thus the goddess Mṛtyu started her dance of destruction. (See also under the word PUNARJANMA).

MĀRDAMAHARŚI. One of the sons of Viśvāmitra who was a Brahmavādī. (Śloka 57, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRGANĀPRIYĀ. A daughter born to Kaśyapa Prājapati of his wife Pradhā. (Śloka 45, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

MĀRGASĪRṢĀMĀSA. The month of Dhanu (December). The month has got great Purānic importance. If one lives taking food only once during the whole of this month one will be free from all sins and diseases. (Śloka 17, Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva). On the Dwādeśi day in this month one fasts the whole day and night and worships Keśava one will get the benefit of conducting an Āsvamedha yajña. (Śloka 3, Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRĪCA. A Dānava. There is a reference to him in Uttara Rāmāyaṇa.

MĀRĪCA I. The uncle of Rāvaṇa.

1) Birth. On the banks of the river Sarayū, there were two states lying adjacent called Malāda and Karūṣa. The great sages conducted Jaladhāra (showering of water) on the head of Indra to absolve him of his sin of killing Vṛtrāsura at this place. At that time Mala (excreta) and Karūṣa (spittings) of Indra fell at those places and so they got the name of Malada and Karūṣa. At that place was born after a few years a demoness named Tātākā who had the strength of a thousand elephants. A demon called Sunda married Tātākā and she gave two sons named Mārīca and Suñāhu. (Sarga 24, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa and Bāla Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

2) Mārīca in his previous birth. Mārīca was the servant of the gate-keepers of Vaikuṇṭha. One day Mahāviṣṇu was displeased by a conduct of his and he cursed him to be born as a demon on earth. But he added that Mārīcawould get salvation from the curse when he was killed by Śrī Rāma in which capacity Viṣṇu would incarnate soon. He would then return to Vaikuṇṭha to his original place. That was how Mārīca was born as the uncle of Rāvaṇa.

3) Āśrama life. Mārīca and Suñāhu were two inseparable brothers. They learned all tactics of war and their hobby was to torment the innocent sages of the forests (Sarga 19, Bālākāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa). When the exploits of Mārīca became unbearable, Viśvāmitra brought Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa from Ayodhyā for help. The instant Mārīca heard the fierce twang of Rāma’s bow he fled to the other shore of the sea. From that day onwards Mārīca grew matted hair and wore barks of trees and spent his life in an āśrama. (Sargas 33 and 36, Aranyakaṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

4) Death. When Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were living in the Daṇḍakāranya with Sītā they were annoyed by a demoness named Sūrpaṇakāhī. In the fight that ensued very many demons were killed. Sūrpaṇakāhī complained to Rāvaṇa who decided to kill Rāma and carry away Sītā. For this he sought the help of his uncle Mārica. Flying in his golden Vimūśa and crossing mountains and oceans he approached Mārica and told him of his plan. Mārica who was aware of the force of Rāma had dissuaded Rāvaṇa from such a venture. But Rāvaṇa persisted in his plan and gave Mārica the following instructions: "Become a golden deer with beautiful white spots all over the body and roam about near the āśrama of Rāma for his wife Sītā to see. I am sure Sītā will request her husband Rāma to catch hold of you. Rāma and Laxmaṇa will follow you and Sītā will be left alone. I will then carry away Sītā as Rāhu takes Candrikā (moonlight) and live happily with her. I will be contented if I can then tease Rāma who will be lamenting over his separation from his wife". Thinking that it would be better to die at the hands of Rāma than at the hands of Rāvaṇa, Mārica agreed to do as his nephew desired.

Rāvaṇa and Mārica came near the āśrama of Rāma in Rāvaṇa's aerial chariot. Mārica on alighting from it took the form of a beautiful fawn and entered the precincts of the āśrama. The false fawn was capable of attracting the attention of anybody. It is described thus: "It appeared as a wonder to those who saw it. It was golden in colour with blue horns with white lines on it. The ears were like leaves of blue lotus and the face was of the colour of red lotus. The lips were like sapphire and the body beautifully shaped with sides like yellow flowers. The waist was thin and well-shaped and a rain-bow-coloured tail adorned its back. The whole body was silver-spotted and the deer was a feast for the eyes of anybody." The deer went and grazed in places where it could be seen by Sītā. It would run away from the āśrama and graze hidden from Sītā but would come back again to the vision of Sītā. It would mix with the deer of the āśrama for some time and run away from them to distant places. Like a butterfly it flitted about always trying to attract the attention of Sītā. Other deer approached it but on getting its scent flew away from it. The false deer suppressing the demon-instinct in him to kill and eat the animals which came near it played well the role of a fawn.

Sītā was enamoured of the deer and expressed to Rāma her desire to get it. Rāma followed it and finding it keeping a distance always got suspicious and shot it down with an arrow. The deer cried "Hā Lākṣmaṇa" and fell down dead. The cry was intended to mislead Lākṣmaṇa and draw him also away from Sītā. (Chapters 43-44, Arasya Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MĀRĪCA II  Kaśyapaprajāpati, Marīcī was the father of Kaśyapa and so Kaśyapa was known as Mārīcī also. (Sarga 46, Vālmīki Rāmāyana).

MARĪCĪ I A Mahārṣi (sage) born from Brahmā's mind.
1) Birth and Genealogy. The six great sages born from Brahmā's mind were: — Marīcī, Aṅgirās, Atri, Pulāstya, Pulaha and Kṛṣṇa, according to Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva.
2) Domestic life. Marīcī had several wives and children. He married Kalā, the daughter of Kardama Prajāpati by his wife Devahūti. Marīcī had two sons Kaśyapa and Pūrṇimaṇ by Kalā. This Kaśyapa was the original ancestor of all living beings. But Pūrṇimaṇ's family did not become well-known. Pūrṇimaṇ had two sons, Virājas and Viśvaga and a daughter Devakūlā. Devakūlā washed the feet of Mahāviṣṇu and merged with Akāśa Gaṅgā.

Uṛṇā was another wife of Marīcī. Six sons were born to Uṛṇā. Under a curse of Brahmā they were born first as the sons of Hiranyakāśipu and in their next birth as the sons of Vasūdeva and Devakī. It was these six children who were born as Śri Kṛṣṇa's elder brothers whom Kāśa Gaṅgā killed immediately after their birth. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

Marīcī had another wife named Sambhūtī. She gave birth to Paurāṇāsī. In Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10, we see that Paurāṇāsī who was a Mahātmā had two sons Virājas and Parvata. Dharmavrata was yet another wife of Marīcī. She was a daughter born to Dharmavrata by Dharmadeva.
3) Dharmavrata cursed. Marīcī lived happily for long with his wife Dharmavrata. Once he returned from the forest, carrying darbha grass, flowers etc. He was tired after a long walk. After taking food, he wanted his wife to massage his legs. While she was massaging him Marīcī fell asleep. Just then Brahmā happened to come there. Dharmavrata was in a fix. She had to attend to her husband and at the same time receive Brahmā with due respect. She could not leave her husband's guru (Śīra). It was her duty to honour him properly.

At last she got up and welcomed Brahmā, offering him the customary honours. Meanwhile Marīcī woke up and not finding his wife near him cursed her to be turned into a stone. Dharmavrata who was distressed at the curse pleaded innocence and explained to him that she had been honouring his guru. She warned him that he would incur the curse of Śiva.

Under Marīcī's curse Dharmavrata was separated from him. She performed penance in the midst of fires. Mahāviṣṇu appeared before her and asked her what boon she wanted. She prayed that her curse might be lifted. Viṣṇu replied: "It was Marīcī who cursed you. That curse cannot be withdrawn. You will be turned into a sacred stone. Your name 'Dharmavrata' will be changed into 'Devavrata'. In future, that stone will become famous under the name "Devavrata" or "Devāsilā". Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Mahēśvara and goddesses like Lākṣmi will dwell in that stone."

After saying this, Mahāviṣṇu disappeared. Once Dharmadeva held this Devāsilā above the demon Gaya and the place became famous under the name of "Gaya tīrtha". (See under Gayātīrtha).
4) Other details.
(i) Marīcī had participated in the celebration connected with Arjuna's birth. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 52).
(ii) Marīcī was a member of Indra's assembly. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 17).
(iii) Marīcī attended the celebration connected with Subrahmaṇya's birth. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 10).
(iv) After the Bhārata Yuddha, Marīcī visited Bhīṣma who was lying on "Śara Śayā" (bed of arrows). (M.B. Śaṇti Parva, Chapter 47, Verse 10).
(v) Mahabharata, Sant Parva, Chapter 334, Verse 35, mentions that Marici is a Prajapati.
(vi) Marici is one of the group of sages known as Cirta-sikhandasins. (M.B. Sant Parva, Chapter 335, Verse 29).
(vii) Mahabharata, Sant Parva, Chapter 340, Verse 44, describes Marici as one of the Astraprakritis.
(viii) Marici once visited Dhruva who was performing penance and gave him advice. (Visnu Purana, Part I, Chapter 11).

MARICI II. A celestial woman. In Mahabharata, Adi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 62 we find that she attended a dance at the celebrations at the time of Arjuna's birth.

MARICI III. An author of Dharmasstra. His statements are quoted in Apararka, Smitandrikara, Mitakshara and other works.

MARISAA. A nymph created as a maiden of the Flora (See under Kaandu).

MARISAA. A river of Puranic fame. (Sloka 36, Chapter 9, Bihsha Parva).

MARISAA. A place of habitation of ancient Bharata. (Sloka 69, Chapter 9, Bihsha Parva).

MARRKA. Son of Jambavan. It is said in Brahmapurapura that the mardaras (cats) have their origin from this son of Jambavan.

MARKA. See under the word Sansdmarka.

MARKANDEYA. The son of Mrkandu. He was a great devotee of Siva.

1) Genealogy. Bhrugu, son of Brahma, begot of his wife Khyati a daughter named Laksmi and two sons named Dhaita and Vidhita.

Dhaita and Vidhita married Ayati and Niyati daughters of Mahameru. Dhaita begot of his wife Ayati a son named Praa and Niyati bore Vidhita a son named Mrkandu. Markandeya was the son of Mrkandu and Vedasiras was the son of Markandeya.

2) Birth. Mrkandu did not have sons for a long time and so he performed penance for several years to please Siva to get a son. Siva appeared before him in person and asked him thus "Do you desire to have a virtuous, wise and pious son who would live up to sixteen years or a dull-witted evil-natured son who would live long?" Mrkandu chose the first type and soon a son was born. He was named Markandeya. Even from boyhood Markandeya knew all the Vedas and stasras. His pleasing manners got the approval of his teachers and the boy was liked by one and all. But the parents were sad and whenever they looked at their son a gloom spread over their face. The secret of the short span of his life was hidden from him.

The sixteenth year was fast approaching and one day unable to control their grief they went before him. Markandeya asked them the reason why they wept. Mrkandu with tears running down his cheeks told him the story. From that day onwards Markandeya started performing penance wearing barks of trees for his dress and growing matted hair. The boy was soon engrossed in severe austerities.

The day of his death came and the boy sat before the idol of Siva in deep meditation. The servants of the god of Death could not approach Markandeya for the radiation from him was too hot for them. So Yama, the god of Death, himself came to fetch him. Then Markandeya crying loudly for help embraced the idol before him. Yama threw his rope in a loop and it went and circled round the idol also. Angry Siva rose from the idol and coming down killed Yama to save the child. From that day onwards Siva got the names Mrityunjaya and Kailakula. After that at the request of the devas Siva gave life to Yama again and made Markandeya to be of sixteen years for ever.

3) Penance of Markandeya. The Puranas state that after getting the blessing from Siva, Markandeya lived for ten crores of years. While he was in deep meditation six Manvantaras passed away. When Markandeya continued his meditation to the seventh Manvantara Indra got frightened and he made an attempt to abort the penance of Markandeya. Indra sent his troops of Gandharvas, nymphs, Manmatha and Vasanta to the aRama of Markandeya. The aRama of Markandeya was at a place which was on the northern side of the Himalayas and was famous by the presence there of the river Puspabhadra and the rock Citra. The agents of Indra came there and tried to entice him with many temptations. Beautiful celestial maidens danced around the aRama. Flowers fell from their hair when their wrists shook by the weight of their heavy breasts. Enchanting girls played with balls here and there. As they played the bracelets on their wrists fell down and the thin garments that hid their bodies flew up showing an alluring nakedness. Kama (God of Love) sent his arrows at that time against the sage. But Markandeya sat unconcerned as rigid as a rock and Indra accepted defeat.

When Indra and his troops returned disappointed Mahavisu with many sages went to Markandeya. He awoke from his meditation and worshipped Visu.

4) Vision of Pralaya. On one evening at dusk Markandeya was sitting at Puspabhadra when from somewhere a wind began to blow. The wind increased in strength and the sky became covered with clouds. The place resounded with peals of thunder and soon it began to rain. Rains became heavy. Rivers became flooded and water-level in the oceans rose. Everything around was submerged in water and Markandeya alone stood there with his matted hair swinging in the wind. It was impossible to know the directions and Markandeya started walking. He fell into whirlpools but was the next instant thrown up on to the top of surging waves. Then he saw on the top of a high wave a banyan tree. On a branch on the north-east of the tree he saw an infant lying, devouring the darkness by its effulgence. He was attracted to the infant by its vital force and went inside the infant as it inhaled. Inside the belly of the kid Markandeya had a vision of the entire universe. He saw the sky, the horizon, the stars, the oceans, the mountains expanses of land, Suras, Asuras, forests and all that the universe contained in its proper set-up. He saw passing before his eyes the elements, the Yugas and the Manvantaras. After some time he was thrown out by an exhalation of the infant. He stood on the waters. The old banyan tree was still there. An infant was still lying on a leaf on that tree. Markandeya then knew it was Mahavisu. He rushed to embrace the child; but the child disappeared before he reached it. Markandeya praised Mahavisu.

5) Parvatii and Parameswara come to Markandeya. When Mahavisu disappeared from his vision he felt he was sitting at Puspabhadratri and he again went into meditation. At that time Parvatii and Parameswara came that way and appeared before Markandeya. The sage worshipped them and they both blessed Markandeya.
and said "Every desire of yours will be fulfilled. You will never be rugous or grey-haired and will live virtuous and famous till the end of the world. Omniscience will be an asset for you". After having said so much Pārvatī and Parameśvara disappeared. The Purānic belief is that the realised soul of Mārkandeya is moving about in the universe. (10th Skandha, Chapters 8 to 11, Bhāgavata).

6) Details from Mahābhārata relating to Mārkandeya.
(i) This sage shone in the court of Dharmaputra. (Śloka 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).
(ii) He sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him (Śloka 12, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).
(iii) Once Mārkandeya gave Dharmopadesha to the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 25, Vana Parva).
(iv) Mārkandeya sitting on the banks of the river Payoṣi sang praises about river Payoṣi and king Nṛga. (Śloka 5, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).
(v) Once Mārkandeya narrated to Dharmaputra stories about Kings and Rāgis. (Chapters 186 to 232, Vana Parva).
(vi) Mārkandeya had a vision of the great deluge. (Chapter 188, Vana Parva).
(vii) This sage entered the belly of Bālamukunda. (Śloka 100, Chapter 188, Vana Parva).
(viii) Mārkandeya gave a description of Kāliyuga. (Śloka 7, Chapter 190, Vana Parva).
(ix) He described at another time the incarnation of Kalki. (Śloka 93, Chapter 19, Vana Parva).
(x) Once Mārkandeya narrated the story of Tripuravadha to Dharmaputra. (Śloka 2, Chapter 33, Karṇa Parva).
(xi) Mārkandeya was also one among the several sages who visited Bhīṣma lying on his bed of arrows, (Śloka 11, Chapter 47, Sānti Parva).
(xii) Mārkandeya learnt Sahasranāma (thousand names) of Śiva from Naciketas and taught the same to Upamanyu. (Śloka 79, Chapter 17, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xiii) Once Mārkandeya discussed with Nārada topics on many different subjects. (Daśkiṣṇātya Pātha, Chapter 22, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xiv) Once Mārkandeya explained the evils of taking flesh as food. (Śloka 37, Chapter 115, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xv) The name of the wife of Mārkandeya was Dhumomā. (Śloka 4, Chapter 146, Anuśāsana Parva).
(xvi) Yudhiṣṭhira worshipped Mārkandeya also when he worshipped great sages before commencing the Mahāprasthāna. (Śloka 12, Chapter 1, Prathāhana Parva, M.B.).
(xvii) Mahābhārata gives the following synonyms for Mārkandeya:-Bhārava, Bhārgavasattama, Bhṛgukulaśārdula, Bhṛgunandana, Brahmarśi and Viśrāṇi.

MĀRKANDEYA (M). A famous holy place. This place is situated about sixteen miles to the north of Kaśi at a place where the rivers Gaṅgā and Gomati meet. He who visits this place would get the benefit of doing an Agnisṭomatayajna. Not only that, he would lift the prestige of his family. (Śloka 80, Chapter 34, Vana Parva).

MĀRKANDEYAPURĀNA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. The number of granthas in it is ninthousand. It contains a critical study of Dharma and Adharma. It is considered to be very good to give this Purāṇa as gift on the full-moon day in the month of Kārttika (November). (Chapter 272, Agni Purāṇa).

MĀRKANDEYASAMASYĀPARVA. A sub-Parva of the Vana Parva of Mahābhārata. This contains chapters 82 to 242 of Vana Parva.

MARMAN. According to Indian Śāstras there are 108 Marmans in the body of a living being. Of these the most important are forehead, eyes, eye-brows, armpits, shoulders heart, chin etc. Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, Chapter 34 says that a snake-bite or a heavy blow on any one of these marmans would prove fatal.

MĀRTTIKAṆĀVANA (M). An ancient country in Bhārata. During the time of the Pāṇḍavas this country was ruled by King Salva. (Śloka 14, Chapter 16, Vana Parva). Parasurāma killed all the Kṣatriyas of this country. (Śloka 12, Chapter 70, Droṇa Parva). Arjuna once made the son of Kṛtvāvarma the King of this country. (Śloka 69, Chapter 77, Mauṣala Parva).

MARU I. A king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty, the father of Prasārūtra and son of Sīghra. He had become "Ciraṇjivi" (immortal) by his Yogic power. According to Bhāgavata Purāṇa, all Kṣatriya families would perish in Kāliyuga. At that time, Maru would come back to the world to revive the Kṣatriya race. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MARU II. A Vīdeha king of the Nimi dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

MARU III. One of the chief lieutenants of Narakāsura. He was slain by Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

MARBHŪMĪ (MARUDHANVA). The ancient name of the present Rājasthān. In Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 5 we see that Nakula had won a victory over Marudhanva during his triumphal march over the western country. Kāmyakavana in which is included Tṛṇabindu sarovara, is in Marudhanva. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 258, Verse 13). Marudhanva was also known as "Mārvāta". The sage Utaśka lived in Mārvāta. In Mahābhārata, Aśvamedha Parva, Chapters 53, 54 and 55 it is stated that once Śrī Kṛṣṇa showed his Viśvarūpa to this sage at Mārvāta.

MĀRUDHA. A country of Purānic fame. Sahadeva conquered this place while he was on his victory march to the south. (Śloka 14, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).

MĀRUTA. The forty-nine Vāyus. (For details see under DITI).

MĀRUTA (M). An ancient place of habitation of south Bhārata. Those who stood on the right side of the Kraunḍarūpa Vyūha (a battle array) constructed by Dhrṣṭadyumna in the Kurukṣetra battle were the people of Mārūta from south Bhārata. (Śloka 57, Chapter 50, Bhīṣma Parva).

MĀRUTAGAṆATĪRTHA. (MARUDGAṆATĪRTHA) A sacred place. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 38).

MĀRUTANTAṆYA. One of the sons of Viśvāmitra. (Śloka 54; Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀRUTĀSA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 62, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MĀRUTĀŚKANDHA. An army of the Devas. The commander of the forces was Subrahmanya. (Śloka 55, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

MĀRUTS. In the Purāṇas there are references to 49 gods who are known as "Maruts". All of them are the sons of Kaśyapa. The story of how the child in Diti's womb was cut into 49 pieces which became 49 Maruts. is given in Chapter 71 of Vāmana Purāṇa as follows:

Kaśyapa's first wife Aditi became the mother of Devas and his second wife Diti became the mother of Daityas. The chief of the Devas was Indra and the chief of Daityas were Hīraniyāka and Hīraniyākaśipu. At the request of Indra, Hīraniyāka and Hīraniyākaśipu were slain by Mahāviṣṇu. Diti who was grieved at the death of her sons, approached Kaśyapa and requested him to give her a son who would be strong enough to kill Indra. Kaśyapa told her that if she could perform tapas for 10,000 Divyavarsas with due observance, she would get a son who would be able to kill Indra and conquer the three worlds. He gave her a long list of conditions to be observed during the tapas, some of which were as follows: Do not injure any creature; do not curse; do not tell lies; do not cut nails or hair; do not touch any unclean object; do not get angry, do not speak to wicked people; do not wear soiled clothes; do not wear garlands used by others; do not eat what is left over by another; do not eat meat touched by a Śūdra woman. Putting on clean white, dress, carrying auspicious substances, everyday before breakfast, cows, Brāhmaṇas, goddess Lakṣmi, and Kaśyapa himself should be worshipped. This observance is known as "Pumāsvana". He said that if she performed the tapas with this austere observance, a son capable of killing Indra would be born to her.

Diti started the observance as advised by her husband. Kaśyapa left for Udaya mountain. After his departure, Indra came to the Āsrama and pretending friendship offered to serve Diti as an attendant. Diti accepted his offer and allowed him to serve her. One day Diti, who was utterly tired fell asleep and Indra took advantage of this opportunity and gained entrance into her womb through her nostrils. He cut the child in Diti's womb with his weapon Vajra into seven pieces. At that time the child cried aloud and Indra said to it, "Ma ruda" which means, "Do not cry!" He cut each of the seven pieces again into seven pieces and thus 49 Maruts were born out of the 49 pieces. Since Indra said "Ma ruda", they came to be known as "Maruts". All these Maruts subsequently became Indra's servants.

After this, Indra with his weapon came out of Diti's body. With joined palms he begged Diti's pardon and explained to her that he destroyed the child in her womb since he was destined to be his (Indra's) enemy.

MARUTTA I. A wealthy king who lived in Kṛitayuga.

Genealogy. Descended from Viśnu in the following order:—Brahmā, Marici, Kaśyapa, Viyāsvan, Vaivas-vata Manu, Mahābhūta, Prasandhi, Ksūpa, Iksāyukī, Viśā, Kaśyā, Kheenatinā, Suvareca, Karandhama and Marutta.

2) How Marutta got gold. As soon as Marutta became king he began to perform a Yāga. Money was required for it. He was puzzled as to how to raise funds. Besides, Indra was trying to obstruct the Yāga. At last he consulted Nārada who told him that Brhaspati's brother Sañhvartaka was performing tapas in the forest and if Marutta approached him, he would give him enough money for this purpose. So Marutta went to Sañhvartaka. He advised, Marutta, to worship Śiva. Accordingly Marutta went to Kaññana and got plenty of gold by worshipping Śiva and returned with it and began his Yāga. In spite of their efforts, Indra and other gods were not able to spoil Marutta's Yāga. After the Yāga, Marutta stored up the surplus wealth in the neighbourhood of Himalayas where his capital was situated.

After the Bhārata Yuddha, Dharmaputra was in need of money to re-establish his administration and for conducting an Āsvamedha yāga. At that time sage Vyāsa informed him about the gold which Marutta had left in the neighbourhood of the Himalayas. It was by fetching that gold that the Pañḍavas conducted their Āsvamedha yāga. (M.B. Āsvamedha Parva, Chapters 3-10).

3) Marutta and Rāvana. Once Rāvana started on a triumphal tour in his Puskāra Vīmaṇa with his followers. It was at that time, that Marutta was performing his famous Yāga. The various gods were also present on that occasion. Alarmèd at the sight of Rāvana who was invisible by virtue of a boon he had received, the gods assumed the shape of different animals and birds. Indra became a peacock, Dharmarāja, (Yama), became a crow; Kubera became a chameleon; Varuṇa transformed himself into a swan, and so on. Rāvana entered the precincts of the Yajña and said to Marutta:—"Either you fight with me, or else admit defeat from me." To this Marutta replied calmly:—"May I know who you are?" Rāvana answered with a smile of contempt:—"I am amused at your strange pretence! Do you mean to say that you do not know Rāvana who is the younger brother of Kubera? There is no one but you in all the three worlds, who does not know me. I have won the Puskāramāna after defeating my elder brother." Marutta retorted with bitter irony:—"As a younger brother who has defeated his elder brother, you are certainly a great man. There is no praiseworthy hero equal to you in all these three worlds. Do you brag that you have defeated your elder brother? I do not know whether you have received the boon by your righteous conduct. I have not heard the stories which you have told just now. You wicked fellow, stop there! I don't think that you will return alive!" Saying this Marutta took his bow and arrows and got ready for a fight.

But Sañhvartaka stopped Marutta saying "O King! If you would please heed my advice, do not prepare for a fight here. We have started Mahē-varasata. If we do not bring it to a conclusion, the whole family will come to an end. One who performs this Yāga should not be engaged in a fight. He should not even become a victim to anger. This Rākṣasa (Rāvana) is invincible. Your victory is doubtful." At this, Marutta put down his bow and began to occupy himself again with the affairs of the Yajña. Just then Sukra shouted, "Rāvana has won." The Rākṣasas and their leader Rāvana continued their tour after eating the Mahārāja who had come to take part in the Yāga. After Rāvana left the place, the Devas resumed their own forms. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa)

4) Other Details.

(i) Marutta flourished in Yama's assembly. (M.B. Sābara Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 16).

(ii) Marutta is considered as one of the "Pañcabāhu-samrāta" (five great emperors). The five great emperors... are—Yuvānśava, Bhagiratha, Kārtūvṛtya, Bharata and Marutta. (M.B.: Sabhā Parva, Chapter 15, Verse 23)

(iii) Once Siva presented him a golden peak of the Himalayas. Indra, Bhraspati and other Devas attended Marutta’s assembly. His Vajramantapas were all golden. His cooks were groups of Marutta. He was able to make all his subjects strong and healthy. In Mahābhārata, Drona Parva, Chapter 55, we see that Marutta ruled over the country for 1000 years as an ideal emperor.

(iv) Once Marutta received a sword from King Miceukunda. Marutta gave it to Raivata. (M.B.: Saṅgh Parva, Chapter 166, Verse 77).

(v) Marutta gave his daughter to Aṅgiras and attained Heaven according to Mahābhārata—Sañcī, Parva, Chapter 234: Verse 18.

(vi) In Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha, we find a passage which says that since Marutta had no sons he had adopted Duyanta, a King of the Pūru dynasty, as his son.

MARUTTA II. A great sage. He entered into a dispute with Śrī Kṛṣṇa, who was on his way to Hastinapura as the messenger of the Pāñḍavas. (M.B.: Udyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 27).

MARUTVĀMALA. In south India, at the southern tip of the Sahya ranges, a mountain reputed for medicinal herbs, may still be seen. This mountain is known by the name “Marutvāmalā”. A legend connected with the origin of this mountain, is given in Utara Ramāyana, as follows:

It was the time of the battle between Śrī Rāma and Rāvana. Rāvana’s younger brother, Vibhiṣāna, joined the side of Rāma and fought against Rāvana. The enraged Rāvana shot his arrow at Vibhiṣāna. In his endeavour to save Vibhiṣāna, Laksmana fell down unconscious. Rāma and his followers discussed how Laksmana could be revived. Jāmbavan observed that there was a herb called “Dronāvan” in one of the peaks of the Himalayas and it was brought at once. Laksmana could be restored to his senses. Hanūman flew to the Himalayas immediately. But although he combed the forests there, he was not able to find the herb Dronāvan. So he tore away and lifted a whole peak which was full of all kinds of medicinal herbs and returned to Lanka. Jāmbavan took the needed herbs from it and deposited the peak at the southern end of India. This is the present Marutvāmalā. (Mala means mountain).

MARUTVĀN. See under MARUTVATI.

MARUTVATI. The mother of two Marutvāns. This Marutvati was the daughter of Daśa, and the wife of Dharma. The ten daughters of Daśa, namely, Arundhati, Vasu, Yami, Lāmba, Bhūnā, Marutvati, Sāṅkāpā, Muhūrtā, Sādhyā, and Visvā were the wives of Dharma-deva. Visvadevas were born to Visvā, Siddhas were born to Sādhyā, Marutvāns were born to Marutvati, Vasus were born to Vasu, Bhūnas were born to Bhūnā, Ghosa was born to Lāmba and Nagavēthi was born to Yami. (Visvā Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

MARYĀDĀ I. A princess of Vidarbha. She was married by the king named Arvācina. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 12, it is said that a son named Arika was born to them.

MARYĀDĀ II. A daughter of the king of Videha, Devātithi, a king of the Pūru dynasty married her. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, verse 29 says that a son, Arika was born to them.

MĀSA. A measure of weight in ancient Bharata. (See under Taramcru).

MĀSA (S) (MONTHS). General information. It is believed that every where for a year there are twelve months. There are six different kinds of months in force in Bharata. They are the following:

2. What the names of the months indicate.
1. Malayālam months. The months are named based on certain beliefs. It takes twelve months for the earth to go round the Sun once. When the earth passes through the twelve divisions, it faces a separate set of constellations in the universe in each of these divisions. In the month of Chittam the earth faces a cluster of constellations in the shape of a lion and so the month is called Simha (lion) or Chittam. In the next division the earth faces the constellations in the shape of a Kanya (kanya) and so the month was called Kann. The earth faces next the constellations in the shape of a balance and so the month was called Tulam (Tulā = balance). In the next division the earth faces the constellations in the shape of a scorpion and so the month was called Vṛṣcikam (scorpion). The set of constellations which faces the earth in the next division is shaped like a bow (chatus) and so the month got the name Dhanu. In the next division the earth faces a set of constellations in the shape of a Makaramatsya (makara-fish) and so the month was called Makaram. Kumbha means a jar and Minam means a fish and Meram (Meṣa) means a goat and ldavam (Ršabha) means an ox. The shapes of the constellations in those divisions are like the things mentioned and the months were so named after them. In the next two divisions the constellations appear as twins and a crab respectively and the months were so called Mithunam (twins) and Karkatākam (crab).

2. English months.
i) January has come from the word Janus, the name of a Roman devatā. Janus is twin-faced, one facing the front and the other back.
ii) February means ‘to purify’ and the festival of purification of the Romans is conducted in that month.
iii) March is Mars, a devatā of War. Rome was built by the brave warrior Romulus. In his time there were only ten months in a year and the number of days in a month varied considerably. There were months with twenty days and thirty-five days. It was in the year 700 B.C. that the then King of Rome, Numa, divided the year into twelve months and added January and February to it. Till then March was the first month of the year.
iv) April—Aperio means ‘blossoming’ and since the trees and plants blossom in that month it got the name of April.
v) May is named after Maia daughter of the demigod (devatā) Atlas. There is an opinion that it is named after Māna, another name of Jupiter.
vi) June gets its name after the devatā Juno though there is a version that it is named after a Roman tribe called Junius.
vii) July was formerly known as Quintilis meaning the fifth counting from March which was the first month of the year till the time of Numa. It was to commemorate the name of Julius Caesar that the name was changed to July.
viii) August. This month was formerly known as Sextilis meaning the sixth month. But it was renamed August in honour of Augustus Caesar. But it still lacked the importance of July as it contained thirty-one days and August only thirty days. So Augustus took one day from February and made the number of days in August thirty-one.
ix) September means the seventh month from March.
x) October means the eighth month.
xii) December means the tenth month.

MĀSAKA (M). A place in the ancient island of Sāka. Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11 says that in ancient times, Kings used to live there for the fulfillment of their desires.

MĀSARŚĀRA. A king of the Rgveda period. Rgveda, 1st Manḍala, 18th Anuvāka, 122nd Sūkta says that this king used to persecute the Aryans.

MĀSAVRATOPAVĀSA. Purāṇas mention about the months in which Vratas are to be observed with efficacy and the details are given below:
(1) He who fasts for half a day in the month of Tulam will get children and vehicles in plenty and would become pure. (Ślokā 29, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(2) He who fasts the whole day of the Dvādaśī in Tulam and worships Viṣṇu will get the benefit of making a Sahasragodāṇa (giving away thousand cows as gift). (Ślokā 3, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(3) He who fasts for one time of the day in Vṛṣcikam will become a very brave and valorous man and acquire many wives and fame. (Ślokā 30, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(4) All men and women who worship Viṣṇu on the dwādaśī day in Vṛṣcikam fasting for the whole day will get the benefit of a Godānayajña. (Ślokā 14, Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(5) He who fasts for one time a day during the month of Meṣa will get gold, diamonds and pearls in plenty and will be born in a high family in his next birth. (Ślokā 23, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(6) If one fasts the whole of the Dvādaśī in the month of Meṣa one would get the benefit of conducting a Punḍarikā. (Ślokā 7 Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(7) He who fasts for one time in a day in the month of Mithuna will become very prosperous. (Ślokā 25, Chapter 106, Anuṣāsana Parva).
(8) If one fasts the whole day and night of the Dvādaśī in Mithuna and does Trivikrama pūjā one would not only get the benefit of conducting a Gomedayajña but will be able to enjoy sexual pleasures with celestial maidens. (Ślokā 9, Chapter 109, Anuṣāsana Parva).

MASĪRAM. A place of habitation in ancient India. There is a reference to this region in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 53.

MATAŅGA. I. An ancient sage. The Rāmāyaṇa in Araṇya Kāṇḍa describes the aṣṭama of Mataṅga. Rāmaḷaṅkāmaṇas after crossing the forest of Krauṇḍa came to the aṣṭama of Mataṅga. Kambhanda was slain at this place. After abandoning his demoniac body Kambhanda extolled the greatness of Mataṅga (aṣṭama) to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. “The flowers of this aṣṭama are never plucked and worn on heads. Even if they are not plucked they never fade. They remain fresh always. There is a reason for this. The disciples of Mataṅga once brought a heavy load of fruits for their guru and when they reached the aṣṭama they were tired and drops of perspiration fell on the plants and they became flowers. Śabarī is performing penance in this aṣṭama.” Mataṅga once cursed Bāli. It happened that while the sage was living on the mountain of Rṣayumā Bāli and the asura Dundubhi fought against each other and blood flowing from the body of Dundubhi by a blow of Bāli’s spurted out and fell on the hands of the sage.
MATAnga I

Mataṅga then cursed Bāli saying that his head would blow off if he entered Rṣyamukācala again. (Sarga 46, Kiṣkindhā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa and Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Pūrva Kāṇḍa). Mataṅgārāma was a holy place. (Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

MĀTANGA II. Another name of Triśāṅku. The name of Mataṅga is used for Rājaṛṣi Triśāṅku in Verse 31, of Chapter 71, of Ādi Parva. For more detail see under Triśāṅku.

MĀTANGA III. A maharṣi born to a barber of a brahmīn woman. This clandestine birth was not known either to the brahmīn husband or Mataṅga for a long time. Once his brahmīn father sent him to the fields for ploughing. He put a donkey to the yoke and ploughed. When the donkey slowed down its work Mataṅga beat it hard. The mother of the donkey saw it and wept. She called Mataṅga to her side and told him that he was the son of a barber and that was why he behaved like a caṇḍāla showing no kindness towards the animal. Mataṅga ran to his house and told his parents what the mother-donkey said. After that he left his house and did penance to become a brahmīn. Indra was pleased and he asked Mataṅga what he wanted and he replied he wanted to become a brahmīn. Indra made him a brahmīn and sent him back. (Chapter 27, Anuśāsana Parva).

MĀTANGA IV. A preceptor. He was the guru of Sabari. (Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀTANGA. Sage Mataṅga was known by this name also. (See under Mataṅga).

MĀTANGAKEDĀRA. A sacred place. He who bathes in a pond there would get the benefit of making a thousand Godānas (Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

MĀṬANGĪ. The great grandmother of the elephants. Māṭangī was the daughter of Krodhavāsa, daughter of Daksā and wife of Kaśyapaprājāpati. Māṭangī had nine sisters. Elephants were born of Māṭangī. (Sarga 14, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

MĀṬALI. Charioteer of Indra. Chapter 69 of Vāmana Parāṇa gives the following story about the birth of Māṭali.

A child was born to sage Śāmika. It was the time of Devāśura war. A great army of asuras under the leadership of Andhaka attacked Devaloka and conquered it. In the great battle with Andhaka the Vajrāyuḍha of Indra broke into two. Indra was thinking of a new weapon for him. Mahāviṣṇu then appeared before him and advised him to praise the glory of Agni. Indra did so and then a divine weapon rose from the fire. Indra flew at the asuras carrying the new weapon. There was no clever charioteer to drive the chariot of Indra. Still, seated in the golden chariot given to him by the Vasus Indra drove very swiftly against the asuras. The earth shivered by the din of the chariot-wheels.

When the earth began to quake the sage Śāmika following directions of his wife Tapasvinī placed the child on the ground outside the hermitage. An astrologer had told her that a child would become two if it was placed in an open ground at the time of earth-quake. Tapasvinī wanted one more child. As soon as her child was placed on the ground another child identical in every respect with the first one was born by the side of the other. But the second child, as soon as it was born rose up and ran to Indra for driving his chariot.

When the Gandharvas knew he was coming to help Indra, they showered him with brilliance and the child approaching Indra said “Oh, Lord of the Devas, I shall be your charioteer.” Indra asked him, “Child, whose son are you? How will you drive my horse? I doubt your competence.” The child replied, “I am the son born to Śamika on the ground. I have been given power and brilliance by the Gandharvas and so I am capable of driving your chariot.” On hearing this, Indra accepted him as his charioteer and named him Māṭali.

MĀṬARĪṢVAN. A devatā (demigod). There are several stories in the Vedas regarding the birth of Agni (fire). Though Agni originating from the clouds reaches the earth as lightning it hides itself making it invisible to man. It was Māṭarīṣvan who took its form from the earth and gave it to the Bhṛgu family and made it possible for them to make it as and when it was required. (Ṛgveda).

This Māṭarīṣvan was one of the prominent sons of Garuḍa. (Śloka 14, Chapter 10, Udyoga Parva).

MATHANA. An asura on the side of Tārakāśura. Mahāviṣṇu killed him. (Chapter 152, Matsya Parāṇa).

MĀṬHARA I. A demigod deputed by Indra to serve Sūrya (Sun). This demigod always sits on the right side of Sūrya, (Brahma Parva, Bhaviṣya Parāṇa).

MĀṬHARA II. One of the Aṣṭādaśavinayakas (Eighteen Vinayakas). (Śāmba, 16).

MĀṬHARA III. An acārya (teacher). He is believed to be the author of the book Sāṅkhya-kārīkāvṛtti. (Kausīṭaka Brāhmaṇa).

MĀṬHARAṆAṆAṆA. A holy place in Dakṣaṇa Bhārata. The victory pillar of Māṭharaṇa, an aide of Sūrya, is situated here. (Śloka 10, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

MĀṬHURĀ. The birth place of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

MĀṬI. A daughter of Dakaṣaprājāpati. She became the wife of Dharmaṅrāja. (Śloka 15, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

MĀṬINĀṆA. A King of Puruvaṇa. The line from Puru as follows: Puru - Janamejaya-Pracīnāiṃ-Manaṣyas-Vitabhaya - Śuṇḍu - Bahuvihda - Saṅ黟yāi-Rahvāvēdi-Bhadrāśva-Rṣeṣyu-Rṣeṣyu-Sannateyu-Ghṛteyu - Sthāṇḍīleyu-Dharneyu-Saṅvidheyu-Kṛṣṭevu-Matsyaṅa got two sons, Santurodha and Pratirathā. Duṣyanta, husband of Śakuntalā, was the son of Śantu-rodha. (Chapter 278, Ādi Parva).

MĀTKULIKĀ. A follower of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 467, Sālya Parva).

MĀṬRĪTHA. A sacred place situated on the outskirts of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a holy pond there one would be rich in children. (Śloka 58, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MĀṬSYA I. The first and foremost incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu. (See under Avatāra).

MĀṬSYA II. An ancient country of Purāṇic fame. The people of this country are called Matsyas. The details available regarding Matsyadeśa from the Mahābhārata are given below:

1. The Pāṇḍavas wandering through the forests came to Matsyadeśa. (Śloka 2, Chapter 135, Ādi Parva).
2. The people of Matsyadeśa in fear of Jarāsandha migrated from the north to the south. (Śloka 28, Chapter 14, Sāhā Parva).
(3) Bhūmaśarṇa during his victory march to the east conquered this country. (Śloka 8, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva.)

(4) Sahadeva during his victory march to the south conquered the people of Matsyas̄eṣa. (Śloka 4, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva.)

(5) Matsyas̄eṣa was one of the countries suggested by Arjuna to spend their life incognito. (Śloka 12, Chapter 1, Virāṭa Parva.)

(6) Virāṭa was the chief of Matsyas̄eṣa during the time of Mahābhārata. (Śloka 17, Chapter 1, Virāṭa Parva.)

(7) In the Kurukṣetra battle Virāṭa, King of Matsyas̄eṣa, came to the help of Yudhiṣṭhira with an Aśau-liṇi (army). (Śloka 12, Chapter 18, Udyoga Parva.)

(8) The Pāṇḍavas spent a year of their life incognito at the palace of Virāṭa, king of Matsyas̄eṣa. (Chapter 7, Virāṭa Parva.)

(9) Matsyas̄aṭya was one of the prominent kingdoms of ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 40, Chapter 9, Bhūśa Parva.)

(10) Bhūśa slaughtered many soldiers from Matsyas̄eṣa.

(11) Droṇācārya killed at a stretch five hundred Matsyas in the great battle. (Śloka 31 Chapter 190, Droṇa Parva.)

(12) Karna once conquered Matsyas̄eṣa. (Śloka 18, Chapter 8, Karna Parva.)

(13) The people of Matsyas̄eṣa were honest and charitable. (Chapter 45, Śloka 28, Karna Parva.)

(14) Those who were left out among the Matsyas in the great battle were killed by Aśvatthāmā. (Śloka 158, Chapter 8, Saupitka Parva.)

MATSYA III. A King. He was the brother of Satyas̄atī, mother of Vyāṣa. Satyas̄atī and Matsya were both found in a fish by the same fisherman. (See under Adī.)

MATSYAGANDHĪ (MATSYAGANDHĀ). Another name for Satyas̄atī, mother of Vyāṣa. (See under Satyas̄atī.)

MATSYAKĀLA. A King of Pāṇḍavaṁśa. He was one of the seven celebrated Kings known as Girikāpūtras. The others were: Bṛhadṛatha, Kuśa, Yadu, Pratyaγra, Bala and Vīra. The seven sons were born to Girikā of her attendants. (Chapter 278, Agni Puḍaṇa.)

MATSYAPūRĀṇA. One of the eighteen Purāṇas. This Purāṇa was told to Maṇu Satyavrata by Mahāviṣṇu during his incarnation as Mātsya. There are thirteen thousand Ślokas in it. For prosperity this Purāṇa should be given as gift on the Viṣuvat day along with a golden image of Mātsya. (Chapters 2 and 272, Agni Puḍaṇa.)

MATSYOVARA. Another name for Satyas̄atī, mother of Vyāṣa. (See under Satyas̄atī.)

MATTA. A demon. He was born to the demon Mālyavān of his wife Sundarī. Matta had six brothers named Vajramuṣṭi, Viruṅpākṣa, Durmukha, Supatagha, Yājñakoṣa and Unmatta. This Matta was killed in the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle. (Chapter 10, Agni Puḍaṇa.)

MATTAMAYŪRA(S). A special tribe of Kṣatriyas. Nakula, one of the Pāṇḍavas, defeated these people during his victory march to the west. (Śloka 5, Chapter 32, Sabhā Parva.)

MAUDGALYA (MAUDGALA). A māharṣi. This māharṣi once cursed Rāvaṇa.

Once Maudgalya was sitting in Svastikāsana resting his shoulders on his yogic staff in the forest of Kadamba. Rāvaṇa returning after his victory march came that way. Seeing the sage sitting in a wonderfully queer posture Rāvaṇa was amused and playfully tapped the staff with his Candrahāsā. The staff broke into two and Maudgalya fell flat on the ground breaking his spine. The sage was furious and he cursed Rāvaṇa saying that his Candrahāsā would thenceforth have no effect at all. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.)

MAUHŪRTTIKĀGATI. When the Sun passes through the centre of Puṣkara-dvīpa it covers a path equivalent to a thirtieth part of the earth and this journey of the Sun is called Mauhūrtti-kāgati. (See under Sūrya.)

MAUṆJAYANA. A māharṣi. This sage shone in the court of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Śloka 13, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva.)

MAURAVAPĀSA. See under Mura.

MAUKVI. A kind of grass. It is with this grass that ascetics make mekhāla (waistlet). (Śloka 33, Aḍī Parva and Chapter 17, Droṇa Parva.)

MAUSALAPARVA. A Parva of Mahābhārata. This Parva contains the story of the end of the Yādavas by killing each other.

MĀVELLA. The fourth son of Uparicaravasav. Māvella attended the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Chapter 63, Aḍī Parva and Chapter 34, Sabhā Parva.)

MĀVELLAKA. An ancient place of habitation in India. Suṣarmā, King of Trigarta, fought against Arjuna taking along with him the warriors of Māvellaka. Arjuna killed them all. (Śloka 20, Chapter 17, Droṇa Parva.)

MAYA. A Dānava king who served Deva and Asuras as their architect and builder.

1) General. Kaśyapa Pragāpati, son of Marici and grandson of Brahmā married the thirteen daughters of Daśka. Among them, the first was Aditi, the second was Diti and the third was Danu. Adities were born to Aditi, Daityas were born to Diti and Danavas were born to Danu. The chief among the sons of Danu was Maya.

Maya was found to be very proficient in the art of architecture even from his boyhood. He worshipped Brahmā in the Himālayas to gain unrivalled skill in architecture. Brahmā was pleased and appeared before him. He blessed Maya to become the unequalled architect of the Devas, Asuras and Dānavas. After that Maya was engaged in building magnificent mansions for Devas and Asuras. He was also anointed King of the Dānavas.

It was a period of friendly co-operation and brotherly relations between Devas and Asuras. Once there was a dancing show in Devaloka. Maya was also invited to see the performance of the women of Devaloka. All the dancers acquitted themselves creditably. But what attracted Maya most, was the dance of Hemā, the Apsarā woman. Maya and Hemā were mutually attracted and fell in love with each other. The Devas who came to know of this, gave Hemā in marriage to Maya. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa.)

2) Domestic life. Maya and Hemā went to the valley south of Himāvān and built there a city named "Hema-pura." While leading a happy life there, two sons, Māyāvī and Duddhubhi were born to them. But they had no daughter. So they worshipped Śiva, praying for a daughter.

At about that time, one day, an Apsarā woman, Madhurā, after observing Somavāra Vrata, came to Śiva and did obeisance to him. Pārvatī was not at home at the moment. Fascinated by Madhurā's charm, Śiva embraced her. Pārvatī who came to know of it, cursed Madhurā and turned her into a frog. But she said that after twelve years, the cursed would be lifted and she would become a woman again. It was in a well near the place where Maya and Hemā were performing tapas that Madhurā fell as frog. After twelve years, the frog recovered her former shape as a woman. At that time Maya saw her, and taking her to be the daughter given to him by Siva, took her with him to his palace. He gave her the name “Mandodari”. It was this “Mandodari” whom Rāvana married later.

Besides these three children, Maya had some other sons and daughters. In Devī Bhāgavatī, 8th Skandha there is a reference to the Dānava named Bala, the son of Maya, living in Atala, a section of Pātalā. In Kathā saritāgara, Madanamaṇicipāolkālambaka, 3rd Taranāga we find that Maya had two daughters named Svayardprabāḥ and Somaprabāḥ. Of them, Somaprabāḥ was married by Nalakūbara, the son of Vaiśravaṇa.

3) Alliance with Arjuna and construction of Indraprastha. Once Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna offered Khaṇḍavavana to Agni-deva as a feast. (See under the word “Khaṇḍavadāhā”). While Agni was furiously feeding upon the forests, the human and animal inhabitants in it began to flee from it. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna shot them down with arrows. At that time Maya was hiding himself in the disguise of Taksaka. When the flames of fire approached that place Maya left his shelter and rushed out. Śrī Kṛṣṇa aimed his weapon Cakra at him. Crying aloud with fear, Maya ran to Arjuna praying for protection. Arjuna stopped Agnideva and Śrī Kṛṣṇa and thus saved Maya. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 240).

From that time, Maya became a loyal follower of Arjuna. After Khaṇḍavadāhā, Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were taking rest when Maya approached them with joined palms and asked Arjuna what he should do in return for saving him from the fury of Kṛṣṇa and the blazing fire. Arjuna replied that he expected no return from Maya for saving his life but wanted only his friendship. Maya was not satisfied. He insisted that Arjuna should accept some service from him as a token of his deep gratitude. On hearing this, Śrī Kṛṣṇa suggested that Maya should build a beautiful palace for the Pāṇḍavas. Accordingly he built a magnificent palace for the Pāṇḍavas at the place called Khaṇḍavapraṣṭha. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 1).

4) Maya settled down in Vindhyā. Once Maya sought shelter from Mahāviṣṇu. Viṣṇu offered shelter to Maya and so he built a mansion called “Sudharmā” for all the Devas. It was a building of inexpressible beauty and rare architectural. workmanship. The Asuras who became angry with Maya for his alliance with the Devas made preparations to attack him. Alarmed at it, Maya fled southwards with his family and reached Vindhyā. There he built a lovely mansion and settled down in it. (Kathāsaritāgara, Madanamaṇicipāolkālambaka, 3rd Taranāga).

In Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Kiṣkindhā kānda, 50th sarga also there is a reference to this wonderful mansion which Maya built on the Vindhyā mountain. In their search for Sītā, Hanūmān and the other monkeys reached the Vindhyā mountain. There they combed the forests and caves to find out Sītā. When they came to the peak to the south west of the mountain, they saw a huge dark cave. They entered it and cautiously moved forward. After a long and tedious walk the monkeys were exhausted with hunger and thirst. When they proceeded a little further, they came across a bright place. There they saw a woman sitting alone, dressed in deer skin and barks of trees. She greeted them and in the course of her talk with the monkeys she told them that the cave was made by the magician Maya and that her name was Svayardprabāḥ. Her mother was Meruśāvanī and that she (Svayardprabāḥ) was entrusted with the task guarding the wonderful mansion. Then she gave them fruits and fresh water.

5) Building of Tripuras. It was Maya who built three magic dwellings for the three Dānavas, Kamalākā, Tārakākā and Vidyumālī. (For details see under the word Pura).

6) Other details.

(i) Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 41 says that Namuci the Dānava was the broth-r of Maya.

(ii) Maya had two sons named Sunītha and Sudanādika. They became human beings under a curse. (For details see under the word Sūryaprabāḥ).

(iii) In Kathāsaritāgara Madanamaṇicipāolkālambaka, 8th Taranāga we see that Maya was an incarnation of Viṣvakarmā.

(iv) At the time when Mahāviṣṇu as Vāmana took the three worlds from Mahābali, Maya joined with other Dānavas and fought against Vāmana. (M.B. Bhaviṣya Parva, Chapter 55).

(v) Once Maya was relaxing with his friends on the Malaya mountain. Knowing about it Mahēśvara sent Indra to that mountain. Indra challenged the Dānavas for a fight. In the battle that followed, Indra killed the Dānava named Pāka. Thus he got the name, “Pākaśāsana”. Indra killed Pura, the son of Mahābali also in that battle and so came to be known as “Purandara”. The remaining Dānavas under the leadership of Maya fled to Pātalā. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 71).

MAYĀ

1) General information. A consort of Mahāviṣṇu, Mayā has got a very prominent place in Hindu Purāṇas. The Purāṇa state that this whole universe is unreal, illusory and if we feel it real it is because of the working of this Mayā.

2) Birth. How was Mayā born? Agni Purāṇa in its twentieth chapter gives a genealogy of Mayā. Hirnā (injury) is the wife of Adharma (evil). They got two children named Anūta (falsehood) and Nikṛtī (wickedness). From them were born Bhaya (fear), Naraka (hell) Mayā (illusion) and Vedanā (pain). Mayā in turn gave birth to Death, the destroyer of all pain produced from Hate or Misery. Mrtyu (death) produced Vyaḍhi (disease), Jāra (rugeosity), Soka (sorrow), Trāṇā (desire) and Krodha (anger).

3) Exhibition of Mayā. Mahāviṣṇu once told Nārada thus: “There is nothing like living beings on earth. All is an illusion due to Mayā.” Nārada requested Mahāviṣṇu to show him that and Viṣṇu took Nārada to the banks of a river and exhibited the wonderful working of Mayā. (For details see under Tāladvajā I).

4) How Gāthi, a brahmin, saw Mayā. In the country of Kosala there was once a brahmin named Gāthi. He went to the forests and standing there in water in a pond, immersed up to his neck, started doing penance. For eight months he did penance thus and then Mahāviṣṇu appeared before him and asked him what boon he wanted. The brahmin said he wanted to see Māyā-devī. Viṣṇu granted the boon and disappeared.

Several years passed after that and nothing happened. One day the brahmin as usual went to bathe in a pond. When he took a dip in the waters he forgot all his prayers and mantras. There was a change of mind. He felt he was lying dead in his house. Relatives were sitting around weeping. His wife was in tears and was holding his legs. In an atmosphere of mourning, his own people weeping bitterly carried his body to a frightening burial ground and put it on a funeral pyre. It was burnt to ashes. He then felt himself in the womb of a Cāṇḍāla woman living in a village near Hūnāmaṇḍala. The foetus developed and a black boy was born. The boy grew passing the stages of infancy, childhood and boyhood and became a man, black and stout. He started enjoying sexual life with a beautiful Cāṇḍāla girl. The amorous plays were done on leaf-beds, in creeper-huts, bushes and in caves and soon many evil-natured sons were born to him. Gradually his health faded and he constructed a hermitage and lived there as a hermit. His children grew up and he became old and then all on a sudden all his children died and he was left alone. He then left the place and travelling much reached the capital city of Kīrāmaṇḍala. The city gates were decorated and inside people stood in groups. The road to the palace from the gate had been beautified and as he reached the palace gates he saw an elephant as big and black as mountain standing there well caparisoned. It was customary in those days to post an elephant well bedecked before the palace gates when a King died. The elephant he saw was one who had been let loose to select a new King in the place of the one who had just died. The elephant on seeing him took him by its trunk and placed him on its back. The people when they saw it shouted “The King”, “The King”. Drums were beaten and people shouted with joy. He was taken to the palace where he was received by young and beautiful girls. He was dressed in royal robes and he took over the administration of the state. Gradually he accepted as his wives the wives of the former King and lived there accepting the name of Gālava. He ruled the state to the satisfaction of all for eight years. One day the King went out for a stroll dressed as an ordinary man. Just outside the gate of the palace a set of Cāṇḍālas were sitting singing songs to the accompaniment of a violin. As soon as they saw Gālava one of the Cāṇḍālas, a red-eyed old man, got up from the group and addressing the King as “Hi, Kalaṇju!” shouted loudly, “Friend, where had you been all this time? It is a long time since we saw you. It is our luck we saw you at least now”. The King of Kīra did not like the words of the Cāṇḍāla and he rebuked the old man. The queens and others standing on the terrace of the palace could see this scene. They were shocked. They regretted they had all along been serving a Cāṇḍāla.

The news spread like wild fire in the state. The King had to live in the palace without the help and co-operation of anybody inside or outside the palace.

People wanted to atone for the crime they had committed in installing a Cāṇḍāla as their King. They made small fire-pits throughout the country and started committing suicide by jumping into it. The King lamented that such a mass suicide was due to him and he also made a fire-pit and jumped into it.

The heat of the fire-pit woke him from his day-dream and Gāthī found himself in the pond where he had come to bathe. “What! Who am I? What all roles did I take just now?” These puzzling thoughts filled him and he went back to the āśrama and started life as usual. One day an old friend of his came to the āśrama and after the daily routine they lay down to sleep. During their conversation Gāthī asked his friend why he had become fleshless and so lean. Then his friend narrated a story exactly similar to the experiences which Gāthī had in the country of Kīra. He added that to atone for the sin of his association with the Cāṇḍālas he was conducting Prayāgaśaṅkha (bath in Prayāga), Japa and Cāṇḍāvanaṁahāvṛata. All those things he explained, made him lean.

Gāthī knew that the story of the guest related to him and he was eager to visit the country of Kīra. When he went to Kīra he saw everything there in the same way as in his dream. Then he realised that it was an exhibition by Viṣṇu of the working of Māyā. Gāthī then renounced everything and went into a cave and started doing penance there. After some years Mahā Viṣṇu appeared before him and blessed him. (Jīrānaviśiśtha).

MĀYĀDARSĀNAPARVA. A subdivision of Adī Parva, in Mahābhārata. Chapters 227 to 233 of Adī Parva, are included.

MĀYĀDHARA. An asura. Indra got down Pururavas to fight against this demon who was always giving trouble to the devas. Pururavas killed Māyādhara in a battle. The day the demon was killed Indra gave a banquet in honour of Pururavas. After the banquet there was a dance performance by Rambha and as she was dancing before Ācārya Tumburu, Pururavas openly criticised Rambha for the mistake in dancing she committed then. Tumburu did not relish it and he cursed Pururavas saying that Pururavas would bear a separation from his wife Urvaśī. It was because of this curse that Urvaśī was once carried away from the palace of Pururavas by the Gandharvas. (Kathāsaritsagara, Tarāṅga 3, Lāvāṇakalamba).

MĀYĀMRGA. Mārica, uncle of Rāvana, took the form of a beautiful deer to tempt Śītā and went to the āśrama where Śītā was staying. This deer is called Māyāmrga. (See under MĀRICA).

MĀYĀPURĪ. A city of the asuras. (See under Kraunṣa).

MĀYĀSĪTĀ. When Rāma and Lakṣmana were in exile in the forests with Śītā, Rāvaṇa came to carry away Śītā. At that time the real Śītā disappeared in Agni and in her place a false Śītā was installed. It was this phantom Śītā who was carried away by Rāvaṇa and who lived in Latikā till the time of Rāvaṇa’s death. It was this Māyāsītā whom Rāma asked to jump into the fire to test her purity. At that time Māyāsītā disappeared and the real Śītā came out from the fire. (See under ŚĪTĀ).

MĀYĀŚIVA. Padma Purāṇa gives a story of how once an asura named Jalandhara approached Pārvatī as Siva to induce her to surrender to his desires. This Siva was called Māyāśiva.

A great battle between the devas and asuras was going on. The asuras were winning and the devas got frightened at the strength of the asuras and so Siva himself entered the battlefield. Jalandhara who led the army of the asuras found the fight against Śiva very tough and smelt defeat. He decided to cheat Pārvati, the consort of Śiva, to compensate for his defeat in the battle-field and so making an asura named Sumbha as the chief, he left for Kailāsa. Sumbha became a māyā Jalandhara and continued the fight.

Taking another asura named Durvāraṇa, Jalandhara went to a cave in Kailāsa and there changed himself into an exact replica of Śiva. He made Durvāraṇa look like Nandikeśa.

Then they went to the top of the mountain where Pārvati and her companions were staying. Śiva approached Pārvati on the shoulders of Nandikeśa and challenged her to a fight. Pārvati seeing Śiva thus, with tears rolling down her cheeks asked him, "Oh, Lord of the gods what happened to your lordship? Who defeated you in the battle? Why do you weep like a low-bred man?" Māyasīva took from his body all his ornaments like Vāsuki and gave them to the companions of Pārvati. When Pārvati saw the heads of Gaṇapati and Subrahmaṇya in the hands of her husband she cried in bitterness. Śiva told her that all his pārśadas like Mañjñhadrā, Virabhadrā, Puṣpadanta, Damana, Dhūmatāmra and Kūśmāṅḍa were killed in the battle. Cāṇḍī, Bhrigī, Kīrīṭi, Mahākāla, Śrīkhali, Cāṇḍīśa and Gupṭanetra were all killed.

Māyasīva told her that he had picked up the heads of Gaṇapati and Subrahmaṇya found lying in the battle-field. He requested Pārvati to console him by embracing him. Pārvati resented the request. She said, "What you say is unfit for the situation. Sexual enjoyment is forbidden in times of misery, fear, meditation, vomiting, fever, performing offering to the manes, journey, royal visits, marriage festivities and in the presence of elders and teachers. Why do you make this request to me when I am mourning the death of my sons?"

Pretending to be grief-stricken Māyasīva said "She who does not give sexual pleasure to a man in distress would go to hell. I have no pārśadas now. I have lost my sons also. I lost my house. Now you also hate me. I am going to my cave. Let me end my life there. Come on, Nandikeśa, Vajra, we will go.

Hearing this Pārvati went near him.

At this time there happened a few bad omens in the ocean of milk where Viṣṇu was residing, and calling Gaṇuḍa to his side Viṣṇu asked him to go and enquire about the battle that was going on between the devas and asuras. To prevent him from being deceived by the magic of the asuras Viṣṇu dropped into the mouth of Gaṇuḍa a pill of great potency. Gaṇuḍa reached the battle-field very soon but could not find anything out of the way and so flew to Kailāsa. He did not see Pārvati first but hearing a noise from somewhere else peeped in and saw Māyasīva. Gaṇuḍa could understand him because of the power of the pill and so flew swiftly back to Mahāviṣṇu and told him what he saw.

Mahāviṣṇu knew that Pārvati had been deceived by Jalandhara. So he decided to cheat Vṛndā, wife of Jalandhara. Mahāviṣṇu filled with amorous desires, avoiding Mahālakṣṇī, covering his head with a yellow scarf and taking the figure of another person by his yogic powers stepped out of his abode and anointed his company. He went to Durgākānana the abode of Vṛndā. They constructed an āśrama there and the wild animals like the lion, tiger, boar, bear and monkey became their disciples taking human form. Then Viṣṇu created mental agony in Vṛndā to attract her to his āśrama. Vṛndā started getting hot and her maids fanned her continuously and anointed her with sandal-wood paste. She thought of her husband in the battle-field and often fainted. She had a very bad dream. She saw her husband Jalandhara lying wounded on his head, ears and nose, with his body smeared with ashes and his eyes pecked by vultures. She saw Kāli, with her hair lying lose, her face reddened with blood, with a skull in her hand dancing before the body of her husband before starting to eat it. At this moment she was awakened by the music of the Māgadhās and loud chanting of family praises by Kimpurūṣas. She at once stopped the music and prayers and paid them off. Then she sent word for pandits to explain the dream she saw.

The Pandits said "Devi, this appears to be a dream giving unimaginable fear. To calm the fear give as gifts to brahmīns, diamonds, garments, cows and elephants." Then the brahmīn pandits sprinkled on her, water made potent by mantras. There was no waning of the fever. Dismissing the pandits, queen Vṛndā went and sat alone upstairs. She felt the whole palace burning and by the craft employed by Viṣṇu she found living inside the palace unbearable.

She got out of the palace and boarding a chariot drawn by mares she went to her play-garden. The sight of the garden filled with beautiful flowers and celestial maidens where no one else but pleasing breeze could enter made her remember her husband. She then brooded on how to find out Jalandhara, and there also she did not get peace of mind. So she accompanied by her maids started for another garden. That garden gave a ghastly sight with huge trees standing crowded interspersed with black rocks and the place resounding with the roars of lions and tigers. Vṛndā got frightened and she hastened to say "Smarakūṭa, I feel frightened. Please drive back the chariot home."

Hearing this Smarakūṭa said, "Oh, Devī, I do not know the place. I do not understand the directions also. To which direction am I to drive? The horses look tired. There is no way here. Anyhow let it go as directed by God. If we stay here we will be eaten by man-eaters." So saying the maid drove the chariot and soon they reached a forest more grisly than the former. It was a forest where great yogins lived. There was no light there neither water nor wind. No sound came. Even the sounds of the bells on the horses and the chariot stopped. Vṛndā moaned, "Where are we to go now, maid! There is no peace of mind for me anywhere in this world."

Smarakūṭa looking ahead cried, "Look Devī, there is a great black mountain in front of us. The horses refuse to move, for they are afraid of it."

Cold with fear the queen stood up from the chariot and keeping her hands on the pearl necklace on her breast jumped out of the chariot. Then a very fierce demon came towards them. He was yellow in colour with three legs, five hands, seven eyes and ears like a tiger's and the shoulders and chin like those of a lion. It was a horrible sight and Vṛndā hid her eyes with her hands and trembled like a plantain leaf. The maid jumping out of the chariot cried aloud "Oh, my queen, help me. This demon is going to eat me." The demon approaching them took the chariot with the horses and whirled it round in the air. Both the queen and the maid fainted at this exhibition of strength. The demon ate all the horses and then catching hold of the hands of the queen he roared, "If you want your life make me your husband. Your husband has been killed by Siva in the battle. If you join me you can live for years together without fear. Come on, drink this sweet liquor with flesh". Vrnda became half dead when she heard that.

At that time Mahavishnu in the guise of an ascetic wearing barks of trees and matted hair appeared before them. An angered look form Vishnu sent the demon away from the place. Vrnda took refuge in the ascetic and the false ascetic said, "I am Devasarmâ, son of Bharadvâja. Renouncing all worldly pleasures I have come here to do penance and if it pleases you, you can come and stay in my Ashrama and do penance. We can go to another forest far away from here." As soon as they reached the Ashrama Mahavishnu appeared before her in the figure of Jalandhara. They embraced each other and lived there joyfully for many days. One day at the end of a sexual act Vrnda saw instead of Jalandhara the ascetic in embrace with her. She was shocked and stood up separated from him. Then Mahavishnu said "Vrnda, I am Visnu husband of Laksmi. Your husband has gone to conquer Siva and get Parvati for himself. I am Siva also. We appear separate. Your husband Jalandhara has been killed in the battle. Join with me."

Vrnda got angry. She cursed Vishnu; she said, "You cheated me by pretending to be an ascetic. Let your wife also be once cheated by a false ascetic." The cursed Vishnu disappeared and Vrnda started penance. Many Gandharva ladies came with temptations to dissuade Vrnda from continuing the penance. But all such attempts failed and Vrnda ended her life doing penance. The nymphs showered flowers on her from above and the dead body of Vrnda was cremated by Smaraduthi and Smaraduti jumped into the funeral pyre of Vrnda and gave away her life. The nymphs made an image of her with the ashes from the funeral pyre and floated it on the river Ganga.

Parvati did not consent to having any sexual enjoyment with Maya and she escaped from the place and went to Akashaganga and started doing penance there. One day Parvati called her maid Jayâ to her side and said "Jayâ you go in my dress to Siva and find out whether he is really Siva or not. If he kisses you and embraces you he will surely be a dana in disguise by his Maya. But if he asks you about my welfare he will be real Siva. Go and tell me what happens."

Jayâ went to Maya. Jalandhara when he saw her mistook her for Parvati and caught hold of her and immediately semen flowed out from him. Jayâ returned and told Parvati that it was Jalandhara and not Siva. Parvati afraid of Jalandhara hid in a lotus and her companions became beetles sitting on the lotus. In the meantime the guards of the palace finding the queen absent from the palace reported the matter to Sumbha fighting against Siva. He sent Gajadamanjas to Jalandhara to inform him of the situation. Jalandhara came back to the battle-field running and took up the fight against Siva again.

MAYASURA. An asura. He had a daughter named Somaprabha. (Kathasaritsagara).

MAYAVASIITHA. There was once a King called Mitrasaha among the Kings of the Solar dynasty who ruled Ayodhya. One day while he was hunting he saw two demons roaming about as tigers and Mitrasaha killed one of them. The other demon waited for an opportunity to wreak vengeance and an opportunity presented itself. Mitrasaha was conducting an Asvamedha yaga to which Vasiṣṭha was the chief priest. The demon went to the King as Vasiṣṭha and privately told him that he desired to eat meat and the King accordingly prepared meat which was greatly relented by the real Vasiṣṭha and the sage cursed Mitrasaha to become a demon. The false Vasiṣṭha who played the trick on the King is called Māyavāsiśṭha. (See for details under Kalmāsapāda).

MAYAVATI. An incarnation of Ratidēvi. An asura named Sambha made her his wife. But Pradyumna, son of Kṛṣṇa, carried her away to Dwārakā. (See under Pradyumna).

MAYAVI. An asura.

1) Birth. Māyāvi was born to the great architect of the Dānavas, Maya, of his wife Hemā, a nympn. Maya fell in love with Hemā when he once found her dancing in Devaloka and the devas coming to know of it gave her in marriage to Maya. Maya took Hemā to the southern side of the Himālayas and constructing a city there called Hemapura stayed there happily. They got two sons named Māyāvi and Dundubhi. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

2) Death. Valorous Māyāvi fought against anybody and everybody. He once challenged Bāli to a fight. But the mighty blows of Bāli were unbearable to him and the defeated Māyāvi ran away from Bāli and hid himself in a big cave. Bāli followed him and when he reached the mouth of the cave he posted his brother Sugriva there with instructions to shut tight the opening of the cave in case he died in the cave in the fight. He said that if blood flowed from the cave the dead person was Māyāvi and if milk flowed from the cave the dead person was himself. In the cave a great fight ensued in which Māyāvi was killed. But Māyāvi by his powers of magic made the blood that flowed out look like milk for Sugriva and the latter thinking that it was his brother who was killed shut tight the mouth of the cave and went his way. (Sarga 9, Kiśkindhā Kanda, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa and Pūrva Kanda, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

MAYIL (PEACOCK). In Uttara Rāmāyaṇa there is a story about how the peacock got its beauty. Mayil in Malayalam means peacock. Once Rāvana set out in his Puspakam Vimâna with his army of Rākṣasas, determined to gain victory over all Kings. They got down on the mountain called Uśfravira. Rāvana examined the valley to see whether there were any Kings doing tapas anywhere there. A King named Marutta was performing a yāga called "Maheśvara" in an Ashrama. Indra and other gods were also present to receive the share of offerings (Havirbhāga). At the sight of Rāvana, the gods took different disguises and fled in panic. At that time Indra assumed the form of a big peacock. As soon as Rāvana left the place, the gods reassembled there. From that time, Indra who put on the disguise of a peacock felt a special attachment to that bird. He called the peacock and said:—"Till now you were blue in colour. But from today onwards, your feathers will have various colours. All my thousand eyes
I transfer to you. Besides, you will be immune from all diseases. Whoever kills you, will meet with death, soon after. You will dance at the commencement of the rainy season. People will greet you with enthusiasm."

It is because of Indra’s blessing that Peacocks are so beautiful in appearance and dance at the onset of the rainy season.

MAYŪRA. An aura who fought against Subrahmaṇya. Skanda Purāṇa, Viramahendrā Kāṇḍa describes the terrible battle between Mayūra and Subrahmaṇya. Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 63 says that after death, Mayūra was reborn in the world as a King named Viśva.

MAYŪRADHVAJA. A King of Ramanagāra. After performing seven Āśvamedha yāgas this King started another Āśvamedha in the Narmadā river valley. The task of protecting the sacrificial horse was undertaken by the King’s son Sucitra or Tāmradhvaja. He set out for the conquest of the world with the chief minister Bahudhvaja. On his return, he came across Yudhiṣṭhīra’s Āśvamedha horse at the city of Malīpur. The heroic Sucitra encountered Śri Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna who were leading the horse. After making them unconscious, he entered the city with the sacrificial horse.

When they recovered their senses, Śri Kṛṣṇa disguised himself as a Brāhmaṇa and Arjuna as a Brāhmaṇa boy and they went to Mayūrādhvaja’s palace. The King welcomed them respectfully. Śri Kṛṣṇa, in his disguise as Brāhmaṇa told the King that he was coming from Dharmapuri to meet the King’s priest, Kṛṣṇa who was to officiate at the marriage of his (Brāhmaṇa’s) son. He added that unfortunately on his way through a forest a lion caught hold of his son. Although he prayed to Lord Narasiṃha, the boy could not be rescued. The lion told him that he would release his son, if the Brāhmaṇa persuaded Mayūrādhvaja to offer one half of his body as food to the lion.

On hearing the Brāhmaṇa’s story, Mayūrādhvaja agreed to give half of his body to the lion. Just then his queen Kumudvati appeared before them and said, “I am the left half (Vāmabhāga) of the King. You may take me and offer me as food for the lion.” But the Brāhmaṇa replied that the lion wanted the right half of the King’s body.

When the King heard this, he readily agreed to give the right half of his own body. Accordingly, they started cutting his body into two halves. Just then, seeing tears coming down from Mayūrādhvaja’s left eye, the Brāhmaṇa said:—“I find that you are in great sorrow; I do not wish to accept a gift which is not given wholeheartedly.” Mayūrādhvaja explained that his tears were not caused by pain or sorrow. His left side was disappointed in not being able to be of as much service as the right side. When Śri Kṛṣṇa heard these words of the King, he resumed his own shape and embraced him and blessed him. After that Mayūrādhvaja completed his yāga and started with Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna, taking Yudhiṣṭhīra’s sacrificial horse with them. (Jaimini; Āśvamedha: 41-46).

MEDA. A serpent of the clan of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 11, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

MEDHĀ. One of the twenty-four daughters born to Dakṣāprajāpati of his wife Prasūti. Of these, thirteen daughters including Medhā were married by Dharmadeva. (Chapter 7, Viśu Purāṇa).

MEDHĀTITHI I. Grandson of Svāyambhuva Manu. Svāyambhuva Manu had two sons named Priyavarta and Utānpāda. Of these Priyavarta married Sarūpā and Barhiṣmati, daughters of Viśvakarmaprajāpati. Medhātithi was the son born to Priyavarta of Sarūpā. Agnīdhra, and others were the brothers of Medhātithi. Medhātithi became the King of Plāksadvīpa after the death of Priyavarta. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Medhātithi got seven sons named Sāntahaya, Śīrā, Suhkodaya, Ananda, Śīva, Kṣemaka and Dhruva. They all became Kings of Plāksadvīpa. The countries they ruled were named after them as Sāntahayavāra, Śīrāvāra, Suhkodayavarṣa, Anandavarṣa, Śīvarṣa, Kṣemakarṣa and Dhruvarṣa. There are seven mountains showing the boundaries of these states and they are called Comeda, Cândra, Nārada, Dandubhi, Somaka, Sumana and Vaibhāra. In these beautiful countries and grand mountains live a great many Devas, Gandharvas and virtuous men. (Chapter 4, Arīśa 2, Viśu Purāṇa).

MEDHĀTITHI II. A Rajārṣi of the Pūrū dynasty.

This Medhātithi got two sons named Dusyanta and Pravīrā. It was this Dusyanta who married Śakuntalā. (Chapter 278, Agni Purāṇa).

Medhātithi was a celebrated sage of Bharata. The maharṣi referred to in Śūktā 12, Anuvākā 4, Manḍala 1 of Rgyveda is Medhātithi son of Kaṇḍa. Once Indra coming in the form of a goat drank the soma of Medhātithi and the latter called him ‘goat’ (Meṣa) and thenceforth Indra got the name Meṣa. (Śūktā 51, Anuvākā 10, Manḍala 1, Rgyveda).

We get the following details about Medhātithi from the Mahābhārata.

(1) He was a King in the court of Indra.
(2) Medhātithi had a son named Kaṇvaṃuni who was popular on the east coast of Bharata. (Śloka 23, Chapter 107, Sānti Parva).
(3) Medhātithi observed Vānaprastha and attained Svarga. (Śloka 7, Chapter 336, Sānti Parva).
(4) Medhātithi was considered to be a sage deserving worship and when he went to see Bhiṣma once Dharmaputra received him with respect and worshipped him. (Śloka 3, Chapter 26, Anuśāsana Parva).

MEDHĀTITHI III. A river. This river is the place of birth of Agni. (Śloka 23, Chapter 222, Vaṇa Parva).

MEDHĀTITHI IV. A sage who was the father of Arundhati, wife of Vasiṣṭha. This Medhātithi who was living in an āśrama on the banks of the river Candrabhāga performed a Jyotiṣṭoma yajña. (Kālikā Purāṇa).

MEDHĀVĪ I.

1) General information. A fierce sage. His father was a sage known as Bāladhi. For a very long time Bāladhi had no children and so, griefstricken, Bāladhi did penance and Medhāvī was born as a result of his penance. Even from boyhood the child showed wonderful powers of grasping things and so he was named Medhāvī. (Chapter 135, Vaṇa Parva).
2) How Medhavī cursed a nymph. One day in spring, Mañjughoṣa (Śucismitā), a nymph, was playing with other companions in the Caitrārathodyāna. Medhavī was doing penance in a place nearby and Mañjughoṣa fell in love with the sage and she went near him and made love to him by dance and music. Medhavī was attracted by her and the sage accepted her advances and lived with her for a long time. One day Mañjughoṣa sought permission to go to Devaloka. “Wait till daybreak” said the sage. When it was morning the nymph renewed her request and the sage said “Wait till I finish my evening prayers.” Hearing this Śucismitā said “Oh, best of brahmins, how many mornings and evenings have gone by this time! Fifty-five years nine months and three days have gone by since we started living together”. The sage then counted the years and found she was correct. The astounding fact that his penance had such a long break made the sage angry and he cursed her and made her into an evil spirit. She begged for pardon and the sage said “If you observe with fasting the Caitrārakṣaikāḍāśī called Pāpmocini it will absolve you of all sins and give you release from the curse”. (Chapter 48, Part 4, Padma Purāṇa).

3) In Rgveda. The Ādvinīdevas once gave rice to this sage. (Śākta 117, Anuvāka 17, Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

MEDHĀVĪ II. A brahmin boy. This child once gave Tattvopadesā to his father. (The philosophy that the human soul or material world is identical with the supreme spirit pervading the universe). Chapter 377, Sānti Parva).

MEDHYA. A holy place on the west coast. A river flows through this place. This sacred river is believed to be the place of origin of Agni. This is one of the rivers worthy to be remembered every morning and evening. (Chapter 155, Anuāśana Parva).

MEDINTI. A synonym for Earth (Bhūmi). (See under Kaitabha for details).

MEGHĀHĀSA. A son of Rāhu. When he heard that Mahāviṣṇu had cut off the head of his father he went to the banks of the river Gautamī and practised severe penance. As a result of that Rāhu, his father, got a place among the other planets in the sky. (Chapter 142, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

MEGHAKĀRNĀ. A female follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 30, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MEGHAMĀLĀ. A female follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 30, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

MEGHAMĀLĪ I. A demon who fought against Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in the forests. He was one of the captains of the army of the great demon Kharā. The other captains were Śyenagāmi, Prthugriyā, Yajñāśatra, Vihaṅgama, Durjaya, Karavīrākṣa, Parigha, Kālakāmukha, Mahāmāli, Sarpasya and Rudhirāśana. (Sarga 26, Aranya Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

MEGHAMĀLĪ II. One of the two pārṣadas given to Subrahmaṇya by Mahāmeru. The other was Kāñcana. (Śloka 47, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

MEGHANĀDA. Indrajit, son of Rāvana. (Only portions which were left off under the entry Indrajit are given here.

1) Synonyms of Meghanāda. Kāñāna, Rāvani, Māyāvi, Indrajit. The origin of each name is given below:

(i) Kāñāna. Son of a virgin. In olden times, once, the Sea of Milk was churned. From it arose a beautiful maiden called Sulakṣaṇā. She became an attendant of Pārvati and one day while bathing in a pond in the garden she sent Sulakṣaṇā to fetch some clothes for her. Sīva who was then in Pārvati’s chamber alone, lost his control when he saw the beautiful Sulakṣaṇā and had intercourse with her. The maid was perplexed and then Sīva assured her that she would give birth to a child only after her marriage. But when Sulakṣaṇā returned with the dress Pārvati felt suspicious and she cursed her and made her into a frog and pushed it into that same pond. Time passed on. Once Maya performed severe penance to please Sīva to get a daughter and Sīva persuaded Pārvati to release Sulakṣaṇā from the curse and she did so turning her into a beautiful maiden named Mandodari and Sīva gave her to Maya. Rāvaṇa married her and their first son was Kānina.

(ii) Rāvaṇī. Son of Rāvana.

(iii) Meghanāda. (One having the sound of thunder). When he was born he made a sound as loud as thunder and so he was called Meghanāda.

(iv) Māyā. He accepted Sīva as his Guru and learned all the divine arts of magic like Mṛgendarāja, Brahmendrarāja, Sūrya, Mahendrarāja Khagendrarāja, Vāyu, Vaiṣṇava, Agni, Śiva, Agnaśeśara, Parakāṣapraśa, Rūpa and Nāgaśiś Kumarā and Tīrūdhāna. Because he knew all these tricks he was called Māyāvi.

(v) Indrajit. When Rāvaṇa attacked svarga he pushed forward too much and so was caught inside an army of the Devas which surrounded him. When Meghanāda saw it he broke the army circle of the devas and getting in caught Indra as a prisoner and brought him to Lāṅka. Indra was later released by the mediation of Brahmā and the latter gave him the name Indrajit meaning “Conqueror of Indra”.

2) Boons. When Rāvaṇa was conducting his world campaign he performed at Nikumbhā many yāgas and got from Brahmā many boons. Meghanāda acquired powers which had not been possible for mānas, dānavas, vānaras or rākṣasas to acquire. He got a Vīmāna (divine car) which could travel in all directions, backwards and forwards, up or down. He received an armour against which no weapon would be of any use. He possessed a weapon which would be effective against anything. Above all these, he had the power to remain invisible. He could be killed by only one person of his age who had lived for fourteen years dutifully and virtuously without sleep. Only Indrajit knew about this.

In a battle Māyāvi would show many tricks. If one was found ineffective he would use another. He had in his stock over a thousand such tricks all of which he had acquired with very little effort. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

MEGHANĀDA II. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 57, Chapter 44, Śalya Parva).

MEGHAPŪSPA. A horse of divinity drawing the chariot of Śri Kṛṣṇa. (Śloka 27, Chapter 45, Viraṭa Parva).

MEGHASĀNDHI. A prince of ancient Magadhā. Once Meghasandhi fought against Arjuna and was defeated. (Chapter 82, Āśvamedha Parva).

MEGHASĀRMAN. A brahmin who was a great devotee ofŚūrya. When there was a drought in the country during the reign of Santanu this brahmin by his worship of Sūrya brought rains to the country. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, Pratīṣṭārgaśanīhitā).

MEGHASVANA. A female follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 8, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MEGHAṆĀHANA. A King. He was a dependant of Jarāsandha. (Śloka 13, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva).

MEGHĀVĀNI. (MEGHĀVĀNī). A female follower of Skandadeva. (Śloka 17, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

MEGHAVĀRI. A character in a story of Paṇcatantra. (See under Paṇcatantra).

MEGHAVARNA. A son of Ghaṭotkaca. Meghavarṇa was also present with Arjuna when he went to protect the sacrificial horse of the Aśvamedha conducted by the Pāṇḍavas.

MEGHĀVĀSA. An asura. This asura sits in the council of Varuṇa and worships him. (Śloka 19, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

MEGHAVEGA. A very brave soldier who fought against the Pāṇḍavas on the Kaurava side. Abhimanyu killed him. (Śloka 15, Chapter 48, Droṇa Parva).

MEKHALA (MEKALa). Mekhala was a country which had attained Purāṇic fame in ancient India. The inhabitants of this place were called Mekhala. They were the bodyguards of Bhīṣma. (Chapter 51, Bhīṣma Parva). They formed a separate division in the army of Bhānnala, King of Kosalā. (Chapter 87, Bhīṣma Parva). Once Karṇa conquered this country. (Śloka 8, Chapter 4, Droṇa Parva). Mekhalas were Śrīkriyās formerly. But they became persons of low caste when they showed jealousy towards the brahmins. (Śloka 17, Chapter 35, Anuśaṇa Parva).

MENĀ I. Wife of Himāvān. Beautiful Menā was the daughter of Mahāmeru. Himāvān lord of the mountains and the seat of many minerals and fossils had two daughters of unparalleled beauty and their mother was the lovely Menā, daughter of Mahāmeru and wife of Himāvān. (Sarga 33, Bīla Kāndā, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

Rāmāyana states that Menā had two daughters of extraordinary beauty named Gaṅgā and Umā. They were both married by Sīva. But Vāmana Purāṇa in chapter 51 states that Menā had three beautiful daughters and a son named Sunābha. Menā's first daughter was Rāgini with red body and eyes and wearing a red dress. Her second daughter named Kūṭilā was white in colour, had lotus eyes, and wore white dress. The third was a girl of enchanting beauty named Kālī. She was blue-black in colour with eyes like the blue lotus leaf. It can be surmised that the Umā of Rāmāyana and Kālī were one and the same person by the following verse in the Aamarakosa.

Umā Kātyāyāṇi Gaurī
Kālī Haimavati-varī //

When the statements of the two Purāṇas are taken together Menā should have had four daughters, Gaṅgā, Rāgini, Kūṭilā and Kālī and a son named Sunābha.

MENĀ II. Daughter of the Ptīrs (Mancs). Ptīrs are of two kinds : Anagnis and Sāgnis. Anagnis are those who do not perform yāgas and those who perform yāgas are called Sāgnis. Anagnis are called Agniśvātta and Sāgnis are called Barhiṣadas. Svadhā was the common wife of all the Ptīrs. Svadhā got two daughters, Menā and Dhārīṇi. They were both very well-learned, virtuous girls and were Brahmavādinīs (expounders of Vedānta philosophy). (Chapter 10, Arṇā 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

MENĀKĀ. A nymph of extraordinary beauty. Taking instructions from Indra, Menākā used to entice many sages and destroy their power of penance. There are innumerable stories of this kind in Purāṇas. Some important events connected with Menākā are given below:

1) Mother of Pramadavarā. Once Menākā became pregnant by a Gandharva named Viṣvāvasu. On the day she delivered she threw the child on the banks of a river and went to Svarga. A sage named Shālukeśa who was doing penance nearby took the babe and brought it up. When she grew up she was named Pramadavarā and Ruru married her. (See under Pramadavarā).

2) Birth of Śakuntalā. When Viṣvāmitra was performing penance in the forests, Menākā, under instructions from Indra, went and enticed Viṣvāmitra and broke the continuity of his penance. A girl was born to Menākā and became later the celebrated Śakuntalā. (See under Śakuntalā).

3) Again with Viṣvāmitra. Once again when Viṣvāmitra was performing penance in Puṣkaratīrtha, Menākā approached him and again Viṣvāmitra fell in love with her and they lived together for ten years. Then one day Viṣvāmitra realised his folly and leaving her went again to the forests for penance.

4) Mankāna was enticed. See under Mankāna.

5) Other details.

(i) When once Durvāsas visited Devaloka it was Menākā who presented him with a flower garland. This incident led to the churning of the milk ocean at a later period. (See under Amṛṭa).

(ii) Menākā was one among the six prominent celestial maidens. Urvaśī, Pārvacitti, Sahajāyani, Menākā, Gūrācā and Viṣvācī are the six. (Śloka 68, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva).

(iii) Menākā attended the Jammotsava of Arjuna and sang on the occasion. (Śloka 64, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

(iv) Menākā was a dancer in the court of Kubera (Śloka 10, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

(v) Menākā once gave a music performance in the court of Indra in honour of Arjuna. (Śloka 29, Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

MENDA (MENDHA). A Sanskrit poet who lived in the 5th century A.D. Among his works only one is known viz. Hayagrīvavadhā (the assassination of Haya-grīva). This book is known by another name "Hasti-pāka".

MEPPATTŪR NĀRĀYANĀ BHĀṬṬATIRI. A Sanskrit poet who lived in Kerala.

1) General information. It is believed that this poet lived during the period from 1560 to 1648 A.D. He was born in the village of Kurumattīr in Malabar district. The illam (house of nambūtiris) which became famous by his birth was a mile to the east of the Bhagavati temple, Candanakkuvā, which itself is situated just two furlongs to the north of the well known Tirunāvāya temple. Meppattūr illam became impoverished and was merged with another illam of name Maravañceri Tekkeṭattu.

Nārāyaṇa Bhāṭṭatirī had a brother named Māṭydatta. He was younger to Nārāyaṇa and his work was to take down the verses which Nārāyaṇa composed. Mcppattur (Nārāyaṇa is more well-known under the name of his illam) studied under different preceptors. His father taught him Mīmāṁsā and such other subjects. He studied Veda under Mahāvārya and Tarka under Dāmodārārya. Aeyuta Piśāroti taught him Vyākaraṇa. The poet became a rheumatic patient in his old age and he stayed in the Guruvāyūr temple worshipping the deity there. His famous work Nārāyaṇiyaṃ was written sitting in the temple of Guruvāyūr and the maṇḍapa (raised dais) where he sat and wrote is even now preserved for pilgrims to see. He took hundred days to write the Nārāyaṇiyaṃ.

MERUBHŪTA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 48, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

MERUDĀNA. Merudānas (gifts of heaps like Meru) are all very effective and productive of good results. The Merus for the dānas are the following:
1) Dhānyamēru. A dhānyamēru or a thousand dronās of dānya (grain) is considered the best; a dāna of half that quantity (i.e. 500) was fair and half of the latter, the worst.
2) Lavānamēru. A dāna of sixteen dronās of lāvāna (salt) is considered to be Uttama (best); with half of that as Madhyama (fair) and with half of the latter as Adhama (worst).
3) Gudamēru. One with ten bharas of guḍa (jaggery) is considered Uttama; with half of that as Madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
4) Svārnamēru. A svārnamēru with a thousand palas of Svārṇa (gold) is considered Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
5) Tilamēru. One with ten dronās of tila (gingelly) is considered Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
6) Kārpāśāmēru. A Meru with twenty bharas of Kārpāśa (cotton) is considered Uttama; with ten as madhyama and with five as adhama.
7) Gṛhtamēru. One with twenty jars of ghṛta (ghee) is Uttama; with ten, madhyama and five, adhama.
8) Rajatamēru. One with ten thousand palas of silver is deemed Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama.
9) Śarkarāmēru. One with eight bharas of sugar is deemed Uttama; with half of that as madhyama and with half of the latter as adhama. (Chapter 210, Agni Purāṇa).

MERUDEVĪ. A daughter of Mahāmeru. The nine daughters of Mahāmeru are: Merudevi, Pratīrūpa, Ugraḍaṇāṅgi, Lātā, Rāmyā, Śyāmā, Nārī, Bhadrā and Devavīthi. They were married to Nābhi, Kimpurūsa, Hari, Hāṝya, Rāmyaka, Hīrgyāma, Kuru, Bhadrāsana and Ketumāla respectively. All these nine Kings were born to a King Agnīdhra of the nymph Pārvacittī. (Paīcama Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MERUMANDARA. A mountain. This supports Mahāmeru. The mountains which support it from the four sides are Mandara, Merumandara, Supārśva and Kumuda. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MERUPRABHĪ. A forest. There were three beautiful forests about the waist of the mountain Latāveṣa, situated to the south of Dvārakapūrī. Meruprabhī is one of them. The other two are Tālāvana and Puspakāvana. (Chapter 26, Sābhā Parva, Dāksīṇātya Pāṭha).

MERUSĀVĀRṆĪ. A Manu. (See under Manvantara). The daughter of this Merusāvārṇī named Svayamprabha was met by Hanumān on his way in search of Sitā. (Sarga 51, Kiṣkindhā kāṇḍā, Vālmīkī Rāmāyana).

MERUVRAJA. A city of ancient India. A demon named Virūpakṣa lived there. (Śloka 19, Chapter 17, Sānti Parva).

MEṢA I. A synonym for Indra. Once Indra taking the shape of a goat went and drank the Soma of the sage Medhātiśī. Then that sage called Indra ‘goat’ (meṣa) and that name of Meṣa stuck to him. (Śūkta 51, Anuvāka 10, Maṇḍala 11, Rgveda).

MEṢA II. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 64, Chapter 43, Śalya Parva).

MEṢAHRṬ. A son of Garuḍa. (Śloka 12, Chapter 101, Śalya Parva).

MĪṢRAKA I. A special tribe of horses. (Dāksīṇātya Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Sābhā Parva).

MĪṢRAKA II. A garden in the city of Dvārakā. The city shines more by this divine garden. (Dāksīṇātya Pāṭha, Chapter 38, Sābhā Parva).

MĪṢRAKA III. A sacred place within the boundaries of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in a holy pond there one would get the benefit of bathing in all the sacred ponds in India. (Śloka 91, Chapter 81, Vana Parva).

MĪṢRAKEŚĪ I. A celestial woman. She was the beautiful daughter born to Pradhā wife of Kaśyapa-prajāpati. Raundryā son of Pāru married Mīṣrakeśī and begot a son named Anvagbhānu and nine sons who were all good archers. When once Arjuna went to Indraloka Mīṣrakeśī gave a dance performance in his honour. (Chapter 65, Ādi Parva and Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

MĪṢRAKEŚĪ II. Wife of King Vatsaka, brother of Vasudeva, (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata, and Chapter 59, Ādi Parva).

MĪṢRĪ. A serpent. This serpent was also among those serpents which came to take away the soul of Balabhadrāma to Pāṭala at the time of his death. (Śloka 15, Chapter 4, Mausala Parva).

MITADHVĀJA. A King of Videha. According to Bhāgavata Mitadhvaja was the son of Dharma-dvāja Janaka.

MĪTHI (MĪTHI JANAKA). Son of King Nimi. The sixth chapter of Devi Bhāgavata gives the following story about the birth of Mithi.
MITHILA

There was once an emperor of great renown in the line of Ikṣvāku named Nimi. He was the twelfth son of the celebrated Ikṣvāku and was devoted to the welfare of his subjects. He was a very honest, virtuous, righteous and good-natured man of a charitable disposition. The agrahāra (village where brahmins reside) named Jayantapurā near the āśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi was constructed by this emperor. This emperor of a Rājasic mind decided to perform a yāga which would take years for its conclusion and in which land was to be given as gifts. He went to his father Ikṣvāku, and took permission from him to conduct the yāga. He made all preparations for the yāga. He invited Bhṛgu, Aṅgiras, Vāmadeva, Pulastya, Pulaha and Rčika all of whom were well-versed in the Vedas and were worthy of being priests in a Yāga of the kind he was conducting. He then went and invited his Kula-guru (family priest and preceptor) Vasiṣṭha for the Yāga. But Vasiṣṭha had to officiate at a Yāga conducted by Indra and so he commanded Nimi to postpone the Yāga by five hundred years. Nimi did not act according to it and he performed the Yāga with the help of the other sages and completed it successfully. After five hundred years when the Yāga of Indra came to a close, Vasiṣṭha came to see Nimi. Nimi was asleep then and the servants in the palace hesitated to go and inform him of the arrival of the sage. Vasiṣṭha got angry and cursed him and made him Videha (without body). At once the body of the King fell to the ground and the soul got out of it. But before the soul separated from the body Nimi cursed Vasiṣṭha also and separated his soul from his body. Vasiṣṭha was again born as the son of Mitrāvārasuṇa. The other sages present there took the lifeless body of Nimi and after sacrificial ceremonies and worship of gods started to churn the body. After some time a mighty and perfect man of great brilliance was born out of it. Because he was born by Mathana (churning) he was named Mithi. Because he was born from his father (Janaka) he was called Mithi-janaka and because he was born of Nimi, a Videha, he was called Videha also. The country which was ruled by Mithi got the name of Mithilā. It is the country of Sītā.

MITHILĀ

1) General information. A celebrated country of ancient Bṛhatā. This is situated on the north-eastern side of Bṛhatā. Its modern name is Tirhut. Mithilā was ruled by the renowned Janaka Kings. Sec under Mithi to know how the country got the name Mithilā.

2) The wealth of Mithilā. Mithilā was the capital of the extensive country of Videha. Successive generations of Janaka ruled the country. Mithilā was noted more for its sāttvic virtues than for the pomp and glory of kings. Everyday on the protruding breasts of an idol of Rājas-a-raja-lakṣmi (embodiment of royal prosperity) bhasma (ashes) and candana (sandalwood paste) would be smeared. In the middle of Tretāyuga Videha was ruled by a Janaka who brought fame and prosperity to the successive generations. A devotee of Śiva and of a sāttvic disposition he was a Nityabrahmacārī (observing celibacy throughout life) and his wife a disciple of Maitreyī and well-versed in Advaitavedānta was a Nīta brāhmacārīngi. Videha grew prosperous with agricultural wealth by hard work put up by the peasants and divine wealth by the virtuous deeds of the King and the people. Agriculture was given importance, so much so that the royal emblem itself was the figure of a plough. Rains were there in season and in plenty because of the yāgas conducted properly by the King. (Bālakāṇḍa, Kambā Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Other details.

(i) Once Pāṇḍu, father of the Pāṇḍavas, attacked this country and conquered it. (Śloka 28, Chapter 112, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna and Bhima once visited this country when they were on their way to Magadhā from Indraprastha. (Śloka 28, Chapter 20, Saṁbhā Parva).

(iii) Karṇa once conquered and captured the country of Mithilā. (Śloka 8, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

(iv) Sītā was born in Mithilā. (Śloka 9, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).

(v) Because she was born in Mithilā she is known by the name of Mithilī. (Śloka 2, Chapter 277, Vana Parva).

(vi) Once Mithilā was ruled by a King called Dharmadhvaja. Hearing about his great Dharmajñāna (knowledge about virtues and duties) a female ascetic named Sūlabhā visited him in the guise of a beggar woman. (Śloka 4, Chapter 320, Sāntī Parva).

(vii) Sūka the great sage, with the permission of his father Vyāsa came to Mithilā and took Dharmopadeśa from King Janaka. (Śloka 6, Chapter 325, Sāntī Parva).

MITHU. A very valorous dānava. Once Bṛhatāra son of Aṛṣiṭeṇa was making preparations for an Aśvamedha on the banks of the river Sarasvati with Upamanyu as his priest when Mithu came and took them both to Pātalā. Then Devāpi, son of Upamanyu, got his father and the King released from there by continuous worship of Śiva (Brahma Purāṇa—127. 56-57).

MITRA. 1) General information. One of the twelve Śūryas. The twelve Śūryas born to Aditi of Kaśyapaprajāpati are Viṣṇu, Śakra, Aryāmā, Dīhatā, Tvaṣṭā, Pūṣi, Vivavān, Savitī, Mitra, Varuṇa, Bhaga and Aiṁśa. (Chapter 15, Aiṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa)

Mitrāvaruṇas are two devataś of great intimacy. They are always found together. If you pray to Mitrāvaruṇas you will get plenty of rains. (Śukta 2, Anuvāka 2, Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

See para 2 under Agastya to understand the story of how Mitrāvaruṇas became the father of Agastya.

2) Other details.

(i) Mitra came and stood in the sky at the time of the birth of Arjuna. (Śloka 66, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Mitra was one among those sent by Indra to fight against Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna at the time of the burning of the forest Khaṇḍaṇva. (Śloka 36, Chapter 226 Ādi Parva).

(iii) Mitra was a member of the Indra sabhā. (Śloka 21, Chapter 7, Saṁbhā Parva).

(iv) He presented two Pārśadas named Suvarata and Śatyasandhā to Subrahmayā. (Śloka 41, Chapter 43, Śalya Parva).

MITRĀ. A female companion of Pārvatī. (Śloka 41, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

MITRABHEDA. See under Pañcatantra.

MITRABHEDA. Brother of Suṣārṇā, King of Trigatīta. Arjuna killed him in the great battle. (Śloka 3, Chapter 27, Karṇa Parva).
MITRADHARMĀ. Son of the Agni called Pāñcajanya, (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

MITRAGHNA. A demon who fought on the side of Rāvana in the Rāma-Rāvana battle. Śrī Rāma killed this demon. (Chapter 34, Verse 27, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

MITRAJña. Son of the Agni named Pāñcajanya. He was one of the five Devasvāmayaśas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

MITRASAKHA (MITRASHA). A King of the Solar dynasty. He was known as Kālmāṣapāda also. (See under Kālmāṣapāda).

MITRASENA. A King who fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. Arjuna killed him. (Sloka 20, Chapter 19, Kārṇa Parva).

MITRAVĀN I. Son of the Agni named Pāñcajanya. He was one of the Pāñcavedavānayaśas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

MITRAVĀN II. An ascetic who lived in the city of Saupura. He acquired complete peace of mind by reading the second Chapter of the Gītā sitting in a Śiva temple. Once a brahmin of name Devasvāmā approached a sage named Muktakarmā seeking advice to obtain peace of mind. The latter directed Devasvāmā to Mitra- vān and Mitra- vān advised him to read the second Chapter of the Gītā. (Padma Purāṇa, Uttara Kāṇḍa, 176).

MITRAVARDHANĀ. Son of the Agni called Pāñcajanya. He was one of the Pāñcavedavānayaśas. (Sloka 12, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

MITRAVARMAN. Brother of Śuṣṭārā, King of Trigarta. Arjuna killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 3, Chapter 27, Kārṇa Parva).

MITRĀVARUNĀ (S). The combined name of two of the Dvādasādītias (twelve Sūryas) Mitra and Varuṇa. These two are always seen together. Agastya and Vasiṣṭha were born as sons of Mitrāvarunā. It was due to a curse by Mitrāvarunās that Uṛvaṣī had to marry King Purūravas, a man of the earth. Manu had no children and he performed a yāga to placate Mitrāvarunās. But since there were many faults in the ceremony a girl was born to him. (For details see under Ilā, Nimi, Uṛvaṣī, Vasiṣṭha and Mitra).

MITRĀVINDA. A deva. The havis (clarified butter which is put in the Agni called Rathanta is intended for this deva. (Sloka 19, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

MITRĀVINDĀ. Daughter of Śrī Kṛṣṇa's father's sister. Mitrāvindā’s mother’s name was Rājādhi-devi. Rājādhi-devi, queen of Avantī, got three children named Vinda, Anuvinda and Mitrāvindā. In the Svaayānivara Mitrāvindā chose Kṛṣṇa as her husband. Vinda and Anuvinda did not like it and joining the Kaurava side fought against Kṛṣṇa. But Kṛṣṇa defeated them all and took Mitrāvindā to Dvārakā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MITREYU. A King of the Lunar dynasty. He was the son of Divodāsa and father of Cyavana.

MLECCHA. A tribe of people of ancient India. This tribe was born from the tail of the celestial cow Nandini, kept by Vasiṣṭha for sacrificial purposes when there was a fight between Visvāmitra and Vasiṣṭha. Mahābhārata gives the following information regarding them.

1. The mlecchas who sprang up from the tail of the celestial cow Nandini sent the army of Visvāmitra flying in terror. (Sloka 38, Chapter 174, Ādi Parva).

2. Bhīmasena defeated the mlecchas living in the coastal regions and took from them several valuable diamonds as tax. (Sloka 25, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

3. The mlecchas living in the coastal area were once defeated by Śahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sloka 66, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).

4. Nakula also once defeated the mlecchas. (Sloka 16, Chapter 32, Sabhā Parva).

5. Bhagadatta was the King of the mlecchas. (Sloka 14, Chapter 51, Sabhā Parva).

6. Bhagadatta accompanied by the mlecchas living on the coast attended the Rājaśya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 14, Chapter 51, Sabhā Parva).

7. Different tribes of mlecchas will be born on earth at the beginning of the era of Pralaya. (Sloka 34, Chapter 168, Vana Parva).

8. Kalkī, the incarnation of Viṣṇu, will destroy the mlecchas who are found everywhere in the world. (Sloka 97 Chapter 190, Vana Parva).

9. Karna during his world campaign conquered many mleccha countries. (Sloka 19, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

10. A place of habitation in Bhārata is called Mleccha. (Sloka 57, Chapter 9, Bhīmaṇa Parva).

11. Aṅga, a mleccha warrior was killed in the battle by Bhīmasena. (Sloka 17, Chapter 26, Droṇa Parva).

12. Once the mlecchas attacked Arjuna with arrows. Arjuna killed the hairy soldiers. (Sloka 43, Chapter 93, Droṇa Parva).

13. Sāyāki killed many mleccha soldiers in the great war. (Sloka 43, Chapter 119, Droṇa Parva).

14. Nakula killed Aṅga, a mleccha King. (Sloka 18, Chapter 22, Kārṇa Parva).

15. Arjuna had to face a great army of mlecchas to protect the Yāgāśa. (Sloka 23, Chapter 73, Aśvamedha Parva).

16. The wealth that remained in the Yāgaśāla of Yudhiṣṭhira after the distribution as gifts to brahmīns was taken away by the mlecchas. (Sloka 26, Chapter 89, Aśvamedha Parva).

17. The mlecchas drove angered elephants on to the army of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sloka 10, Chapter 22, Kārṇa Parva).

MODA I. A demon who was a companion of Hiriṇyākṣa. In the Devaśura battle Vāyu killed him.

MODA II. A serpent born of the clan of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death in the sarpasatra of Janaṃeṣaya. (Sloka 10, Chapter 52, Aṣṭavāśīka Parva).

MODĀGIRI. A country of ancient Bhārata. The King of this country was killed by Bhīmasena. (Sloka 31, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parva).

MODĀKI. A vast area of land in Sākadvipa near the mountain Kesara. (Sloka 26, Chapter 11, Bhīmaṇa Parva).

MODĀPURA. A country of ancient Bhārata. Arjuna defeated the King of this country once. (Sloka 11, Chapter 27, Sabhā parva).

MOHA. A son born of the lustre of Brahmā. (3rd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MOHAKA. Son of Suratha, a devotee of Śrī Rāma. When Suratha blocked the Aśvamedha horse of Śrī Rāma, a fight ensued in which Mohaka also took part (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭāla Kāṇḍa).
MOHANA. An ancient place of habitation in Bhrata. This place was conquered by Karna. (Sloka 10, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

MOHANA. Wife of Sugriva. Mohana helped her husband in bringing water from the Sarayu river to bathe the Asvamedha horse of Sri Rama. (Padma Purana, Patala Khandha).

MOHINI. The female form of Mahavishnu. Devas and Asuras quarreled with each other the right of partaking the Amrata (nectar) obtained from the sea of Milk. At that time Mahavishnu appeared before them in the guise of a beautiful maiden of maddening charm and the asuras were guilefully made to turn their attention on her for some time during which time the nectar was carried away by the Devas. The female form of Mahavishnu was called Mohini.

Siva fell in love with Mohini and by the union of the two was born SastÃ¡. (See under Amrata). (8th Skandha, Bhagavata).

MOKSA I. One of the seven divisions of the island of Paka. The seven divisions are Siva, Yavasa, Subhadra, SÃ«nti, Moksa, Amrata and Abhaya. (5th Skandha, Bhagavata).

MOKSA II. Moksa means liberation and is generally meant to convey the meaning of the deliverance of the soul from recurring births. The Jivatma enshrined in the body has the delusion that it enjoys or suffers happiness or woe. In truth it neither suffers nor enjoys anything. It is detached from all. It is the Supreme Being (Parabrahman). When Jivatma deserts its woes it gets moksa i.e. Jivatma gets merged with Paramatma. When once Jivatma merges with Paramatma, Jivatma is devoid of happiness or woes. It need not be enshrined in any body. A Jivatma getting released from one body joins another new body and thus a Jivatma in succession enters thousands of bodies and each time without knowing the absolute Truth laments over its woes. In the words of a Rsi it is explained thus: "Jivatma, which is bliss in itself living in births after births searches for bliss elsewhere just as a person wearing a golden necklace round his neck searches for the same elsewhere."

The passage of Jivatma from one birth to another and the bodies that enshrine it each time constitutes the worldly life. When once a Jivatma thus involved in Samshara (mundane existence) gets real knowledge, the knowledge that Jivatma and Paramatma are one and the same, then that Jivatma gets final emancipation, liberation from recurring births. It merges with Brahman. This is called Moksa.

MOKSA DPARVA. A sub-divisional Parva of Santi Parva. It contains the chapters 174 to 365 of Santi Parva.

MRGADUMA. A sacred place on the border of Kuruksetra. If one goes there and worships Mahadeva one will get the benefit of conducting an Asvamedhayajna. (Sloka 101, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

MRGAMANDA. A daughter of Kaediva. (See under Mrgas).

MRGANKAKA. A sword. Once Kubera cursed a Yaksa and making him a lion posted it to guard the palace-gates of Mahabali. He said he would be released from the curse when any man on earth defeated it. Once a brahmin warrior named Sraddhata defeated this lion and at once the lion changed into a Yaksa and the Yaksa presented Sraddhata with the sword named Mrgankaka. (Kathapithalambaka, Kathasaritsagara).

MRGANKAVATI. Daughter of an ancient King called Srimbaki. (See under Sraddhata).

MRGAS (DEER). All the animals originated from Kaedivaprajapatii. Kaedivaprajapatii, son of Marici, married the eight daughters of Daksha named Tarmâ etc. From Tarmâ were born birds. KrodhavaÊa gave birth to ten girls named Mrge, Mrgamanda, Hari, Bhadramadâ, MtaRg, Sarduli, Sveta, Surabhi, Surasâ and Kadrú. Mrgas (deer) are the children of Mrge. (Valmiki Ramayana, Aranya Kanda, Sarga 4).

MRGASVAPNODHAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of the Vana Parva of Mahabharata. Chapter 253 of Vana Parva constitutes this Parva.

MRGAVATI. See under Udayana.

MRGAVYADHA. The disguise. Siva took when he went to test the devotion of Parasurama. Parasurama once went to the forests and did penance to please Siva to learn archery from him. Siva in the form of a Mrgavyadha (forest hunter) appeared before Parasurama and tested his sincerity in his penance in several ways. Siva was pleased to find Parasurama's devotion to Siva unwavering and blessed him. He gave instructions in archery and also permitted him to go round the earth. (Chapter 65, Brahmangda Purana).

MRGAVYADHA II. One of the EkDadarudas (eleven Rudras). (Sloka 2, Chapter 66, Adj Parva).

MRGI. The mother of all types of deer. (See under Mrgas).

MRKANDU. Father of the sage Markandeya. (See under Markandeya).

MRTM. See under Pratman.

MRTASANJIVANI. This is a medicinal herb to give life to those who are dead. When in the Rama-Ravana battle Laksmi and others fell dead, Sri Rama wanted Mrtasanjivani to be brought to revive them back to life. Jambavan the oldest among the monkey-warriors then instructed Hanuman to get it from the mountain Mahameru explaining to him the way to reach there. He said: "If you go a hundred yojanas (1200 Kilometres) from here to the north you would reach Ramavara the southernmost point of Bharata. From there if you go to the north another thousand yojanas you would reach Himlayas which is the northern-most point of Bharata. Himavat is thousand yojanas high, two thousand yojanas wide and is long enough to reach the two oceans on the east and the west. On that mountain is the marriage-dais of Pavrati and Parameshvara and you will find places where Paramesvara had sat for practising penances. On the northern side under a big Kuvata tree lies Kamadhenu. This cow gives milk to the sages and tourists who go there.

1 Jivatma=The individual soul enshrined in the human body imparting to it life, motion and sensation as opposed to Paramatma,
Paramatma=The Supreme spirit or Brahman
Samshara=The circuit of life consisting of births and rebirths with sufferings and enjoyments of woes and happiness.
Nine thousand yojanas to the north of this there are two mountains named Hemakūta and Ratnakūta. The centre of that is Ṛṣabhavarsa. On a big Kāraskara tree there will be hanging a king with his face downwards after being cursed by the sage Durvāsas. He will be released from the curse by you. If one eats the fruits of this tree one will be free from greying of hairs and rugosity.

If you go farther north from Hemakūta you will reach the mountain Niṣadha. There is a lake there. If one bathes there one will be granted all prosperity by Lakṣmīdevi. Farther to the north is situated Mahāmeru. The greatness of this mountain is indescribable.

Mahāmeru has got four supporting mountain pillars named Mandara, Merumandara, Supārśva and Kumuda. The abode of the three deities is on the top of this mountain. On a peak in the centre is living Brahmā with his wives Vāni, Gāyatrī and Śāvitrī as creator of the universe. This place is called Satyaloka and to the west of it is Śrī Vaikunṭha the abode of Mahāviṣṇu. Mādevi and Bhūdevi are his two wives. He is the god who protects us all. To the east of Satyaloka is Kailāsa, the abode of Śiva. He lives there with his wives Gaṅgā and Pārvatī and sons Gaṅgā and Subrahmanya. To the south of Satyaloka is the city Śaṅhyamāṇī the abode of Yamadāharma. He lives there with his wife Kālini and sons Viḍava, Mahimā and Dīpaka. To the east of this is the wonderful Devaloka. There lives Indra, his wife Śacidevi and son Jayanta with thirtythree crores of Devas. Celestial nymphs like Urvāṣī, Rambhā and Tīlottamā live there. Kāmadhenu, the Kalpa tree, Airāvata, Uccāśīrasvas, and Cintāmani are all there. You will find Amarāvatī, the capital of Indra and Sudhārma his court there.

On the northern side of Meru is a tall Aśvattha tree. To the north of that is the Nīla-mahāgiri (the great blue mountain). Kaśyapa has installed a deity named Śvetavarāhāmūrti there. Beyond that is the Ṛṣabhādri (ox-shaped mountain). It is believed that a divine ox became a mountain there. Its two horns are like two peaks. This mountain contains many divine medicines of which Śaṅhyarāja, Viśālaya, Saṅdhāna, and Mṛtasaṅjhīvanī are the most important.

Once the asuras defeated the Devas. Then Paramesvara and Mahāviṣṇu gave the Devas these four medicinal herbs. They planted them here and watered them from the Milk-sea. Around these precious plants stand guard the pārśadas of Śiva and the Discus Sudarśana of Viṣṇu. (Yuddha Kaṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

There is another statement in the Mahābhārata that Śaṅjīvanī is an art, the use of a mantra. Śukrācārya by this art brought to life all the asuras killed in a war with the devas. (Śloka 8, Chapter 76, Ādi Parva).

Again Śukrācārya brought to life three times his disciple Kaca whom the asuras killed three times. Śukrācārya taught the art to Kaca. (Śloka 28, Chapter 76, Ādi Parva).

MṛTTIKĀVATI. A place of habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 10, Chapter 254, Vana Parva).

MṛTYU. The goddess of Death. Agni Puruṣa gives details about the birth of Death. Hirnā was the wife of Adharma. They got a son named Anṛta and a daughter named Nikṛti. From them were born Bhaya, Naraka, Māyā and Vedanā. Of these Māyā gave birth to Mṛtyu, the destroyer of matter.

Mṛtyu has been described both as a god and goddess in Mahābhārata. The statements regarding Mṛtyu as a deva are as follows —

(i) Three sons were born to Nikṛti, wife of Adharma. One of them was Mṛtyu. Mṛtyudeva has neither wife nor children because he is the destroyer of all. (Śloka 54, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Once the son of an old Gātami was bitten by a snake. A hunter seeing it rushed to kill the serpent but Gātami objected to it. She advised him that it was a sin to injure any living being. The serpent then said, “It is not my fault that I bit the boy. I was persuaded by the god of death to do so.” The god of death Mṛtyudeva also appeared there then. He confirmed the snake’s statement and added that God had programmed all events beforehand and the boy’s death was not due to any mistake on anybody’s part. (Śloka 50, Chapter 1, Anuśāsana Parva)

(iii) Once Mṛtyu followed the King Sudarśana, but Mṛtyudeva had to withdraw after accepting defeat because the King had been living a virtuous life of high standard. (See under Sudarśana.)

The statements regarding Mṛtyu as a goddess are the following:

1) This devatā was born from the body of Brahmā in the shape of a woman. (Śloka 17, Chapter 53, Drona Parva).

2) Brahmā gave the work of destruction to Mṛtyu. When she got that work she wept aloud. (Śloka 21, Chapter 257, Sānti Parva).

3) The goddess of Mṛtyu once did severe penance. (Śloka 17, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).

4) Brahmā assured the goddess of death that any destruction by her would not be deemed as a sin. (Śloka 44, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).

5) The terrible strength of Mṛtyudevatā is described in Chapter 819, Sānti Parva, Mahābhārata.

MUCUKUNDA. A celebrated King of the Solar dynasty.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu — Brahmā—Mārici—Kaśyapa — Viivasvan — Vaivasvata Manu—Ikṣvāku—Śaśāda — Puraṇjaya (Kakuttha) — Anenas — Pṛthulāśva — Prasena — Yuvanāva — Māndhātā—Mucukunda. Māndhātā got three sons named Ambariṣa, Mucukunda and Purukutsa and fifty daughters and all the fifty were married to a sage named Saubhāri.

2) How Mucukunda attained salvation. (For the story see para 72, under Indra).

3) Other details.

(i) Mucukunda had a daughter named Candramukhi. She was married to Sobhana, son of Candrasena. Once, when Sobhana came to his wife’s house it was an Ekādaśī day and all were observing fasting and so Sobhana also did so. The next day Sobhana was seen lying dead. The soul of Sobhana went to the valley of the mountain of Mandara and started enjoying heavenly bliss. One day a pilgrim from the country of Mucukinda named Somaśarman met the soul of Sobhana and coming to know that it was the son-in-law of their King he started making enquiries about him. Sobhana then said that all his happiness was MUDGALAIyne. A sage of Purānic fame.

1) Mudgala and Durvāsas. Mudgala had never been provoked even by anger. Durvāsas once came to the āśrama of Mudgala in Kurukṣetra where he was living on alms received by begging. Durvāsas came naked, Mudgala gave all that he had to that day to Durvāsas. The latter ate to his heart’s content and smeared on his naked body what remained after his meal. Mudgala never got angry. This continued for days together and not for once did Mudgala get angry. Durvāsas was immensely pleased with this behaviour of Mudgala and he offered to send him to heaven with his body. Devas came with a Vimāna at once. Mudgala after enquiring about the conveniences and luxuries of heaven refused to go. (Chapter 261, Vana Parva).

2) Other details.

(i) Mudgala, who was well versed in the Vedas, was a priest in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Mudgala visited Bliṣṭa lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 9, Chapter 47, Ādi Parva).

(iii) Once Satādyumna gave Mudgala a golden house. (Śloka 21, Chapter 137, Anuśāsana Parva).

(iv) Once the King of Cola conducted a Yāga making Mudgala the chief priest. (Chapter 130, Part IV, Padma Purāṇa).

MUDGARA PARNĀKA. A serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MUDGARAPITĀDAK. A serpent born to Kadrū of Kaśyapaparājapāti. (Śloka 9, Chapter 33, Ādi Parva).

MUDITĀ. Wife of the Agni named Saha. (Śloka 1, Chapter 222, Vana Parva).

MUDRĀS. When he recites the mantras a Māṇḍrika should use different kinds of gestures with his hands to suit the recital. They are called Mudrās. The Mudrās in general are given below:

The first mudra is called Anjalimudra. Anjali means a cavity formed by folding the hands and joining the open hands together. If the hands thus folded are placed on the breast it becomes a Vāndinī mudrā. The hands should be placed on the breast with a slight slant to the left for Vāndinī mudrā. The third mudra is called Urdhva mudrā. Held the left hand first in such a way that the thumb comes on the top and then with the fingers of the right hand bind the thumb of the left hand. The thumb of the right hand should also come to the top. This is called Urdhva mudrā. The lowering of the left palm opened up is called Varāhā mudrā. (Chapter 26, Agni Purāṇa).

MŪKA I. A serpent born of the family of Takṣa. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 9, Chapter 5, Ādi Parva).

MŪKA II. An asura. This demon once went to Arjuna who was engaged in penance in the forests. He had assumed the form of a boar and Arjuna killed him. At once Śiva appeared there in the guise of a forester and contended that the boar was killed by him. A quarrel ensued which ended in a fight between them. In the end Śiva appeared before Arjuna in his real form and granted him the missile Pāśupata. (See under Arjuna).

MŪKA III. A Candāla devoted much to his parents. A Brāhmaṇa named Narottama went to this candāla to learn moral lessons from him. (Srṣṭikhaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

MUKHAKARNĪ. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 29, Chapter 46, Salya Parva).

MUKHAMANḌIKĀ. One of the evil spirits tormenting infants. This is called Dīti also. (Śloka 30, Chapter 23, Vana Parva).

MUKHARA. A serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 16, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva).

MUKHASECAKA. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 47, Śloka 16).

MUKTĀPHALAKETU. A Vidyādhara youth. The story of this young man who was born to kill Vidyyudhvaja, a fire-brand of an asura, is told thus in Kathāsaritsāgara.

An eminent asura of name Vidyyutprabha performed penance to propitiates Brahmā to get a son. As a result of the blessings of Brahmā he got a son invincible to the Devas. He was named Vidyyudhvaja. Even from boyhood he was very brave and daring. Once when he saw some demons standing guard to protect the asura family he said “At present our country is being protected by the hands of others. I shall, therefore, perform penance and obtain boons to remove Vidyuddhavāja went straight to the forests and performed penance to propitiate Brahmā. When the austerics became severe, Vidyuddhavāja observed fasting without break and the whole world became excited due to anxiety. So Brahmā appeared before him in person and gave him many divine weapons like Brahmāstra. For Brahmāstra the only counter-missile was Paśupatā and so Brahmā warned him that it should be used only when it was found absolutely necessary.

Vidyuddhavāja became arrogant with the possession of such divine weapons and started for Indralokha with his father and his army to conquer Indra. He knew that Indra was ready to face him with a big army headed by Candraketu and Padmaśekhara.

The battle that ensued was very grim. Even Brahmā and Rudra came to see the fight. In a combat with Indra, Vidyutprabha was killed. Vidyuddhavāja saw his father killed, got furious and sent Brahmāstra against Indra who in turn opposed it with Paśupatā. Vidyuddhavāja failed. Devas sounded the trumpets of victory and left the place.

After some time Vidyuddhavāja awoke from the swoon and lamented thus to those of his men who were around:—“My tapoba (strength resulting from penance) was of no use. I have decided to die fighting against Indra. I do not want to return to a country where my father is not alive. On hearing this his aged minister pointed out to him his mistake in having used the Brahmāstra untimely.

Vidyuddhavāja decided to attain more powers and so he went to the base of the Himālayas to perform penance to propitiate Śiva. Pleased at his penance of five thousand years Śiva appeared in person and asked him to name the boon he wanted. Vidyuddhavāja demanded “I must be able to kill Indra in a battle.” Śiva granted him the boon.

Vidyuddhavāja once again attacked Indra with a huge army. In the fierce battle that followed Indra fell down fainting by the weapons of Vidyuddhavāja. At once a voice from the air commanded, “Take away Indra from the battlefield. It is dangerous to keep him there.” Vāyu came and carried him away swiftly. When Indra awoke from fainting he went to Brahmāloka with all the other devas.

Vidyuddhavāja established himself in Amaraśā, the capital city of Indra and lived there enjoying his life as Indra. In the meantime Candraketu, King of the Vidyādhāras was sitting in Vāyu-loka musing thus, “How long should we remain thus displaced from our positions! There is no waning of the power of Vidyuddhavāja. My friend Padmaśekhara, King of Gandharvas, has gone to Śivapura to perform penance. I do not know whether he has been blessed by god. Anyhow I will act after hearing from him.”

As his musings came to an end Padmaśekhara himself appeared before him and said: “I have come to tell you the glad news that Śiva told me. Śiva said “Son, do not grieve. You will get your country back. You will get a son and a daughter. They will be top-ranking men in all activities. The husband of your daughter will kill Vidyuddhavāja.”

A happy Candraketu went to Kaśī with his wife Muktāvalī and started penance. Padmaśekhara went and mentioned to the devas all that had happened. The devas then went to Maḥāviṣṇu and told him of the boons which Vidyuddhavāja had received from Śiva and how he was ruling Indralokha then. After hearing them patiently Viṣṇu said that only Śiva could do anything in that matter. They all then went to the temple of Śiddhiśvara and sat there meditating on Śiva.

In the meantime Bhagavān appeared before Candraketu and blessed him and said he would get a very valorous son who would kill Vidyuddhavāja and restore Devaloka to the devas. But after that he would be born as a man on earth by a curse. Padmaśvātī daughter of a Gandharva King, would by the strength of her penance release him from the curse and help him to get his original state as a Gandharva. He would then marry Padmaśvātī and remain as emperor of the Vidyādhāras for ten Kalpas together. Candraketu and wife came back to Vāyu-loka.

At this time Śiva appeared in person to those sitting in the temple of Śiddhiśvara and said that a son would be born to Candraketu from a part of his and that valorous youth would kill Vidyuddhavāja. Muktāvalī wife of Candraketu became pregnant at that time and soon delivered a son. He was named Muktāphalaketu. Even from boyhood he became an ardent devotee of Śiva and started performing penance to propitiate Śiva. Śiva appeared before him and gave him the secrets of many techniques in archery.

Vidyuddhavāja was once bathing in a river when muddy waters flowed from up the river and the arrogant demon sent a servant to find out the cause thereof. When he went up by the shores he saw an ox and an elephant bathing in the river. They were the Vāhanas of Śiva and Indra. The elephant was the famous Airāvata. He came back and intimated to Vidyuddhavāja what he saw. The demon then ordered his people to bring the culprits to his side. But the Vāhanas killed those who went to capture them and then they went to their masters, Śiva and Indra. Hearing about this audacity of the demon-chief the Devas challenged the asuras to a fight. This time the army of the devas was led by Muktāphalaketu.

A Gandharva princess named Padmaśvātī grew up to be a beautiful maiden at that time. She was in love with Muktāphalaketu. Padmaśvātī was one day plucking flowers from a pond in the Gandharva land thinking about Muktāphalaketu who had gone to war against the asuras. A demoness who was going to eat flesh in the battle-field of the devas and asuras saw Padmaśvātī, took her and went up. Muktāphalaketu coming to know of this went up with her and got back Padmaśvātī who was struggling in the hands of the demoness like streaks of lightning among clouds. Then he asked her maids about her and they said, “She is the daughter of the Gandharva King Padmaśekhara, Padmaśvātī is her name. She is unmarried. But she is betrothed to the son of Candraketu named Muktāphalaketu, who is born to destroy Vidyuddhavāja. She has come here to practise penance for the success of her father and Muktāphalaketu in this war between devas and asuras.”

Padmaśvātī recognised Muktāphalaketu from the words of his followers. But the latter had to go back to Devaloka under instructions from Indra. The Devāsura war became fierce. By the valour and skill of Muktāphalaketu many of the asuras were killed. The war was won. Muktāphalaketu was given a grand reception at Devaloka.
and was then sent back. Muktāphalaketu did not seem to be happy and everybody thought that it might be due to his having killed Vidyuddhavaja. But the real cause was his separation from Padmāvati.

A sorrow-stricken Padmāvati sent her female companion Manoharikā to the country of Vidyādharas to enquire about Muktāphalaketu. What she saw there was a sad Muktāphalaketu pining to see Padmāvati. Both now understood each other and Manoharikā returned with presents for Padmāvati from Muktāphalaketu.

At that time Muktāphalaketu went to see a Maharṣi named Tapodhana. Disregarding the objections of the disciple Drdhavrata who stood guard outside the āśrama Muktāphalaketu entered the āśrama with his friend. Drdhavrata followed them. When they entered the āśrama they found the āśrama empty and at once Drdhavrata cursed them both to be born on earth as men. Padmāvati fainted when she heard the news. When she regained her consciousness she started practising austerities sitting in a temple devoted to Gaurī, wife of Siva. She meditated on her husband Muktāphalaketu in his life on earth and performed penance to propitiate Siva. By the grace of Siva Muktāphalaketu got his original life and he married Padmāvati and led a happy married life. (Taraṅga 2, Padmāvatilambaka, Kathāsirītasagara.)

MUKULA. A King of the dynasty of Pūru. Mukula, Sṛṇjaya, Bhṛadiṣu, Yavinara and Kṛmila were the sons of King Bāhyāśa. All these five are known as Pāñcālas. Of these the family of Mukula comprised of Maukulas. Mukula got a son named Pāñcāśa. (Chapter 201, Agni Purāṇa.)

MUKUṬA. A Kṣatriya family. It was in this family that the wicked King Vigāhāna was born. (Śloka 16, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva.)

MUKUTA. A follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 23, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva.)

MULAKA. A son of Kumbhakarṇa. Mūlaka was born on Mūla day and Kumbhakarṇa deeming that day and the constellation inauspicious threw the baby away. The abandoned child was brought up by honey-bees giving the babe honey. When Mūlaka grew up he became a mighty demon who always tormented people. He was killed by Śītā with the help of Śrī Rāma. (Ananda Rāmāyaṇa, Rājyakāṇḍa.)

MUMUCU. A sage who lived in Dakṣinabhārata. (Chapter 165, Verse 39, Anuśāsana Parva.)

MUNDA I. A warrior of the country of Munḍa. In the great battle the Munḍas were present in the Kaurava’s army. (Śloka 9, Chapter 56, Bhīṣma Parva.)

MUNDA II. An asura. (See under Caṇḍamunḍas.)

MUNDAKA. A forest. During his exile Śrī Rāma entered this great forest of Munḍakā and paid homage to the sage Agastya. (Araṇyā Kaṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.)

MUNDAVEDĀNGA. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 17, Chapter 57, Aḍī Parva.)

MUNDI. A female follower of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 17, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva.)

MUNI I. The mother of the Yakṣas. It is stated that Kaṣyapaprajāpāti begot of his wife Muni, the Yakṣas. (Chapter 19, Agni Purāṇa.) The Gandharvas also were born of Muni. She gave birth to sixteen Gandharvas of which the first was named Bhūmasena. (Śloka 42, Chapter 65, Āḍī Parva.)

MUNI II. Son of a Vasu named Ahar (i.e. Ahaḥ) (Śloka 23, Chapter 66, Āḍī Parva.)

MUNI III. Son of Kuru of the Pūru line of kings. Kuru begot of his wife Vālīni five sons named Aśva-vān, Ahīṣyanta, Caitraraṭha, Janamejaya and Muni. (Śloka 50, Chapter 94, Āḍī Parva.)

MUNI IV. One of the seven sons of a King named Duyutimān. (Maṇḍya Purāṇa 5. 24.)

MUNIDEṢA. A country in the island of Krauṇca. (Śloka 22, Chapter 12, Bṛiṣma Parva.)

MUNIVĪRYA. One of the eternal Viśve Devas. (Śloka 31, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva.)

MUNJA. An ancient sage of Bhārata. This sage respected Yudhīṣṭhīra very much. (Śloka 23, Chapter 26, Vana Parva.)

MUNJAKESA. A Kṣatriya King of ancient Bhārata. He was the re-birth of an asura called Nicandra. (Śloka 21, Chapter 67, Āḍī Parva.) The Pāṇḍavas had sent an invitation to this King to participate in the great battle. (Śloka 14, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva.)

MUNJAKETU. A Kṣatriya King of ancient Bhārata. He was a member of the court of Yudhīṣṭhīra. (Śloka 21, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva.)

MUNJAPRŚTHA. A place on a mount in the Himālayas. Rudra once practised penance sitting on this mount. (Śloka 4, Chapter 122, Śānti Parva.)

MUNJAVĀN. A mountain. This is in the range of the Himālayas. Paraṃśiva performs his frequent penances at this place. Śiva freely rambles for pleasure with his army of goblins in the caves and shades of trees in this place. Everyday the Sādhyas, Rudras, Viśvadevatās, Vasus, Yama, Varuna, Bhūtas, devīṣ, Nāṣayyas, Āśvin, Gandharvas, celestial maidens, Yakṣas, Devarṣis, Ādīyas, Maruts, and Yātudhānas come to this mountain to worship Śiva. There is neither heat nor cold here. Grieving of hairs or rugosity is unknown here. There is no hunger or thirst either. None dies here. On the sides of this mountain gold lies spread like sunlight. (Verses 1-12 Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 8.)

MUNJAVĀTA I. A holy place of pilgrimage devoted to Śiva in the neighbourhood of Kurukṣetra. If one resides here for one night one will get the position of Gaṇapati. (Śloka 22, Chapter 83, Vana Parva.)

MUNJAVĀTA II. A holy place of pilgrimage devoted to Śiva on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. If a man goes to this place and does circumambulation of the idol there singing songs in praise of Śiva he would get the position of Gaṇapati and if he bathes in the Gaṅgā river also, he would be absolved of all sins. (Śloka 67, Chapter 85, Vana Parva.)

MUNJĀVATĀ. A place on the Himālayas. Once Paraṇāśaṇa went to this place and calling the sages there instructed them to keep their tufts knotted together. (Śloka 3, Chapter 112, Śānti Parva.)

MŪNNU (THREE). The importance of the number three is indicated below:
1) Aṇīutra (Three aṇīs). The three aṇīs are Dakaṣṭa, Gārhapatya and Ahaṇavya. Of these the first is in the shape of a semi-circle, the second in the shape of a full circle and the third, a square.

26) Trîpuras. The three demons who always formed a group are Tārâkâsa, Kamâlâkâsa and Vidyûnmâli.

27) Trîbhuvana. Svarga (heaven), Bhûmî (earth) and Pâtâla (Netherworld) are the three bhuvanas. (worlds).

28) Trîmadhura. The three sweet things are honey, sugar and Kadalî (plantain fruit).

29) Trîmûrti. The three Mûrtis (deities) are Brahmâ, Vîṣṇu and Mahesâvara.

30) Trilînga. The three liṅgas (genders) are Pûrîlinga (masculine), Strîlinga (feminine) and Nâpanîsaka (neuter).

31) Triloka. The three worlds are Manusyaloka (world of men), Pitrlokâ (world of the Manes) and Devaloka (world of the gods).

32) Trîvarga. The following groups of three are classed as Trîvargas (a) Dharma (Virtue), Arthâ (wealth) and Kâma (desire). (b) Vrîddhi (increase) Sthâna (same position) and Kṣaya (decrease).

33) Sattva, Rajas and Tamas.

34) Pralayatraya. The three pralayas (floods) are Naimittika (floods due to rains in and out of season) Prâkrtapralaya (floods arising out of saûrattagni) and Atyântikapralaya (floods due to heavy rains).

35) Trîvidhâyâjñas. Yajñas are of three kinds. Karmayajña, Upâsanayajña and Jñânayajña. There are six divisions in Karmayajña namely, Nityakarma, Naimittikakarma, Kâmyakarma, Adhyâtmikakarma, Adhidaivikakarma and Adhibhautikakarma. For Upâsanayajña there are nine divisions namely, Nirgunopâsana, Sagunopâsana, Bhûtapratopâsana, Mantrayogavidhî, Aṣṭângayogavidhî, Lasyayogavidhî, Râjyogavidhî, Avatâropâsana and Maharâśdevopâsana. Jñânayajña has got three divisions namely, Manana, Nidhiyâsana and Śraṇava.

36) Tîrîtî. Vaidarbi, Pâncâli and Gauḍî are the three Kâvyârâtrîs.

37) Trîveda. The three Vedas are Rgveda, Yajurveda and Sûraveda.

38) Trîśakti. The three kinds of powers are, power of wealth and position, power of endeavour and power of good counsel (Prabhuśakti, Utsâhâkâti and Mantra-śakti).

39) Trîsmitās. The three bodies or physical adjuncts of a soul are Sthûla, Sûkṣma and Kârâṇa and the three bodies of Paramâtman are Isâ, Sâtra and Virât.

40) Trîsmitās. The three bodies or physical adjuncts of a soul are Sthûla, Sûkṣma and Kârâṇa and the three bodies of Paramâtman are Isâ, Sâtra and Virât.

MURA I. A ferocious asura.
1) Birth and acquisition of boons. Mura was the asura born to Kaśyapaprajapati of his wife Danu. Once Mura was shocked to find the huge heap of dead bodies of the asuras killed by the devas. Mura got afraid of death and did penance for years to propitiate his grandfather and Brahmā appeared before him and asked him to name the boon he wanted. Mura said “Lord, anybody whom I touch with my hands in a battle, even if they are immortal, should die.” Brahmā the father of the universe granted him the boon. (Chapter 60, Vāmana Purāṇa).
2) Family life. Mura became the guard of the boundaries of Prāghyotisa, the capital city of Narakāsura. Mura begot four thousand sons. Of these ten were posted to guard the palace of the queens. Mura performed penance and obtained boons. He fenced the boundary of Prāghyotisa with six thousand ropes and arrested the approach of the enemies. These ropes were known in Purānas as the Maurāvapāsas. (Chapter 38, Dākinīyāta Vaiṣṇa, Sābhā Parva).
3) Dīgojaya. (Conquest of the quarters). Mura who became arrogant by the power of the boon he possessed went to Mahāmeru and challenged the Yaksas and Gandharvas to a fight. But none dared to fight with him. Then he went to Amarāvati and challenged Indra, Indra also did not accept the challenge. Then he entered Amarāvati with a raised hand. Nobody stopped him. Going to the palace of Indra he said “Oh, thousand-eyed deva, fight with me or leave this place”. On hearing it Indra left his place and came to earth. Then Mura took possession of Airāvata and Vajra. He lived in devaloka with Maya, Tāra and other dānavas enjoying the luxuries there. Along with his wife, son and other devas Devendra established himself on the southern bank of Kālindī river.
Then one day Murāsura came to the earth on the Airāvata and landed at a place on the banks of the river Sarayū where Raghu a king of the solar dynasty was conducting a yāga. Murāsura went to Raghu and said “Come on, fight with me or you should stop this yāga. You should not worship the devas.” Then the great and brilliant Maitrāvarunī sage, Vasiṣṭha told him, “Daily, what use is there in conquering men of the earth? You should win against those who are never defeated. If you want to fight go and challenge Antaka, the god of Death. Oh, King of asuras, that boy of an Antaka would never obey your orders. If you conquer him you will have defeated all the world.”
On hearing the words of Vasiṣṭha, Mura started to fight Dharmarāja. Yama on hearing that Mura was coming to fight him went to Mahāviṣṇu on his buffelo as he knew he could kill him. Mahāviṣṇu asked him to send Mura to him. Yama returned to his place to see Mura there ready to fight. Yama told him that he would do whatever Mura ordered him and then Mura said “You should stop killing people or I will chop your head off.” Dharmarāja replied “Mura, if you had been the person who had appointed me for this job I would have willingly followed your instructions. But I am under the control of somebody else.” Mura asked “Who is the person superior to you? Tell me, I shall surely defeat him.” Yama said “There is an individual called Viṣṇu holding a Cakra and a Gadā in his hands living in Sveta-dvīpa. He is the person who has appointed me.” Mura anxiously asked “Where is his abode? I shall go there myself to conquer him.” Antaka replied “You go to the ocean of Milk. It is there that Viṣṇu, the omnipresent protector of the universe is residing.” Mura said “Well, I am going to him. But you should in the meantime discontinue your work of killing people.” Yama replied “Go and win him. If you defeat him I shall abide by your instructions.”
Mura went to fight Mahāviṣṇu. It was at this time that Śrī Kṛṣṇa the incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu attacked the capital city of Narakāsura, Prāghyotisa. Mura went to the help of Narakāsura. The boundary of the city was well-fenced with ropes but Kṛṣṇa cut them all and removed the barrier. In the fight that ensued both Narakāsura and Mura were killed by the celebrated weapon Sudarśana of Kṛṣṇa. From then Kṛṣṇa got the name of Muramathana. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MURA II. Son of Tālajāṅgha, an asura born of a part of Brahmā. The capital of this valorous Murāsura was in the city of Candrabāti. Murāsura who possessed the brilliance of Brahmā was a nightmare to the devas. Once Murāsura fought against Viṣṇu and in the fierce fight that took place Viṣṇu was defeated and he ran away from the battlefield and started sleeping in a cave named Sīthmahāvati in the neighbourhood of Badarikāśrama. Mura went there too. Then Mahāviṣṇu created a Devī through his Yogamāyā and made her kill Mura.
Pleased at the slaughter of Mura, Viṣṇu blessed her and said "From today onwards you will be known as Ekaḍāśī. You will be capable of wiping off all sins on earth." (Tadmapurāṇa, Uttararākhanda 36. 50-80).

MURA III. (MURU). A Yādava King. He was one of the neighbours of Jarāsandha. The daughter of this Yādava king called Kāmakaṭakā was married to Ghatotkaca. (13. 13. Sabhā Parva and Skanda Purāṇa).

MURA IV (MURU). A country of ancient Bhārata. A King called Bhagadatta was the King of this country. (Śloka 14, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva).

MURĀRI. A Sanskrit dramatist who lived in the 8th century A.D. in India. His father was Bhaṭṭāravaśirmāṇa. Murāri is the title of the author of the drama 'Anaragha-rāghava'. This drama has eight acts. Murāri has mentioned in his works about Anaragahārṣa who lived in 700 A.D. and Rātnakara who lived in 750 A.D. It is therefore, surmised that Murāri must have lived during the latter part of the 8th century. In the writing of dramas Murāri has excelled the Mahāvīracarita of Bhavabhūti and his verses indicate he had the style of Māgha.

MURMURA. A river. Agni originated from this river. (Śloka 25, Chapter 222, Vana Parva).

MŪRTI. One of the thirteen children of Dakṣaprajāpati. This girl was married to Dharma. Nara and Nārāyaṇa are the sons born to Mūrti of Dharma. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

MŪSANA. An ancient place of habitation in Bhārata. (Śloka 56, Chapter 9, Bṛhma Parva).

MŪSAKĀDA (MUSICAKA). A serpent born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Kadrī. This serpent sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. Once Nārada introduced this nāga to Mātali. (Śloka 10, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva and Śloka 14, Chapter 103, Udvyoga Parva).

MUSALA. A Brahmapāḍī son of Viṣvamitra. (Śloka 53, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

MŪSIKA. An ancient merchant. In the Kathāpithalambaka of Kathāsarasvatīgāra a story is told to demonstrate that even without any capital an ingenious and industrious man can earn money. A merchant got this name by means of his industry. Once a poor man of no resources went to the house of a great merchant named Viśākhila. He was then admonishing a young man of his own caste. The merchant was saying, "See, here is a dead rat on the ground. A clever man would earn money by using this as a capital. To you I have given money for business on several occasions. Not only that you have not increased it but also you have lost it."

The poor man who went to him requested the merchant to give him the dead rat. Viśākhila greatly amused at the request gave him the rat. A rich man bought it for his cat to eat and gave him instead two measures of Bengal gram. He roasted it and made it palatable and then with a pot of water went outside the city gates and sat under a tree on the road-side. Wood-cutters were passing that way carrying loads and he sold the roasted gram and water to them who purchased it with cageriness to ease their weariness. They gave him in exchange firewood and in the evening he took it to the market and sold it. With the money he purchased more Bengal gram and continued the trade as before and after a few days he purchased from them a great stock of firewood. Suddenly there were heavy rains and there was a scarcity of firewood in the market and he sold his stock for good price. With the money thus received he purchased some goods and started a grocery shop. Gradually his business increased and he became a big merchant. Because he started the business from a Mūṣika (rat) he got the nick-name Mūṣika.

MŪSIKAṬIRA. See under Pañcatantra.

MUṬTIKA. An asura who was a servant of Karīsa. This asura was killed by Balabhadra. (See under Kṛṣṇa).

NA. In Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348, the meaning of this syllable is given as 'vrṇḍa' (collection) and 'Buddha'

NABHAGA. A brother of Ikṣvāku, who had ten brothers named Nabhaga, Śaryāti, Diśa, Dhrṣṭa, Nārisyanta, Nabhāga, Prśadhra, Kavi, Karuṣa and Vasumān. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 8).

NĀBHA. A brother of Ikṣvāku. The famous Ambariṣa was Nabhāga's son. After conquering all the worlds he ruled the kingdom strictly along the path of truth and righteousness. (Vana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 12). In the evening of his life Nabhāga gifted away the whole land to Brahmins. Since she could not leave Nabhāga, Bhūmidevi herself assumed physical form and went to him on the occasion. This emperor never consumed meat. He lives in Brahmaloka according to Chapter 115, Anuśāsana Parva. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 124).

NĀBHAṆAṬIṢA. A son of Vaivasvata Manu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 17).

NABHAṆĀNA. An ancient country in South India. (M.B. Bhṛṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Stanley 59).

NABHAṆĀṢAṆ. A son of Narakāsura. Tamra, Antakṛṣa, Śravaṇa, Vasu, Vibhāvasu, Nabhasvāna and Aruṇa were the seven prominent sons of Narakāsura. (Bhāgaṭa, Skanda 10).

NABHODA. An eternal Viṣvadeva. (A class of gods concerned in the Śrāddha offerings to the Manes). (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Stanley 34).

NĀCIKA. One of the Brahmanvāḍī sons of Viṣvamitra (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 59).

NĀCIKETA (NACIKETA). A sage of olden days. Son of Uddālaki, he lived for a long time in the āśrama his father, who devoted his time to performing yajñas. Nāciketa, who was once sent into the forest for flowers etc. did not find them anywhere there, and he returned to the āśrama without them. Angry at this his father cursed him to be taken to Yamaloka. Accordingly he went to Yamaloka. He waited at the gates for a long time to see Yama, who appeared at last when he sang the praises of Yama. The advice then given by Yama to Nāciketa forms the Kathopanisad. After studying the advice he returned to his father, who was pleased to find him a great scholar. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 71).

NĀCIKETAS. A famous hermit. Kathopanisad is the exhortation given by Yamadeva (God of death) to this hermit. There is a story to substantiate this statement. The father of Nāciketas was the hermit Vājasravas. This hermit gave as alms, cows which had grown lean by old age and lack of food, at the time of sacrifices. Nāciketas felt grieved at this action of his father. He went to his father and sadly asked him "Father, to whom are you going to give me?" The father got angry at the question of the son, and replied; "You are to be given to Yama."

On hearing these cruel words of his father, the boy went to the palace of Yama who had been away. For three days and nights the boy waited there without food and drink. When Yama returned the boy was happy and cheerful and Yama was pleased with him. Yama promised the boy three boons and asked him what boon he wanted. The first boon he asked for was, "Give me the boon that father will be pleased with me and not angry with me." The second was, "Adviser me how to attain heaven." The third was, "Tell me the solution of the mystery, whether the soul remains after death." Yama granted the first two boons and said to him, "Boy, this is a difficult question. So ask for another boon such as long life, power over the world, all the pleasures of the world and so on."

The boy replied: "The things you have promised to give me are useless things because after a while the organs of sense will become fragile. The life also will end. So, please tell me. I want the answer to my question." Being greatly pleased at the reply of the boy Dharmadeva expounded to him about the immortality of the soul and the essence of things regarding God Almighty. (Kathopanisad).

NACINA. An ancient region of the country mentioned in Chapter 38, Sabha Parva.

NADA. See under Pātṛu.

NADĀGIRI. An intelligent elephant with discriminative power. Mention is made about this elephant on several occasions in Kathāśārītsāgara.

NĀDICAKRA. The ten nādis where the yogi in meditation retains the five prānas form the nādicakra. At the bottom of the nābhi (nābhikanda) innumerable nādis or nerves originate or sprout up. 72,000 such nādis exist at the centre of the nābhi (navel). The whole body is filled with these nādis spread out in parallel and horizontal positions, and they exist in the form of circles entwined with one another. Ten nādis are prominent amongst them, i.e. Iḍā, Piṅgalā, Śūṣumnā, Gāndhārī, Hastījihīvā, Prthī, Yasā, Alambuṣā, Kuḥā and Saṅkhīnī. Any defect or harm caused to any one of these ten nādis may lead even to death.

There are ten Vāyu (winds) in the body. The five Prānas called Prāṇa, Apāṇa, Samāṇa, Udāna and Vyāna, and the five Vāyu called Nāga, Kūrma, Kṛkala, Devadatta and Dhanāṇjaya together constitute the ten Vāyu. Prāṇa is the most important Vāyu. This vāyu does the emptying as well as the refilling of the other nine vāyus and thus sustains life. The prāṇavāyu has its existence ever in the chest of living beings and fills the body with air through breathing in, out, coughing etc. It depends on life and it is called Prāṇavāyu as it moves or travels with life.

Apāṇa leads vāyu downwards. It is Apāṇa which directs man's food downwards. Also it keeps in its fold urine and semen. This vāyu is called Apāṇa as its function is adhāna (leading downwards) as mentioned above. Samāṇavāyu conveys to the different parts in the body in equal manner the things which living beings eat, drink and smell as also blood, bile, phlegm and vāta. Udāna causes the shivering of lips, flushing of face and eyes and excitement of joints etc. Vyāna causes the limbs to be closed and stretched, and it excites diseases. Nāga exists in nausea, Kūrma in the bulging of the eyes of Kṛkala in food, Devadatta in yawning and Dhanāṇjaya in sound. Dhanāṇjaya does not quit the body even after death.

Life, Prāṇa, travels through the nādicakra depending on ten different courses, i.e. Saṃkṛanti, Viṣṇu, Ahar, Rātri, the two ayanas (Dakṣinā and Uttara), Adhīvāsa Rośa, Unārātra and Dhana. Unārātra means hiccough, Rūa cough, Dhana breathing and Adhīvāsa yawning. Of the two ayanas, Uttara and Dakṣinā, the former is the course towards the left and the latter towards the right and Viṣṇu is the centre between the two. Saṃkṛanti is the change of position of Viṣṇu. On the left side of the human body is the nāḍi called Iḍā, on the right side Piṅgalā and between the two Śūṣumnā. The prāṇa above these three nādis is Ahar i.e. day and that below is Apāṇa, i.e. night. Thus every vāyu assumes ten different forms.

There are various kinds of prāṇāyāma (control of breaths). Prāṇāyāma practised with the prāṇa contained in the centre of the body is called Candragrāhāna; that which supersedes physical principles is called Sūryagrāhāna. To fill the stomach with as much of vāyu as is desired is Pūrakaprāṇāyāma. To remain like a full pot, all breathing stopped, (Pot completely filled) having closed all the openings—doors—of the body is Kumbhaka. The yogi practising Kumbhaka should direct the vāyu upwards in one breath, and that practice is called Recaka. He who does it should be conversant with the yoga of inhalation. Erudite people call it Japa, because when it is practised Śiva resident in one's own body awakes within. Śiva, the King of yogins, chants the mantra (japa) 21,600 times within the course of one day and one night. The soul chants the mantra—Gāyatri—of which Brahma, Viṣṇu and Śiva are the presiding deities, and that is called Ajapa. He who chants Ajapa will have no future births. Prāṇāyāma should be followed by Kuṇḍalinīyoga, Kuṇḍalinī meaning primordial force. The force is a compound of Sun, fire and Moon and its seat is the heart, where it exists in the form of a sprout. Since creation is dependent upon this force power for creation should be invoked on it. The yogin should picture in his mind that nectar flows out of Kuṇḍalinī. He should also realise that the soul within the body possesses form while pure soul is formless. He should address this soul as 'Harṣa Harṣa'. Harṣa means Śiva. Śiva exists and functions inside and outside the body just as oil is in the gingelly seed and fragrance in flower. Soul possessing form is of five kinds. Accordingly Brahma's seat is the heart, Viṣṇu's the neck, Rudra's, the centre of the throat; Maheśvara's, the forehead; and Śiva's, the tip of the prāṇa. Soul without form is just contrary to the above. Its place is where the prāṇa ends. By prāṇāyāma the formless soul may be experienced. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 214).

NĀDIJA. An ancient King. In Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 15, it is mentioned that the Pāṇḍava had sent an invitation to this King to take part in the Bhārata battle.

NĀDIJANČA I. A famous stork. It lives in the pond called Indradyumma as an eternal being, without death. (See under Indradyumma).

NĀDIJANČA II. A kite, who was a son of Kaśyapa. A friend of Brahma, it was known as Rājadhārmā as well. Nādijangha was once killed for food by an ungrateful brahmin. (For details see under Gautama V).
NADVALÅ. (a) The wife of Manu, the son of Càkṣūṣa Manu. Ten sons named Īrū, Pūru, Satadyuma, Tapasvi, Satyavāk, Kavi, Agniṣṭha, Atriātra, Sudyuma and Aitūmanyu were born to Manu by Nadvalå. (Agni Puråṇa, Chapter 18).

(b) The daughter of Prajāpāti Vairāja. Manu married this woman. Kuru, Puru, Satadyuma, Tapasvi, Satyavāk, Kavi, Aitiṣṭha, Atriātra, Sudyuma and Abhimanyu were the ten sons born to Nadvalå from Manu. (Viṣṇu Puråṇa, Aṛiha 1, Chapter 13).

NÄGA I. An asura (demon). (See under Någåstra).

NÄGA II. A class of serpents. It is stated in Vålmiki Râmâyana, Aranya Kånda, Sarga 14, that the ten daughters of Kåṣyapa, from Suraså, the nágas and from Kådrå, the Uragas (both are serpents) came into the world.

NÄGADATTÄ. One of the hundred sons of Dhråtarâṣṭra. This Någadatta was killed by Bhåmaså. (Mahåbhårata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 157, Stanza 197).

NÄGADHANVATIRTHA. An ancient holy place of bath, situated in the basin of the river Sarasvatå. Våsuki stays here. It was at this holy place that Våsuki was anointed as the King of the Någås. (M.B. Sålya Parva, Chapter 37, Stanza 3).

NÄGADVIPA. A region inside the island Sudaråså. This region has the shape of the ear of the hare in the Moon. (M.B. BhåmA Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 55).

NÄGALOKA. The world of the Någås or Påtåla. Våsuki is its chief. (Adi Parva, Chapter 127, Verse 60). There is a pond in Någaloka and a drink of its water bestows the strength of a thousand elephants. (Adi Parva, Chapter 127, Verse 68). Påtåla is thousands of miles away from earth. Its area exceeds a thousand yojanas, and it is surrounded by magnificent forts studded with gems. The steps at the entrance of the fort are also decorated with gold and gems. There are beautiful gardens, fountains and singing birds in Påtåla. Its outer doors are hundred yojanas in length and five in width. (Avåmedha Parva, Chapter 58, Verse 37).

NÄGAPURÅ. A place situated on the basin of the river Gomati in Naimåśåraṇåya. It is mentioned in Mahåbhårata, Såntå Parva, Chapter 355, Stanza 3, that in this place, a Någa named Padmaðåba lived.

NÄGARA. In ancient days there were rules and principles regulating the construction of a city. The name ‘city’ could be applied to them only if they conformed to the rules and principles in vogue. The principles and rules of the erection of a proper city are given below:

One yojana or a half of land should be selected as site.1 The planning of the city should be commenced after worshipping the deity of Våstu. There should be four main gates on the four sides, East, West, North and South. The South gate should be in the position of Gandharvapada, West gate in the place of Varuåga, the North gate in the place of Soma (Moon) and the East gate in the place of Śûryapada (the position of the Sun). The hattås (minor gates) should be wide enough for elephants etc. to pass through. The main gates should be six rods wide. When the city is completed goldsmiths should be settled in the Agni corner2 (i.e. South East). The courtesans who live by dancing etc. should have their houses on the south side of the city. The houses of actors, those who extract oil, fishermen etc. should be in the corner of Nirṛti (South West). Sheds for chariots, weapons, swords etc. should be on the western side. Dealers in liquor, carpenters, blacksmiths, masons etc. and servants should be given houses in the Våyu corner i.e. North West. The houses of Brahmins, hermits, sages, saints, and such others should be on the north side. In the Işåna corner (North East) merchants of vegetables and on the eastern side, the authorities of the army should have their houses.

The army (Infantry, cavalry, chariots and elephants) should be put up in the Agni corner. On the south the goddesses who are protectors of women-folk should be consecrated. Archers should live in the Nirṛti corner. Most honourable people, Treasury officers, Leaders of the people, Brahmin groups and such others should have their abodes on the western side. So also Kåṣṭåyas should have their houses on the eastern side, Våśyas on the south and Śûdras on the west of the city. Våśyas and horses should be placed on all four sides. The army also should be placed thus. The movable wealth should be placed on the east side and the funeral place on the south. The cattle etc. should be kept on the west, farmers on the north, and the outcastes on the corners. This should be the plan of a city as well as that of villages too.

On the east fort-gate of cities and villages Våśrayaṇå and Śri Bhågavatå should be consecrated. They will confer prosperity upon those who visit them: Temples dedicated to Gods should be erected on the western side facing the east. If temples are erected on the east they should face the west and those erected on the south should face the North. For the protection of the city, there should be temples dedicated to Indra, Viṣṇu and such other Gods. If there is no worshipping place in a city, a village, a fort, or a house, such places will be haunted by devils and troubled by diseases etc. If cities are built according to this plan they will afford both salvation and prosperity.

On the east there should be the house of Lakåmî, in the Agni corner, the kitchen on the south, bedrooms in the Nirṛti corner the weapon-house, on the west the dining hall, in the Våyu corner, the granary, on the north, the treasury, and the place of worship in the Işåna corner. Houses could be erected with four blocks, three blocks or only one block. Houses with four blocks could be made in two hundred and fiftyfive ways by making changes in each block and the open verandas. Houses with three blocks are of four types; with two blocks are of five types; and houses of only one block are of four types. There are houses and cities with twenty-eight open verandas. There are fiftyfive types of houses with four open verandas and seven open verandas. Houses with six open verandas and eight open verandas are of twenty types. In cities houses should have eight open verandas. (Agni Puråṇa, Chapter 105).

NÄGÅRJUNÅ. Minister of King Cåyåus. (For details see under Cåyåus).

NÄGÅRI. One of the prominent children of Gåruḍå. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 9).

NÄGÅŚATA. The mountain where Påndu did tapas along with Kunti, Mādrī and others. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 118, Verse 47).

NĀGĀŚRI. Wife of King Dharmacātta of Kosala. Tārādattā was their daughter. (See under Dharmacātta).

NĀGĀSTRĀ. A destructive weapon (arrow). The following story about the astra is told in the Yuddha Kāḍha of Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.

In olden times there was a very powerful and mean asura called Nāga. Brahmā Jason to virulent black magic to kill Nāga, and from the fire-pit arose a terrible goblin called Nāgāpāśa. It was deputed to kill Nāga and the Trimūrti followed it. Nāgāpāśa went to the city of Nāgasura called Viramahendra, ascended its tower and made a terrible noise the echo of which caused abortion in all the pregnant nāga women. Many children fainted and many died. Nāgasura deputed his army chieftain Virasena with an army to kill the nāga goblin. At the sight of the army the nāga raised another terrible cry, which blew off Virasena and his army, reducing them to powder. Then Nāgasura's minister with a big army attacked the goblin. But the minister was deverted by him, and the army annihilated. Enraged at this defeat of his minister, Nāgasura attacked the goblin with an army of crores of soldiers. But, within seconds the goblin deverted the mighty army. At last Nāgāpāśa and Nāgāsura engaged themselves in a duel which lasted for years. Ultimately the goblin swallowed up Nāgāsura also. Then he went to the Trimūrti and saluted them. They granted him many boons, and Śiva, in excess of joy, wrought it as one of the ornaments round his neck. Some time later Nāgāpāśa set out on a tour to see the fourteen worlds, and Śiva specially instructed him not to visit the Śālimali island. He visited the various worlds earning all knowledge and started for mount Kailāsa. On his way he saw Śālimali island, the abode of nāgas, and in violation of Śiva's instructions, he entered the island. The nāgas there did not honour him and his false pride made him tremble with rage. Then the nāgas of the island told him thus: "We have a powerful enemy, who visits us every month, and unless we feed him sumptuously he will devour all of us for food. He is to come today, and if you are capable enough, you defeat and drive him off and save us. If you do so, we shall crown you as our King and honour you."

The powerful enemy of the nāgas was Garuḍa and he came. All the nāgas ran off at his sight. Garuḍa then attacked the goblin Nāgāpāśa, who was standing unperturbed before him. There being no chance of victory for the goblin he ran away and took refuge with Śiva. Garuḍa also followed him, and demanded of Śiva to return to him, his enemy, the goblin. Śiva told Garuḍa thus: "If, in future he (the goblin) interferes with anybody connected with you, you may either punish or eat him. Do not do anything with him now".

Garuḍa agreed to the above proposal of Śiva. From that day onwards Nāgāpāśa lived in Vaiśuangara entwined with nooses. He became the arrow called nāgāpāśa or nāgāstra.

NĀGĀTĪRTHA I. A holy place situated on the boundary of Kuruśetra. Those who drink the water of this holy bath will obtain the fruit of performing an Agniṣṭoma sacrifice. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 14).

NĀGĀTĪRTHA II. A holy place which is situated near Gaṅgādvāra or Kanakhalaka and which keeps up the memory of Kapila, the King of the Nāgas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 66).

NĀGAVĪTHI. Daughter born to Yāmī, the daughter of Dakṣaprajāpatī. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

NAGAJIṬI. A Kaśṭāriya King. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 37, Stanza 21 that this King was born from a portion of an asura called Iṣupāda. This Nāgajīṭi who was the King of Gaṇḍhāra was killed by Kaṇḍa and his sons were defeated by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 254 and Udyoga Parva, Chapter 43).

NAGAJIṬI II. An asura. This asura who had been the disciple of Prahlāda took rebirth as a King named Subula, (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 11).

NAGODDHEDA. A holy place near Vinaśana tirtha. Sarasvatī is supposed to dwell here in invisible form. He who bathes here will attain nāgaloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 112).

NAHUṢA I. A famous King of the Lunar dynasty.
1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu in the following order:—Brahmā-Ati - Candra - Budha-Purūravas-Āyus-Nahuṣa.
2) Birth. Āyu, the son of Purūravas, married the princess named Indumati (Śvarbhānukumāri). Nahuṣa was the son born to the couple, thanks to the blessing of the great hermit Dattātreya. Nahuṣa married Aśokaśundari, the daughter of Śiva.

There is a story about the birth and marriage of Nahuṣa and Aśokaśundari in Padma Purāṇa as given below.

Once Śiva and Pārvatī were engaged in love-making in Kailāsa. Pārvatī requested Śiva to show her the best garden ever created by Brahmā. Śiva took her to Nandanavana, where she saw the Kalpa tree, which was beautiful all over, and she asked Śiva about its special features. Śiva replied that anything asked of it would be granted by the Kalpa tree. Pārvatī made a request to the Kalpa tree for a girl just for a test. Instantly a very beautiful girl was born from the tree. Pārvatī named her Aśokaśundari and brought her up as her daughter. Once Pārvatī gave her a boon that she would become the wife of King Nahuṣa of the Lunar family, who would be equal to Indra.

One day, when the beautiful Aśokaśundari was walking with celestial maids in the Nandanavana an asura named Hūṇḍa the son of Vipracitti, came there. The moment his eyes fell on Aśokaśundari he fell in love with her. The asura spoke to her of his love and requested her to be his wife. Not only did she refuse his request but also told him that according to the boon given by Pārvatī she would become the wife of Nahuṣa, the King of the Lunar dynasty. Hearing this Hūṇḍa smiled and said: "That righteous man named Nahuṣa is yet to be born in the Lunar dynasty. You will be much older than he. He will not suit you as he will be too young. Don't waste your blooming youth. Come and enjoy life with me." But Aśokaśundari did not concede. Hūṇḍa was disappointed. So he began to think about ways to get her. He disappeared from there and reappeared in the guise of a beautiful woman. and told Asokasundari thus:—"Lady, I have taken a fast. Huṇḍa has killed my husband. I am doing penance to curse him. You may come to my hermitage on the banks of the Gaṅgā".

Asokasundari believed these false words. She went with her. Both of them walked on and at last entered a palace. Then only did she understand that it was the palace of Huṇḍa, who assumed his original form and tried to violate her chastity. Asokasundari became angry and cursed Huṇḍa that he would die at the hands of Nahuṣā, and ran away to Kailāsa.

Huṇḍa was sad for two reasons. On the one hand he did not get Asokasundari and on the other hand he had incurred the curse that Nahuṣā would be his slayer. Now what was the way to get out of the trouble? He asked his minister Kampana to take Indumati the wife of Ayus by stealth and bring her to his palace. They decided to destroy Nahuṣā in the womb of Indumati, in case it was not possible to carry her away. They waited for an opportunity.

Ayus was an emperor of righteousness. After the marriage, for a long time he was childless. Once he visited the hermit Dattātreya, in his hermitage. Dattātreya who was the son of Atri and the most famous and the noblest of all the hermits, was quite senseless and red-eyed because of drinking, and without even the Brahmaśūtra, was playing with a young woman, seating her in his lap. His body was besmeared with sandalwood and aloe and adorned with garlands and necklaces of pearl and he was surrounded by many women. The King seeing the divine hermit bowed him with reverence and fear. The moment the hermit saw the King, he sat in deep meditation. This continued for a hundred years, at the end of which period, seeing the devotion of the King, he said, "Oh King! why do you take this trouble. I have left off the customs and manners of Brahmīns. I have no Brāhmaṇya (Brahminism). I am immersed in liquor, meat and women. So you had better go and serve another Brāhmaṇīn."

Ayus refuted all that the hermit said and requested him to bless him that he might get a son. Finally the hermit ordered the King to bring meat and liquor in a skull. The King obeyed him. Dattātreya was pleased at the devotion and willingness to serve as a disciple and told the King that a son would be born to him; that the son would be a worshipper of Devatīrthas (Holy baths), that he would not be defeated by devas, asuras, Kinnaras, giants, and Kṣatriyas, that he would be the protector of his subjects and that he would be a great scholar in Vedas and Śastras. Saying this he gave the King a fruit to be given to his wife. The King returned to his palace.

The King gave the fruit to his wife Indumati. She ate it and became pregnant. One night she gave birth to a son. When the servant-maid went out of the room of confinement Huṇḍa entered into her body and went in. When all were asleep he took the child and ran to his palace at Kāñcana-pura. He gave the child to his wife Vipulā and asked her to make a sauce of the child for him. Vipulā gave the child to the servant woman to cook it. With the aid of the cook she hid the child and prepared a sauce with some other flesh. The cook took the child to the hermitage of Vasiṣṭha and placed it at the door of the hermitage, in the night. At dawn Vasiṣṭha came out of the hermitage and seeing the child took it, named it Nahuṣā and brought him up. The King and his wife Indumati cried for a long time over the loss of the child. At that time Nārada came there and told them that their son would return soon.

Once Nahuṣā was bringing Samits (butea-fuel) when he heard some devacāraṇas (heavenly singers) saying among themselves the history of Nahuṣā. Nahuṣā heard it. He told Vasiṣṭha all that he had heard. Vasiṣṭha told him all the stories from the beginning to his being kidnapped by Huṇḍa. Nahuṣā was amazed at what he heard. He wanted to kill Huṇḍa instantly. So he bowed before Vasiṣṭha and taking bow and arrow went away to kill Huṇḍa.

Believing that he had eaten Nahuṣā, Huṇḍa approached Asokasundari again and told her that he had actually eaten Nahuṣā. Asokasundari felt very sad when she heard this. At that time a Kinnara named Vidyuddhara and his wife came there. They consoled Asokasundari and told her that Nahuṣā was alive. He continued.

"Oh beautiful lady, that great sage will kill Huṇḍa-sura and marry you, and live with you as an emperor in this world, as Śākra (Indra) in heaven. From Nahuṣā will be born to you a son named Yayāti, who will be righteous, kind and loving towards his subjects and equal to Indra, and a hundred daughters who would be exceedingly beautiful and of very fine character. Then Nahuṣā will go to heaven and become Devendra. At that time your son Yayāti will be the emperor and will rule his subjects with kindness. Four sons, who would possess prowess and valour, who would be second to none in archery will be born to him. They will be known by the names Turvasu, Puru, Kuru and Yadu. Powerful and mighty sons called Bhoja, Bhima, Andhaka, Kukkura, Vṛṣṇi, Śrutascena, Srutadhāra and Kāladarśa will be born to Yadu. They will become famous by the name Yādavas. Several sons will be born to them. Thus the family of Nahuṣā and yourself will increase."

By this time Nahuṣā had arrived at the spot fully armed and ready to fight Huṇḍa, who was killed in the terrible battle which ensued. Nahuṣā married Asokasundari in the midst of devas and after the marriage the couple reached the palace of Nahuṣā. (Padma Purāṇa, fifteen chapters from 102).

3) Nahuṣā became Indra.

Became a python by the curse of Agastya. To get remission from the sin of Brahmahatya, incurred by killing Vṛtrāsura, Indra hid himself in a cluster lotuses in the Mānasalake. The devas who were worried due to the absence of Indra, elected Nahuṣā as Indra temporarily. Nahuṣā wanted to get Indrāni. Agastya cursed Nahuṣā and changed him to a python. At the sight of the Pāṇḍavas he regained his original form and went back to the world of Indra. (For detailed story see under Agastya).

4) Other details.

(i) Nahuṣā had six sons Yati, Yayāti, Sāhuṭāti, Ayāti, Ayāti and Dhruva. (M.B., Ādi Parva, Chapter 75, Stanza 30).

(ii) Nahuṣā was allowed to enter heaven because he made himself pure by performing the sacrifice Vaiṣṇava yajña. (M.B., Vana Parva, Chapter 257, Stanza 5).
NAHUŞA II

(iii) Nahuṣa once came down to the world in the aerial chariot of Indra to see the battle of Arjuna. (M.B., Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 9).
(iv) Nahuṣa got a famous sword from his father Ayus. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 266, Stanza 77).
(v) Nahuṣa had once a talk with the hermit Cyavana about the wealth of cows. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 51).
(vi) On another occasion the hermit Cyavana granted Nahuṣa a boon. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 44).
(vii) Once Nahuṣa gave to Brahmīns lakhs of cows as alms. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 81, Stanza 5).
(viii) It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 8, that Nahuṣa, after death, stays in the palace of King Yama (God of death).
(ix) Mention is made in the Rgveda, Mandala 1, Anuvāka 7, Sūkta 31, about Nahuṣa's becoming Indra.
(x) The names DeVārāja, Devārāj Devendra, Jagatpati, Nāga, Nāgendra, Sūradhipati, Surapati etc. are used in Bārāta as synonyms for Nahuṣa.

NAHUSĀ. A famous nāga (serpent) was born to Kaśyapa-prajāpati by his wife Kadrū. (Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Stanza 9).

NAIDHĪRVA. A gotra-originator of the Kaśyapa dynasty. He was the grandson of Mahārṣi Kaśyapa and son of Avatsara mahārṣi. He was one of the six Brahmāvādins of the family of Kaśyapa the other five being Kaśyapa, Avatsara, Rābhliya, Asīta and Devala. (Vāyu Purāṇa, Chapter 52; Matsyapurāṇa, Chapter 143).

NAIGAMEVA. A younger brother of Subrahmanya. He had three younger brothers, i.e., Sākha, Viśākha and Naigameva. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

NAIKĀBAHU. A synonym of Pārvati. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 11).

NAIKAPRŚṬHA. A particular region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 41).

NAIMIṢA. (NAIMIṢĂRAṆYA).

1) General. Naimiṣa is very famous in the Purāṇas. It is considered to be a sacred place. Nimsar is the modern name for the place, and it is in the Sītāpur zīlla of North India.

Sānaka conducted a yajña there which lasted for twelve years. All the reputed Ṛṣis participated in it, and there Sūta (Saut) the son of Vyāsa recited to the Mahārṣis Mahābhārata composed by Vyāsa. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 1; also see under Sauta).

2) Other information.

Devas once came to this place and conducted a yajña there. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 1).

(ii) Arjuna once visited here the river called Utpaliṇī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 214, Verse 6).

(iii) Half of the sin of those who visit Naimiṣa will at once be dispelled. The remaining portion of the sin also will be removed before they return from the place. He who stays for a month and bathes here will derive all the results of Gomeda yajña. He who quits his life here by fasting will attain all the sacred lokas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 59).

(iv) River Gomati, Yajabhūmi of the Devas and the yājnic vessel of Sūrya are found at this place. (Vana Parva, Chapter 87, Verse 6).

(v) Dharmaputra once came to this place with his brothers and bathed here and made gifts of cows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 1).

NAIMIṢĂKUṆJA. An ancient sacred place on the borders of Kurukṣetra. The Ṛṣis of Naimiṣāranya built this place. A bath here gives the same results as an aṃuṣṭomayajña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Verse 108).

NAIMIŚEYA. A sacred place. River Sarasvati which flowed westwards changed its course here towards the east so that it (river) might see the sages of Naimiṣāranya. There is a story about it in Mahābhārata as follows:

The Yajña conducted by Sānaka at Naimiṣāranya ended in the twelfth year. The Ṛṣi who came from various parts of the country were put up in ārāmas built on the banks of river Sarasvati. But, many Ṛṣis did not get accommodation there and they moved eastwards. The River Sarasvati which felt sorry that the Ṛṣis could not be accommodated also turned and moved eastwards, and thus afforded space for ārāmas to be built on her banks. (Śalva Parva, Chapter 37).

NAIRRTA. An urban region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 51).

NAIRRTI. A Rākṣasa. His name also occurs in the list of the ancient guards or protectors of the world. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 52).

NAKṢA. The son born to Prthuṣeṇa by his wife Ākūti. Mention is made in Bhāgavata, Sandhā, 5, that he had a son named Gaya of his wife Drūti.

NAKṢATRAKALPA. A part of the Atharvaveda. The great hermit Muni Jākeśa had divided the Atharvaveda into five parts called Nakṣatraloka, Vedakalpa, Sarhṭikalpa, Āgīrakalpa and Śanti Kalpa. Nakṣatra Kalpa deals with the order of worshipping the Nakṣatras(stars), Veda Kalpa deals with the activities of Brahṇa as a ṛtvik (family priest), the Sarhṭikalpa, the mantras(spells and incantations). In Āgīrakalpa Kalpa sorcery and enchantment and in Śanti kalpa, Śantis (Alleviation or cure) of horse, elephant etc. are given. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anūṣa 3, Chapter 6).

NAKṢATRAYOGA. It is ordained in the Purāṇas that alms-giving on each star or day will be rewarded by particular attainments. This is called Nakṣatrayoga. The Nakṣatrayoga of each star is given below:

1) Astaṃyuk:— Those who give horses and chariots as alms on this day, will be born again in a noble family.
2) Bharanit:— If lands and cows are given to Brahmīns on this day, one would get a large number of cows and will become famous in heaven.
3) Kṛttikā:— If rice-pudding is given to Brahmīns to their satisfaction on this day the giver will attain the prominent worlds after death.
4) Rohini:— If milk-rice and venison mingled with rice is given to Brahmīns on this day, he indebtedness to the manes would end.
5) Mrgašīras:— (Candra nakṣatra). If a milch-cow is given as alms on this day, the giver will become capable of crossing mountains and trenches.
6) Adra:— If fast is taken and gingelly oil is given as alms on this day, the giver will become capable of crossing mountains and trenches.
7) Pūnarvasu:— He who gives bread on this day will be born again in a good family.
8) Puṣya:— He who gives gold as alms on this day will enter the world of bright planets.
9) Āleśā:— He who gives an ox made of silver as alms on this day, will become fearless.
10) Maģhā:— He who gives gingly as alms on this day will become prosperous with cows.
11) Paṇṭaṭha:— If ghee-rice is given to Brahmins taking fast on this day, the giver would become happy and prosperous.
12) Uttarāṣaṭṭha:— He who gives rice of Nivara variety mixed with milk and ghee on this day will be honoured in heaven.
13) Hastā:— If one gives four horses and an elephant as alms on this day, one will attain the world of bliss.
14) Cīrā:— He who gives oxen and perfumery as alms on this day, will enter the parks in which celestial maids play.
15) Svāṭī:— He who gives any sort of wealth as alms on this day will become renowned in the worlds.
16) Viśāṭā:— He who gives as alms on this day, oxen, milk-cow, grain-box, cart, paddy and diamond will attain heaven.
17) Anuṛāṭhā:— He who gives cloth, rice and blanket on this day will be honoured in heaven for a hundred yugas.
18) Fṛēṣṭhā:— If Brahmins are given yams and greens on this day one could realize one's wishes.
19) Mālā:— The manes will be contented, if Brahmins are given roots and nuts on this day.
20) Paṇḍaṭhā:— If Brahmins who are expounders of Vedas are given as alms pots of curd, after observing fast, the givers will take birth again in families with many cows.
21) Uttarāṣaṭṭhā:— He who gives milk and ghee to wise men will be honoured in heaven.
22) Śravaṇa:— Those who give cloth and rug on this day will enter a white conveyance and reach heaven.
23) Śravīṣṭhā:— Those who give cattle, cart and cloth on this day will enter heaven.
24) Saṭṭavēṣṭik:— Those who give sandalwood and aloeswood on this day, will go to the world of devas (gods).
25) Paṇḍaṭpṛṣṭha:— He who gives coins on this day will reach the world of bliss.
26) Uttarāṣaṭṭhā:— Those who give mutton on this day will be pleasing the manes.
27) Reviṭā:— He who gives cows which could give potfuls of milk, could reach any world. (M.B. Anuvāsana Parva, Chapter 64).

NAKULA.

1) Birth. The fourth of the Pāṇḍavas, Mādrī, the second of the two wives of Pāṇḍu meditated on the twin gods Aśvinidevas, and recited one of the Mantras given to Kuntī by the hermit Durvāsas and the two sons Nakula and Sahadeva were born to her from those gods. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 111 that Nakula and Sahadeva were immensely handsome.

2) Story of Nakula till the Bhārata battle. Naming and such other rituals after birth were performed for Nakula also as in the case of the other Pāṇḍava children, by the hermits who lived in Śataṭīrga. The ceremony of investiture with the Brahmiā string was conducted by Kaśyapa the priest of Vasudevā. The royal hermit Śuka taught Nakula archery and swordplay, in his boyhood. When Pāṇḍu died, Mādrī jumped into the funeral pyre and died leaving her two sons with Kuntī. After this the hermits of Śataṭīrga took Kuntī and her five sons to Bhīma at Hastināpura.

At Hastināpura, Nakula learned archery under the great teacher Droṇa. According to the instruction of the teacher, Arjuna had to fight with him (teacher) on the completion of the teaching and during that fight Nakula and Sahadeva were the guards of Arjuna's chariot-wheels. As Nakula was such an expert in wielding the weapons, he got the name 'Aitārathā'. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 138, Stanza 30). When the lac-palace was completed at Vṛarāppata, the Pāṇḍavas shifted to that mansion by the instruction of Dhitarāṣṭra. When the lac-palace was set fire to, the Pāṇḍavas escaped by way of an underground passage and reached the banks of the Gaṅgā. There Nakula and Sahadeva fell down weary and exhausted. Bhīma carried them on his shoulders. After Baka had been killed, they proceeded to Pāṇḍalāpura, where at the Svayaṁvara (marriage) Pāṇcālī became the wife of the Pāṇḍavas. They returned to Hastināpura. A son named Śatānikha was born to Nakula by Pāṇcālī. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 75).

After that Nakula married Karēqumati, the daughter of the King of Cedi. A son named Niramitra was born to the couple. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Stanza 70).

Nakula was then sent to the kingdoms of the west for regional conquest, by Dharmaputra. The wealth of the kingdoms he had conquered, was carried on ten thousand camels to the capital Hastināpura. (M.B. Saṁhāra Parva, Chapter 32). After the Rājasāya (imperial consecration) of Yudhiṣṭhira, Nakula went to Gāndhāra to escort Subala and his sons. After the defeat of Yudhiṣṭhira in the game of dice, the Pāṇḍavas went to live in the forest. At that time Nakula put soil all over his body and sat on the ground because of his profound grief. In the forest, once Jaṭāsura carried away Nakula. (See under Jaṭāsura). Nakula killed Kṣemaṅkara, Mahāmaha and Suratha in the forest At Dwaitavana (a forest) Nakula went to a lake to fetch water and was killed by Dharmadeva who appeared in the form of a crane. At the request of Dharmaputra, who came afterwards, all the Pāṇḍavas including Nakula were brought to life again, by Dharma. During the pseudonymity of the Pāṇḍavas at the city of Virāta, Nakula assumed the name Granthika. When the period of pseudonymity expired, Nakula fought with the Trīgaras on behalf of the King Virāta. On the return of the Pāṇḍavas after the expiry of their forest-life and pseudonymity, when Duryodhana announced that he would give not even a single dot of land to them, Nakula was very eager to decide the matter by a battle. He proposed that the King Drupada should be made the chief captain of the army.

3) Nakula in the Bhārata-battle. The following is the part played by Nakula in the battle of Kurukṣetra.

(i) There was a combat between Nakula and Duśāsana on the first day of the battle. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 15, Stanza 23).

(ii) Nakula fought with Śalya and was wounded. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 83).

(iii) He fought with Śakuni. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 105, Stanza 11).
NĀKULA

(iv) He engaged Vikarṇa in a combat. (M.B. Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 110, Stanza 11).
(v) Nākula defeated Vikarṇa. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 106, Stanza 12).
(vi) Nākula defeated Śakuni. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 169, Stanza 16).
(vii) He defeated Duryodhana in a fight. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 187, Stanza 50).
(viii) Nākula killed the King of Aṅga. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 22, Stanza 13).
(ix) He retreated on being defeated by Karṇa. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 24, Stanza 45).
(x) He fought with Droṇa. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 48, Stanza 34).
(xi) Nākula fought with Duryodhana again and was wounded. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 7).
(xii) He fought with Vṛṣṇa. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 61, Stanza 36).
(xiii) Nākula killed Citrasena, Satyasena and Suyena the sons of Karṇa. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 10).

4) After the Bhārata-battle.
(i) After the battle, Nākula explained to Yudhiṣṭhira, the duties of a householder. (M.B. Śant Parva, Chapter 12).
(ii) On the instruction of Yudhiṣṭhira, Nākula became the chief captain of the army. (M.B. Śant Parva, Chapter 41, Stanza 12).
(iii) After the battle, the palace of Durmārgaṇa the son of Dhrītarāṣṭra was given to Nākula by Bharmacauta. (M.B. Śant Parva, Chapter 44, Stanza 10).
(iv) After the battle when Yudhiṣṭhira performed the horse sacrifice, Nākula and Bhimāsena stood as protectors of the city. (M.B. Aśvamedha Parva, Chapter 72, Stanza 19).
(v) Nākula went to the forest to see Kuṇti, who was engaged in penance during her latter days. (M.B. Āravamavasi a Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 8).

5) The end. At the ‘great departure’ (Mahāprasthāna) of the Pāṇḍavas, Nākula died in the forest. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Svargāroha Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 9, that after death Nākula and Sahadeva attained the position of Asvinīdevas.

6) The name Nākula. It is stated in Mahābhārata, Virata Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 25 that the name ‘Nakula’ was given to him because there were none more handsome than he in the family (Kula) of the Pāṇḍavas.

NĀKULA. An ancient country in India. (M.B. Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Stanza 53).

NĀLA I. Nāla the King of Niṣadha. (As the history of Nāla is included under the word Damayanti, some points which are not given there, are mentioned here).
(i) Nāla was the son of Vīrasena, the King of Niṣadha. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 52, Stanza 56).
(ii) Once the hermit Bhṛadaśva came to the Palace of Vīrasena and praised Nāla a good deal and spoke highly of his good qualities to his father. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 53, Stanza 2).
(iii) When Nāla was playing in the garden some swans with golden wings flew to the lake in the garden. Nāla caught hold of one of them just for fun. The swan said to Nāla, "If you will let me off, I will tell Damayanti about you." So it was released. As a reward it flew to the country of Vidarbha and persuaded Damayanti to love Nāla. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 53).
(iv) After death Nāla sat in the aerial chariot of Indra and witnessed the battle fought by Arjuna with the Kauravas at the end of the forest life of the Pāṇḍavas. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 10).
(v) Previous birth. Two different stories are narrated about the previous birth of Nāla.

1) In the previous birth Nāla was a Vaśya of the city of Pippala in the Gauḍa country. This Vaśya became abstinent and after leaving off everything he had, went to the forest. There, according to the advice of a hermit he undertook the fast of Gaṇeṣa. As a result he was born as Nāla in the next birth. (Gaṇeṣa Purāṇa).

2) Nāla and Damayanti were foresters named Ahuka and Ahukā. Sīva was pleased with the couple. So they were born in royal families in the next birth, and Sīva in the form of a swan, helped them. (Sīva Purāṇa, Saṭarudra Saṁhitā).

NĀLA II. An ancient hermit. In Sābhā Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 17, it is mentioned that this hermit lives in the palace of Indra.

NĀLA III. A monkey. This monkey was the son of Vīṣvakarmā. Śrī Rāma and the monkey-army went to redeem Śī from Laṅkā and reached the sea-shore. A bridge had to be made to cross the sea and reach Laṅkā. Immediately Varuṇa the King of the seas appeared there and said, "Nāla who is in the monkey-army, is the son of Vīṣvakarmā. His father had given him a blessing that he would become as expert an architect as his father. So let the construction of the bridge be commenced under his supervision." Accordingly under the supervision of Nāla, Rāma’s bridge of rock was completed and Śrī Rāma and the army of monkeys reached Laṅkā by walking over this bridge (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kanda, Sarga 22).

In the battle between Rāma and Raṇa, Nāla fought with the giant Tuṇḍaka. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 285, Stanza 9).

NĀLAKŪBARA. A son of Vaśravaṇa. He had a brother called Manigriva.

1) Cursing Raṇa. It was the time when Raṇa was ruling over Laṅkā and terrorising the fourteen worlds. As he was carrying on his conquests, once he came to a round rock near Kailāsā. It was night, Rambha had fixed a rendezvous near the rock that night with Nālakūbara. The full moon shone bright. The radiance of the moon rendered Kailāsā and its vicinity most beautiful. Filled with passion Rāvaṇa could not sleep at all. In the silence of that calm night he heard the tinkling of bangles. Rāvaṇa opened his twenty eyes and looked in that direction. He saw an extremely beautiful woman clad in splendid garments and ornaments going along the way. He ran to her and caught hold of her hand. She was flurried and confused at his sudden appearance. So she said, "Oh Lord! I am the wife of Nālakūbara who is the son of your brother Kubera. My name is Rambha. Your brother’s son is your son too. So don’t do any harm to your son’s wife." But Raṇa did not pay any heed to her words. He lifted her up and placed her on the round rock and raped her. Before dawn Rambha, who had become like the lake of lotus trodden by a mad elephant, went to Nālakūbara and told him everything. Nālakūbara became very angry and cursed Rāvana. “You, who have become blind with lust, shall not touch a woman who does not reciprocate your love. If you do so your head will be split into seven pieces.” It was because of this curse that Rāvana did not touch Śītā though she was kept in his harem. (Uttara Rāmāyana; Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 28).

2) Another wife of Nalākūbara. It is mentioned in Kāthāsatīsāgara, Madanamañcukālambaka, Tārāgā, that, of the two daughters, Svañyamprabhā and Somaprabhā of Maya, Somaprabhā was the wife of Nalākūbarā.

3) The curse of Nārada. Nalākūbara and Maṇigrīva, the sons of Kubera were playing with celestial maidens in the Ganges in nudity, when Nārada came by that way. The hermit was returning after visiting Viṣṇu. The moment the celestial maidens saw Nārada they put on their clothes and stood aside bowing before Nārada. Nalākūbara and Maṇigrīva did not see Nārada. They ran here and there, playing with no clothes on. At this, Nārada got angry and cursed them that they would become two “Maruttu” trees (Terminalia alata) on the earth. They became very sad and requested for liberation from the curse. Nārada told them they would get liberation from the curse when they saw Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the incarnation of Viṣṇu. Accordingly Nalākūbara and his brother took birth near the house of Nandagopa in Ambāḍi, as double “Maruttu” trees. It was the period of the childhood of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa swallowed mud, and Yaśodā tied him to a mortar. The child dragged the mortar to the Maruttu tree and got himself between the double trees. Immediately the trees regained the original forms of Nalākūbara and Maṇigrīva. They paid homage to Śrī Kṛṣṇa, who blessed them, and both of them returned to Vaiśravaṇapurī. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

NALASETU. The rock bridge built by the monkey named Nala. The bridge over which Śrī Rāma and the monkey-army crossed the sea to Lāṅkā was built under the supervision of Nala and so the bridge came to be called Nalasetu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 283, Stanza 45).

NALATANTU. One of Viśvāmitra’s sons who were expounders of Brahma. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 58).

NĀLĀYANI. See under Pāñcāli.

NĀLĀYIRAPRABANDHAM. See under Nammālvār.

NALIN. A branch of the Ganges. When the heavenly Gaṅgā came down to the earth as a result of the penance of Bhagiratha, Śiva received it on his head. It is seen in Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Sarga 43, that when the Gaṅgā fell drown from the head of Śiva it split into seven river-arms called Hāḍhinī, Pāvani, Nalini, Sukaṇḍa, Sītā, Śindhu and Gaṅgā. The Ganges which flows north through India is one of these seven river-arms.

NALOPĀKHYYĀNAPARVA. A sub Parva (section) of Mahābhārata. This sub section consists of Vana Parva, Chapters 52 to 79.

NĀLU (FOUR). Various things mentioned in the Purāṇas having some association with four (Nālu) are given below:
1) Four distances. In the case of an elephant one must keep a distance of 1000 kols, a horse 100 kols, horned animals 10 kols, evil people, unli mited number of kols. (1 kol is equal to a metre).
2) Four Adhiṅkāraṇas. Manda (the very ordinary), Madhyama (medium standard), Utarna (best) and Utamottama (the very best).
3) Four Anubhandhas. (Factors). In philosophy there are four factors called Viṣaya (subject matter), Prayojana (purpose), Samandhā (relationship between factors) and Adhiṅkāraṇī (the deserving or eligible person).
4) Four Aṅtaṅkāraṇas (Internal organs). Manas (mind), Buddhi (intellect), Cittam (heart) and Ahaṅkāra (ego). Imagination is the function of the mind, decision that of Buddhi; to retain knowledge gained in orderly form is the function of Cittam and self-respect that of Ahaṅkāra.
5) Four Anuvāyas. Satyam (truthfulness), Dama (Self control), Ārjāvam (straightforwardness) and Ānśānīsya (not to be cruel).
6) Anuvadās Four. Yajñā (sacrificial offerings), Dāna (alms-giving, gifts), Adhyayana (learning) and Tapas (penance).
7) Four Āṣṭāṅkāraṇas. (Not suited to the particular station or place in life). Brahmins are forbidden from receiving bribes, engaging in trades, service of Śūdras and uttering lies.
8) Abhiṅkāya Four. (Acting). Āṅgikam (where gestures and bodily actions are used to convey ideas). Sattvikā Subjective feelings expressed by perpiration etc. Āhāryam (extraneous), Vācikam (by words of mouth).
9) Abhyāsāvīyayas Four. (Subjects for practice and training). Vināya (humility), Damana (control of mind), Indriyāṅga (controlling the sense-organs) and Bhūtadāya (kindness).
10) Aṃtīs Four. (Nectar). Good wife, talk of children, present from King and honourable food.
11) Ahaṅkāras Four. (Ornaments). For the stars, Moon; for women, husband; for earth, King and for all, education (learning).
12) Ahaṅkārasādhanas Four. According to rhetorics, Aṭīṣāya (excellence), Śāmīya (simple), Vāstavam (matter of fact, as it is) and Śīṣa (one word with two meanings) are the Ahaṅkārasādhanas.
13) Ahaṅkārasādhanas Four. (States, conditions).
A. Saṁśāvam (childhood), Kauṁāram (boyhood), Yauvanam (youth) and Vārdhakayam (old age).
B. Jāgrat (wakeness), Svāpoṇam (dream), Suṣuṣṭi (sleep) and Tiṇyam (being one with the supreme soul).
14) Aṣṭāṅkālyogkalāṣya Four. (Objects of shooting arrows). Sthirā, Calam, Calācalam, Dvayacalam.
When the archer and the object of his shooting remain motionless the object is called Sthirām. When the object is moving but the archer is not, the object is called Calam. When the case is just the opposite of the above it is Calācalam. When both are moving it is called Dvayacalam.
15) Ahaṅkārāṅgas Four. (Factors of the novel). Kathābandhā (plot or theme), Pātraṅkatanam (exposition of characters), Rasapuṣṭi (sentiment) and Gāḍyārī (prose style).
16) Abhaṅgos Four. (Ornaments). For man, shape or form, for food, quality or merit; for quality, knowledge or wisdom and for wisdom, patience or forbearance.
17) Āyuḥdhas Four. (Weapons). Mukta, Amukta, Muktaṁkāta and Āytramukta. (Sec under Dhanurveda).
18) Āvaregās Four. (Covering, Protection). For earth the sea, for house the compound wall, for country the King, for women chastity.
19) Aḥārās Four. (Food etc.). Āhāra (food), Nīhrā (Evacuation), Maithuna (sexual act), Nidrā (sleep).
20) Aḥāraśvaśtras Four. (edibles). Khādyaṃ (eaten by munching with teeth and chewing), Peyam (that which is drunk), Lehyaṃ (licked with the tongue) and Bhohyaṃ (that which is not included in the above three).
21) Rṇas Four. (Obligations, debts). Debts due to Devas, Rūṣis, Pitrīs and Men. One pays back one’s debts to Devas by performing yajñas. By Svādhyāya (self-study) and tapasya one pays the debt due to Rūṣis; by procreation of children and libation offerings that due to Pitrīs and by truthfulness, hospitality etc. that due to people are repaid.
22) Rtviks Four. Adhvaryu, Udgātā, Hotā and Brahmanā. The first of the four should be an erudite scholar in Yajurveda, the second in Sāmaveda, the third in Atharvaveda and the fourth in all the four Vedas.
23) Kavis Four. (Poets). He who boasts about himself in secret is called Udātta; he who cries down others and indulges in self-praise is known as Uddhata; he who proclaims others’ merits is called Pradaunga and he who shows humility is called Vinīta.
24) Kukkutagunyas Four. (Traits of the Cock). To rise early in the morning, to struggle for existence, to share whatever is got with relations and to work and earn one’s own food—these are the qualities of the Cock.
   A. Nectar even from poison, good advice even from boys, good action even from enemies and noble and chaste brides even from low families are to be welcomed.
   B. Literacy (learning of alphabets) should be accepted from brahmins, food from mother, pan from wife and bangles from King.
26) Caturāṅgās Four. Elephant, Horse, Chariot and Infantry.
27) Aśrāmas Four. Brahmacaryā (student life), Gārhatiṣṭhyā (married life), Vānaprastha (anchorite, forest-life) and Sannyāsa (Renunciation).
29) Vārgas Four. Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa.
31) Gikitsāpadas Four. (Four elements in the treatment of patients). Vaidya (doctor), Rogen (patient), Ausadham (medicine) and Paricāraka (attendant).
33) Tyājyas Four. (things to be shunned).
   A. Horse returning after bath, elephant in its rut, love-born bull and wicked scholar.
   B. Evil action, unhealthy region, evil wife and bad foods.
34) Dānas Four. (Gifts). Gifts daily given without expecting return or result is Niyādāna. Gifts given to scholars (pundits) for the sake of alleviation of or redemption from sin is Naimittikadāna. Gifts given for welfare and prosperity is Kāmyakadāna. Offering made to propitiate God is Vimala.
35) Nīyakas Four. (Heroes) Dhīrodatta, Dhīroddhata, Dhīralalita, Dhīrāśānta.
37) Pramāṇas Four. (Means of valid knowledge), Pratyakṣa, Anumāna, Upamāna, and Śābda.
38) Mokṣas Four. (Salvation). Sālokya, Sāmīpya, Śāripya and Śāyujya.
39) Four Togas. Jīnāyoga, Bhaktiyoga, Karmayoga and Dhyānayoga.
40) Four Satrus (Enemies). Mother leading an immoral life; father who incurs debt; foolish son and beautiful wife.
41) Four Śāstras. Nitiśāstra, Tarkaśāstra, Manusmṛti and Kāmaśāstra.

NAMASYU: A King of Yāyāti’s family. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

NAMBUTIRIS. (Malayāla Brahmins). Logan says that the Nambūtiris were the batch of Aryans that settled down in Kerala after the Nairs. The historians like Saṅkumpr Menon and others have stated that the Nambūtiris had come to Kerala from the banks of the rivers Godāvarī, Narmandā and Kāverī. Famous historians have inferred that the progress of the Aryans to the south took place between 1000 and 325 B.C. But Thomas Fawkes thinks that there were Nambūtiris priests and hermits in South India, during the time of Buddha. N.K. Datta, the author of the book “Aryaṁśānam of India”, is of opinion that during the time of the invasion of Alexander, the Aryans had spread all over India and Ceylon. Thus historians have not yet come to an agreement as to the correct period of the exodus of the Aryans to the south. Anyhow in the Geography of Ptolemy mention is made that half a degree east to Taibia there was a place called Brahmagāra. It may be assumed that Brahmagāra may be Brahmagāra (settlement of Brahmins). It has been decided definitely that the period of Ptolemy was A.D. 2nd century, and in that case the Brahmins must have settled in the south before that period.

Though the period of the ‘Saṅgha poets and their works’ has been assessed differently by different scholars, the majority have fixed it as the first few centuries of A.D. In these Saṅgha poems the gods of the Aryans are praised. The gods Śūrya (the Sun), Candra (the Moon), Varuṇa (god of water), Baladeva (Sir Kṛṣṇa’s elder brother) and Viṣṇu (Supreme God) are especially mentioned in ‘Cilappadikārā’. The Saṅgha work ‘Puranānūru’ is an encomium to the purity of the Vedas and Agnihotra Brahmins (Brahmins who maintain the holy fire by burnt offering). In those days the King carried on the administration of the country with the advice of Brahmins. Economics, Grammar and law were taught in royal palaces. Paciﬁcakara and such other spells, reading of the scriptures, Aryan ways of marriage, Recitations of Puranīc stories etc. were prevalent in those days. Manimekalā is stated to have reached the capital of the Cera King and learned Vedas and Saṅkhya doctrines (one of the six systems of Indian Philosophy dealing with evolution) from the prominent teachers here. The dictum of both the works ‘Cilappadikārā’ and ‘Manimekalai’ is, to a certain extent, indebted to Sanskrit. Many of the Sanskrit poetic traditions are used in these poems. When these poems are taken into account, it is not wrong to presume that in the period from 1st century to 5th century A.D. Aryan civilization prevailed in southern India. If, during this period, Aryan civilization had taken root to such an extent in south India, the advent of the Aryans to south India must have taken place at least two or three centuries prior to this period. The Nambūtiris of Kerala are called Malayāla Brahmins. Between them and the Brahmins of other countries there are differences in manners and customs. They are given below:

1) The Brahmins of other parts of India do not perform āgnihoṭra rites (maintaining the holy fire by burnt offering) so elaborately as the Malayāla Brahmins.

2) Among the sixteen purificatory rites, Agnisvākāra (or taking up of sacrificial fire) is an important item in Malabar. From Vedic period Agni (Fire) had become a prominent God. Most of the verses in Ṛgveda are concerned with fire. The attachment of the Brahmins of Kerala to fire shows their antiquity.

3) Much importance is attached to the learning of scriptures and priest-hood in Kerala. There were 18 Maṭhas and residential institutions in Kerala for giving religious education.

4) The peculiar type of recitation of the Vedas of the Malayāla Brahmins and the accompanying gestures of their hands and the movements of the head at the time of recitation are considered by them to be ancient. Even today certain sounds are produced by them in the Vedic way. (For instance Samrāl—Samrāṭ; Vaṣār—Vasaṭ; Iḍe—Ile etc.).

5) In Malabar there is a customary atonement or expiation called Vṛāṭyastoma for those Brahmin boys who had not undergone investiture with the sacred thread within the stipulated time. This shows the stress laid on the need of religious education.

6) The custom that all the male members of the family except the family chief should be engaged in Śnātaka-vṛtī (should remain celibates even after education) is prevalent only in Malabar.

7) Much importance is attached to evening worship in Kerala. At that time the Vedic gods are not hailed. But Brahmins of other places do not seem to attach so much importance to this practice.

8) The Brahmins outside Kerala repeat the mantras uttered by the priest and perform the functions, at the time of meditation and worship. But in Kerala for meditation and worship with or without initiations a priest is not necessary. This indicates the practice in vogue during Vedic period before the priestly class became predominant.

9) The Nambūtiris have recognized only three Vedas.

10) The Kerala Brahmins wear only one sacred thread. The Nambūtiris became predominant in Kerala and began to have a hand in the various spheres of activities. Thus the Aryan civilization shook the customary faith and religion of Kerala from top to bottom and the Aryan religion hoisted its flag of victory here. Aryan literature also found its way into Kerala. The authors and scholars in Kerala began to imitate it. The Nambūtiris erected temples in Kerala with the help of local chieftains. The sounds of alphabets, sentence pattern, grammar, poetic tradition etc. of Malayālam language underwent a thorough change. Sanskrit education spread far and wide. They spread Aryan civilization through Kāṭītu and Kūṭiyāṭam (Narration of mythological stories with gestures etc. and collective dance) Paṭhaka and Saṅghakkāli (Musical lectures and dramatic performances), in connection with festivals in the temples.

They absorbed many of the customs and manners of Kerala. The Nambūtiris who had adopted priest-hood as their career had amassed wealth and landed property in the capacities of priests and authorities of the temples. Some of them became Kings (e.g. King of Iḍappally, King of Campakaśeri etc.). They kept up the contact with the people of the locality by means of morganatic marriages and made their positions secure. Thus these people, though a small minority, were able to hold sway over the people of Kerala for a long time.

NAMMĀLVĀR. The first of the twelve great Ālvārs. The Saivite devotees of South India are called Nāyānārs and the Ūravāvite devotees, Ālvārs. The word Ālvār means, a devotee of God. The Ūravāva religion says that the twelve Ālvārs are the incarnations of Adiśeṣa and Garuḍa the followers and the embodied deities of the Conch and the discus the weapons of Viṣṇu. It is mentioned in Śrīmad Bhāgavata that divine persons who are followers of Viṣṇu will incarnate on the earth in Kaliyuga and that their native places will be the banks of the holy rivers in Drāvīḍa such as Tāmraparṇi, Kṛṣṇamāḷa (Vaigai), Paṭayasanī (Pāpanāśini) and Kāverī. It is stated about these divine persons in Viṣṇumāhātmya that they would take birth in any caste and compose Drāvīḍa songs and thereby propagate lofty truths. The collection of Drāvīḍa songs thus composed by the Ālvārs is called ‘Divya Prabandha’ (Divine Composition).

There are four thousand songs in four parts in the Divine composition and hence it has the name Nālāyira Prabandha ‘Four thousand composition’. The theme of the 1st and 2nd thousands is a secret known as ‘Tirumanṭra’ (the divine spell). The third thousand is concerned with the ‘Caramaḷaḷa’ (the verse of death) and in the fourth “Divya/mantra’ is dealt with. The Tirumāṇaḷ (the divine spell) is the collection of three words Om, namaḥ and Nārāyaṇaṇa. ‘Om’ and ‘namᾰ’ are explained in the first thousand and the word Nārāyaṇaṇa in the second thousand of the composition. The Caramaḷaḷa (the verse of death) is the last utterance of the songstress-priest. It is a propagation of the theme of seeking refuge. The individual soul has to seek refuge under the universal soul, unconditionally. This is what is called ‘Prapatti. Divya/mantra (the two fold mantra) deals with the aim and the ways for the realisation of that aim. It would be possible only by the help of Lakṣmī Bhāgavati (the goddess Lakṣmī). It is a verse of only two lines.

The first and foremost among the Ālvārs is Nammālvār. ‘Tiruvāyvom’ is his work. It had been predicted in Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa that at the beginning of Kaliyuga. Viṣṇu Śeniṇi named Viṣvakṣena would incarnate as Nammālvār and that he would restate the Vaiṣṇavite religion. It is hinted in Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa that Nammālvār would incarnate in Šrīnagarī (Tirunagarī) on the banks of river Tāmraparṇi in the Kingdom of Pândya. As was fore-told Nammālvār was born in Tirunagarī. The present name of this place is ‘Ālvār tirunagarī’.

There is a traditional lore about the birth of Nammālvār. There was a ruling chief named Kārīyar in Tirunagarī. Udayamanṭkāyār was his wife. The couple once went to the Vaiṣṇavite temple near Mahendra mountain known as Tirukkuṟuṅkuṭi temple and prayed to the god consecrated there called Nambi, for a son. Reply was given through the priests that the god himself would take birth as their son. Accordingly Udayamaññkayār gave birth to Nammālvār. Scholars say that the birth of Nammālvār was on the 43rd day of Kaliyuga—that is in B.C.3102.

Nammālvār had another name Parāṇikusā, Some believe that he was the incarnation of portions of Seneśa and the jewel Kaustubha. Some say that there are portions of Mahāviṣṇu, Paññayudha, Adiśeṣa and Seneśa in Nammālvār. The Vaisāgvites have given Nammālvār a lofty place. The infant born to Kāriyār and Udayamaññkayār was not an ordinary one. Generally infants at birth are covered with a case of air called 'Satātha'. Because of this they lose the memory of previous birth. But Nammālvār had no Satātha. So he got the name 'Satāthakopa'. The parents were amazed at the infant which lay still without beating its legs, and crying or sucking its mother's breasts. The bright infant was taken to the Vaisāgvite temple on the twelfth day. Because of his difference from ordinary infants he was named Māra. A golden cradle studded with jewels was hung on the branch of a tamarind tree and laying the child in it, the parents went home. That tamarind tree still stands there. The devotees believe that that tree also is a portion of Adiśeṣa.

Nammālvār spent sixteen years under the tamarind tree without opening the eyes or uttering a single word. In the sixteenth year a wise man who could understand the dignity of Nammālvār came there. The person was the Madhura Kavi Ālvār. After this Nammālvār sat under the tamarind tree and sang songs of praise of Nārāyaṇa. Madhura Kavi set tunes for them and sang them. Everybody who heard them was struck with wonder and stood still. Nammālvār spent his days under the tamarind tree in meditation and contemplation. At the age of 35 he entered heaven.

NAMUCI I. A fierce Rākṣasa (giant). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 22, that this giant was the son of Prajañapati Kaśyapa by his wife Danu. This fierce giant was killed by Indra. There is a story in the Purāṇas describing how Namuci was killed.

Under the leadership of Namuci a great army of the giants invaded the realm of the gods. Indra came with an army of devas. Though the giants were defeated in the battle Indra was not able to kill Namuci. To save himself from the attack of Indra, Namuci got into the radiance of the Sun and hid himself there. Indra found him out and made a treaty with him, the conditions of which were as said by Indra:—

"Oh, noble giant, I will not kill you by wet thing or dry thing, in the night or in the day. What I say is true."

According to this treaty it became impossible for Indra to kill Namuci either with wet things or with dry things and either in the day time or in the night. Only when Indra had agreed to these conditions did Namuci come out.

The battle continued and Indra drove away Sūmbha and Nīṣumbha the elder brothers of Namuci, who went to Pātāla. Indra ran after Namuci and in the evening Indra found him hiding on the sea shore and killed him with the foam of the sea. As Indra had violated the condition of the treaty the severed head of Namuci followed Indra. With this Indra incurred the sin of Brahma-hatyā (killing a Brahmin). To get remission from this sin Indra approached Brahmā. He was advised to bathe in Aruṇāṣāngama and doing so Indra got remission of his sin. From that day onwards Aruṇāṣāngama became a holy bath (tirtha). (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 40).

NAMUCI II. An army-captain of Hiranyaśaka. In the battle with Indra, Namuci made him unconscious and the elephant Airāvata thrust its tusks on the ground. After that by his magic and sorcery he created many creatures. But Viṣṇu destroyed all those creatures with his discus Sudarṣana. At last Indra killed Namuci. (Padma Purāṇa, Śṛṣṭikhaṇḍa).

NAMUCI III. Another valiant captain of Hiranyaśaka. He sent five arrows against Indra in a fierce battle. But Indra cut all the five arrows in the midway. Then by his magic and sorcery Namuci spread darkness everywhere. Indra defeated that strategy also. Then Namuci dashed forward and taking hold of the tusks of Airāvata shook Indra down. Indra stood up and cut off the head of Namuci with his sword. (Padma Purāṇa, Śṛṣṭi Khanda).

NANAGĀBHU. A King of the family of Ḍayātī. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

NANDA I. (NANDAKA). See under Nandagopa.

NANDA II. (See under Vararuci).

NANDA III. A son of Dhrītāręţtra. In the battle of Kurukṣetra, Bhīmasena killed him. (M.B. Karna Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 19).

NANDA IV. A serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa (Mahābhārata, Udāyoga Parva, Chapter 103, Stanza 12).

NANDA V. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 64).

NANDA VI. A synonym of Bhagavān Viṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 149, Stanza 69).

NANDA I. Wife of Harṣa the third son of Dharmadeva. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Stanza 33).

NANDA II. A river. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 214, Stanza 6, that while Arjuna had been engaged in a pilgrimage visiting the holy places in the east, he reached the banks of the rivers Nandā and Aparanandā. Many of the scholars are of opinion that this river flowed through the eastern side of the forest Naimiśaranya. When the hermit Dhaumya talks about the holy places of the east to Yudhiṣṭhira, he says as follows about the river Nandā. "The beautiful mountain Kuṇḍoda is a place which abounds in roots, fruits and water. Nala the King of Niṣadha, who was weary of thirst rested here. There is a holy temple here called Devavana which is thronged by hermits. Near this temple there is a mountain through the top of which, two rivers Bāhuḍa and Nandā flow." (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 87).

During the time of the forest life of the Pāṇḍavas, Yudhiṣṭhira travelled with the hermit Lomaśa, through the basin of the rivers Nandā, and Aparanandā. During the Paurāṇic times some deities had lived in the basin of the river Nandā, and men began to come there to visit the deities. The devas (gods) did not like this and so they rendered the place inaccessible to men. From that time onwards the river basin of Nandā and the mount Hamsākīta have become prohibited area for human beings. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 110).

NANDABHAḌRA. A righteous Vaśya. Having been childless for a long time this Vaśya, who was an ardent devotee of God Kapileśvara, got a son in his old age. But he died after his marriage. With this calamity Nandabhandra became a man of abstinence and began to try to acquire spiritual knowledge. After a while a seven-year-old boy appeared before the Vaśya and quenched his thirst for spiritual knowledge. Later with meditation on Śiva and the Sun, Nandabhandra attained heaven. (Skanda Purāṇa, Chapters 1, 2 and 46).

NANDAGO ḌA. Foster-father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

1) Previous birth. There are two stories about the previous birth of NANDAGOPA.

(i) Droṇa, one of the eight Vasus and his wife Dhārā once committed a mistake, not becoming the gods. Brahmā who found it out, cursed the couple to take birth in the family of cowherds. Droṇa and Dhārā prayed for remission. Brahmā told them that Mahāviṣṇu would incarnate as their son as Śrī Kṛṣṇa and that after that birth they would be liberated from the curse. Accordingly Droṇa took birth as NANDAGOPA and Dhārā as Yaśodā. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

(ii) Once a King named Candrasena sat in the Mahākāla temple in Ujjayinī to perform penance. Śiva was pleased at his penance and gave him a jewel. That brilliant precious stone fulfilled all his desires. Other kings heard about this jewel and came to war to take possession of the jewel. The King came and took refuge in the temple. At this time a son named Śrīkara was born to a cowherdess in Ujjayinī. He was god-fearing since childhood. Śrīkara came to Mahākāla temple and sat in worship and meditation and attained the goodwill of Śiva. The Kings who came in chase of Candrasena could not approach the temple because of the unearthly brilliance that radiated from Śrīkara. Not knowing the reason the kings stood staring and Hanumān instantly appeared before them and said, “Hear this, oh Kings! Śrīkara is not a mere cowherd boy. The God is pleased with him. In his eighth birth from today he will be born in Ambāḍi under the name NANDAGOPA. Then Mahāviṣṇu will incarnate as the son of NANDAGOPA under the name Śrī Kṛṣṇa.”

NANDAGOPA was the eighth birth of this Śrīkara. (Śiva Purāṇa, Sanipradosamāhātmya).

2) Varuṇa carried away NANDAGOPA. While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was living in Ambāḍi as the foster-son of NANDAGOPA, NANDAGOPA went to bathe in the river Yamunā. While he was taking a dip under the water a servant of VARUṆA carried him away to the realm of VARUṆA. As NANDAGOPA disappeared the people of Ambāḍi ran here and there in grief. At last Śrī Kṛṣṇa jumped into the water and reached the city of VARUṆA, who praised Śrī Kṛṣṇa and said that it was to see Śrī Kṛṣṇa that he had carried NANDAGOPA away, and requested for pardon. Śrī Kṛṣṇa pardoned VARUṆA and brought NANDAGOPA to Ambāḍi. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

3) NANDAGOPA swallowed by a great mountain-snake. (See under Kṛṣṇa, Para 21).

NANDAKA II. A sword of Mahāviṣṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 147, Stanza 15).

There is a story explaining how Mahāviṣṇu came by this sword NANDAKA. In days of old Brahmā performed a sacrifice on the banks of the heavenly Ganga on a peak of mount Mahāmeru. While Brahmā was sitting in deep meditation in the sacrifice Loḥāsura was seen coming to cause disturbance to the sacrifice. Immediately a male being came into existence from the meditation of Brahmā. The male being paid homage to Brahmā and the devas (gods) became glad and they encouraged the male being. Because the gods greeted the male one, he was changed to a sword called NANDAKA (that which is greeted or thanked for). That sword was received by Mahāviṣṇu at the request of the gods. When Mahāviṣṇu slowly took it Loḥāsura came near. He was an asura of blue complexion, with thousand hands of adamantine fists. By wielding his club he drove away the gods. Mahāviṣṇu cut down his limbs one by one and those organs became metals by the touch of the sword. Then Mahāviṣṇu killed the asura. Then Mahāviṣṇu granted NANDAKA a pure body and various boons. Afterwards NANDAKA became the deity of weapons on the earth. Thus Brahmā, who got rid of the disturbance by the aid of Viṣṇu, completed the sacrifice. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 245).

NANDANA I. Son of Hīranyakāśipū. Pandana who had been ruling over the Śveta island had obtained boons from Śiva and had become invincible. He ruled over the kingdom for ten thousand years and then attained KAILĀSA and became a gaṇaṇa of Śiva. (Śiva Purāṇa, Uttara Khaṇḍa, Chapter 2).

NANDANA II. One of the two attendants given to Skandadeva by Aśvinikumāras. (M.B. Śanti Parva, Chapter 44).

NANDANA III. A divine park in the world of devas (gods). Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 45, that those who had brought the organs of senses under control and who had not killed any living being, would be permitted to enter this park.

NANDAŚRAMA. A holy place. Ambā, the daughter of the King of Kāśi once performed penance in this holy place. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 186, Stanza 26).

NANDI I. A Deva Gandharva. He was present at the birth celebration of Arjuna. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, Stanza 56).

NANDI II. One of the divine attendants of Śiva. (See under NANDIKEŚA).

NANDIGRĀMĀ. It is stated in Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Ayodhyākanda that while Śrī Rāma had been leading forest life, Bharata lived in NANDIGRĀMĀ for twelve years worshipping the sandals of Śrī Rāma. This NANDIGRĀMA is situated nearly fourteen miles away from Ayodhyā. (Faizabad).

NANDIKEŚA. The chief of the Bhūta Gaṇas (the attendants) of Śiva. For the story of how NANDIKEŚA once took the form of a monkey and cursed Rāvana, see under RĀvana.

NANDIKUNDA. A holy place. In Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Stanza 60, it is mentioned that the sin incurred by causing abortion, will be washed away by taking a bath in this holy place.

NANDINĪ I. A cow of the world of the gods (Devas). (See under Kāmadhenu).
NANDINI II. A holy place. In this place there is a well esteemed by the gods. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanza 15, that those who bathe in this holy well will obtain the fruits of Naramedhayājña (human sacrifice).

NANDISENA. One of the four attendants given to Subrahmanya by Brahmā. Lohitākṣa, Ghanṭākarna and Kumudāmāli were the other three attendants. (M.B. Śālya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 24).

NANDISVARA. See under Nandikesa.

NANDIVARDHAN. I. The name of the conch of Śatyaki. (M.B. Śālya Parva, Chapter 61, Dāśīnāya- pāṭha).

NANDIVARDHANA II. A King of the solar dynasty. He was the son of Virada and the father of Sukuṭu. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 9).

NANDIVEGA. A Kṣatriya family of ancient India. A famous King named Śama was born in this family. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Stanza 17).

NAPTA. An eternal god concerned with offerings to the Manes. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Stanza 37).

NAPUMSAKA. (EUNUCH). Mention is made in Brāhmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 48, that the semen introduced into the womb of the woman by the man at the time of coition, will get mixed with the blood in the womb, and that the issue will be male, female or eunuch according to the proportion of the mixture. In the mixture of semen and blood, if blood exceeds semen the issue will be female and if semen exceeds, it will be male child and if both are equal the child will be a eunuch.

NARA I. A hermit of divine power.
1) Birth. Brahmā created Dharmadeva from his breast. Truthful and righteous Dharmā married ten daughters of Dākṣa. Several sons were born to Dharmā of his ten wives. But foremost among them were Hāri, Kṛṣṇa, Nara and Nārāyaṇa. Hāri and Kṛṣṇa became great yogins and Nara and Nārāyaṇa became great hermits of penance. The Nara-Nārāyaṇas lived in the holy Asylum of Badarikāśrama in the vicinity of the Himālayas for a thousand years performing penance to Brahmā. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skanda 4).
2) Giving birth to Uraśā. See under Ura 1, Para 1.
3) Keeper of Amṛta (Ambrosia). The Devas (gods) and the asuras (demons) together churned the sea of milk and obtained Ambrosia (the celestial nectar of immortality). Mahāviśnu took the guise of a fascinating woman and obtained the Amṛta by stealth from the asuras and gave it to the devas. The asuras waged a terrible war with the devas. At that time, at the request of the devas, Nara and Nārāyaṇa took sides with the devas, and fought against the asuras as a consequence of which the asuras were defeated. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 31, it is stated that from that day onwards Indra entrusted the keeping of the celestial Nectar with the hermit named Nara.
4) Damabhodbhava brought under control. See under Dambhodbhava.
5) Conflict with Śiva. Because he was not invited to the sacrifice by Dākṣa, Śiva got angry and sent his trident against Dākṣa's sacrifice. The trident completely destroyed the sacrifice and flew through the air here and there. Then it reached Badaryāśrama and hit the breast of Nārāyaṇa who was sitting engaged in penance. By the force of the utterance of the sound 'Hum', made by Nārāyaṇa, the trident was ejected from his breast. Finding no accommodation there it flew back to Śiva, who getting angry at this rebuff approached Nara-Nārāyaṇas with the intention of exterminating them. Nara took a grass from the ground and discharged it at Śiva. Instantly the grass became an axe. It flew round Śiva to attack him. Śiva broke the axe. From that day onwards Śiva got the name 'Khaṇḍaparāsū' (one who broke the axe). In this story it is said that the trident which had returned from the breast of Nārāyaṇa heated the hair of Śiva to such an extent that they were dried as dry grass. So Śiva came to be called 'Mufṭja-keśa' (with hair having the colour of dry grass). (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 343).
6) Fight with Prahlāda. Once Cyavana the son of Bhṛgu went to Nākuleśvara tīrtha (Bath) to take his bath in the river Narmadā. As soon as he got into the water the serpent called Kekaralahita caught hold of him. Cyavana meditated on Viṣṇu. So the poison of the serpent did not affect him. The huge serpent dragged Cyavana to Pāṭāla (the Nether world). But as his poison did not affect the hermit the serpent left the prey and went away. The Nāga damsels welcomed him and showed hospitality. Being greeted by the Nāga damsels he travelled through Pāṭāla and reached the great city of Dānavas. The asura chiefs greeted him with respect. Prahlāda met Cyavana, and received him with pleasure. The hermit said to Prahlāda, "I came to bathe in the Mahātirtha and worship Nākuleśvara. When I got into the river a serpent caught hold of me and brought me to Pāṭāla, and made it possible for me to meet you." Hearing these words of Cyavana the King of the asuras said: "Oh good Lord! which are the holy baths in the earth, the sky and the Pāṭāla? Would you be pleased to tell us?" Cyavana replied: "Oh! powerful and mighty King! The holy baths are Naimiṣa on the earth, Pūṣkara on the sky and Cakra tīrtha in Pāṭāla; these are the most important ones."

The King of the Daityas decided to go to Naimiṣa and said: ""We must go and bathe in the Naimiṣa tīrtha. We could visit and worship Viṣṇu with eyes as beautiful as lotus."" Obeying the words of the King, preparations were made instantly and the asuras started from Rasātalī for Naimiṣa.

The mighty host of Daityas and Dānavas reached Naimiṣa and bathed in the tīrtha. After that Prahlāda went to the forest for hunting. As he was walking thus he saw the river Sarasvatī. Near the river there was a Pine tree with very big branches, all of which were covered with arrows, the head of one at the tail of another. Prahlāda saw near the tree two hermitis, with shaved hair, clad in the hide of black antelope, performing penance. Near them were two perfectly made divine bows named Sārīga and Ajagava and two quivers which would never become empty. Prahlāda questioned them without knowing that they were Nara and Nārāyaṇa. The questioning ended in a contest. The hermit Nara stood up and taking the bow Ajagava began sending showers of arrows at Prahlāda. Prahlāda checked every one of them. The hermit made his fight more severe. Prahlāda also withstood it. At last pushing Nara back Nārāyaṇa came to the front. The fight between Prahlāda and Nārāyaṇa was fierce. In the end Prahlāda fell down, his breast being pierced by the arrow of Nārāyaṇa.
Prahlāda realized that the hermit Nārāyaṇa was none but Viṣṇu. He praised Nārāyaṇa (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 8).

7) Other information.
(i) On the occasion of the stripping of Pāñcālí of her clothes at the palace of the Kauravas, Pāñcālí cried, calling Nara and Nārāyaṇa. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 68, Stanza 46).
(ii) Arjuna and Śrī Kṛṣṇa were the rebirths of Nara and Nārāyaṇa. (See under Arjuna).
(iii) It is stated in Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Chapter 394, Stanza 9, that the hermit Nara was one of the four incarnations taken by Mahāviṣṇu in the Manusya yuga (age of man) of the Śvāyambhuva Manvantara.
(iv) It is mentioned in Padma Purāṇa, Utṛtā Khaṇḍa, Chapter 2, that, of the two viz. Nara and Nārāyaṇa, Nara was of fair complexion and Nārāyaṇa of dark complexion.
(v) It was because of the curse of the hermit Bhrgu that Nara-Nārāyaṇas took birth as Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa in the Dwāpara-yuga. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 4).
(vi) The meaning of the word ‘Nara’ is he who is not damaged. The universal soul named Nara has created water and so water got the name ‘Nāram’. Because he lives in that water which has the name Nāram, the universal soul got the name Nārāyaṇa. (Manusmṛti, Chapter 1, Stanza 10).
(vii) For the other incarnations of Nara see under Raktajā.

NARA II. A Gandharva (semigod). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 10, stanza 14 that this Nara stays in the presence of Kubera.

NARA III. A King of Ancient India. He never tasted meat in his life. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Stanza 64).

NARA IV. One of the wives of Uśīnara, a King of the family of the Aṅgā Kings. Uśīnara had several wives such as Nṛgā, Nara, Kṛmī, Daśā, Drṣṭadvatī and so on. Nṛgā was born from Nṛgā, Nara from Nara, Kṛmī from Kṛmī, Suvarṇa from Daśā and Śibi from Drṣṭadvatī. All these sons became Kings. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

NARA V. An ancient place in South India. (M.B. Bhṛṣṇa Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 60).

NARĀCA. A particular type of arrow.

NĀRADA I. A very famous sage of the Purāṇas.

1) Birth. Nārada was the son of Brahmā, born from his lap. Brahmā mentally created the famous saptarṣis, Marici, Aigirās, Atri, Pulastya, Vasiṣṭha, Pulaha and Kruṭi. From Brahmā's anger was born Rudra, from his lap Nārada, from his right thumb Dakṣa, from his mind Sānaka and others and from his left thumb a daughter called Viraṇī. Dakṣa wedded Viraṇī. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

2) Various births of Nārada. The Purāṇas refer to more than seven prominent births of Nārada. He was first born as the son of Brahmā, and after that, on account of Brahmā's curse he was born as the Gandharva called Upabarhaṇa. Following that he was born as the son of emperor Drumila and was named Nārada. Again born as the son of Brahmā under the name Nara, he married Mālāti and ended his life as a monkey. He was again born as the son of Brahmā and was cursed by Dakṣa. Afterwards he was born as the son of Dakṣa and also as a worm. All these births did not occur in one and the same Manvantara. Nārada may be noticed doing something or other in connection with the various characters in the Purāṇas. There is no other character in the Purāṇas occupying so popular a place in them as Nārada. The important five births of Nārada are described below.

(i) The Gandharva called Upabarhaṇa. Nārada born from the lap of Brahmā desired to remain a celibate. But, Brahmā suggested that he should assume responsibility for procreation as his (Brahmā's) other sons like Marici and Sanaka had already become celibates. Nārada did not accept this suggestion of Brahmā at which the latter got angry and cursed Nārada to lose his knowledge and to marry fifty beautiful women. Brahmā continued:—"You will be born as a Gandharva known as Upabarhaṇa and will become a great musician. You will be unrivalled in the handling of the Viṇa. After your death as the Gandharva you will be born as the son of a servant woman, and as such you will be a great devotee of Viṇu. Afterwards you will be born as my son when I will impart knowledge to you."

There was a Gandharva called Citraketu, who performed penance on the banks of the Puṣkara lake to propitiate Śiva for a child. Śiva appeared and blessed Citraketu to the effect that Nārada, the son of Brahmā, would be born as his son. Accordingly the wife of Citraketu delivered a son whom the family priest named Upabarhaṇa. The boy grew up as a devotee of Viṇu. Brhaspati taught him the worship of Hari (Viṇu). Upabarhaṇa lived on the slopes of the Himalayas performing penance. While Upabarhaṇa was one day engaged in Samādhi fifty daughters of the Gandharva called Citraratha passed that way, and they fell in love with Upabarhaṇa, who was in Samādhi. He awoke from Samādhi on hearing the melodious songs of the fifty damsels who stood there with palms joined in reverence. Upabarhaṇa too fell in love with them, and he married all the fifty girls. He returned with them to the palace and lived there for thousands of years. Once the Gandharvas and the Apsaras were invited to sing the story of Viṇu in Brahma-loka. Upabarhaṇa accompanied them. He became lustful towards Rambhā. The Prajāpatis, who noticed it got angry, and Upabarhaṇa fell-nigh dead due to their curse returned home. He told his wives all that had happened to him. He spread a darbha grass on the ground and lay on it and died. Mālāti, the eldest of his wives, got ready to curse Brahmā, Yama and Mrtyu. In great consternation they sought refuge under Viṇu, who comforted and sent them back to Mālāti. They saluted her. Then a brahmin, who went there questioned Brahmā about the death of Upabarhaṇa. The brahmin told him that, according to previous decision, life for another thousand years remained for Upabarhaṇa, but he died in the meantime on account of the curse of Prajāpatis. Immediately the brahmin assumed the form of Viṇu. The brahmin blessed Upabarhaṇa who woke up from death rubbing his eyes. He lived happily at home with his wives. He was blessed with children and grandchildren. Knowing that his end was near Upabarhaṇa and Mālāti spent their time in austeries on the banks of the Gaṅgā. At last Upabarhaṇa expired, and Mālāti ended her life in his funeral pyre. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).
(ii) Son of Kalavati. There lived in Kanyakubja the emperor called Drumila. He, along with his wife Kalavati, performed penance on the bank of the Gangā for an offspring. Kalavati pleased Kaśyapa, by her worship and with his blessing she became pregnant. Drumila, who in the meantime had renounced everything in life, decided to spend the rest of his life in the forest itself. He gifted away all his wealth to brahmans and died in the forest. Though Kalavati got ready to follow him in the funeral pyre, a celestial voice stopped her and she refrained from committing self-immolation. She returned to the village and lived as a slave in a brahmín's house. In due course of time she delivered a son. On the birth of the child it rained in the land which was suffering from failure of rains, and because of that the brahmín master of Kalavati named the child Nārada, meaning he who gives water. When the child Nārada grew up he told his mother the story about his former birth. He turned out to be a great devotee of Viṣṇu. Meanwhile, Kalavati, who went to milk the cow one night, was bitten to death by a snake, and Nārada was orphaned. Śīva and three attendants of his who went there in disguise were pleased at Nārada's great devotion for Viṣṇu and his service-mindedness. He lived on the left-overs given by them. He repeated songs sung by them about Viṣṇu. Gradually Nārada became perfect devotee of Viṣṇu and a unique master of music. Śīva and others imparted Bhāgavata to Nārada before they left him. Nārada who thus attained divine knowledge performed penance for many years on the banks of the Gangā and died there. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

(iii) Birth as Kāpi (Monkey). Nārada, who expired on the banks of the Gangā was again born as the son of Brahmā. Though the father wanted the son to get married the latter preferred to spend his days in the meditation on God. Brahmā then told his son as follows:—

"Why are you so much afraid of the house-holder's life? Many people have attained salvation by following the four āśramas (stages in life) like that of the celibate, the house-holder, the anchorite and the sannyāsin. In fact, only such people will be able to serve man and God. A girl named Mālātī alias Damayantī is born to maharshi Śaṅkīa, and Śīva has granted her the boon that in this birth you will become her husband. You, therefore, go to Naranāraśyaṇas engaged in penance on the Himalayas. They will give Mālātī in marriage to you."

Accordingly Nārada went to Badarikāśrama where in the presence of Naranāraśyaṇa he married Mālātī. During those days Nārada and sage Parvata started on a pilgrimage in the course of which they went to the palace of emperor Śaṅkīa to observe Cāturnāśya. The emperor left a well-furnished house at the disposal of the pilgrims. He also deputed his daughter Damayantī to serve them. The humble service of Damayantī pleased them both. But, Damayantī's devotion towards Nārada was more ardent and both of them noticed this fact. One day Parvata asked Nārada whether Damayantī did not take a special interest in him (Nārada) and to this Nārada answered 'Yes, I too think so'. Parvata got angry at this answer of Nārada and told him thus:—"We had agreed at the time when we started on this tour to divulge all secrets to each other. Now you have broken that contract. Why did you not tell me about Damayantī's partiality for you? You become, therefore, a monkey". Nārada, in turn, cursed Parvata as follows:—"You will live in hell in Yamaloka for a hundred years."

Accordingly Nārada became a monkey and Parvata lived in hell. At this juncture Śaṅkīa's ministers advised him to marry his daughter to a prince, and the news made her very sad. Śaṅkīa understood the reason for his daughter's sadness from her nurse. The father had ultimately to yield to her wishes and Damayantī married Nārada, who had been turned into a monkey. Hundred years rolled by, and Parvata, the period of his curse being over, returned to the palace of Śaṅkīa. Nārada treated Parvata duly well, and pleased at the treatment, he gave redemption to Nārada from the curse. Nārada lived very happily with Damayantī for a long time at the palace, and after the demise of Damayantī he attained Brahma-loka. (Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha).

(iv) Born as Dakṣa's son. After the creation of the Devas was over, Brahmā called Dakṣa to him and asked him to marry Virāṇī and procreate, and Dakṣa accordingly begot five thousand sons of Virāṇī. They were called Haryāśvas. Finding that the Haryāśvas also were interested in the procreation of children Nārada, the Devaṛi, approached and told them as follows:—

"Oh! Haryāśvas! You who are exceptionally vital people seem to be trying to procreate children. But, you have not enquired as to whether there is enough space on earth for such large numbers of people. You are just like children who know nothing about the world. How will you procreate people? Since you could live absolutely free in the sky, why do you not find out the limit of the earth?"

The Haryāśvas thereupon ran away in different places to find out the limit of the earth, and they have not, like the rivers which entered the ocean, returned yet. At the loss of the Haryāśvas in the above manner, Dakṣa created the Śabalāśvas, whom also Nārada sent away to various parts of the earth. Dakṣa again created five thousand people whom also Nārada drove away in the above manner. Angry and sad at this, Dakṣa cursed Nārada thus:—"Well, Nārada! if my children roam about like this because of you. Therefore, you too in future will be roaming about without a permanent abode. Moreover, you will have rebirth as my son." Nārada became a world-trotter on account of the above curse of Dakṣa. He was also reborn as the son of Dakṣa. (Devī Bhāgavata, 7th Skandha and Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 15).

(v) Born as a worm. There is a story about Nārada being born as a worm. On the approach of a chariot, the worm moved quickly away from its route lest its wheel should crush it to death. The King seated in the chariot burst out into laughter at the above sight when the worm told him as follows:—"There is nothing to be laughed at in my action. In every birth the body is much dear to the ātman (soul). Just as you love your body I also love and protect my body. (Mahābhārata).

3) Viṣṇu showed Nārada the function of Māyā. See under Tāladvajā I

4) Nārada became a woman. While staying once with Kṛṣṇa at Dvārakā, Nārada and the former went out on a tour in an aerial chariot. On the way they saw a stream and Kṛṣṇa stopped the chariot there as Nārada wanted to quench his thirst at the stream. Nārada drank water from the stream disobeying Kṛṣṇa's injunction that he should bathe before drinking water, and lo! the next moment Nārada was turned into a woman and when 'she' looked around neither Kṛṣṇa nor the chariot was to be seen. She wandered about in the forest and at last reached an āśrama. When the Rṣi of the āśrama awoke from his samādhi he saw standing before him a beautiful woman who requested him to accept her as his disciple. He readily granted her request. The preceptor married the disciple and in due course of time she became the mother of sixty children. One day all the sixty children and their father expired together. The grief-stricken widow felt too weak to perform the obsequies of the dead. An extraordinary hunger also held her in its grips. She raised her hand to pluck a fruit from the mango tree that stood nearby but could not reach the mango above. She placed together the corpses one on the other, mounted upon the heap of dead bodies and plucked the mango-fruit. Immediately a brahmin arrived on the spot and exhorted the widow on the impropriety of taking food without bathing after the death of husband and children. Then the widow entered the stream and dived in its waters holding above water the hand in which was held the mango, and lo! it was Nārada who came out from the water. Only the hand, which had been held above water and did not therefore get wet, remained like that of a woman with bangles thereon. The brahmin, who stood there on the banks of the stream transformed himself into Kṛṣṇa. As ordered by Kṛṣṇa Nārada again dived with the whole of his body in the water when the hand also turned into that of a man. The mango held in the hand turned into an excellent Vīṇā. And Kṛṣṇa told Nārada: 'The Rṣi who lived with you as your husband and who is no more is Kālapuruṣa, and the sixty children are years Prabhava, Viabhava etc.

Kṛṣṇa and Nārada then returned to Dwārakā. (Bhāgavata. 7th Skandha).

5) Nārada met the woman called Bhakti. When Kalikāla held the earth in its grips Nārada, on a particular occasion, went round the world viewing the evils of Kali, and he saw a young woman immersed in grief sitting on the banks of the Yamunā, the sportsfield of Kṛṣṇa. On both sides of her two old men were breathing in an unconscious state, and the woman, weeping was trying to restore them to consciousness. Many other women were fanning the unconscious men and trying to comfort the woman. Nārada approached the young woman when she spoke to him as follows: 'Oh! great sage, please put an end to my grief, because your words will remove all grief. I am called Bhakti and these two old men are my sons, one of whom is known as Jñāna (knowledge) and the other Vairāgya (renunciation), and they have become old due to the impact of time. The others found here are sacred rivers, who have come to serve me. But, the service of nobody will do me good.'

I was born in the Drāvida region, grew up in Karnāṭaka, lived here and there in Mahārāṣṭra and became old at Gujarāt whereat, atheists due to the evil of Kali inflicted wounds on me for a long time so that I became very weak. I did then go with my sons to the worshipful Vṛndāvana where I regained my old form and became a young woman in the shape of a ghost. My children suffer here in an unconscious state and I have to leave this for another place. I am so very sad that my sons have become old. Why did I become a young woman when my sons were old people? We three were touring together, and how then did this difference arise with regard to us? Is it not the proper thing for the mother to be older, and her children younger? You will please explain the reason for all these.'

Nārada read out the Vedas and the Vedāṅgas to her, to no purpose. Then Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumāra, Sanatsujāta and others (all of them the mental off-springs of Brahmā and gifted with eternal youth) asked Nārada to read out Bhāgavata to the sons of Bhakti. Nārada did so, and they became immediately young. (Padma Pūrṇa, Uttarākhandā).

6) Tested Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa was living in Dwārakā with his 16008 wives. Nārada once wanted to know how Kṛṣṇa managed to maintain so many wives without any difficulty or quarrels among them. To test it he first went to the palace of Rukmiṇī where both Kṛṣṇa and herself welcomed and treated him duly. Nārada next visited Satyabhāma's house where also Kṛṣṇa and herself welcomed and treated him well. In the houses of all the 16008 wives of Kṛṣṇa, Nārada had the same experience as above. He was wonder-struck at the divine powers of Kṛṣṇa and returned home praising Kṛṣṇa (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

7) Mahāviṣṇu put down Nārada's haughtiness. Nārada had been very proud about his greatness as a musician. Viṣṇu decided to put an end to this conceit of Nārada for which purpose he took Nārada to a forest. There they saw many women, whose limbs had been cut, crying on account of insufferable pain. Mahāviṣṇu asked the women who they were and why their limbs were cut. They answered Viṣṇu that they were Rāginīs, the presiding deities over the various tunes and that they were reduced to their present plight by the totally erroneous singing of the tunes by Nārada.

Nārada hung his head down in shame at the above answer of the women and he was cured of his conceit. (Adbhuta Rāmāyaṇa).

8) Hanūmān ashamed Nārada. Nārada once met Hanūmān, who sang a song for him. Enjoying the music Nārada placed his Viṇā on a rock which had been melted by the song of Hanūmān, and Nārada's Viṇā sank into the melted rock. When the singing by Hanūmān was over, the rock, as of old, became hard again and the Viṇā got stuck up with it. Hanūmān asked Nārada to melt the rock again with a song of his and take away his Viṇā. Nārada sang and sang, all to no purpose. The rock did not melt again. Then Hanūmān sang a song and the rock melted. After praising Hanūmān Nārada left the place ashamed. (Adbhuta Rāmāyaṇa).

9) Śrī Kṛṣṇa instructed Nārada about Māyā. Nārada once requested Kṛṣṇa to teach him about Māyā (illusion) and Kṛṣṇa told him that he would be taught sometime later. Afterwards, one day while Nārada was walking about, it began to rain and he took shelter from the rain in a hut near at hand. There was a beautiful young woman in the hut and Nārada fell in love with her. Nārada lived with her for many years and a number of children were born to them. But, a flood washed the mother and children off into the sea, and Nārada was grief-stricken. Then Kṛṣṇa appeared there and asked Nārada whether he loved Māyā. Nārada confessed that he understood Mâyâ very well and requested Kṛṣṇa to save him from attachments on account of Mâyâ.

10) Nārada and Sanatkumāra. Once Nārada went to Sanatkumāra and requested him to instruct him in spiritual wisdom telling the latter that he had already learnt the Vedas and all other scriptures and arts. Sanatkumāra accordingly taught him about the perfect nature, without either beginning or end, of supreme bliss. He taught Nārada thus: "Everything is God. God exists in all animate and inanimate objects, and God is superior to everything." (Chândogypopa-niśad).

11) Other information about Nārada.
(1) Once Brahmā advised him fifteen names which would wash off all the evils of Kali, i.e. Hare Râma Hare Râma Râma Râma Hare Hare, Hare Kṛṣṇa Hare Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa Hare Hare. (Kâlisaṭārāṇopaniśad).

(2) It was Nārada who gave the impetus to Vālmīki for the composition of Râmâyâna. Once Vālmīki asked Nārada, who had returned after a tour of the three worlds, who the greatest of men was. Nārada replied 'Śrī Râma' and related to Vālmīki a brief history of Râma. Nārada departed from there and Vālmīki went to the banks of the river Tamasâ. It was there that Vālmīki, at the sight of a hunter shooting down one of the Krauṅga birds, sang the famous verse ‘Mâniśâda’ etc. (See under Vālmīki).

(3) Nārada once went to Veda Vyâsa, who was very unhappy because he had no children. Questioned by Vyâsa as to the means to have a son Nārada advised him to worship Parâśakti (the supreme power). Accordingly Vyâsa worshipped Parâśakti at Kâlíśa and was gifted with the son Suka. (Devî Bhâgavata, 1st Skandha).

(4) When once Nārada came to Vaikuṇṭha playing on his Vînâ Lakṣmîdevi went bashfully into the inner apartment. In fact, she felt some love towards Nârada who asked Vîṣṇu for the reason thereof. Vîṣṇu replied that none existed who had absolutely conquered Mâyâ (illusion) and that Lakṣmîdevi felt love towards Nârada for a few moments because of the influence of Mâyâ. (Devî Bhâgavata, 6th Skandha).

(5) Once Agastya kicked down mount Vindhya and Nârada had also a small share in it. Vindhya had risen above the path of the sun as Nârada told him querulously that the Sun was circling Mahâmeru and was ignoring Vindhya. (Devî Bhâgavata, 10th Skandha).

(6) Nârada once went to Pâtâlaloka anû returned after having been duly treated as guest by Prahlâda. (Brahma Purâṇa, Chapter 23).

(7) Nârada once cursed Nâlakûbara and Manigrîva (sons of Kubera) and turned them into two trees. They regained their former form on being touched by the mortar drawn by Kṛṣṇa as a boy. (See under Nâlakûbara).

(8) It was Nârada who told Kaṁsa that Śrī Kṛṣṇa was in Ambâdi. He also told Kaṁsa about his previous history. (Bhâgavata, 10th Skandha).

(9) Vṛkṣâsura once asked Nârada who amongst the Tri-mûrtis used to be pleased most easily and Nârada mentioned Siva. It was therefore that the asura performed penance to Siva and pleased him. (Bhâgavata, 10th Skandha).

(10) The following story occurs in the Vâyu Purâṇa as to how Nârada's Vînâ became the musical instrument of the world. Once Nârada was in Indra's court when the latter asked Urvâšî to give a dance performance. She did so and in the course of the dance saw Jayanta, son of Indra seated before her. She was swept over by a passion towards Jayanta as a result of which some mistakes were made by her in dancing. Nârada, who was playing his Vînâ called Mahâti, also committed some mistakes. Nârada did so to attract the attention of the audience to Urvâši's mistakes. Noticing the mistake Agastya, who too was present on the occasion, cursed Urvâši to become a bamboo. He cursed that Nârada's Vînâ should become the Vînâ of the world (Vâyu Purâṇa).

(11) Nârada's curse was also one of the causes for Râvana's death. Râvana once requested Nârada to explain to him the meaning of 'Om', and when Nârada refused to oblige him he threatened to cut Nârada's tongue. Nârada in return cursed that the ten heads of Râvana would be cut. (Kamba Râmâyana, Yuddha Kârâda).

(12) During one Kalpa, Nârada was born as a Devagandharva as the son of Kaṁyapa by his wife Muni, (Âdi Parva, Chapter 1 and Śvarga-râhoṇa Parva, Chapter 5).

(13) On one occasion Nârada recited Mahâbhârata which included three lakhs of ślokas. (Mahâbhârata, Âdi Parva, Chapter 1, Śvarga-râhoṇa Parva, Chapter 5).

(14) Since he imparted Sâṅkhya wisdom to the sons of Dakṣa they renounced the world and departed for different places. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 75, Verse 7).

(15) He was present at the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 57).

(16) He also was present in the company of Devas and women, who attended Pâñcâlî's Śvayamâvara. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 7).

(17) After Pâñcâlî's Śvayamâvara he once went to the Pâṇḍavas at Indraprâshha and advised the five brothers not to quarrel over Pâñcâlî. It was he, who told them the story of the Sundopasundas. He also arranged that Pâñcâlî should live by turns of one year each with each of the five Pâṇḍava brothers. (Âdi Parva, Chapter 207, Verse 9).

(18) It was he who comforted and sent the apsaras called Vargâ, who was in the grip of a curse, to the south. (See under Vargâ).

(19) In the form of a catechism he gave advice on various topics to Dharmaputra. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 5).

(20) When proposals for building a palace at Indraprâshha for the Pâṇḍavas were under discussion Nârada went there and gave descriptions of the courts of Indra, Yama, Varûṇa, Kubera and Brahmâ. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapters 5-11).

(21) He related the story of Hariścandra to Dharmaputra. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 23).

(22) It was he who conveyed the information to Dwârakâ that Kṛṣṇa's grandson Aniruddha was imprisoned in the house of Bâra. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 38).

(23) He bathed Yudhiṣṭhira's head with holy waters at the Râjasûya Yaṁa. (Sabhâ Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 10).
(24) He prophesied that the Kauravas would get annihilated. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 80, Verse 33).
(25) When Pradyumna decided to kill Śāla, it was Nārada who saved him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 22).
(26) Nārada too was in the company of the Gandharvas who had gone to receive Arjuna at Indraloka.) Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 14).
(27) It was Nārada who informed Indra about the Svanirvāra of Damayantī. (Vana Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 20).
(28) It was he who informed Sagara that his 60,000 children had been burnt to ashes in the fire of Kapilamuni's anger. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 33).
(29) On another occasion he prevented Arjuna from using divinc arrows. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 18).
(30) While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Kāmyaka forest Nārada went there and enjoyed hearing stories related to Sage Mārkaṇḍeya. (Vana Parva, Chapter 183, Verse 47).
(31) Once he went to the palace of Āśvapati the father of Sāvitrī and described the good qualities and merits of Satyavān as a result of which Sāvitrī was married to Satyavān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 294, Verse 11).
(32) Once in the course of a search for a suitable husband for his daughter, Mātāli was taken by Nārada to Varuṇāloka and shown many wonderful sights. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 100).
(33) After that he took Mātāli to Garuḍa loka. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101).
(34) At last he got Mātāli's daughter married by Aryaka. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 1).
(35) He related Gālava's history to Dharmaputra. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 106).
(36) When fighting started between Bhīṣma and Pārāśu-rāma Nārada tried to stop them. (See under Ambā).
(37) He consoled Akampana who was grieving over the death of his son. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 52).
(38) He demanded Sañjaya's daughter in marriage. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 12).
(39) Sage Parvata cursed Nārada and he, in turn, cursed Parvata. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 7).
(40) He blessed that a son would be born to King Sañjaya. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 24).
(41) He consoled Sañjaya who was sad over the absence of children by telling the story of Varuṇa. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 26).
(42) He spoke about the charitable nature of King Suhotrā in the presence of Dharmaputra, who was feeling sad about the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 56).
(43) He extolled the charitable nature of King Paurava. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 57).
(44) He extolled the yajña conducted by emperor Śibi and also his generosity. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 58).
(45) He related the story of Śri Rāma to Yudhiṣṭhira. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 59).
(46) He related the story of Bhagṣratha. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 60).
(47) He convinced Yudhiṣṭhira about the reasons for the prosperity of Dilipa. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 61).
(48) He told Yudhiṣṭhira the stories of Māndhātā, Yayāti, Ambariṣa, Saśābindu, Saha, Rantideva, Bharata, Pṛthu, Parāśurāma and Śrīṇavāya. (Droṇa Parva, Chapters 61-70).
(49) Nārada too was present to see the pond created with arrows by Arjuna during the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 61).
(50) He lighted the lamp for the Pāṇḍavas during the great war. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 163, Verse 15).
(51) He prompted Vṛdhakanyā to get married. (See under Vṛddhakanyā).
(52) It was he who conveyed the news about the annihilation of the Kauravas to Balabhadra-rāma. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 25).
(53) He prevented Arjuna and Āśvatthāmā from using Brahmapātra during the great war. (Sauptika Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 11).
(54) He informed Yudhiṣṭhira about the curse on Karn. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 2).
(55) On another occasion he related to Yudhiṣṭhira the story of Suvarṇaśāthi, son of Sañjaya. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 31).
(56) He was also present in the company of the sages who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 8).
(57) It was he who prompted Dharmaputra to question Bhīṣma on topics of Dharma (righteousness) (Śānti Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 9).
(58) Once Nārada told wind that the Śālmaṇi tree claimed itself to be greater than wind. The next morning wind smashed the branches and leaves of the tree. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 155, Verse 9).
(59) Once he entered into a discussion about the creation of the world with Aśīta-devalamunī. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 3).

(67) He was also present with the sages who cursed Śamba, son of Kṛṣṇa, to deliver an iron rod. (Mausala Parva, Chapter 1).
(68) Synonyms for Nārada: Devarśi, Parameśṭhiṇa, Pārameśṭhiputra, Saruṣi etc.
NĀRADA II. One of the Brahmāvādī sons of Viśvāmitra (Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 53).
NĀRADĀGAṆANAPARVA. A sub parva of Aśrama-vāsikaparva, Chapters 37-39.
Náraśimha. A kingdom of ancient India. In Mahábhárata, Sabhá Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 6, it is mentioned that Sahadeva one of the Pándjávas, conquered this country.

NÁRAKI. One of the Brahmávádi sons of Viśvámitra. (Anúshasana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 59).

NÁRADAYAPURĀNA. One of the eighteen Puráṇas. (See under Puráṇas).

NÁRAKÁ. (NÁRAKÁSURA). A valiant Asura.

1) Birth. Once the Asura Hiranyáyaka was amusing himself by wading through the ocean and beating at the waves with his club. Varúṇa, the god of water, was alarmed at this and ran to Mahávisnu and told him every thing. Hearing this Mahávisnu got up to kill Hiranyáyaka. Hiranyáyaka who had assumed the form of a Boar carried the earth on his tusk and ran to Páṭāla. As the goddess earth had come into contact with the tusks of Hiranyáyaka she became pregnant and gave birth to an asura infant of immense might and power. That infant was Nárašisura.

When the infant was born from the impurity the sad goddess Earth went to Mahávisnu and requested him to save the child somehow. Mahávisnu pitied him and gave him Náraśisútra (Náraśisurá's weapon) and said: "Náraśisura! So long as this weapon is with you, nobody but me could kill you." Saying this he disappeared. (Bhágavata, Skandha 10).

2) Administration. Nárašisura made Prágjyotíśa his capital and ruled over the asuras as their emperor for a long time, all the while terrifying the Devas. Once this asura raped Kaśéru the daughter of Tvaśťa. He brought sixteen thousand and one hundred maidens from the women of the earth and the world of gods. He made them captives at Audaka on the top of the mountain Mañjiparvata. He appointed four mighty and fearful asuras: Hayágriva, Nisunda, Pañcánanda and Mura as gate-keepers of Prágjyotíśa. As they stood blocking the way up to Devayána, nobody dared to enter Prágjyotíśa. The ten sons of Nárašisura guarded the harem. At the boundary of the country Murásura had tied six thousand ropes with a sword at the end of each. So enemies dared not come near the boundary. When Sugriva gave instructions to the monkeys who were sent in search of Sítá, about the route they were to follow, he had mentioned about the city of Prágjyotíśa. Mention is made in Valmíki Rámáyaṇa, Kíśkindhá Kánda, Sarga 42 that Sugriva did have special instructions to search for Sítá in Prágjyotíśa. (M.B. Viśṇu Parva, Chapter 63).

3) Previous birth of Náraśisura. Long ago a king who was the father of Sixteen thousand daughters, ruled over a country. While the father and daughters were sitting in the palace Mahávisnu came there as a hermit. The sixteen thousand damsels gathered round the hermit. Their father got angry and cursed them. The daughters shed tears and entreated their father for liberation from the curse. He gave them remission and said that in the next birth they would become wives of Mahávisnu.

Another version of this story says that the damsels had requested Bhrámá for liberation from the curse according to the advice of the hermit Nárada, and that Bhrámá had given them liberation from the curse. In some versions it is stated that Nárada himself gave them liberation from the curse.

It was this King, who was the father of the sixteen thousand damsels, who took birth again as Nárašisura. Those sixteen thousand damsels who had been born as princesses in different places were taken captives by Nárašisura and were kept in Audaka. (Bhágavata, Skandha 10).

4) Death. Nárašisura who had been causing devastation and terror in the three worlds entered the world of the gods once. The gods were not able to withstand the fury of Náraśisura, who carried away the ear-rings of Aditi, the mother of Indra, and the large white royal umbrella of Indra to Prágjyotíśa. Indra went to Dvára to and told Śrí Kṛṣṇa of the molestations he had received at the hands of Nárašisura. Śrí Kṛṣṇa rode on Garuda with his wife Satyabhámati to Prágjyotíśa. They flew over the city round and understood the lay-out of the city, and the precautions taken by Nárašisura. The battle began after this reconnaissance. Śrí Kṛṣṇa, Satyabhámata and Garuda fought with the asuras. The mighty asuras such as Mura, Tamra, Antáríka, Śravána, Vasu, Víbhávásu, Nabhasván, Arúṇa and others were killed. At last Nárašisura himself entered the battlefield. A fierce battle ensued in which Nárašisura was killed. The divine weapon Nárâyánástra of Náraśisura was given to his son Bhágadatta. After the battle Śrí Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhámati went to the world of the gods and received the ear-rings to Aditi and the umbrella to Indra. (Bhágavata, Skandha 10).

NÁRAKÁ II. Mention is made about another Nárašisura who was born to Prajápati Kaśyapa by his wife Dańu, in Mahábhárata, Ádi Parva, Chapter 63, Stanza 28. Once Indra defeated this Nárašisura. It is seen in Mahábhárata, Sabhá Parva, Chapter 9 that this asura after his death, stayed in the palace of Varúṇa worshiping him.

NÁRAKÁ III. Bhágadatta the son of Nárašisura ruled over the part of Páṭála called Náraśisura, and being the ruler of Náraśisura, Bhágadatta seems to have been known by the name of Náraśisura also.

NÁRAKÁ IV. See under Kála I.

NÁRANÁRÁYÁNAS. Two hermits Nara and Náráyaṇa. These two hermits had spent many thousands of years in Badaryásrama doing penance. Arjuna was the rebirth of Nara and Śrí Kṛṣṇa was the rebirth of Náráyaṇa. (For detailed story see under Nara and Náráyaṇa).

NÁRÁNTÁKA I. A captain of the army of Rávaṇa. It is stated in Agni Puráṇa, Chapter 10, that the captains of Rávaṇa, viz., Kumbha, Nikumbha, Makaráka, Mahadóra, Maháparśva, Matta, Unmatta, Prághása, Bháskará, Virúpáka, Devántaka, Nárántaka, Trikára, Atikáya and other Rákṣasas fought on the side of Rávaṇa against Śrí Ráma and that all of them were killed.

Of these Devántaka and Nárántaka were mighty and valiant warriors. Aigáda killed Nárántaka after a fierce battle. (Valmíki Rámáyaṇa, Yuddhá Kánda, Chapter 69).

NÁRÁNTÁKA II. Son of Rudraketu, an asura. This asura terrorized the three worlds by his wicked and cruel deeds. When the wickedness and cruelty of this asura became unbearable Gaṇapati incarnated in the house of Kaśyapa to protect the three worlds. Knowing this Nárántaka resorted to various means to kill Gaṇapati. But his attempts were futile. Finally he was killed by Gaṇapati. (Gaṇeśa Puráṇa).

NÁRAÑÁSTRA. A kingdom of ancient India. In Mahábhárata, Sabhá Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 6, it is mentioned that Sahadeva one of the Pándjávas, conquered this country.

NÁRAŚIMHA. See under Avatára.
NARAVĀHANA. A Kṣatriya King who had obtained remission of the sin of Brahmahatya (slaughter of Brahm) by taking the fast of Vaikākhavrata. This man who was a Kṣatriya of Pañcāla once happened to kill a Brahmin with an arrow. To get remission of this sin, he discarded his Sacred thread, mark on the forehead and forelock and had been wandering here and there when he met a Brahmin named Muniśārmā. Naravāhana told him his story. This Brahmaṇḍa who was a lover of God advised him regarding the importance of the Vaikākhā fast. By taking this fast the King obtained remission of sin. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 88).

NARAVĀHANA-DATTĀ. A famous Vidyādhara. Udayana the King of Vatśa had been spending his time in play and pleasure with his wives Padmāvati and Vāsavadattā, when once Nārada appeared before them. The king greeted the hermit and showed hospitality. The King and the queens were childless. Nārada told them: “Hear, oh King. Your wife Vāsavadattā is the incarnation of Ratidevi blessed by Śiva. The son born to her would become the emperor of the Vidyādharas. Not long after this Vāsavadattā conceived and gave birth to a radiant son. He was named Naravāhana-datta. At this time Kalīngasena, who had been transformed into a woman by the curse of Indra, gave birth to an extra-ordinarily beautiful girl. (For detailed story see under Kalīngasena). That child was named Madanā-nācukā. Even in infancy she was surrounded by a halo of unearthly beauty. Hearing of this child, Vāsavadattā brought Kalīngasena and the infant to the palace. To the wonder of everybody, the infants looked at each other and they were not satisfied how sooner they looked at each other. The king and his wives understood this perfectly well and at the proper time their marriage was conducted. Naravāhana-datta was anointed as the Heir-apparent. Once he was playing in the garden in the spring season, with his ministers Gomukha and others, when the most beautiful Ratnaprabhā came there. (See under Ratnaprabhā).

Once Naravāhana-datta went for hunting with his minister Gomukha and retinue. Somewhere or other he was separated from Gomukha and army in the deep forest. Then he heard a divine song and sound of a heavenly lyre. He went in the direction from which the music came and reached a Saivite temple. Getting in, he saw an excessively beautiful damsel standing in the midst of her attendants and companions singing and playing on a lute, in praise of Śiva. At this time a grown-up Vidyādhara woman came down from the sky and getting near the damsel, gave her to Naravāhana-datta. The name of the Vidyādhara damsel was Alāṅkāravati. (For other details see under Alāṅkāravati).

As Naravāhana-datta was spending his days, enjoying the pleasing company of his wife Alāṅkāravati, once he went for hunting, with his army. Being very tired they went in search of water, and entered a thick forest. There they saw a lake full of golden lotus flowers and four men plucking flowers, Naravāhana-datta approached them. They said that they had been plucking flowers to worship Viṣṇu. Naravāhana followed them, to the presence of Viṣṇu. Mahāviṣṇu was greatly pleased at Naravāhana-datta who was standing with folded hands singing praises of Viṣṇu in intense devotion and blessed him to become the emperor of the Vidyādhāras. (Kathāsarasāgara).

NĀRĀYANA. One of the two Rṣis famous as Naranārāyaṇas.

1) Birth. Dhharma, son of Brahmā was Nārāyaṇa’s father. Dhharma married ten daughters of Dakṣa, and four sons, i.e. Hari, Kṛṣṇa, Nara and Nārāyaṇa were born to him of them. Of the four, Nara and Nārāyaṇa were inseparable sannyāsins. In the holy Badarikāśrama on the slopes of the Himalayas they did tapas to please Brahmā for a thousand years.

2) Nārāyaṇa’s tapas. The whole world was, so to say, burnt by the intense tapas of Naranārāyaṇas. Indra was alarmed. Believing that their tapas was for the attainment of Indrahood and fearing his own displacement Indra went to Badarikāśrama mounted on Aiśvarya to break their tapas, and told them thus: “Oh ascetics, who shine like the rising sun, I am pleased with your tapas. You may choose any boon you like.”

The Naranārāyaṇas did not even recognise the thunder-like voice of Indra; nor did they answer him. This increased Indra’s alarm, and he decided to disturb them with Māyā, productive of fear, desire etc. and thus break their tapas. Indra began threatening them with cruel animals created by him like wild cat, leopard, tiger, lion, elephant etc. and also with aberrations created in nature like storm, rain, wild fire etc. But, none of the above affected or moved them in the least. After all, why should they be moved? You would threaten only those who are subject to desires, love of comfort, any particular object in life or likes and dislikes. Since Naranārāyaṇas had none of the above, Indra’s attempts to threaten them failed. Thus disappointed he returned to Svaragoloka and after thinking for a long time he called Kāmadeva to him and spoke as follows:—

“You should go, along with Rati and the spring, to Badarikāśrama. Also take with you any number of apsarā women you want. You will find Naranārāyaṇas at the āśrama performing tapas and will weaken them from their resolution by using your arrows (erotic shafts) and tempt them into erotic life. I am also deputing apsarā women like Rambhā to help you.”

Kāmadeva accordingly started for Badarikāśrama accompanied by all the apsarā women. When they reached the place spring season had set in there. Varieties of butterflies flew about from flower to flower humming. Trees like the mango and Palāśa were thick with flowers. Creepers (Comparable to young women) entwined and embraced trees (lovers), the former carrying pupas (flowers, in the case of young women, coming of age). A fragrant breeze swept the whole region. In this erotic background Kāma and Rati, with their five arrows and accompanied by celestial women came to the āśrama, and there they began singing and dancing. The erotic flow enchanted the soul of Naranārāyaṇas. Nārāyaṇarṣi awoke from his tapas and whispered something in the ears of Nara. By now Kāmadeva had entered the presence of Naranārāyaṇas accompanied by the reputed beauties of Svarolika like Menakā, Rambhā, Tilottamā, Sukesiṇī, Manoramā, Mahēsvāri, Puspagandhā, Pramadvarā, Gūḍacī, Candraprabhā, Somaprabhā, Vidyumālā, Ambujākṣi and Kāñcana-mālā. These beauties were accompanied by 10080 of their beautiful attendants. Naranārāyaṇas were wonder-struck to see this army of Kāma. All those great beauties stood before Nārāyana in salutation. Some of them began to sing, others to dance and yet others to take up the tunes. Nārāyanarāśi could easily divine the reason for the show. He thought to himself thus—

"None but Devendra could have sent all these people here, and his object must be to hinder our tapas. But I shall prove to Indra that all these mean nothing to me. Let Devendra understand that I can create more beautiful ladies than these women of his here and that I am not in the least attracted by any of them here."

Thinking thus Nārāyaṇa beat gently on his thigh and immediately arose therefrom an exceptionally beautiful woman. Since that woman, the most beautiful in all the three worlds, was created from the Īru (thigh) of Nārāyaṇa she came to be known as Urvasī. Others were wonder-struck by this new creation. He created some other beauties also, and an equal number of other women to serve them. All of them stood before him in humble salutation.

The celestial women almost fainted with fear. In repentance they begged the munis pardon for their mistake. The munis were kindly disposed towards them. They told them that they (munis) cherished no animosity towards them, but in fact were pleased with them, and they further asked them (celestial women) to choose their boons. The munis also asked them to take Urvasī to Devaloka as a present from them to Indra. Let the Devas prosper.

Having heard Nara speak like this the celestial women returned in great humility to Devaloka with Urvasī and the other women. (Devī Bhāgavata, 4th Skanda).

3) Other information.

(i) Nara and Nārāyaṇa were two incarnations of Mahāvīra. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 384)

(ii) A dark hair of Nārāyaṇarāśi was born as Kṛṣṇa and a white one as Balabhadra-rāma. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 196, Verse 32).

(iii) He was a star member in Brahmaras assembly. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 52).

(iv) Once he appeared before Māndhātā in the guise of Indra. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 14).

(v) He once fought with Śiva and won. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 382, Verse 110).

For complete details about Nārāyaṇarāśi see under Nara Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa.

NĀRĀYANAŚRAMA. A holy place. (Vana Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 6)

NĀRĀYANAŚTATHĀNA. (SĀLAGRĀMATĪRTHA). A sacred place where Mahāvīra is always present. Brahmarā, Devas, Sanyāsins, Ādityas, Vasus, and Rudras are also ever present here in the service of Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu is called Sālagrāma as he is being thus worshipped at Sālagrāma. Those who visit the place will enjoy the fruits of Aśvamedha yajña and ascend to Vaikuṇṭha.

(Vana Parva, Chapter 64, Verse 115).

NĀRĀYANAŚTARAMOKSAPARVA. A sub parva of Drona Parva comprising of Chapters 193-220.

NĀRĀYANAVARMA-MANTRA. Imparted by Viśva-rūpa, son of Vṛṣastha, to Indra, this mantra is competent to destroy enemies. He who dares to chant this mantra should do so silently after having first washed his hands and feet and holding Kuṣa grass in his hands with face turned towards the north. The mantra is to be chanted when some danger is imminent.

NĀR. A daughter of Meru. She and her sisters were married by the following sons of Agniśhra, i.e. Nābiḥ, Kimpuruṣa, Hari, Ilāvṛtā, Ramayaka, Hiraṇmaya, Kuru, Bhadraśva and Ketumāla. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

NARĪŚYANTA I. Son of Vaivasvata Manu. He was a brother of Iksvākū. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 8).

NARĪŚYANTA II. A King who was the son of Marutta. Indrasena was his wife; Dama was his son. While Nārīśyanta was leading the life of a house-holder in the forest, Vāpuṣmān killed him. Indrasena jumped into the funeral pyre of her husband and died. (Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa).

NĀRĪTĪRTHA. Common name for the five tirthas, i.e. Agastyā tirtha, Sāubhadratīrtha, Paulomatīrtha, Kāran-dhamatīrtha and Bhāradvājatīrtha. Once Arjuna bathed in Bhāradvājatīrtha. The Apsaras women called Vargās were living in the five tirthas in the form of crocodiles as the result of a curse. With the arrival of Arjuna there, the crocodiles resumed their previous forms as Apsara women and returned to Devaloka. (For the curse etc. see under Vargā).

NARMADĀ I. A famous holy river of South India. This river which springs from Amarakoṇṭaka flows through the valley called Khambhāta and falls into the ocean.

1) Birth. This river which is considered to be a holy river was the rebirth of Tapaṭi the daughter of the Sun. (To know how Tapaṭi was reborn as Narmadā, see under Tapaṭi).

2) The divine nature of the river Narmadā. Mention is made in most of the Purāṇas about the river Narmadā which is one of the holy rivers of Bhaṛata. Once Nārada said to Yudhiṣṭhira about the river Narmadā as follows: "Gaṅgā has more divinity in Kaṇakhala and Sarasvatī has more divinity in Kurukṣetra. But Narmadā is a holy river everywhere, whether in the villages or in the forests. Sarasvatī purifies us in three days and Gaṅgā in one day. But the moment we see Narmadā we are purified."

The river Narmadā, the former half of which embraces the mountain Amarakoṇṭaka in the country of Kaliṅga, is the purest of rivers in the three worlds. The devas, aṁuras, Gandharvas and hermits bathe in the river and attain eternal bliss. He who controls his organs of senses and fasts for one night and bathes in this river would be prosperous for hundred generations. This great river is hundred yojanas long and two yojanas wide. There are sixty crores and sixty thousand holy ghats in this river around the mountain Amarakoṇṭaka. Anybody who dies by fire, by drowning or by fast on this mountain Amarakoṇṭaka, will never have rebirth. (Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 13).

3) Mahābhārata and Narmadā. Throughout Mahābhārata mention is made about Narmadā. Important of them are given below:

(i) Goddess Narmadā stays in the palace of Varuṇa worshipping him. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 18).

(ii) While leading forest life Dharmaputra with his brothers visited Narmadādevī. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 121, Stanza 16).

(iii) Indra and the Aśvinidevas once drank Soma sitting on the mountain Vaiḍūrya on the banks of the Narmadā. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 121, Stanza 19).
NARMADĀ II. Sec under Puppotikāta.
NARMADĀ III. Wife of Purukutsa, the son of Māndhātāt (Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
NARYA. A King of the age of Ṛgveda. It is mentioned in Ṛgveda, Maṇḍala I, Anuvāka 10, Sūkta 54, that Devendra had rescued the Kings Narya, Turvasu and Yadu.
NĀSATYA. One of the Āśvinikumāras (Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 17).
NĀSIKA. The grandson of Lomapāda (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).
NĀṬĀKEYA. A particular region in ancient India (Śabhā Parva, Chapter 36).
NĀṬOṬINĀṬAKA. A kind of dramatic performance in ancient Kerala. (See Tirayāṭṭam).
NĀṬOṬIPPĀṬTU. (FOLK-SONGS). Every literature has a section known as nāṭoṭippāṭtus (folk songs). In Kerala (Malayālam) literature the period of folk songs was a golden era. Worship of devatas, honouring heroes, entertainments, philosophy, science, caste-professions, morals, ethics etc., generally formed the themes for folk songs. There are a number of folk-songs in Malayālam called Saṅghakkali, Tiṣṭātā, Olappākkātūtu, Ezhamatu Kali, Kāṅippāṭtā, Nāṭippāṭtā, Vatippāṭtā, Parakkalippāṭtā, Aṭtacurappāṭtā, (Pullavarpāṭṭā, Nizhalkuttippāṭtā, Bhadrakalippāṭtā, Tiṣṭātā etc. All these songs were reflective of the spiritual thoughts and ideas of the masses. Also, there is a special series of folk-songs called Vatakkkappāṭtus (songs of the north) All the Vatakkakpāṭtus are heroic songs. They are folk-songs culling the heroic deeds and achievements of certain heroes and heroines of exceptional courage and prowess who flourished in olden days in north Malabar. Though there are more than four hundred such songs, only thirty-five of them have been printed and published yet. These songs, which call for no special training or gifts for their singing or require any special knowledge in music for their appreciation, take their roots in the hearts of the common people. Almost all these songs are connected with Kalaris (schools where gymnastics are taught), Aṭṭu (strategic feats of the duel fight), Payattu (physical training) and Ankam (fight). Descriptions of the challenges by heroes, clashing of arms and the way how youngsters get out of danger by their intelligence and prowess are really exciting and exhilarating to read.
Most of the heroes in the Vatakkakpāṭtus lived either in Kaṭṭattanādu or its suburbs. A good majority of the songs sings the praises of two powerful families, Pullāram house and Taccolimāṇikkattu, the former a Tiya and the latter a Nāṭyar family. Taccolimāṇikkattu house was at Meppa in Putuppātam village near Vatakkara in Kaṭṭattanādu, and most of the songs relate to the great hero Otenakkuruppul of this house. Otenakkuruppul was born in 158 A.D. and lived for thirty-two years. Therefore, the Vatakkakpāṭtus may generally be placed in the 16th and 17th centuries A.D. Āromolakavār, Aṭṭumānaṇamel Unţiyaṛcē, Takcoli Otenan, Takcoli Candu, Pāṭlāṭ Kōmapan, Bambāyi Ālikuttu, Putunāṭan Kēlu and Kālppārampi Kaṁpan are the chief characters in the paṭṭus. Especially the song about Unţiyaṛcē is thrilling. Brief notes about the heroes and their families in the paṭṭus are given below.
1) Puttāram Viṣṇu. (Puttāram House). Āromol Cekavār, Aṭṭumānaṇamel Unţiyaṛcē and Āromolūnm were the star heroes of the house. Unţiyaṛcē was the sister of Āromolakavār and mother of Āromolūnm whose father was Kaṁpan. It may be understood from the song puttiriyāṅkham that Āromolakavār was born to Kaṁpan when he was forty-two years old. One or two songs about Āromolakavār are extant, one about his playing a game of dice and the other about his fighting the puttiriyāṅkham.
As for the game of dice, Āromolakavār went to his uncle at Mikāvil Mikaccevīṭṭil—expert in the game of dice—to study the art. There he spent a night with his uncle’s daughter Tumolārccē, who became pregnant by him. Though people ridiculed her at this development Āromol Cekavār took her as his wife when she had delivered his child. Āromol Cekavār had also another wife called Kuṭeśuṇīl of Alattūr house.
With regard to the puttiriyāṅkham, Āromol as the Cekavār (Sevakaṇ, one who served) of Unţiikoṇāṭ, once went to fight with Aṁrtnoṭār, Candu, his father’s nephew, accompanied him as his assistant. Candu hated Āromol from the latter stood in his way of marrying Unţiyaṛcē.
Aṁrtnoṭār brought over to his side Candu, assistant of Āromol. Āromol killed Aṁrtnoṭār in combat and on his way home he slept lying on the lap of Candu wearily after the combat while the treacherous Candu thrust heated handle of the lamp into a wound in the stomach of Āromol, who managed to reach home only to die there.
2) Aṭṭumānaṇamel Unţiyaṛcē. Unţiyaṛcē, overruling the opposition of her father-in-law and mother-in-law, one day went with her husband Kuṭṭurām to witness Kūttu in the Allimalar temple. When they came to Etavaṭṭam market after passing Tānṭur market certain ruffians confronted them. The coward that he was, Kuṭṭurām trembled before the ruffians, but Unţiyaṛcē routed them with her skill in combat.
3) Āromolūnm. Āromolūnm, who as a youth heard from his mother Unţiyaṛcē the story about the treacherous killing of his uncle, Āromol Cekavār, by Candu rushed to Kolattanādu and killed the latter in combat.
4) Takcoli Otenan. Otenan was a powerful Nāṭyar (Kuruppul) born in Takcoli māṇikkattu house. His father was a nāṭyar chief well-known both as Puttāramattuvāzunno and Cīnāvīṭṭil Tānṭāḷ. His mother was Uppāṭi, daughter of a woman called Teyi. He had an elder brother called Komappan and a younger sister called Uncciircūta (Uncciircī). Otenan’s father begot a son (Kanṭaccērī Cāppan) of Mākkam, the maid-servant of Uppāṭi. Cāppan grew up to be a constant com-
Another Candu Taccoli is blood. "Who went down Otenan became Kotamala Putunatan Mateviamma. But, Komappan Kurumparampil golden He Sannyasin, the pleased kar, forms with Raja captive. At many of the (Katattanatu) Otenan, necromancy last in song. Manikkattu another with the (betel chewing) Otenan, another girl, and about the other family went to the fort, and also the song. Another song describes the escape of Otenan, who went to see the construction of the Karimala fort, with the help of Cappan. There are also many other songs about Otenan.

The very marriage of Otenan is an interesting story. Māteviamma of Kāvilum cōttottu had a daughter named Ciru. Māteviamma went to Mānijkkattu house and requested Otenan to marry her daughter Ciru. Otenan refused to oblige her. But, Ciru grew up to be very beautiful girl, and Otenan, who saw her in that state felt a great passion for her. He sent Cappan to her for a pan (betel leaves for chewing) which she also refused. At last Cappan took Otenan disguised as a blind person to Ciru's house. Ciru and Otenan got married without the knowledge of Ciru's mother, who cursed them when she knew about the marriage.

There is another story about Otenan and Karuttanatām (Kaṭṭatannāṭu) Kuṇiikkannī, the only daughter of the Rājā of Kaṭṭatannāṭu. A rowdy called Keppan of Ponnapparam fort forcibly carried her off. The Rājā, who tried to bring back his daughter had to return wounded. Otenan came to know that Ponnapparam fort had once been given as dowry to his family and Keppan was in illegal and forcible occupation of it. Otenan along with Cappan went and captured the fort. He released Kuṇiikkannī from captivity and took Keppan captive. The Rājā of Kaṭṭatannāṭu was very much pleased with this exploit of Otenan and married Kuṇiikkannī to him.

There is also a story about Otenan fighting with the māppilas of Cirakkal. The māppilas did not honour the Rājā of Cirakkal during one of his tours, and the Rājā asked Otenan to put down the haughtiness of the māppilas, and he did so. Kotamala Kuṇiikkamma, the Rājā Pulinādu, Matilār Gurukkal and others are referred to in this story.

Katirū Gurukkal was a very powerful enemy of Otenan. The Gurukkal one day kept his new gun leaning against a jack fruit tree, and Otenan, in derision, commented about it thus: "Who is it that has kept the spear made of earth leaning against the tree on which usually spear made of gold is kept so?" The Gurukkal, angry at the insult challenged Otenan for a combat within three months from Wednesday, the ninth of Kumbham. On the appointed day Otenan went to Gurukkal's combat field and killed him, Parintukul Emmenpaniykar and others. On his way home after the victory, Otenan remembered that he had forgotten his dagger on the platform of the peepal tree, and paying no heed to the advice of his friends he returned to the combat field and got killed there.

5) Taccoli Candu. Candu was Otenan's nephew and was reputed for his great prowess. Mālu of Tāzhattumāṭham was his wife. One day she went for worship in the Omnallur temple where Kandar Menon of Tuluñāṭu fort abducted her into his court. Candu was at the time, twenty-two years old. On hearing about his wife's mishap Candu, disguised as a Sannyāsin, entered the fort and fought singlehanded against Menon and his army of 400 soldiers.

6) Pāḷāṭṭu Koman. Koman Nāyar, another nephew of Otenan, the son of Kuṇikimmā of Kappullipalāṭu, became famous under the name Komappan. The family feud between the Kuruppus of Tōṃūrāmvitū and the Nāyars of Pāḷāṭu was a long-standing affair. There were seven Kuruppus during the days of Koman, and they had two sisters named Uṇnicierru and Uṇniāmmā. Koman felt a great passion towards Uṇniāmmā, who was bathing in the tank, and her brothers rushed to kill Koman. But Koman outlived all obstacles created by the seven brothers of Uṇniāmmā and the tale-bearing Uṇnicerru because of the cleverness of the very intelligent Uṇniāmmā. Koman also got settled by Otenan the fortytwo items of family quarrels and married Uṇniāmmā.

7) Bambāyi Ālikkuṭṭi. In the song about Ādirāja it is said Ālikkuṭṭi, an expert in the science relating to elephants, was invited for help when the seventh elephant of the Rājā escaped back into the forest. Ālikkuṭṭi hailed from Bombay. According to the song under reference Ālikkuṭṭi brought back the elephant from the forest to the Rājā, who, greatly pleased with him, gave his daughter, Kuṇiikkkanī, in marriage to him.

8) Putunāṭu Kelu. Putunāṭu Candu and Kelu were brothers. Candu married a woman named Mātu. One Vaṭṭoli Menon became Mātu's paramour by bribing her with a golden chain worth three thousand panams, and she got her husband killed by this paramour. Candu had two dogs called Malli and Cōkkān, and one of them kept guard over Candu's dead body while the other went and informed Kelu about Candu's death. Kelu, in great rage, rushed to the place, saw the golden chain presented to Mātu by Menon and blinded one of her eyes.

9) Kurumparampīl Kaṭṭan. This tiya youth had a very chaste wife called Āryā. One day when Kaṭṭan was away from home for tapping coconut palms for toddy Putukolottu rājā saw Āryā, and having felt a great passion for her he presented her one night four pieces of silk and a gold ring. The next day Āryā dressed her husband as a brahmin with the sacred thread on, and deputed him to return to the Rājā’s wife the presents made by her husband to her (Āryā). Kaṃṭha succeeded in his mission, but the revengeful Rājā ordered him to be executed. Āryā went to the Rājā and after various discussions with him returned home.

NAUBANDHANA. A peak of the Himalayas. The peak came to be known by this name on account of the following cause. Once upon a time Hiranyakaśipu stole the Vedas and with them hid in the bottom of the ocean. Mahāviśūnu incarnated himself as fish to restore the Vedas. The world then was submerged in water and the mahārṣī escaped in a boat attached to the horns of the Makāra fish. On earth flood rose unto the peaks of the Himalayas. The Saptarṣī attached their boat to a peak of the mountain and that came to be known as Naubandhana. (nau = boat; bandha = tie). (Vana Parva, Chapter 187, Verse 50).

NAUKARṆĪ. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 29).

NAVAGVA. The Navagvas are a group of the Aṅgiras. InṚgyeda, mention is made about them in several places.

NAVAKANYAKĀ(S). An important item of Navaratrisipūjā (A festival of 9 days, as observed by Sakti worshippers) is the worship of virgins. The nine kinds of virgins (from two to ten years in age) thus worshipped are called Navakanyakās (nine virgins). (See under Kumāripūjā).

NAVAMĪVRATA. (Fast on the ninth lunar day). This is a special fast taken in the month of Tulām (October-November) with a view to obtain Bhukti (enjoyment or possession) or Muktī (Beatitude). The important rite of this worship is to take fast on the ninth night of the bright lunar fortnight in the month of Tulām and worship goddess Gaurī. This navamī is also called Gaurīnavamī. Another name of this navamī is Piṣṭaka navamī. This name is given because on that day Piṣṭam (ground rice) is eaten and the goddess is worshipped. In the bright lunar fortnight of the month of Tulām (Āśvina), on the eighth night when the star is Mālam and the Sun is in the zodiac of Kanyā if there is the touch of Navamī, it is called Aghārdanavamī or Mahānāvamī.

Worship could be conducted on the days mentioned, by consecrating the goddess Durgā in nine temples or in one temple only. When the goddess is consecrated in nine temples they are meditated upon as nine separate beings. In such cases Goddess Durgā should be consecrated with eighteen hands and the rest of the goddesses with sixteen hands. Of the eighteen two should be holding Antimony and ādamaru (a small drum shaped like an hourglass), and the remaining sixteen hands should hold weapons that the other goddesses hold. The nine goddesses to be worshipped are Rudrā, Caṇḍā, Pracāṇḍā, Caṇḍogrā, Caṇḍanāyikā, Caṇḍavatī and Caṇḍarāṇī and in the middle of these eight beings the great goddess Durgā who is UgraCaṇḍā and the slayer of Mahiṣāsura. Durgā is addressed with the spell of ten letters “Om, Durgē Durgēkṣāni Svāhā,” Adoration, offering to ancestors and exclamation in sacrifice (Namaskāra, Svadhākāra and Vaṣṭākāra) should be denoted by six words and the Aṅgas (organs) beginning with heart also should be imagined. This root-spell should be repeated resting the organs such as heart etc. on the fingers. He who repeats this secret spell of goddess, will never be troubled by enemies.

The goddess should be worshipped by meditating upon her as carrying the weapons such as Kapāla (skull), Khetaka (shield) Ghanā (bell), Mirror, Tārjani, bow, dhvaja (flag), ādamaru (drum) and pāśa (rope) in the left hands and Sakti (dart) Mūdgar, trident, vajra, sword, spear, conch, wheel and Saḷākā (antimony) in the right hands. These weapons also should specially be worshipped. In the worship of the goddess, a cow (sacrificial animal) should be headdress with a sword repeating the spell Kāli Kāli and the blood and flesh of that cow should be offered as oblation to the goddess Pūtāna uttering the spell, Kāli Kāli Vaṣṭreyvari, lauhadaṇḍayai namah.” Offering to Pūtāna should be made in the south west corner of the shrine of the Devī. In the same way offerings of blood and flesh should be made to the goddesses Pāparākṣa in the North West corner, Caraki in the North East corner, and Vidārīkā in the South East corner. The same form of offerings should be made to the god Mahākāṣṭika in the South East corner. The King should bathe in front of this god Mahākāṣṭika and making an image of his enemy with rice flour, should break it. Then give that rice flour as oblation to the gods Skanda and Viṣṇu and worship the female ancestors such as Brāhmaṇa and such others in the night. As ordained in the Vedas, the Devī should be bathed in Pañcāṃra (milk, curds, butter, honey and water) and then worship before her, uttering the spell “Jayaśaṃgala Kāli, Bhadrakāli Kapālī, Durgā Śivā Kṣāmā Dhātrī Svadhā Śvāhā Namostu te.” (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 183).

NAVARATNAS I. (The nine precious Jewels). The nine precious stones are pearl, ruby, Chrysoprusas, beryl, diamond, coral, jacinth, emerald and sapphire.

NAVARATNAS II. Legend says that there were nine scholars who handled philosophy and arts, in the palace of the emperor Viṣṇumātīda. These nine scholars were known by the name Navaratnas (the nine jewels). They were Dhanvantari, Kṣapaṇaka, Amarasimha, Šaṅku, Vetālabhaṭṭa, Ghaṭakarpura, Kālidāsa, Varaḥamihira and Vararuci.

NAVARĀTRĪ. Navaratriṣipūjā (nine nights’ worship) is done to goddess Durgā. Though this is observed throughout the whole of India, it is more prominent in North India than anywhere else. (To know the details regarding the origin of this worship, see under Sudarśa, Saśi- kalā and Viṣṇuyadsāñi).

As ordained in the Vedas, the Nine nights’ worship is to be made in the seasons of spring and autumn. These two seasons are called Kāladaṇḍēras (the tusk of seasons). Diseases and deaths occur in these seasons in excess, and so it is ordained that this fast and worship should be conducted in the months of Meṣa (Meṣa) and Tulām.

Vṛśā has ordered that navarātri worship should be conducted as follows. The things necessary for the worship and oblations should be collected on the new moon day. Only clarified butter could be eaten on that day. An open temple should be erected with pillars and flag-posts in an open flat place which is pure. It will be good if the shed has a circumference of sixteen cubits. There should be sixteen pillars. The shed should be floored with the mixture of cowdung and white clay. In the middle of the shed there must be a dais having a height of one cubit and a circumference of four cubits. This is the place for the seat. The shed and the dais should be decorated.

The throne placed on the dais must be covered with a white silk and Devi (goddess) should be consecrated on it. A calm Brahmin should read the Vedas and at that time the worship of the goddess should begin. This worship will continue for nine days. Another ritual of this navaratripūjā is the worship of virgins. (See under Kumāripūjā)

NAVAVYŪHĀRÇANA. This is a worship conducted to prevent epidemics. In olden days Mahāviśūṣu advised Nārada on the form of this worship. The form of this worship is given below:

In the centre of the circular lotus, consecrate Vāsudeva with the first syllable of mantra (spell) ‘A’. To the south of him consecrate and worship Saṅkarṣana and Pradyumna with the syllable ‘A’; in the S.E. corner, Aniruddha with the syllable ‘Ah’; in the west, Nārāyaṇa with the syllable ‘Om’; Brahmā in the N.W. corner with the syllables ‘Tattṣa’; Viṣṇu in the North with the syllable ‘Hun’; Nṛśīṁha with the syllable ‘Kṣau’ and Varāha in the N.E. corner with the syllable ‘bhūm’.

Consecrate Garuḍa with spells having as first syllables ‘Kam’, ‘ṭam’, ‘sam’ and ‘śam’ at the western entrance of the lotus figure; Pārvavaktra, with spells ‘Kham’ ‘cham’, ‘Vam’ and ‘hum’ at the southern entrance of the lotus figure; Gadā (club), with the syllables ‘Kham’, ‘ḥam’ and ‘Sam’ at the Northern entrance; consecrate Iṣa with the syllables ‘bam’, ‘nām’, ‘mam’ and ‘Kṣam, in the North East corner. Then consecrate Śrī with the syllables. ‘Dham’, ‘Dām’, ‘Bham’ and ‘Ḥam’ on the southern side; Vanamāli with the syllables ‘Gam’, ‘Ḍam’ ‘Vam’ and ‘Sam’ on the northern side; Śrīvatsa with the syllables ‘sam’, ‘ham’ and ‘lam’, to the west of Vanamāli; and Kaustubha, with the syllables, ‘cham’, ‘Ṭam’ and ‘yam’, to the west of Śrīvatsa.

After having consecrated and worshipped persons as mentioned above, in the order of the ten member-parts of Mahāviṣṇu, Ananta should be consecrated below the seat of the deity and in the order of the ten member parts of Ananta, the four component parts called Mahacro and so on should be consecrated on the four directions such as east and so on, and consecrate in the same way all the decorations, flags, canopy etc. Then the three spheres of Vāyu (Air), Agni (fire) and Indu (moon) should be consecrated with the first syllables of the spells suited to each and meditating on them and worshipping them, dip the body in the meditation. Then imagine that the subtle form of the individual soul is staying in the sky. Then meditate that the individual soul is reborn by harmony with the universal soul after having been dipped and washed in the snow-white ambrosia emanating from the moon. After that saying to yourself ‘I am Viṣṇu himself reborn’, utter the twelve-syllabled mantra or spell. Place heart, head, turban and weapon respectively on chest, head, hindpart of the lock of hair and Netra (eye) Place weapons in both hands. After this your body will become divine. This placing of the individual soul should be repeated in the same way with Deva (god) and Śiva. When this worship of Viṣṇu is conducted in heart in imagination (without the aid of materials) it is called ‘Anirmanāyupūjā, and when it is done with the aid of lotus figure etc., it is called Sanirmanāya pūjā.

At this pūjā (worship) the disciple should stand with eyes tied. Then on whichever dāty he places flower it should be given that name. Place it on the left side and burn gently, paddy and ghee in the sacrificial fire. After performing hundred and eight burnings perform another burning for the purification of the body. To each of the member-parts of the Nānavyūha deities also burnt offering should be made, no less than hundred times to each. Then put the entire thing in fire as burnt offer ng. Then the disciples should take fast, and the disciples should offer wealth etc. to the teacher. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 201).

NĀVYĀŚRAMA. An āśrama built by Lomapāda Maharṣi. Rṣyasrīga came to Lomapāda’s country in a boat. Hence the name Nāvyāśrama (See under Rṣyasrīga).

NĀYANĀR. The protagonists of Southern Śaivism are known as Nāyanārs while those of Vaiṣṇavism are called Ālvars.

NEMI. The real name of Daśaratha. (See under Daśaratha).

NEMICAKRA. A king, who once ruled Hastināpura. Once, when Hastināpura was washed away by floods Yamunā Nemicakra built a new city in Kaśmīrī. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NEMIHAMSAPADA. An important place in ancient India. The place is near Aksaprapatanam in the Anarta region. It was here that Kṛṣṇa killed Gopati and Tālaketu.

NEPĀLA. The kingdom of Nepal on the boundaries of the Himālayas has been famous from Purānic times. It is the only ‘Hindu’ State in the world. Kaṇṭha, during his triumphal tour, had conquered Nepal also. (Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Verse 7).

NBIĐA. A mountain in the Krauṇča island. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 19).

NICANDRA. A Rākṣaśa referred to in verse 26, Chapter 65 of Adī Parva.

NICITĀ. A holy river of ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 18).

NIDAGHA. A maharṣi. (For details see under Rbhu)

NIDHRUVĀ. One who actually saw the Sāktas. He was the son of Vatsāra Śri born in Kaśyapa dynasty. He married Sumedhas the daughter born to Cyavana and Sukanyā; and Kuṇḍapāyins were their sons. (Vāyu Purāṇa).

NIGHNA. A King of Ayodhya and son of Anarayya. He had two sons called Anamitra and Raghūttama. (Padma Purāṇa, Śrṣṭi Khaṇḍa).

NIKHARVAṬA. A Rākṣaśa in Rāvanā’s camp. He fought with the monkey called Tāra in the Rāma-Rāvana war. (Vana Parva, Chapter 235, Verse 80).

NIKṢUBHĀ. An Apsārā woman about whom the following story occurs in the Brahmāparva of the Bhāvīṣya Purāṇa. On account of the curse of Sūrya, Nikṣubhā, the great beauty in Svarloka, was born on earth as daughter of Sujīva a brahmin of Mihira Gotra. At the instance of her father, she used to keep the yajña fire ever burning. One day the fire held in her hands abruptly burst into flames, and her unique beauty revealed in the light kindled the passion of Sūrya.

Next day Sūrya went to Sujīva and told him that his daughter, Nikṣubhā was carrying since he had married her. As soon as he heard Sūrya's words Sujhiva cursed his daughter thus: "Since the child in your womb is enveloped by fire the child born to you will be despised and rejected by people."

Then Sūrya went to Nikṣubhā and told her that though her child might be despised he would be a scholar, very well-bred and eligible for the worship of Agni.

As years passed many children were born to her by Sūrya. While she was living in the Śāka island Sāmba, the son of Kṛṣṇa, deputed her sons to perform rites in the Śūrya temple at Śāṁbapura. Nikṣubhā's sons were married to girls born in the Bhoja family.

NIKUMBHA I. A very mighty Rākṣasa. Son of Kumbhakarna (Rāvaṇa's brother) by his wife Vajrāmālā. He had an elder brother called Kumbha. When Kumbha was killed in the Rāma-Rāvaṇa war Nikumbha rushed to the front line and fought fiercely, and he was killed by Hanumān. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Canto 77).

NIKUMBHA II. Third son of Prahlāda. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 19).

NIKUMBHA III. An asura born in the dynasty of Hiranyakaśipu. Sunda and Upasunda were his sons. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 208, Verse 2).

NIKUMBHA IV. A warrior of Subrahmanya (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 58).

NIKUMBHA V. A king born in the Ikṣvāku dynasty. He was the son of Haryāśva and the father of Saṁhitāśva (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 1).

NIKUMBHA VI. Another form of Gaṇapati. The following story about him in the Nikumbha state is told in Vāyu Purāṇa.

Suyaśa, wife of Divodāsa used to worship in the Nikumbha temple of Vārāṇaśi for the sake of a child. As the worship did not yield the desired effect, Divodāsa smashed the idol in the temple into pieces. Then Nikumbha cursed that Vārāṇaśi should decline. As a result of the curse the Hehayas like Tālajaṅgha and others destroyed Vārāṇaśi and drove Divodāsa away from there. At last the Nikumbha temple was rebuilt and Vārāṇaśi became prosperous again.

NIKUMBHILĀ. A particular spot in the forest outside Lāṅkāpurī. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

NILA I. A prominent nāga born to Kaśyapa Prajāpati of Kadrū. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 7).

NILA II.

1) General. A King born in the Hehaya dynasty. His was a rebirth of the asura called Krodhaavaśa. Nila was called Duryodhana also. Māhismatī was the capital of his kingdom. He attended the Śvayamvara of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 61).

2) Other Information

(i) Once he fought a fierce battle with Sahadeva, but ultimately yielded to the latter at the instance of Agnideva. (See under Agni, Para 8).

(ii) He gave his daughter Sudarṣanā in marriage to Agnideva. (See under Agni, Para 8).

(iii) During his triumphal tour, Karna defeated Nila. (Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Verse 15).

(iv) In the battle of Kurukṣetra he fought on the side of the Kauravas. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 23).

(v) He was reckoned as one of the mahārathis on the side of Duryodhana. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 164, Verse 4).

(vi) Sudarṣanā was a daughter born to him of his wife Narmadā. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 2).

NILA III. A monkey-chief, who was a dependant of Śrī Rāma. He was Agni's son. 'Nila, son of Pāvaka (fire) shone forth like āgni (fire). He stood foremost among the monkeys in the matter of effulgence, reputation and prowess'. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 17).

This monkey-chief was also included in the set of monkeys deputed by Śrī Rāma to search for Siṭā. In the Rāma-Rāvaṇa war Nila killed Prabhāti, the younger brother of the Rākṣasa called Dūṣaṇa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 267, Verse 27).

NILA IV. A warrior who fought on the Pāṇḍava side. He was king of Anūpadeśa. He fought against Durjaya and Aśvathāmah and was killed by Aśvathāmah. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 25).

NILA V. A famous king in northern Pāṇcāla. The Purāṇas refer to sixteen famous kings of this royal dynasty from Nila to Pṛṣata.

NILA I. A daughter born to Kapiśa of Keśiṇi. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 3).

NILA II. A warrior son of Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa was one day picnicking in Vrndavana with the Gopi women, and they were proud that he was mad after them. To dispel their pride Kṛṣṇa disappeared abruptly from their midst and sported with the woman called Nila. Then she also became proud that Kṛṣṇa loved her more than the others, and she asked him to carry her on his shoulders. He stood there ready stretching his neck to carry her. But, when she stood with her legs parted to mount on Kṛṣṇa's neck and looked for him he was missing; he had already disappeared. The Gopīkās ultimately shed their pride and then Kṛṣṇa appeared before them. (Ceruṣāri's Malayālam Epic Kṛṣṇa Gāthā).

NLAGIRI. Name of a mountain in the region called Iḷḷvṛta of Jambū island. In Iḷḷvṛta there are three chief mountains called Nlagiri, Svetagiri and Śrīgavān, and in their middle three Varṣas (regions) called Ramyaka, Hiraṇmaya and Kuru. (Devī Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha).

NŁAKAŅṬHA DIKŚITAR. A Sanskrit poet who flourished in the 17th century A.D. He was the court poet of King Tirumala-Nāyaka. He has written works in all the branches of literature. His more important works are Śīvalīlārṇava, Gaṅgāvatāraṇa. Nīlakanṭhavijaya, Cāmpū, and Kalividambana. Śīvalīlārṇava contains twenty-two cantos. Its theme is the sixtyfour lilās (Divine sports) of Śiva installed at Madura. (South India) Gaṅgāvatāraṇa is a poem in eight cantos which describes the story of Bhagiratha bringing Gaṅgā down to the earth. In the first canto of Nīlakanṭhavijaya, A.D. 1638-39 is referred to as the period of its composition, and this reference helps us to determine the date of the poet.

NILI. Second wife of King Ajañīṭha. Two sons called Dusuṇyata and Parmesṭhī were born to the king of Nili. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 32).

NILINĪ. A wife of Sunaśēpha. A daughter called Sāntī was born to him of Nilini. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 275).

NIMEŚA I. A son of Garuḍa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 104, Verse 10).

NIMEŚA II. See under Kālamāṇa.

NIMI I. A famous emperor who was the son of Iksvāku,

2) Vasiṣṭha’s curse. Emperor Nimi was very generous with his gifts. He was interested in performing  yajñas. The feeding hall that can be seen even today near the aśrama of Gautama Mahārṣi was built by emperor Nimi. The emperor, a person of rājasic nature, decided to conduct a Yajña which would take a long time to end and which required much money for gifts; and he got his father Ikṣvāku’s permission for it. Arrangements were made for the Yajña, and Rāṣṭa like Bhṛgu, Aṅgiras Vāmādeva, Pulastya, Pulaha and Rṣiṇka who were competent to perform yajña and great scholars in the Vedas were invited for the Yajña. Lastly he met his family preceptor Vasiṣṭha and told him thus: “Oh preceptor! I have made all arrangements for a Yajña, which it is my desire should last for five hundred years. You would also come with me and see that the Yajña is duly performed.”

Vasiṣṭha listened to Nimi’s request with great attention. But, he had already been invited by Indra to conduct a Yajña which would last for five hundred years, and he would be able to oblige Nimi only after that period of time. So Vasiṣṭha asked the emperor to postpone his proposed yajña by five hundred years. Nimi returned disappointed.

Nimi had no patience to wait for five hundred years. So he started the yajña with Gautama as his preceptor. After Indra’s Yajña for 500 years was over, Vasiṣṭha came to Nimi’s Yajña hall. Nimi, at the time, was in the inner apartment of his palace. Though his servants went to him to tell him that his preceptor Vasiṣṭha had come, they waited outside his chamber as he was sleeping then. Within a few moments Vasiṣṭha was ablaze with anger. He raised his hands and cursed Nimi thus: “Oh! Nimi, you have insulted me, your preceptor. You disobeyed my injunction and began the Yajña. Therefore, let your body be parted from the soul and fall on the ground.”

This curse of Vasiṣṭha alarmed the servants of Nimi so much that they roused him from sleep and told him all about the affair. Nimi hurried to Vasiṣṭha and prostrated at his feet. But, he did not shed his anger. This made Nimi also angry. He also raised up his hands and cursed Vasiṣṭha thus: “Oh muni! you who got angry without reason are worse than a Cāṇḍāla. Therefore let your body also be parted from the soul and fall to the ground.”

Vasiṣṭha got alarmed at the above curse. He ran up to and submitted his grievance to Brahmā, who told him thus:— “My son, your action was really fool-hardy. Yet, I shall advise you a way out of your troubles. You dissolve your-self in the effulgence of Mitra and Varuṇa and remain there permanently. After sometime you will be able to be born without being present in the womb of a woman. Then you will remember everything about your previous birth will acquire sense of righteousness and knowledge of the Vedas will become respected by all and will be omniscient.

The soul of Vasiṣṭha parted from his body on account of the curse of Nimi, saluted Brahmā, went to the aśrama of Mitrāvaraṇuṇa and got mixed with their effulgence. Meanwhile Urvaśī one day came to the aśrama of Mitrāvaraṇuṇa, who had seminal emission at her sight. The semen fell into a pot. The pot duly burst open and there emerged from it Agastya and Vasiṣṭha.

Nimi returned to the Yajña hall and told the munis about the curse on him of Vasiṣṭha. While the munis were helplessly looking on, Nimi’s body got separated from the soul and fell down. The munis placed the dead body in an uncovered coffin, kept it free from putrefaction with the help of medicines and mantras and continued with the Yajña. At the close of the Yajña the Devas appeared and asked Nimi which did he prefer to have, a human body or body of a Deva. He preferred to have a Deva body, and accordingly ascended to Svarga along with the Devas.

As Nimi had no sons to perform his obsequies the munis began churning the corpse repeating mantras and there arose from it an ideal person as glowing as Nimi. As he was created by ‘mathana’ (churning) the munis named him Mithi. Again, as he was created from a dead body he came to be known as Janaka also. Further, as he was born from the body from which the soul had departed he was called Videha also. The famous kingdom of Mithilā on the banks of the Gaṅgā was founded by this Janaka.

Janaka, the father of Sītā, was a King born in this dynasty. To all the Kings born in this dynasty the surname ‘Janaka’ came to be applied. This dynasty is known as Janakavarmśa and Videhavarmśa after emperor Mithi. (Devī Bhāgavata, 6th Skandha).

3) Other information.

(i) He worships Sūrya’s son Yama in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 9).
(ii) He gave gifts of land to brahmins. (Vana Parva, Chapter 234, Verse 26).
(iii) He did not eat flesh. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 65).

NIMI II. Son of Dattātreyamuni of the Atri family. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 5).

NIMI III. Son of the King of Vidarbhā. After giving his daughter in marriage to Agastya he attained heaven. (Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 11).

NIMNA. A Yādava. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIMROCI. A King born in the Yadava dynasty. Nimroci, son of Bhoja had two brothers called Kīṇaka and Vṛṣṇi, (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIPA I. A famous King of the Pūru dynasty. A son called Bramhadatta was born to the King by his wife Kṛiti alias Kṛttimātī. Bramhadatta begot hundred sons like Kṛttivardhana and all of them became famous by the name Nipas. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIPA II. An ancient kingdom in India. The King of this place participated in Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājasya. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 24).

NIPA III. A Kṣatriya dynasty. King Janamejaya belonged to this dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Verse 13).

NIPĀTĪTHI. A Rṣi exalted in the Ṛgveda. He was a Sūktadṛṣṭa (one who realized the Vedic hymns).

NIRĀMARDA. A King of ancient India. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 237).

NIRĀMAYA. A King of ancient India. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 137).
NIRĀMAYĀ. A river, the water of which was very dear to the people of ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 33).

NIRAMITRA I. Son of Nakula. His mother was the noble lady called Karṇaumātī. (Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 79).

NIRAMITRA II. A Trigarta prince killed in the great war by Sahadeva. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 26).

NIRĀVINDA. An ancient mountain. It is believed that he who bathes in the pond on this mountain will attain salvation. (Anuśīṣana Parva, Chapter 137).

NIRMOCANA. The Palace of Murāsura. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 48, Verse 83).

NĪRĪTTI I. A Deva. The Purāṇas contain the following information about him.

(i) He is one of the Asāṭdikpālas (guards of the eight quarters). He is in charge of the south-western corner. (See under Asāṭdikpālas).

(ii) He is one of the Ekādaśa-arudras. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 2).

(iii) Brahmā was his grand-father and Sthānū his father. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 2).

(iv) He attended the birth-day celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 129, Verse 63).

(v) In temples his idols are installed with sword in hand and seated on an ass. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

NĪRĪTTI II. Wife of the Deva called Adhārma. She had three sons called Bhaya, Mahābhaya and Antaka. These Rākṣasas are known as Nīrīttas. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 54).

NISĀ. The third wife of the Agni called Bhānu. To the couple were born seven sons called Agni, Soma, Vaiśvānara, Viśvapati, Sannihita, Kapila and Agraṇi, and a daughter called Rohini. (Vana Parva, Chapter 211).

NĪṢĀDA I. A forest dweller. The grand sire of the nīṣāda tribe living in forests was one Nīṣāda. Those forest-dwellers came to be known as nīṣādas as they were the descendants of this Nīṣāda. The Purāṇic story about the origin of Nīṣāda is as follows:—

Once upon a time there lived a King called Vena. A very immoral ruler, he was hated by the people. As dharma declined in the country due to the misrule of Vena the māhārṣis killed him with darbha grass sanctified by mantras. Then the māhārṣis saw dust rising up everywhere and people told them that the poor people, in the absence of king, had turned into thieves and the dust was formed by the onrush of the thieves. To remedy the problem thus created the māhārṣis churned the thigh of Vena, who had died childless, for a son, and from the thigh was born a male child, dark in colour, dwarfish and with a compressed face. Sadly he asked the brahmins (māhārṣis) what he should do. They asked him to sit (nīṣāda) and hence he became Nīṣāda (forest-dweller). His descendants settled down on mount Vindhyā and they by their sinful lives divested Vena of his sins. Vena was absolved of his sins through the Nīṣādas, and thus the Nīṣādas became responsible for the ending of Vena’s sins. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 13).

NĪṢĀDA II. A particular region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 51).

NĪṢĀDANAREŚA. A King well known in Bhārata. He was born from aspects of the dāityas, Kālakaṇya and Krodhahāntu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 50).

NĪṢADHA I. A King born in Śrī Rāma’s dynasty. Kuṣa was born as the son of Śrī Rāma, Aditi as Kuṣa’s son and Nīṣadha as Aditi’s son. This Nīṣadha was the father of King Nabhas. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NĪṢADHA II. A King of Bharata’s dynasty. Nīṣadha was the grandson of King Puru and the fourth son of Janamejaya. A great humanitarian, Nīṣadha ruled the country to the satisfaction of everybody. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 26).

NĪṢADHA III. A mountain near mount Meru. During his triumphal tour, Arjuna defeated the people of this region.

NĪṢĀKARA I. A mahārṣi. Honoured even by the Devas he lived in his āśrama on the heights of Mount Vindhyā. One of those days Jāṭāyu and his elder brother Sampāti, under a bet, flew up to the Sun’s sphere. In his attempt to shield Jāṭāyu, who flew with great speed and neared the Sun’s sphere, from the scorching heat of the Sun, Sampāti’s wings got burned and he fell down on the heights of Vindhyā where he lay unconscious for six days.

Nīṣākara mahārṣi heard Sampāti crying and he saved the bird, which lived there for many years as the mahārṣi’s slave. The mahārṣi, who could foresee things told Sampāti about Śrī Rāma’s incarnation which was to happen in the future. He entered Saṃādhi after finally telling Sampāti that monkeys would go there then in search of Sītā, that Sampāti would point out to them where Sītā was and that on that day his wings would automatically reappear and his legs would become strong. Afterwards for eight thousand years Sampāti led a solitary life in the āśrama. It was during this period that monkeys, in the course of their search for Sītā got information about her from Sampāti. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa; Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kīṣhkindhā Kāṇḍa, Canto 60).

NĪṢĀKARA II. A great muni, who attained Svarga after passing through many lives. His story is given below:—

There was a great ascetic and erudite scholar in all branches of knowledge called Kośakāra, son of muni Muditaka. Kośakāra’s wife was Dharmaśī, daughter of Vatsyāyana. To them was born a son, an idiot and a deaf and dumb child, whom they foresook at the gates of the mother’s house. At the same time an evil-minded Rākṣasa woman called Sūrpākṣi, who was in the habit of lifting children came there with a lean child. She replaced Dharmaśī’s child with the lean one and returned with it to the Sāłabhaṁgapāta where her blind husband asked her what she had brought for his food. She told him about the changeling child with her when he said as follows “Return the child at once to where it was found. The child’s father is a great man of knowledge and wisdom and when he hears about your action, he will curse us. So, return the child and bring the child of some one else.” As soon as she heard these words of her husband she rose up in the sky in great alarm.

Hearing the cries of the Rākṣasa child left at their gates Dharmaśī and her husband came out, and the child which, in its colour and shape resembled their child exactly, Kośakāra said thus: “Oh! Dharmaśī! this must be some ghost. Some one is lying here in the same form as our child to hoodwink and cheat us.”
Saying so he tied the child to the ground by chanting mantras with darbha grass in his hands. At the same time Śūrpākṣi came there in invisible form. She threw Dharmiśṭhā's child from a distance into the courtyard. Kośakāra took his child. But all the attempts of the Rākṣaṇa to lift her child from the ground failed. The grief-stricken Rākṣaṇa reported the matter to his wife.

As soon as Śūrpākṣi left the place the magnanimous Kośakāra handed over the Rākṣaṇa child to his wife. He brought up his own child by feeding it on cow's milk, curd, juice of sugar-cane etc. Both the children grew up to seven years of age. The Rākṣaṇa boy was named Divākara and the other child Niśākara. Both the children were invested with the sacred thread in due course of time. Divākara learned the Vedas, but Niśākara did not, and he was despised by all. His father pushed him into a neglected well and covered its mouth with stone.

Niśākara lived in the well for many years. The fruits of a cluster of plants in the well served as his food. Some ten years afterwards when Niśākara's mother found the mouth of the well closed with a big stone she asked as to who did so, and from the well came the answer, "Mother, it was father who covered this well with that stone." Alarmed at this the mother asked who was within the well, and she was answered, "Your son, Niśākara." Then she argued that her son was named Divākara and that she had no son called Niśākara. But, Niśākara told her about his past life and what had happened to him during the present life, upon which the mother rolled away the stone and Niśākara came out of the well and prostrated before his mother. He then went home with his mother. Questioned as to how and why these things happened by Kośakāra his son Niśākara described his previous life as follows:

Father, you would please hear about the reason why I became dumb and idiotic. In my previous life I was born in a noble family, my father being called Vṛṣkapī and mother Māla. My father taught me all the Sāstras and the Vedas. I became conversant over my unique learning and erudition and began doing evil acts. Conceited led to avarice, and I lost all my scholarship. I became indiscreet. Having thus become a fool, I began committing sins. I had to hang myself to death on account of my association with others' women and stealing others' money. I, therefore, fell into the Raurava hell. After a thousand years some sin remained attached to me as a result of which I was born as a tiger, and a King trapped and took me to his city. When I was caged Sāstras about Dharma, Artha and Kāma came up in my mind.

One day the King went out wearing only one piece of cloth and with a club in his hands. Then his wife Ajitā, a unique beauty came to me, and because of my taste in my previous life sexual desire arose in my heart. I told her about my feelings. She also felt like me. So, she unchained me and I approached her in great passion and seeing me thus the King's servants tied me to a peepal tree and thrashed me to death.

My soul again returned to hell. After a thousand years I was born as a white ass in the house of a brahmin named Aṅgīvaśya, who had many wives. Then all knowledge and wisdom were reflected in my mind. My duty was to carry the brahmin's women on my back. One day the brahmin's wife Vīmati of Navarāṣṭra started for her father's home mounted on my back. Half-way home she dismounted and went to a stream to bathe. The exquisite beauty of that lady with wet clothes upset me, and I ran up to her on the stream, pushed her into the water and myself fell upon her. Then a person came and tried to tie me down. I escaped from his grips and ran southwards. While thus running the saddle slipped into my mouth and I fell down. And, within six days I died thinking about her. Thus I fell again into hell. My next birth was as a parrot. A hunter caged me in the forest and he sold me to a Vaiśya merchant, who put me up in the women's quarters. The young women fed me on rice and fruits. One day the wife of the Vaiśya merchant hugged me to her breast and petted me. Her touch kindled in me sexual feelings and I embraced her with my wings. In my hurry about the affair I slipped down and got crushed between the doors. Thus I fell again into hell. Afterwards I was born as an ox in a camp of a Gaṇḍāla. One day he yoked me to his cart and started for the forest in it with his wife. On the way she sang a song, and mentally excited by it I looked back. At once I slipped my feet, fell down and died. Again I returned to hell.

After another one hundred years I was born as your (Kośakārād) son in this house. All facts about my previous lives linger in my memory and now I am free from evils and am a virtuous person. I am going to the forest for tapas. Let the good boy, Divākara live here as house-holder. Niśākara thus did tapas for many years and attained Vākuṇṭha (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 91).

There is no definite evidence in the Purāṇas to establish that the Niśākara, the protector of Sampāti and the Niśākara mentioned above were the same person.

NISĀNGI. A son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhīmasena. (Karṇa Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 4).

NISĀTHA I. A prince of the Vṛṣṇi dynasty; son of Balabhadra born of Revati. (Harivaṃśa). Nisātha also had participated in the utsava celebrations held at Raivata mountain by the Yādavas. It was Niśātha who went to Kṛṇḍavapraṣṭha with the dowry of Subhadrā. He was present at the Āvamedha and Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. After death he was absorbed into the Viśvadevas. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 328, Verse 20; Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34; Āvamedha Parva, Chapter 66; Svāgaroḥaṇa Parva, Chapter 5).

NISĀTHA II. A King of ancient India. After death he lived in the court of Yama worshipping him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

NISCĪRĀ. A river glorified in the Purāṇas. It is well known in all the three worlds. A bath in the river is as good as performing an āśvamedha yajña. Those who bathe in the confluence of Niscīrā will attain Indraloka. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 138).

NISCĪYAVANA. Second son of Bhīsmapati. He was sinless, pure and holy. (Vana Parva, Chapter 209).

NĪṢĪTHA. A King of Dṛḍhara's dynasty. Puspaṇa was the son of Utkala, the son of Dṛṇha, and Niśīha was Puspaṇa's son by his wife Prabhā. Niśīha had two brothers, Pradoṣa and Vyūṣa. (Bhāgavata, 4th Skanda).

NĪṢKA. One palam (about one-sixth of a pound) of gold. (Manusmṛti, Chapter 8).

NīṣKRĪṬI. An agni (fire). A son of Bṛhaspati, he came to be known as Nīṣkrīṭi as he redeemed (Nīṣkrīma) people from unhappiness. (Vana Parva, Chapter 229, Verse 14).

NĪṢKUMBHA. A great asura. A dependant of the asura called Vṛṣaparvan, Nīṣkumbha, took part in many Devasūrā wars. (Bhaviṣya Parva, Chapter 59).

NĪṢKŪṬA. An ancient region in India. The people of the region were defeated once by Arjuna. (Sabhā Parva Chapter 27, Verse 29).

NĪṢKUTIKĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 12).

NĪṢTĀNAKA. A prominent nāga (serpent) begot by Kāśyapa Prajapati of his wife Kadrū. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 35, Verse 9).

NĪṢTHURĀKṢA. A very prominent King, who lived in ancient times in South India. Once he had to depend on Śrīdatta, a King of North India. (See under Śrīdatta).

NĪṢṬHŪRĪKA. A nāga born in the Kāśyapa dynasty. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 106, Verse 12).

NĪṢUMBHA I. An asura. Two of the sons of Kāśyapa Prajapati by his wife Diti became notorious fellows called Sumbha and Nīṣumbha. They were born and brought up in Pāṭāla. But as young men they came to the earth and began rigorous tapas taking neither food nor drink. After ten thousand years Brahmā appeared and asked them to choose their boons. They requested for eternity, deathlessness. But, Brahmā refused to grant that boon. Then they thought of another boon, which would in effect be as goodas the first one; they wanted death to come, but to come in a manner impossible to happen. So, they requested Brahmā as follows: “We shall not meet with death at the hands of males among Devas, human beings as also by birds, animals etc. In short we should be killed only by women; we fear them not.”

Brahmā granted them such a boon and they returned to Pāṭāla. They lost their head over the boon and appointed Śukra as their preceptor. Śukra was so pleased at this that he made Sumbha sit on a golden throne and crowned him King of Daityas. Following this, lesser Kings began coming to salute the great King and pay tributes. Great daityas like the Čaṇḍamūḍhas, Dhūmralocana, Raktabīja etc., became attendants of Sumbha and Nīṣumbha.

After having established the power of the daityas thus Sumbha–Nīṣumbha bhas gradually turned their attention towards extending the boundaries of their kingdom. The whole earth they subjugated. Then Nīṣumbha with a large army marched to Devaloka to conquer Indra. A Devasūrā war started. In the fight all the Dikpālakas were on one side and Nīṣumbha alone on the other side; the latter side was slightly defeated. Smitten by Indra's Vajra-udha Nīṣumbha fainted; his army also was broken.

As soon as news about the defeat of his brother was reported to him, Sumbha, with the remaining Dānavas hurried to Devaloka. In the battle that ensued the Devas were routed. Sumbha assumed Indra-hood by force and the standard (flag) of the daityas was hoisted on the flag-staff of Sudhārma, the palace of Indra. Sumbha captured Kamadhenu, Airāvata, Ucchāśravas etc. The Nandana garden and the shades of the Kalpaka tree were turned into resting places of the daityas. Fragrant flowers of the Kalpaka tree adorned the hairs of daitya women. Sumbha drove away Kubera and took over Alakāpurī also from him. As Yama ran away from the kingdom, Kālapūrī also came under Sumbha. All the Dikpālakas took refuge in forests and caves. Thousand years rolled by thus. By then the Devas worshipped Mahādevi, who appeared before them. Kauśikī devī, born from the body of Mahādevi stood before the Devas. As Kauśikī was dark in colour she came to be known as Kālikā also. Mahādevi, along with Kālikā started for the capital of Sumbha-Nīṣumbhas. At the capital they ascended a mountain and sat on two rocks. Mahādevi sang such a melodious song that birds and animals lost themselves in its sweetness and stood motionless.

The Čaṇḍamūḍhas, who were at the time passing that way were also attracted by the music. Having understood what it all meant they hurried up to Sumbhāsūra and gave him a description of the supreme beauty of Mahādevi and Kālikā. The description kindled great interest in Sumbha and Nīṣumbha about the devis and they deputed their minister Sṛgṛiva to bring the devis over to them. Having heard Sṛgṛiva's mission Mahādevi told him as follows: — “We do not have any objection to becoming the wives of your masters. But, in the matter of my marriage there is a special problem. While playing with my friends as a child I had accidentally taken a vow. I was at that age a bit proud about my capabilities and strength, and the vow I took was that I would marry only someone who was stronger than I am. My friends called me a 'fool' and ridiculed me about the vow. That only hardened my stubbornness and I stand by my vow even now. Therefore, please tell Sumbha first to defeat me in fighting.”

When Sṛgṛiva carried this information to Sumbha, and Nīṣumbha, they felt amused that a woman challenged them to fight. But, they had no alternative but to fight. So they deputed the mighty daitya Dhūmrākṣa with an army to fight Devī, and there ensued a fierce fighting between Devī and Kālikā on one side and the big daitya army on the other side. The whole army and finally Dhūmrākṣa too was killed.

Devī then retired from the battlefield to a place nearby and blew the conch. Sumbha–Nīṣumbhas heard the sound from it, and the next moment a messenger came and told them about the fate of the army and of Dhūmrākṣa. They then sent a much greater army under Čaṇḍamūḍhas against Devī. But Kālikā defeated them all. Raktabīja, who next encountered Devī with a great force, also became food for Kālikā. Then Sumbha–Nīṣumbhas entered the battlefield and they too were killed. Devas thus victorious regained Sargva. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

NĪṢUMBHA II. The Mahābhārata mentions another Nīṣumbha, a dependant of Narākāsura. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed this asura who towered up to the path of the devas (devayāna) from the earth. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 38).

NISUNDA. An asura killed by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Vana Parva, Chapter 12).

NITAMBHU. A great mahaṛsi. He too was present in the company of the munis, who visited Bhīṣma on his bed of arrows. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 8).
NÍTHA. A king born in the Vṛṣṇi dynasty. (Vana Parva, Chapter 120, Verse 9).

NÍTIGOTRA. A king born in the Brāhma dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIVĀTAKAVACA (S). A sect of Daityas.

1) Birth. Daityas were the off-springs of Kaśyapaprajāpati by Diti. Two sons called Hiraṇyākṣa and Hiraṇyakaśipu and a daughter called Siṁhikā were born to the Prajāpati of Diti. Siṁhikā was married by Vijrāṇṭi and to them were born Rāhu and others who became famous as the Saṁhitākṣers. Hiraṇyakaśipu had four famous sons called Anuhrāda, Hṛada, Prahlāda (the great devotee of Viṣṇu) and Saṁhitā. (Some texts refer to them as Anuhrāda, Hṛada, Prahlāda and Saṁhriḍa). Hṛada’s son was called Hṛda, Saṁhitā’s sons were called Āyuṣmān, Sibi and Bāśkala, and Prahlāda’s son was called Virocanā. Mahābali was Virocanā’s son and Bāna was the eldest of the hundred sons of Mahābali. Four crores of asuras called Nivātakavacas were born in the family of Prahlāda. The army of the Asuras, which routed the Devas many a time, was formed by the Nivātakavacas and Kālakeyas. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

2) Fight against Rāvaṇa. After securing boons from Brahmā Nivātakavacas lived in the city of Manimati and they were a terror to the world. Rāvaṇa longed once to defeat them and so besieged their city with his army. The two sides fought fiercely for hundreds of years. At last Brahmā intervened and conciliated them. From that day onwards the Nivātakavacas became friends of Rāvaṇa. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

3) Annihilation. The Nivātakavacas in company with the Kālakeyas attacked Devaloka. Indra, who could not withstand the attack, sent his charioteer Mātāli to Arjuna and brought him down. Most of the Nivātakavacas and Kālakeyas were killed in the fight by Arjuna. (See under Kālakeya).

NIVĀTAKAVACAYUDDHAPARVA. A sub Parva in Vana Parva of Mahābhārata comprising of chapters 165 to 175.

NIVIT. A mantra or hymn. ‘Uktha and Nivit are recited after the offerings in a yāga. (Rgveda, Manuḍala 1, Anuvāka 14, Sūkta 86).

NIVITA. Brahmin’s wearing upper cloth or the sacred thread on the left shoulder and under the right hand is called Upavīta; the same on the right shoulder and under the left hand is called prācināvīta and the same worn as a garland around the neck is called Nivīta.

NIVRTI. A king of the Yayāti dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NIYATAYU. Son of Śrutāyu. He was killed by Arjuna in the great war. (Draṇa Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 29).

NIYATI. A daughter called Laksṇi and two sons called Dhātā and Vidyātā were born to mahārāṣṭra Brigu of his wife Khyātī. Dhātā and Vidyātā married Āyati and Niyati, daughters of Meru. A son named Prāṇa was born to Vidyātā, and this Prāṇa became father of Mārkandeya. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part I, Chapter 10).

Niyati after her death became a Devī, and she continues to worship Brahmā in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 43).

NIYOGA. During the Vedic period there prevailed a system or custom which permitted either the husband or the wife who had no child by his wife or her husband to procreate a child in another woman or beget children by another man. That custom, called Niyoga fell into disuse after the Vedic period. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 256).

NODHAS. A muni who lived in the Rgvedic period. He achieved all his desires by praising the Devas. (Rgveda).

NRCAKŚUS. A king of the Yayāti dynasty. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

NRGA. A king born in the dynasty of Vaivasvata Manu.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahmā — Marici — Kaśyapa — Vivasvān — Vaivasvata Manu — Mahābhāhu — Prasandhī — Kṣapa — Nrγa. Nrγa was the younger brother of Iksvāku. From Nrγa was born Sumati, from him the king called Jyotis, from Jyotis Vasu and from Vasu Pratikā.

2) Nrγa became chameleon. Nrγa was an extremely righteous and generous King. Once, at Puṣkarā he gifted away thousands of cows to brahmins. There was a brahmin called Parvata living near Puṣkarā. He too was given a cow and it was after that the brahmin named Anārata came. By then there remained no cow to be gifted. Anārata came after Parvata had gone into the forest after leaving the cow at the pond (Puṣkarā). Nrγa had forgotten the fact that the cow had already been gifted away to Parvata and finding it there owner-less he gavc it to Anārata, who went away with the cow very much pleased. The King and his ministers also returned to the palace.

A very short time afterwards Parvata returned to the pond and felt very sorry to miss his cow. He searched for it here and there and at last found it at Anārata’s house. Quarell ensued between the two, Parvata alleging that Anārata had stolen his cow while the latter contended that it had been given to him by the King. Now, it was decided that the question should be submitted for arbitration to the King, and the contending parties went to the capital to see the King. At the palace they asked the gate-keepers to tell the King about their arrival. But, they did not tell the King, nor did he come.

Angered at this the brahmins cursed that Nrγa be converted into a chameleon and live as such for a thousand years. The King heard about the curse and ran up to the brahmins and requested for absolution from it. The brahmins then said that after one thousand years Mahāviṣṇu would incarnate as Śrī Kṛṣṇa and that at his touch Nrγa, the chameleon would resume his former form as King. According to this curse Nrγa was born as a chameleon in a neglected well at Dwārakā. One day Śan∫a and others who happened to go near the well tried their best to take the chameleon out of it, to no purpose. At last Kṛṣṇa with his attendants came and took it out of the well. At Kṛṣṇa’s touch it resumed its form as King Nrγa, and related the story of his curse to the onlookers, who stood there wondering.

3) Other information.

(i) After his death Nrγa lived in Yama’s court worshipping him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 8).

(ii) Nrγa once conducted a yajña on the banks of the river Payoṣṣa in Varahatūrtha at which Indra drank soma so much as to get intoxicated, and the brahmins danced with pleasure at the very liberal gifts made to them. (Vana Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 5).

(iii) Nṛga was a King very dear to Indians. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 7).
(iv) Kṛṣṇa granted salvation to Nṛga who changed, at his touch, from chameleon to his former form as King Nṛga. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 29).
(v) He did not eat flesh. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 29).

Nṛśad. A maharṣi, who was the father of sage Kauṇa. (Ṛgveda, Manḍala 10).

Nṛśart. A Rṣi, who lived in the Ṛgvedic period. His son was Ṛṣabha. (Ṛgveda, Manḍala 1, Anuvāka 17).

Nyagrodha. A son of Ugrasena. When Kṛṣṇa killed Kaṁśa Nyagrodha fought with Kṛṣṇa and others and was killed by the blow of Balabhadra’s shield. (Bhāgavata).

Nyagrodhaṭīrtha. A holy place on the banks of the ancient river Drśadvatī in North India. (Vana Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 11).

O. This sound signifies Brahmā. (Agni Pūrṇa; Chapter 348).

Od Ra. (M). An ancient province of India, Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 23 says that the King of this province had come to Dharmaputra with presents.

Ogharatha. Son of the King named Oghavān. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2, Verse 38).

Oghavān I. Grandson of King Nṛga. He had a son named Ogharatha and a daughter named Oghavati. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2).

Oghavān II. A warrior on the side of the Kauravas. (M.B. Karṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 42).

Oghavatī I. There are seven Sarasvatī rivers in the world. These are Suprabhā, Kaṁcanākṣi, Vīśāla, Manorāmā, Sarasvatī, Oghavatī and Surenū. In the Mahābhārata, Salya Parva, Chapter 38 we find that Oghavatī was invoked and brought to Kurukṣetra. It was on the bank of this Oghavatī that Bhīṣma fell and lay on the Sarāṣṭryā. (Bed of arrows). (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 5).

Oghavatī II. Daughter of the King named Oghavān. Sudarṣana, the son of Agni married her. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 2).

Om. This sound is a combination of the three letters—A, U and M. The A—sound signifies Viśṇu, the U—sound signifies Śiva and the M—sound signifies Brahmā.

Akāro Viṣṇuruddiṣṭā
Tekārastu Maheśvarah/
Makārastu śmṛto Brahmā
Pranavastu trayātmaṇakah//

(Vāyu Purāṇa).
The sound “Om” is called “Pranava” or “Brahman.” All mantras begin with the sound ‘Om’. Because of its sacredness, Śūdras and other low-caste people are not allowed to utter it or to hear it. They may pronounce it only as “Aum.” This sound includes all that has happened and all that is to happen. (Māndukyopanisad).

Ompatu. (Malayālam word for nine).

Nine grahas (nine planets). Sun, Moon, Mars, Budha (Mercury), Guru (Jupiter), Sukra (Venus), Śani (Saturn), Rāhu and Ketu.
PADMASARAS. A lotus pond of Uttara Bhārata. The Paṇḍavas on their way from Khāṇḍavaprastha to Girivraja met Śrī Krṣṇa at this place and talked with him for a long time. (Chapter 20, Sabhā Parva).

PADMASAGANDHIKA. A lotus pond situated near Cedeśa. During the period of the Mahābhārata a company of merchants were attacked by wild elephants at this place. This is very nicely described in Chapter 66 of Vana Parva of Mahābhārata.

PADMASEKHARA. A Gandharva King. Padmāvatī of whom many stories are told in Kathāśārī of Śrī Vana was the daughter of Padmaśekhara. Padmāvatīlambaka of the said book is entirely devoted to stories about Padmāvatī.

PADMĀVATI I. A river which is the incarnation of Mahālakṣmi. (See under Gaṅgā).

PADMĀVATI II. Wife of Emperor Udayana. (See under Udayana).

PADMĀVATI III. Wife of Candragupta son of Sahasramukhārvana. (See under Sahasramukhārvana).

PADMĀVATI IV. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PADMĀVATI V. Daughter of Satyaketu, King of Vidarbha. Ugrasena married her. After marriage she went and stayed once in her father’s house for a short period. During that time through illegal intimacy with a messenger from Kubera named Göbbila she became pregnant. She started to destroy the foetus when from inside a voice said “I am being born to wreak vengeance on Mahāviṣṇu for killing Kālanemi.” The son born thus was Kaṭiśa. (Śṛṭikhaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PADMĀVATI VI. Wife of a Vaśya named Pranidhi. Once Pranidhi went to a neighbouring village for trade. Padmāvatī and her companions were one day bathing in a river nearby when a Śūdra passed that way. Attracted by her dazzling beauty he remained there talking to her. The Śūdra named Dharmaḍhava was greatly enamoured of her and the companions of Padmāvatī, noticing that, just to make fun of him said “If you abandon your life at the point where the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā meet you can attain Padmāvatī.” Without any hesitation, thinking that what they said was true, he went and ended his life at the place suggested. Immediately he became a replica of Pranidhi and stood before Padmāvatī. The real Pranidhi also came there then. Padmāvatī was in a fix to choose the real husband. Mahāviṣṇu appeared before them then and asked Padmāvatī to accept both of them as her husbands. Padmāvatī pleaded it was forbidden for women of her community to accept more than one husband and then Mahāviṣṇu took all the three along with him to Vaikuṇṭha. (Kriyā Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 4).

PAHLAVA. A place of human habitation of ancient India. This is situated in the western zone. (Sloka 68, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PAJAVANA. A Śūdra. This Śūdra conducted a grand Yājña similar to Aindrāṅgāyajña and gave as fees to priests a lakkh of gold vessels. (Chapter 6, Santi Parva).

PAILA. A disciple of Vyāsa. It was the five disciples of Vyāsa named Sumantu, Jaimini, Pāila, Śūka and Vaiśampāyana who gave publicity to the original Mahābhārata. (See under Guruparamparā).

He was the son of a person named Vasu and attended the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 35, Chapter 33, Sabhā Parva). Paila was also one among those who visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 6, Chapter 17, Santi Parva).

PAILAGARGA. An ancient sage. Ambā, daughter of the King of Kāśi, once practised austerities in the āśrama of this sage. (See under Ambā).

PAISĀCA. A kind of marriage. (See under Vivāha).

PAIṬHAKA. An asura. This asura was killed by Śrī Krṣṇa. (Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

PĀKA. A mighty asura. Once this asura gathered a big army and went to fight against Indra. A grim battle which lasted for several days took place in which the asura army was destroyed and Pāka killed. Indra got thenceforth the name Pākaśāsana. (Chapter 70, Viśu Purāṇa).

PAKAL. Malayālam word meaning Day. A story about the origin of day, night, dawn and dusk is contained in Viṣu Purāṇa. At the time of the great Deluge everything from gods down to the rocks lay submerged in Parabrahman (Supreme Being). Brahmā sat in meditation to initiate what he termed as Jagatṣṛti, the four species of living beings like the devas, asuras, pitṛs and men. When the meditation proceeded, the Tamogūṇa in Brahmā became prominent and so first and foremost of all, the asuras were born from his waist. Then Brahmā discarded his Tamogūṇa and the manifestation of the discarded Tamogūṇa became Night. Brahmā sat again in meditation and from his face sprang out the devas, who were embodiments of sattvagūṇa. Brahmā discarded the sattvagūṇa and it then became Day. That is why asuras are powerful at night and devas by day. Then another manifestation with sattvagūṇa predominating sprang out from Brahmā and it was called Pīṭrs. Brahmā discarded that also and it became Dusk. Brahmā sat again in meditation and then were born men who were a manifestation of Rajagūṇa. Brahmā discarded that also and it then became Dawn. That is why men are strong at dawn and the pitṛs strong at dusk. It is because of these that it is said that day, night, dawn and dusk are bodies of Brahmā. All the above four are an asylum of the three gunas.

Night is called Uṣa and day,Vyuṣṭi. Sandhyā (dusk) is the time between Uṣa and Vyusṭi. When the fierce and terrible Sandhyā commences, a set of fierce demons called Mandejas desire to eat the Sun. A fight ensues then between the Sun and the demons and by a curse of Prajāpati the demons die daily though their bodies never perish. At that time the best of Brahmās with the sound of ‘OM’ vibrating recite the gayatri and throw water upwards. That water transforms itself into Vajrāyuṣa and burns to death the wicked demons. The first oblation to the sacrificial fire is performed reciting the mantra which begins with “Sūryo jyotith” ‘OM’ is but Bhagavān Viṣṇu, lord of the Vedas with the lustre of Rk, Yajus and Sāma. The very utterance of the word ‘OM’ therefore, destroys the demons Mandejas. (Chapter 8, Arṇiṣa 2, Chapter 5, Arṇiṣa 1, Viṣu Purāṇa).

PĀKHANDA. An ancient place of habitation in Dakṣiṇa Bhārata. Sahadeva one of the Pāṇḍavas sent his messengers and subdued the country. (Sloka 70, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).
PÁKKANÁR. Vararuci, the celebrated astronomer, got of a Cāndāli wife twelve sons. They were called “Paracci peṭṭa pastikulam (The twelve sons born of a Cāndāli). They were Pākkānar’s wife was a very chaste woman devoted to her husband. There are two stories demonstrating the devotion she showed to her husband.
(i) It was usual for all the sons of Vararuci excepting Vāyillakkunnilappan to assemble at the house of Agnihotri for the Sṛddha of their father annually once. Once after the Sṛddha, all of them sat together for their meals and the antarjanam (wife) of Agnihotri refused to serve an assembly consisting of Pākkānar, a Cāndāla. When Agnihotri compelled her to do it she came to the place hiding her face with an umbrella. Pākkānar enquired about the purpose of the umbrella and Agnihotri replied that it was the duty of chaste and devoted wives to hide their faces from other men. Then Pākkānar argued that still the brahmīn wives who hid their faces were lacking in devotion and chastity and the Cāndāla women were the only class of women who were chaste and devoted to their husbands. Everybody present there joined sides with Agnihotri and opposed the argument of Pākkānar. To demonstrate the devotion of Cāndāla wives Pākkānar took Agnihotri to his house. On reaching there Pākkānar called his wife and asked “How much paddy do you have here?” “Five measures”, she replied. “Pour half of it and bring it to me”, Pākkānar instructed. The dutiful wife pounded the paddy, cooked the rice and brought it to Pākkānar. Pākkānar asked her to throw the rice into the drain. She did it without the least hesitation. Pākkānar then asked his wife to pound the remaining paddy and bring the rice cooked as before. She did so and when she brought it before Pākkānar he asked her to throw that also away into the drain. She instantly obeyed. That day both of them went without meals. They were so poor.
The next day Pākkānar along with Agnihotri went to the illam (house) of Agnihotri. Pākkānar then asked Agnihotri to make his wife do exactly like what Pākkānar’s wife was made to do. Agnihotri immediately called his wife and asked her to take two and a half measures of paddy, pound it, cook it and bring it to him. “There is rice here ready in stock and so why should we pound paddy now?” Agnihotri’s wife questioned. But Agnihotri insisted and so surrendering to the compulsion she did as she was instructed. When she brought the rice before him cooked, Agnihotri asked her to throw it away into the drain. She hesitated first but when Agnihotri insisted she did so very reluctantly. Then Agnihotri asked her to take another two and a half measures of paddy, pound it and bring the cooked rice once again. The antarjanam (wife) flew into fury and showered on her husband a heap of abuses. She went and hid inside and despite repeated requests from Agnihotri she never showed her face out again. Agnihotri admitted defeat and accepted Pākkānar’s view that a Cāndāli woman was more chaste than a brahmīn woman.
(2) Once Agnihotri came to the hut of Pākkānar. Pākkānar called his wife to bring a ‘palaka’ (a wooden plank used for sitting) for Agnihotri to sit on. She was at that time drawing water from a well and the bucket was midway in the well with water. The instant she heard her husband call her she left the grip on the rope and rushed to the side of her husband. She did what was asked of her to do and then returned to the well. Pākkānar followed her taking Agnihotri along with him. When they reached the well Agnihotri was dumb-founded. The bucket with water was staying in mid-air in the well exactly at the position at which Pākkānar’s wife had left it. The power of the chastity of the woman. (See under Vararuci).

PAKSHA. See under Kālamāna.

PAKSĀLĪKA. A female follower of Subrahmanyā.

PAKSIVAMŚA. The Purāṇic version of the origin of birds is given below:

Descending in order from Viṣṇu came Brahmā—Marici—Kaśyapa-prajapati. The latter got of his wife Tāmār (daughter of Dākṣa) five daughters named Krauci, Bhāṣi, Śyenī, Dhṛtarāṣṭri and Śuki. From Krauci were born the Ulūkas, Bhāṣi gave birth to Bhāsas, Śyenī to vultures and Dhṛtarāṣṭri to swans and geese. From these originated the entire bird family of the world. (Chapter 4, Aranyā Kaṭā, Vālmikī Rāmāyana).

PACTHA. A King of Vedic times who was a protege of the Ásvins. Indra was kind to this King. In the Dāsarājīna battle Paktas fought against Sudāś on the side of Trasadasyu. (Maṇḍala 7, Rgveda).

PALA. A measure of ancient times. (See under Trasa-reṇu).

PALA. A serpent born of the race of Vāsuki. This serpent committed suicide at the Sarpastra of Jana-mejaya. (Śloka 51, Chapter 57, Ádi Parva).

PALAKA. A son born to the King Cāndmahāsena of his wife Angaravati. Angaravati got two sons. The other son was named Gopālaka. (Kathāmukhalambaka, Kathāsārīṣāgara).

PALAKĀVYA. The author of the famous book ‘Hastā-yuvradasaṁhitā’. This book contains 160 chapters dealing with Mahārasthāna (great diseases), Kṣudra-rasthāna (minor diseases), Salyasthāna (extraction of extraneous matter from the body) and Uttarasthāna (diseases of the head). Pālakāvyā taught this Ayurveda-saṁhitā to Rāmapāda, King of Āṅgadeśa. (Agni Purāṇa).

PĀLĀ. One of the seven mothers of Subrahmanyā. The other six are: Kāki, Halimā, Brahmikā, Mālinī, Āryā and Mitrā. (Śloka 10, Chapter 228, Vana Parva).

PĀLĀSAVANA. A sacred forest. Once the sage Jāmadagni performed a sacrifice in this forest. On that occasion all the rivers in the world were present there carrying their water. The sage at this Yāga gave wine to all the other sages to their heart’s content. (Śloka 16, Chapter 94, Vana Parva).

PĀLĪ. A corrupt form of Sanskrit.

PÁLITA. A rat, a character in ‘Bidālopakhyāna’. This rat held a conversation with Lomasā, a cat. (See under Bidālopakhyāna).

PÁLITĀ. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 3, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PALLAŅTU. The name of the devotional songs sung by the Tamil devotional poet, Viṣṇucītta.
According to Nyāya Vaiśeṣikasūtra there are seven Padārthas and they comprise nine kinds of Dravyas which are the Pañcabhūtas (five elements), Kāla (time), Dik (space), Ātmā (soul), and Manas (mind). They are described below:

1) Prthvi (earth). The characteristic of this padārtha is smell. Prthvi is of two kinds, Nitya (eternal) and Anitya (perishable). Nitya is in the form of atom (paramāṇu) and anitya in the form of Kārya. They are classified into body, sense organs and objects.

2) Jala (water). Jala has a cold touch. It is of two kinds Nitya and Anitya. Nitya is in the form of paramāṇu (atom); Anitya in the form of Kārya.

3) Agni (fire). It generates heat. It is of two kinds, Nitya and Anitya. Nitya is in the form of paramāṇu and anitya in the form of Kārya. There are four kinds of Āgni: Fire of the earth, fire of the sky, fire of the stomach (digestive power) and the fire commonly used.

4) Vāyu (air). It is without form but with the sense of touch. It is also of two kinds. Nitya in the form of paramāṇu and anitya in the form of Kārya.

5) Ākāśa (ether). This is the carrier of sound. It is single and eternal.

6) Kāla (time). It is general cause for all actions embracing the elements. It is also single and eternal.

7) Dik. Places like north, south, east and west which are eternal.

8) Ātmā (soul). It is related to knowledge and is of two kinds, Jīvātmā and Paramātmā.

9) Manas (mind). It is the sense-organ to enjoy pleasures. It is in the form of paramāṇu and eternal. To know the views of Manu on the origin of the Pañcabhūtas see under Srṣti.

PAŃCA BrahMĀSANA. This is a divine cot with Brahma, Viṣṇu, Rudra and Iśvara as its four legs and Sādāśiva as the couch. Devī rests on this cot always. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PAŃCAKūDA. A nymph. Once Śuka, son of Vyāsa by his yogic powers entered the Ākāśa. Then a host of celestial maidens led by Pañcakūḍā stood watching him in admiratiom. (See under Śuka)

Bhīṣma once told Dharmaputra that women were fickle-minded and the cause of evils. To explain his statement he pointed out to the conversation between Nārada and Pañcakūḍā. Nārada once conducted a world tour during the course of which he met Pañcakūḍā and asked her the characteristics of women. She replied thus: “Even beautiful, venerable and noble ladies would stoop to folly. It is not the habit of women to leave away charming men of wealth if they get them conveniently. Any woman can be tamed if you please her in the proper way. If women remain faithful to their husbands it is because they are afraid of scandal. They will enjoy men without looking into their life or figure. The desire for men in women can be compared to that of Antaka (god of Death) for the lives of men. This is the secret of womanhood.” (Chapter 38, Anuśāsana Parva).

PAṆCADEVIS. Durga, Rādhā, Lākṣmī, Sarasvatī and Sāvitrī are the Paṅcadevis. They are different forms of nature. (See under Devī and Prakṛti).

PAṆCADHANUS. A King of the race of Pāru. He was the son of Śrījaya and the father of Somadatta. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

PAṆCAGAṆA. An ancient kingdom of Uttarā Bhārata. During the time of the Pāṇḍavas this country was prosperous and Arjuna once conquered the ruler of this country. (Śloka 12, Chapter 27, Sabhā Parva).

PAṆCAGĀṆĀ. A sacred place of Uttarā Bhārata. The god of Death once sat at this place and practised penance. From then onwards the place was considered holy. (Śloka 23, Chapter 54, Droṇa Parva).

PAṆCAGNI. Rohini, a daughter and Soma, a son, were born to Niśā the third wife of Manu, an Agni. Besides there they got five sons in the form of Agni (fire) and these five are called Paṅcagnis. They are Vaśiṇvāna, Viśvapati, Sanshiṣita, Kapila and Agraṇi.

PAṆCĀJA I. (PAṆCĀJANA): A mighty asura. This asura lived inside a conch. Śrī Kṛṣṇa killed this asura. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadrārama were having their education in the āśrama of the sage Sāndiṭanī. On the eve of their completing their education an asura named Paṅcāja carried away the son of the sage while the child was bathing in the Prabhāsāśīrtha and kept him inside a conch where the asura lived. The sage, greatly grieved asked his disciples to get him back his son as his Gurudakṣiṇā (fees for the preceptor). Accordingly Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma went to the banks of the river and prayed to Varuṇa. Varuṇa appeared before them and then they told him about the mishap. With the help of Varuṇa they killed the asura Paṅcāja and got back the son of their guru. The conch in which the asura lived was taken by Kṛṣṇa. Because the conch belonged to Paṅcāja the conch got the name Paṅcājanya. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCĀJA II. Sagara of the solar race got a son named Asamaṇiṣa as his wife Keśi. He became famous as Paṅcāja. He was the father of Aṁśumān and grandfather of Dilipa. (Chapter 15, Harivaṃśa).

PAṆCĀJANA. A Prājāpati. He gave his daughter Paṅcājani (Asīṇi) in marriage to the great sage and law-giver Daśa. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCĀJANAS. Brahmīns, Kṣatriyaśas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras are the four castes. Niśādas form the fifth caste. All these castes are collectively called Paṅcājanas. (Sūkta 89, Anuvāka 14, Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

PAṆCĀJANI. A beautiful daughter of Viśvārūpa. King Rṣabha of the lunar race married this girl and they got five sons named Sumati, Rāṣṭrabhṛt, Sudarśana, Āvaraṇa and Dhūmratum. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAṆCĀJANYA I. The conch of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (See under Paṅcāja).

PAṆCĀJANYA II. A forest near the mountain of Raivataka. (Dāksiṇātya Pāṭha; Chapter 38, Sabhā Parva).

PAṆCĀJANYA III. An agni (fire). It was so called because it was born of the parts of five sages. It was called Tapa also. (Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

PAṆCĀKA. One of the two soldiers presented to Subrahmanya by Indra for the battle between the devas and asuras. The other was named Ukroṣa. (Śloka 35, Chapter 45, Śûlaya Parva).

PAṆCĀKARṆAVĀṬSAYAṆA. A Vedic preceptor. Because Paṅcākarna was born in the family of Vāṭṣya he got the name Vāṭṣayaṇa. In the language of Yogic treatises the seven life-winds in the human head are called the ‘Saptasūryas’ (seven suns). Paṅcākarna väṭṣayaṇa had a clear knowledge of these Saptasūryas and has given a vivid description of them. (Taittirīya Aranyāka).

PAṆCĀKARPAṬA. An ancient country of western Bhārata. Nakula, one of the Pāṇḍavas, conquered this country. (Chapter 32, Sabhā Parva).

PAṆCĀKSĀRĀMĀHĀTMYA. Namaśīvāya composed of five letters (Na—mah—śi—va—ya) is called the mantra of Paṅcākṣara. There is a story in Śiva Purāṇa about the powers one can acquire by uttering this mantra. (See under Kalāvatī).

PAṆCĀLĀ I. An ancient village of Bhārata. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).}

PAṆCĀLĀ II. A sage. He worshipped God according to the doctrines laid down by Vāmadeva and by the blessing of God attained the Kramavībhāga in the Vedas. (Śloka 102, Chapter 342, Śaṅti Parva).

PAṆCĀLĀ III. An ancient country of Bhārata. Draupadī, wife of the Pāṇḍavas, was the daughter of Drupada, King of Paṅcāla. (See under Drupada).

PAṆCĀLĪ. Draupadī, wife of the Pāṇḍavas.

i) Previous births. Pāṇcālī had many previous births. During all these births many gods blessed her saying that she would have five husbands when she was born as the daughter of Drupada. Stories about her previous births lying scattered in the Purāṇas are given below:—

1) Māyāśītā. When Rāma and Lākṣmāna were in exile in the forest with Sītā, Agni came to Rāma once and told him in private thus: “Oh Rāma, you have incarnated on earth to kill Rāvana. The time for that is drawing nigh and ere long Rāvana would carry away Sītā. It is not proper that Sītā, the incarnation of Lākṣmī, should be touched by Rāvana. Therefore I shall keep Sītā safe with me and I am giving you a phantom Sītā to be with you in her stead.” Śrī Rāma took the Māyāśītā from Agni without even Lākṣmāna knowing it and handed over the original Sītā to the custody of Agni.

While thus Śrī Rāma, Lākṣmāna and Māyāśītā were living together in their hermitage a golden deer was seen one day in the precincts of their āśrama. Sītā was enamoured of the beautiful deer and wanted it. So Rāma keeping Lākṣmāna to watch over Sītā went in search of the deer. Śrī Rāma tried his best to capture the deer alive. But all his efforts failed and by that time he had come far from the āśrama following the deer. So he discharged an arrow and killed it. While falling dead the deer raised a cry imitating that of Rāma’s and called Lākṣmāna for help. The deer was none other than Mārīca, the uncle of Rāvana. On hearing the call for help Lākṣmāna rushed to the spot from where the sound came and Sītā was left alone. for some time. Rāvana came to the āṭrāma at that time and took the Māyāśīṭa away to Lāṅkā.

Rāma and Lāṅkmaṇa went to Lāṅkā with an army of monkeys and after killing Rāvana took back Sītā to Ayodhyā. Then Rāma in deference to public opinion put Sītā into the fire to test her purity. At that time god Agni taking back Māyāśīṭa gave the real Sītā to Rāma, unscathed by the fire. Then, when Māyāśīṭa was thus abandoned by Rāma she bowed down before Śrī Rāma and Agni and asked them thus “What am I to do now? Where should I go?” They advised her to go to Puskara and do penance there and blessed her saying that at the successful end of her penance she would become Svargalakṣī. Paramāśiva was pleased by her penance and appearing before her asked her what boon she wanted. Māyāśīṭa who had become Svargalakṣī by then requested Śiva to give her a husband. She repeated the request ‘Patiṁ dehi’ (Give me a husband) five times and Śiva said that she would have five husbands in her next life as the daughter of the King of Pāncālī with the name Kṛṣṇa.

9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata)

ii) Nālāyāni (Indrasenā). Once there was an aged sage named Maudgalya. Nālāyāni alias Indrasenā was the wife of Maudgalya. Even though the wife was young and the husband old, Nālāyāni was very chaste. The sage became very old, grey-haired and rugged, skeleton-like with a foul smell emanating from his body. He was always in an angry mood. Still Nālāyāni stuck to him as a chaste, loving and dutiful wife. As time passed on Maudgalya became a leper. One day while the sage was eating, a finger of his broke and fell into the rice. With great calmness and devotion Nālāyāni removed the finger from the rice and ate the rice. Greatly pleased at this act of hers the sage asked her what boon she wanted and she replied she desired to have an amorous life with him as Paṅcalāśira. Maudgalya granted her the boon and they both travelled the whole world enjoying an amorous life. When the sage took the form of a mountain Nālāyāni became a river and when the sage took the shape of a flowering tree she became a creeper on it. They spent thousands of years like that and then Maudgalya became tired of a sexual life and returned to the ascetic life. Even after such a long period of erotic life Nālāyāni was still lustful and she resented the decision of her husband to go back to the life of a hermit. She begged her husband to continue the same life for some more time. Maudgalya got cross when she thus caused hindrance to his penance and cursed her saying that she would in her next life be born as the daughter of the King of Paṅcalī when she would have five husbands to satisfy her lust. Greatly grieved at this curse she practised severe austerities standing in the midst of Paṅcāgiri. Pleased with her penance Śiva appeared before her and blessed her saying that she would be born in her next birth in a very noble family and she would then have five husbands, good-natured, doing godly work and equal in valour to Indra. She then pleaded that she should be granted the boon to remain a virgin during the coitus with each of her husbands. Śiva granted that wish. Then Śiva sent her to the river Gaṅgā, and asked her to fetch a beautiful young man whom she would be seeing there. Accordingly she went to the river to do as she was directed.

At that time all the devas joined together and performed a Yāga at Naimiṣārṇya. Kāla, the god of Death, was one of the chief priests for the function. The Yāga lasted for a long time and since Kāla was consecrated for the Yāga he did not attend to his duties as the god of Death. Death came to a dead stop and men increased in alarming numbers and the devas were perplexed. They went to Brāhma and acquainted him with the frightening situation. Brāhma sent them to Naimiṣārṇya. They went there and were talking to Kāla when they saw a few golden flowers coming down the river. Getting curious Indra walked up the river to locate the origin of these flowers. When he reached the place of origin of Gaṅgā he saw Nālāyāni there. Nālāyāni took the beautiful young man to Śiva. Śiva was at that time engaged in a game of dice with Pārvatī and Indra did not then recognise Śiva. Indra in his arrogance argued that the whole universe belonged to him. Śiva jumped up enraged and ran after Indra who ran to the mouth of a cave. Śiva caught him and said that he would show him four Indras inside that cave. Both of them entered the cave and to the amazement of Indra he saw four other Indras sitting inside the cave. They were all the creation of Śiva and with the original Indra the number of Indras came to five. Then addressing Nālāyāni who had followed them Śiva said, “Oh beautiful girl, do not be worried. All these five are your husbands. You will be born as the daughter of the King of Paṅcalī. Then all these five will be born in the lunar race and will marry you.”

The Indras agreed to be born on earth and do the work of God. After that they all went to Mahāviṣṇu and requested him to give them mighty accomplices to fulfill their mission. Then Mahāviṣṇu plucked two hairs from his body, one white and the other black, and dropped them on the ground. The black hair was born as Śrī Kṛṣṇa and the white hair was born as Balarāma, to help the Paṅḍavas later.

Paṅcalī’s two previous births can be explained thus: Agni deva created Māyāśīṭa who in turn became Svargalakṣī to be born as Paṅcalī. Māyāśīṭa was a part of Mahālakṣī and so also Nālāyāni who became Paṅcalī was a part of Lakṣṇī. Paṅḍavas are known to be the sons of five gods and they used for the procreation of the Paṅḍavas Indraṁśa (part of Indra) thus making all Indras, (Chapters 197 and 198, Adi Parva).

2) Birth of Paṅcalī. Paṅcalī was born in the palace of Drupada, King of Paṅcalī. She had a brother named Dhṛṣṭadyumna. There is a story about their birth in the Purāṇa:

Drupada insulted Droṇa his classmate in the Gurukula and Droṇa kept in mind the insult to wreak vengeance on Drupada. Drupada, therefore, wanted a son to be born who would defeat Droṇa in a battle. Brahmīns advised him to conduct a Yāga for that purpose. He decided to conduct one on a large scale and went about in search of a Yajyā (one who performs sacrifices according to Vedic rites) and reached Kalmāsapurī on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. There he saw a brahmīn’s house where lived two sages named Yāja and Upayāja. They were in figure and nature alike. At first Drupada went to the younger of the two, Upayāja. He went near him and after massaging his feet and legs requested him to officiate in a Yāga aimed at getting for him a son to conquer Drona in a battle. He promised to give him ten crores of cattle for that and also anything else the sage wanted. These promises did not make the sage consent to conduct the Yāga and so the King stayed at the aśrama serving the sage. A year went by and one day the sage appeared cheerful and told Drupada thus: “Oh King, my brother who was walking one day in a storm saw a fruit lying on his way and ate it without first ascertaining whether the fruit was pure or not. Again, I have seen him taking food from others freely and eating it. I think he is wishful about wealth and, perhaps, if you approach him he may help you.”

Drupada went to Yāja and after serving him to please him made his request promising him much wealth. Yāja was ready to perform the Yajñā. Upayāja came to them at that time and Yāja consulted his brother before going to perform the Yajñā. The Yāga was successfully conducted and at the end the priest Yāja called the wife of Drupada and gave her havya (clarified butter). Because the havya was prepared by Yāja and was offered by Upayāja the sages said that the queen would get two children. While Yāja was offering oblations to the sacrificial fire a boy with a crown on his head and bearing a sword and a bow in his hands rose from the fire. The sages present there then said that, that boy would kill Droṇa. He was named Dhrṣṭadyumna. Then from the dais of the Yāga-fire emerged a beautiful lady of dazzling brilliance. Immediately a voice from heaven was heard to say thus: “This Sumadhyaṁā (a girl in her blossoming youth) would work on the side of God and will cause terror to the Kauravas.”

Yāja blessed the wife of Drupada saying that the two children would thenceforth call her mother. Yāja himself named the boy Dhrṣṭadyumna and the girl according to the ethereal voice, Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa was dark in complexion. Kṛṣṇa was called Pārśuṛati because she was the grand-daughter of Pṛṣṭa and Draupadi because she was the daughter of Draupada and Pāṇcāli because she was the daughter of the King of Pāṇcāla. Pāṇcāli grew up in the palace of Drupada. (Chapter 167, Adi Parva).

3) Marriage. After escaping from the lac palace the Pāṇḍavas reached a village named Ekacakra after walking a long time through the forests. There they stayed in a brahmin’s house. Every morning they would go in disguise for begging and return with the alms in the evening. This was their daily routine and one day while they were in their daily round they saw a group of brahmans and they said they were going to the Śvayaṁvara of the daughter of the King of Pāṇcāla. The brahmans invited them also to come along with them describing in detail the beauty of the girl and the elaborate and festive arrangements made for the marriage. The Pāṇḍavas went to Pāṇcāla along with the brahmans. On the way they met Vedavyāṣa and receiving blessings from him they went to the capital city of Pāṇcāla and took their abode in the house of a potter. Nobody knew who they were.

Drupada had placed a mighty steel bow in the marriage hall. When all the distinguished guests were seated in the marriage hall, the King announced that his daughter would be given in marriage to him who bent the steel bow and with it shot a steel arrow, through the central aperture of a revolving disc, at a target placed above. Many valiant princes from all parts of Bhārata including the Kauravas had gathered there. When it was time for the ceremonies to begin Pāṇcāli clad in beautiful robes with a bewitching charm which excited the royal assemblage entered the hall with a garland in her hands. Then Dhrṣṭadyumna brother of Pāṇcāli said “Hear ye, oh princes, seated in state in this assembly, here is the bow and arrow. He who sends five arrows in succession through the hole in the wheel and unerringly hits the target shall win my sister.”

Many noted princes rose one after another and tried in vain to string the bow. It was too heavy and stiff for them. Then Arjuna rose and meditating on Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme God, strung the bow with ease and hit at the target. Pāṇcāli then put the garland on Arjuna’s neck and accepting him as her husband went with him and stayed that night at the house of the potter. Drupada that night went to the house of the potter to make enquiries about his daughter and son-in-law. His joy knew no bounds when he knew that his son-in-law was none other than the celebrated Arjuna. The Pāṇḍavas then took Pāṇcāli to their home in Ekacakra and as soon as Kuntidevi heard the footsteps of her sons outside she said from inside asking them to share that day’s aims among themselves little knowing that it was a bride that had been brought by them. Thus Pāṇcāli became the common consort of the five Pāṇḍavas. Then the marriage of Pāṇcāli was ceremoniously conducted after inviting friends and relatives. The Pāṇḍavas then built a new palace at Indraprastha and lived there. (Chapters 190 to 220, Adi Parva).

Sūrya was present there along with the leading members of the clan of Vṛṣṇi. He could recognise the Pāṇḍavas in spite of their disguise. Sūrya went to the potter’s house and visited them. He gave them valuable presents on the occasion of their marriage.

4) Making Draupadi naked. Once Duryodhana challenged Dharmaputra to a game of dice. Dharmaputra lost all and in the end in despair pledged Draupadi and lost her. Immediately Duryodhana asked Vidura to bring Draupadi to his palace and make her serve as a servant-maid. Vidura did not consent to that. Then Duryodhana asked Prātikāmi to bring her. While entering the palace of Draupadi, Prātikāmi was as timid as a dog about to enter the cage of a lion. He informed Draupadi of his mission. Draupadi sent him back and then Duryodhana sent another messenger. Draupadi went with him to the court of the Kauravas. As soon as Duśśāsana saw Draupadi he jumped at her and caught hold of her hair and dragged her to the centre of the assembly. When Duśśāsana dragged her thus she said in piteous tones “I am in my monthly period and I have only the upper garment on me. Please do not take me to the assembly.” Duśśāsana was not moved by these pleadings and he dragged her still.

Bhima could not hold himself calm against this atrocity any longer and in a roar of wrath he abused Dharmaputra for pledging Pāṇcāli thus and losing her. Arjuna however remonstrated gently with Bhima. Then to the consternation of all, Duśśāsana started his shameful work of pulling at Pāncālī's robes to strip her of all the clothes. All earthly aid having failed Draupadī in utter helplessness implored divine mercy and succour. Then a miracle occurred. In vain did Duṣāsana toil to pull the garments completely and make her naked. As he pulled off each, fresh garments were seen to come from somewhere and cover her nudity. Duṣāsana retired from his work exhausted and disappointed. Then Karṇa ordered that Draupadī should be sent to the palace of Duryodhana as a servant-maid. Hearing this Duṣāsana once again started dragging her. Draupadī wept. Bhīma roared in fury and said that if his brother, Dharmaputra, gave him permission he would at that instant smash to death the Kauravas just like a lion killing the animals. Bhīma and Droṇa interfered and pacified him. Duryodhana stood up and striking his right thigh with his right hand challenged Bhīma to a fight. Bhīma-sena did not like Duryodhana exhibiting his naked thigh in front of Draupadī and an angered Bhīma declared that he would in a battle break Duryodhana's thigh with his mace. Dīrtarāṣṭra came to the scene and pacified both of them and turning to Pāncālī asked her to name any boon she wanted from him. Pāncālī said: "In order that my son, Pratīvin-dhya, should not be called a 'dāsaputra' (son of a servant) his father Dharmaputra should be released from his servitude." The boon was granted. Then she requested that all the other Pāṇḍavas should be set free. That was also allowed. Dīrtarāṣṭra then asked her to name a third boon. Pāncālī then said that all Kṛṣṇi women were entitled only to two boons and so there was no need for a third one. Then Draupadī took a vow that her hair which was let lose by the wicked Duṣāsana would be tied properly only by a hand tainted by the blood of Duṣāsana. After that in strict obedience to the conditions of the wager the Pāṇḍavas started for the forests with Draupadī to spend twelve years in the forests and one year incognito. (Ten Chapters from Chapter 68, Sābhā Parvā.)

5) Vanavāsa of Pāncālī. (Life in the forests.) During the exile of the Pāṇḍavas in the forests Pāncālī was involved in many events of which a few important ones are given below:

(i) Kīrmirā's attack. When the Pāṇḍavas were in the Kāmyakavana, Kīrmirā, the brother of Baka, came to the āśrama where Pāncālī was taking rest. The demon was such a fierce-looking giant that Pāncālī was forced to shut her eyes by fright and she became wearied like a river in the midst of five hillocks. Bhīmasena immediately ran to her rescue and killed Kīrmirā. (Chapter 11, Vana Parvā.)

(ii) Pāncālī consorted Dharmaputra by her soothing words. (Chapter 27, Vana Parvā.)

(iii) Once when her woes became unbearable she condemned the devas. (Chapter 5, Vana Parvā.)

(iv) While the Pāṇḍavas were on the mountain Gandhamādana, Pāncālī persuaded Bhīma to bring for her the Saugandhikā flower. (See under Bhīma.)

(v) While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Badarik-āśrama waiting for the return of Arjuna who had gone on a year's pilgrimage, Pāncālī was carried away by Jaṭāsura. (See under Jaṭāsura.)

(vi) After she was rescued from Jaṭāsura, Pāncālī along with her husbands dwelt in the hermitage of Arṣīṣena. (See under Arṣīṣena.)

(vii) Once Draupadī gave instructions on the duties of a wife to Satyabhāmā who came to the forests along with Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapters 233 and 234, Vana Parvā.)

(viii) Once Durvāsas with his disciples came to the forest as the guests of the Pāṇḍavas. They came late and Pāncālī had taken her food already. The Akṣayapātra (the never-empty pot) could not be invoked to produce anything that day and Pāncālī was greatly agitated and worried. She prayed to Śrī Kṛṣṇa for succour and Śrī Kṛṣṇa also coming hungry searched in the pot for something to eat and finding a bit of spinach sticking to the sides of the pot grabbed it with avidity and ate it. The guests felt as if they had enjoyed a sumptuous feast and left the place well pleased. (See para XII under Duryodhana.)

(ix) Jayadratha carried away Pāncālī from the forests once. The Pāṇḍavas rescued her. (Para 4 under Jayadratha.)

6) Life incognito. After their twelve years of exile in the forests the time for living in disguise for a year came and Dharmaputra and his brothers with Pāncālī spent that period in the palace of the King Virā. Each assumed a new name and accepted different types of service under the King. Pāncālī took the name of Sairandhri and served as a companion and attendant to the princess. One day Kīcaka, the mighty brother-in-law of the King, tried to molest Pāncālī and Bhīmasena killed him. (See under Kīcaka.) It was at the time when the incognito life was coming to an end that the Kaurava army headed by Duryodhana carried away the cattle of the King Virā. The King was absent from the palace at that time and the prince, Uttara, had not the guts to go and attack the Kaurava army. It was Pāncālī who then suggested sending of Bhānnala of the palace (Arjuna) to serve as charioteer of Uttara. (See under Arjuna, Para 24.)

7) Subsequent events. The thirteen years of life in exile and incognito came to an end. But the Kauravas were not prepared to give half of the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas. The differences between them increased and it led to a great war. Śrī Kṛṣṇa agreed to go as a messenger to the court of Dīrtarāṣṭra and ask for the share of the Pāṇḍavas. Before leaving he asked each one of the Pāṇḍavas what he should say at the court of Dīrtarāṣṭra. Pāncālī then approached Kṛṣṇa in private and said she desired for a war to defeat the Kauravas. She then reminded Kṛṣṇa of a vow taken by Bhīmasena that he would tie her hair with his hands smeared with the blood from the thigh of Duṣāsana.

The peace-mission of Kṛṣṇa failed and the famous Kurukṣetra battle started. Many valiant warriors on both the sides were killed. When Abhimanyu was killed Subhadra wept bitterly and Pāncālī who went to console her fainted. Śrī Kṛṣṇa revived her. Pāncālī asked Bhīmasena to bring to her the inborn jewel on the head of Āśvattamā, son of Droṇa. She wanted to take revenge on him for killing her brother Dhrṣṭadyumna.
After a fierce battle for eighteen days the Kauravas were defeated and their tribe annihilated. Pāṇḍavas took hold of Hastināpura and Pāṇḍāli was one among those who persuaded Dharmaputra to take charge of the administration of the state as its ruler. Dharmaputra performed an Āśvamedha-yajña and Pāṇḍāli gave presents to Cīrāgadā and Uśāpi who were present for the function then. After the Āśvamedha Draupadi lived in Hastināpura serving Kuntī and Gāndhārī alike for a long time. It was at that time that Dhitaraśṭra, Gāndhārī and Kuntī went to the forests and Draupadi expressed her desire to go along with them to be of help to them. But they did not allow her to do so. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in Hastināpura as the rulers of the country eminent rṣis from different parts of the country visited them and some of the Siddhas (realised souls) among them saw Pāṇḍāli as the goddess Mahālakṣmi herself. (Sloka 9, Chapter 25, Āśramavāsikā Parva).

8) Death of Pāṇḍāli. At the end of their life the Pāṇḍavas crowned Parīkṣit as the King of Hastināpura and started on their Mahāprasthāna. They travelled for long through the Ḫimalayas and reached Mahāmeru. At that time Pāṇḍāli fell down dead. Then Bhīmasena asked Yudhiṣṭhīra why without any particular ailment Pāṇḍāli died. Yudhiṣṭhīra replied that it was because she showed special interest in Arjuna. The Pāṇḍavas walked on and all of them excepting Dharmaputra died on the way one by one. Even before Dharmaputra entered svarga Pāṇḍāli and the four brothers had reached there. (Chapters 1 to 4, Mahāprasthānākā Parva).

9). Sons of Pāṇḍāli. Pāṇḍāli had five sons one each from each of the five husbands. She got Pratīvindhyā of Yudhiṣṭhīra, Srutasmā of Bhīmasena, Srutakṛtī of Arjuna, Satānikā of Nakula and Śrutakīrtim of Sahadeva. (Sloka 73, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

PĀNCĀLIKA (PĀNCĀLIKESA). A Yakṣa who was a son of Kuber. In some parts of Bhārata this Yakṣa is worshipped as a deity. It is believed that Śiva had given Pāṇḍāli a boon that he who worships him whether he be man or woman, young or old, would become intoxicated with vigour. There is a story behind Pāṇḍāli obtaining this boon:—

When Sati who was insulted at the Dakṣayāga was consumed by fire a bereaved Śiva sat inactive and moody at a lonely place. When this continued for a long time Kāmadeva (god of love) at the request of the other devas sent arrows against him and made him lustful. Siva then started running passionately calling the name of his wife and finding her nowhere jumped into the river Kālindī to commit suicide. (The waters of Kālindī became black from that time onwards). Kālindī was unable to bear the burden of the soul of Śiva and so he had to get out to the shore and run again. At this time Kāmadeva sent another arrow, unmādāstra (arrow of intoxication) also against Śiva. Śiva could not bear the impact of the two arrows together and he laboured under great strain. Just then he saw Pāṇḍālika son of Kuber coming that way. Śiva then made him understand his difficulties and requested him to take charge of the force of the arrows from him. Pāṇḍālika did so and saved Śiva from his toil. Pleased at this Śiva blessed him. He said that Pāṇḍālika will be worshipped by people in the month of Caitra and all those who do so will be invigorated. He added that henceforth he would be known as Pāṇḍālikesa also.

PĀNCĀLYA. An āśrama of ancient Bhārata. This was the place where Nyagrodha, King of Pāṇḍāla, performed penance for a long time. (Sloka 11, Chapter 90, Vana Parva).

PĀNCAMĀḤAYĀJṆĀ. For a Gṛhasthārāmā (householder) the following five apparatuses are unavoidable: A sifter, a grinding stone, a broom, a wooden mortar and a water-pot. It is believed that a sin is committed when each of these is used and to remove the sins thus committed the ancient sages have prescribed five yājñas and these five yājñas are called the PaṇcamaḥayājṆās. They are the BrahmayājṆā, PitrâyājṆā, DevayājṆā, BhūtayājṆā and the MānuṣayājṆā. Reciting of Vedas is BrahmayājṆa. Pleased the manes by offering rice or libations of water is called PitrâyājṆa. Giving offerings to the demi-gods in the sacrificial fire is called DevayājṆa and religious offerings of rice to the cows is called BhūtayājṆa. Giving food for the guests is MānuṣayājṆa. One who does not do the PaṇcamaḥayājṆas has no better than dead. Some scholars have classified the PaṇcamaḥayājṆas as Huta, Prahuta, Brahmâyuta, Prāśita and Ahuta.

Japo huto huto homah
Prahuto bhautiko balih//
Brāhmnyaḥ hutāin dvijāgnyarccā
Prāśita putrāpānam.//

Ahuta is BrahmayājṆa, huta is devayājṆa, prahuta is bhūtayājṆa, brahmâyuta is mānuṣayājṆa and prāśita is pitrāyājṆa. Even if at times one finds it not possible to do mānuṣayājṆa one must perform daily brahmayājṆa and daivyājṆa. The offerings given to gods in the sacrificial fire go to the Sun. The Sun sends rains to the earth which in turn make the plants flourish. Vedas say that thus living beings increase. Just as all animals and objects depend on life-breath for living, a Brahmacārī, a Vānaprastha and a Sannyāśī depend upon a gṛhastha for sustenance. Therefore, the Gṛhasthārāma is the best of all āśramas. (Chapter 3, Manusmrītī).

PĀNCĀMĪ. An ancient river of Uttara Bhārata. People used to drink water from this river. Chapter 9, Bhūṣma Parva.

PĀNCĀNADĀ I. A land of the north-western side of Bhārata. This is at present called the Punjab. When Nakula conquered the western states he conquered Paṇčanada also. (Sloka 11, Chapter 32, Mahābhārata). Five rivers of names Viṣāṇa (Vyāsa), Śatadrū (Sutlej), Irāvati (Rāvi), Cndrabhaga (Chenab) and Vitāstā (Jhelum) run through this place and that is why the place is called Paṇčanada.

PĀNCĀNADĀ II. A sacred place in Kurukṛṣṭera. If one bathes in the holy pond of Kṛṣṭiratha there, one would get the benefit of performing an Aśvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PĀNCAPRĀNAS. The five prānas (life breaths) of any living being are Prāṇa, Apana, Vyāna, Samāna and Udāna. There is a story in 'Devī Bhāgavata' regarding the origin of the Paṇcaprāṇas.

Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa met Rādhādevī at Rāsamandala and in seclusion they spent in sexual sport the period of one day of Brahmā. Then Kṛṣṇa selecting an auspicious time dropped his vital fluid into her womb at the end of the sexual sport. Tired by the prolonged carnal sport and shaken by the impact of the hot semen Rādhādevī perpired profusely and the exhaustion produced deep and long breaths. The whole universe was covered with her sweat and her sighs became the goddess of the life-giving breaths of all created animals. From the left side of goddess was born Vāyupatni and to her were born the Pañcāpsaras. Besides these, another five younger Prāṇas were also born. From the sweat of the Devī was born Varaṇa and from the left side of Varaṇa was born Varuṇāni, (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Māndūkyopaniṣad gives the following details regarding the working of the Prāṇas in the body.—Prāṇa was first used in the sense of breath. Later it got the meaning of life. Life is in fact breath to all living beings. Only when a man is awake, his mind and sense organs are active. But Prāṇa is active always both in the state of wakefulness and sleep. Therefore Prāṇa is the vigour of life. It may be said that when a man is asleep his senses merge with his mind and his mind with the prāṇa. The five factors of Prāṇa are the Pañcāpsaras.

The first of the five is called Prāṇa itself. It is called Mukhyaprāṇa or chief Prāṇa. Just as a King appoints his ministers at different places to do specified jobs the chief Prāṇa posts the other prāṇas at different parts in the body with specific purposes of their own. Prāṇa is seated in the heart and does the work of breathing. Apāṇa is seated in anus and directs the organs of excretion of the body. Vyāna is spread throughout the body and it is this life-wind which keeps one alive even when breathing is stopped for some time. When an archer stands in deep concentration with his bent bow without breathing he lives with the help of Vyāna. Samāna controls the breathing-in and breathing-out to a specified rhythm. Samāna (equaliser) is so called because it balances the force of the in-coming and outgoing breaths. There is a school of thought that Prāṇa is not seated in the heart but spread over the ears, eyes nose and face. Samāna is seated at the navel midway between the seats of Prāṇa and Apāṇa. This is also a reason why life-wind got that name. This breath does the work of prompting digestion. The four prāṇas, Prāṇa, Apāṇa, Samāna and Vyāna sustain life. The fifth one, Udāna, takes the soul of the being out of the body when it dies.

PAÑCÁPSARAS. A lake of distinction. During the exile of Śrī Rāma in the forests, Agastya showed Śrī Rāma this lake and described its origin thus: “In times of old a sage named Māṇḍākaṇḍi built this lake. This sage living on air alone stood in the waters of this lake and practised severe austerities for ten thousand years. Devas were frightened by the rigorous penance of Māṇḍākaṇḍi and they sent five devakanyakās (celestial damsels) to the earth to entice the sage and stop his penance. The sage was attracted by the divine beauty of the girls and he lived with them in a grand building constructed within the lake itself. Even after the passing away of the sage and the damsels people used to hear dance and music from inside the lake. Because five apsaras lived in that lake it became known as Pañcāpsaras.

(Apsaras = celestial damsels who are servants of Indra).

(Sarga 1, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyana).

PAÑCARĀTRA. An āgama (a system of philosophy).

(Chapter 218, Śānti Parva).

PAÑCARĀTRA. A book of spiritual doctrines. He who learns this will attain the position of Uparicaravasuv. Śloka 25, Chapter 323, Śānti Parva).

PAÑCASIKHA. A sage of ancient times. The Purāṇas give the following details about him.

He was a disciple of Āsuri. He was brought up breastfed by Kapīlā, wife of Āsuri and so he was known as Kapilā also. He dwelt in Pañcāsrotas and performed a Yāga for a thousand years and got his name Pañcasikha.

He went to the assembly of the learned king Janaka and entered into a polemic contest with him and defeated him. The defeated King gave Pañcasikha great respect and he lived in the court of Janaka as his Guru for a number of years. (Chapter 218, Śānti Parva).

PAÑCĀSVA. A King of the Puru race. (See under Puruvarśa).

PAÑCATANTRA.

A. General information. An ancient book of distinction written by the scholar Viṣṇuśarma in the form of stories for the use of children to give them an idea of the different aspects of life.

1) Origin. There is a statement in the preface itself regarding the composition of this book: “Three sons were born to an emperor named Amaraśakti. All the three were dull-witted. The emperor was very sorry for them but found no way to improve them. Greatly disappointed the King called the royal council and told them about his sons. Then one of the members of the council, a man named Sumati, stood up and said “Oh best of Kings, let us not try to teach your children the āstras one by one. It will not only be unpleasant study but would also take a long time to complete. If we can mix all the āstras cleverly and make it palatable like sweetmeats the children would take it easily. There is a suitable man also for this work in our state. He is Viṣṇuśarma, a kind-hearted scholar who is not only well-versed in all the āstras but also an adept in the art of the up-bringing of children. I am sure he would make your children wise and learned.”

When the emperor heard this he sent for Viṣṇuśarma and told him everything. After understanding well the nature of his would-be disciples and the ambition of their father, Viṣṇuśarma took charge of his wards and within six months he taught the sons of the emperor the science of government. The stories which he used to teach them the science of administration were all compiled into a volume called Pañcatantra.”

2) A general idea of the book. The book contains five divisions each division illustrating one tantra (tact, diplomacy) by several stories. It contains prose and verse. The first tantra is called Mitrabheda. Stories under this head explain the philosophy of “Divide and rule” in politics. The main characters in these stories are two foxes named Karataka and Damanaka. Stories under Mitrabheda relate to how these sly foxes enjoy themselves in breaking the intimacy between a lion and an ox using slander against each other. “Mitrālābha” is the theme of the next tantra. It is an advice that you should select your friends with care selecting them only after studying them in detail properly. The author has selected as characters in his stories for this purpose a tortoise, a deer, a crow and a rat. The third tantra is called Kākolīkīya. This deals with the evils behind an intimacy between born enemies. The main characters in the stories relating to this are a crow and an owl. The fourth tantra is called Labdhapranāśa. It describes how a man loses what has come into his possession by his foolishness. A monkey and a crocodile are the characters in this story. The fifth tantra is Apārākṣitakāra. It deals with the bad side of not looking into all the possible aspects of what you hear. Several stories are there to illustrate this point.

3) Popularity of the book. Though no correct records are there in history in support of the belief, it is believed that Amaraśakti was the ruler of Mahālārāpiya in Deccan and that Pāṇcatantra must have originated from there. But Pāṇcatantra received a global publicity and popularity and was translated from Sanskrit into many other languages. Directed by King Kosru Anusīrva, a Persian poet named Buryoe translated it into the Persian language during the period 531-575 A.D. That translation is not available at present. In the year 570 A.D. it was translated into the Syrian language by a poet named Bud. A scholar named Abdulla Ibaa Mogaffā in the year 750 A.D. translated it into the Arabic language. It was from this Arabic translation that it was translated into many European languages. The Greek translation appeared in the year 1000 A.D., Hebrew in 1100 A.D., Latin in 1270 A.D., German in 1480 A.D., Italian in 1582 A.D. and French in 1678 A.D. Next to the Bible this is the book which has received the greatest publicity and popularity. The great linguist Hertel says that Pāṇcatantra has appeared in about 200 translations in fifty different languages.

4) Period of composition. Because the translation into the Syrian language appeared in the year 570 A.D. it must have been composed earlier than that date. Again, since it takes at least two centuries for a work to get popular enough to be translated into a foreign language, the composition must have been done early in the fourth century A.D. Some believe that the work was done in Kashmir. While others assert that it was written in Magadha. The original title of the book is believed to be 'Karatāka and Damanaka' by a few.

5) Two editions. Two different editions of the book are now found. One edition popular in Kashmir is known as Tantārākhāyikā. The other is in the form found in Kāthāsārītāgara and Bhāthakāthāmañjarī. The original Sanskrit work is very rarely found. There are several editions of this in Dakṣina Bhārata. Changes in the stories according to the change of times are also noted. (History of Classical Sanskrit Literature).

B. Contents (Stories).

1) Mitraabheda. There was once a very good merchant in the land of Mahālārāpya called Vardhamāna. He was once travelling in a bullock-cart. One of the bullocks drawing the cart was named Saṅjīvaka. The leg of Saṅjīvaka broke on the way striking against a stone. Leaving the bullock to the charge of four of his attendants Vardhamāna continued his journey. When night came the attendants were frightened by the surrounding forests and so, leaving the bullock to its fate the attendants left the place. The bullock got well and it roamed about in the forests bellowing loudly. The King of the forests, Piṅgalaka the lion, was frightened by the bellowing of the bullock.

The lion remained in the forest without stirring out from its cave. The minister of the lion was a fox. That fox had two sons named Karatāka and Damanaka. Damanaka wanted to know what made the lion worried and told his brother about it. Karatāka advised him not to interfere unnecessarily with the affairs of others and told his brother Damanaka a story to stress his point.

A group of sawers were sawing wood near a temple for its construction. At lunch time one of the sawers placed a wedge on a half-sawn timber and went for his midday meal. One of the monkeys sitting on the branch of a tree near the temple jumped on to the half-sawn timber and pulled out the wedge. His tail had fallen without his knowing into the space between the sawn planks and when the monkey later jumped out from the timber his tail was wedged between the planks and the tail got crushed. If you poke your nose into the affairs of others without any purpose such dangers are sure to happen.

Hearing that, Damanaka said, "Brother, are we serving the lion, our master, just for our food? If we want only our food what difference is there between ourselves and the dog? Have you not seen the uproar the dogs make when they see food. A dog has no modesty, humility or self-confidence. Some men are also like that. But some others are not like that. Look at the elephant. It never makes an exhibition of its happiness when it gets its food. Its majestic stand, look and gestures are worth noticing. The best of men are also like this. Everybody should keep this in mind. He who earns his livelihood without depending on others but does it by his own wits and efforts is the most revered of men. But food is not enough, we must earn fame also. So even though we are children we must try to remove the worry that hangs over our lord, the lion."

The brother was not moved by this philosophy of Damanaka and so he said again, "Anywhere and in any venture success is difficult to achieve and failure is very easy. It is difficult to rise up but it is easy to fall down. It is a very hard labour to roll a stone up a mountain but to push it down from the top is very easy. He is blessed who can read correctly the thoughts of other people. I have, looking at the face of our King, understood that something big is worrying him."

Karatāka said, "Admitting what you say to be correct how are we to know the thing that worries, the King? It is a dangerous task." Damanaka said "Regarding the achievement of success, there are three kinds of people namely the Uttama (best), the madhyama (mediocre) and the adhama (worst). The adhama type will never start a venture fearing failure. The madhyama type would start hisendeavour but would turn back at the sight of obstacles. But the Uttama type would never turn back without achieving success. They are the adoral type of men in this world. The Uttama would act according to the circumstances of the situation. If he wants to talk to another and obtain a favour from him he would not go to him at random without looking into the time, place and opportunity to do so. Even Bhaspati has his moods. In fact, there is nothing impossible in this world. Disappointment and failures are due to want of experience and lack of endeavour. The great ocean with its huge rolling waves gives one a fright at first sight. But if he starts bathing in it for a long time he finds it not so unapproachable or ghastly."

When Karatāka heard these moral preachings of his brother he allowed him to do what he wanted to do. Damanaka went to the cave of the lion. Far from the cave itself Damanaka started walking humbly with his head bent down. The lion saw Damanaka walking thus to him and was immensely pleased. The King of the beasts asked him thus “Damanaka, it is a long time since I saw you and your brother. Why is it that you both, sons of my minister, do not come and see me as often as your father?”
Damanaka replied very humbly “Oh mighty King, of what use can we insignificant creatures be to you? Yet, if one thinks over it, even little things can also be of use to great people.” Damanaka then recited to the King a poem which in substance was thus: “Even grass over which we trample while walking, is of use as fodder to the cattle. Some are used for cleaning the teeth and still some, dry and brittle, to tickle the ear when it itches badly. Great men retain their greatness even when they fall. A burning torch would send its flame only upwards even when you keep it upside down. Similarly all things will shine only in their proper places. An ornamental waistbelt would not shine round a neck nor would bangles shine on one’s ears. Anyhow let me ask your highness one question. Is it true that when your highness went to drink water something happened to make your highness worry?”
Piṅgalaka the lion said: “What you say is correct. When I went today to drink water in the river I heard the horrifying bellow of a fierce animal and was frightened.
I am thinking of leaving this forest and going to some other one.”
Damanaka said “Oh Lord, be not frightened. Appearances are often deceptive and cannot be believed. I shall tell you the story of a fox who mistook an ordinary drum for an animal with good flesh. Once a fox saw a drum lying in a battlefield. It was making a sound when the wind blew over it. The fox mistook it for an animal with plenty of flesh and blood. Rejoicing at the prospect of having a hearty meal the fox mustered caution and went near it. It tore the leather open. Only then could it understand its blunder.”
The King liked the story very much. So he sent Damanaka to enquire where the bellow came from.
Damanaka found out Saṭṭivaka, the ox and told him everything and added that he had been sent by the King to fetch him to his presence. Saṭṭivaka was at first afraid to go but the consoling words of Damanaka gave him courage and it went to the lion. The lion and the ox became great friends and gradually the intimacy developed to such an extent that the King of the beasts started becoming indifferent to the welfare of the other beasts in the forest. The subjects of the King Piṅgalaka were in trouble.
Feeling sorry for his own actions Damanaka went to his brother and said, “All this happened because of our own fault. I shall tell you a story about a self-made calamity.
Once an ascetic named Devaśārmā was afraid of robbers. So he stitched into his robes all the money he possessed. Somehow a robber named Āśādhahātū came to know of it and he made friends with the ascetic and acted as his servant pretending to be very faithful.
Devaśārmā got confidence in him and one day he went to bathe handing over all his guarded wealth into the hands of Āśādhahātū. On his way back from the river after his bath Devaśārmā saw two goats fighting against each other. Blood was flowing from the heads of both the goats and still the fight continued. A fox came there to drink the fresh blood flowing from their heads and he went and started licking the blood that had dropped between the two fighting goats. The goats came again and hit against each other with force and the fox that was standing between the two and licking the blood greedily was crushed to death. When he returned after witnessing the fight the ascetic found that his servant had gone away with his cash.”
Karāṭaka liked the story very much. They then discussed ways and means of getting out of this calamity.
Damanaka said that any object can be achieved by cleverness and told his brother a story to illustrate his point. He said “Once a crow made his abode on a tree with his wife and children. After some time his wife began to lay eggs but all of them disappeared one by one. They made enquiries and found that the culprit was a big cobra living beneath the same tree. They were no match to the cobra and so they sought the advice of their friend, a fox.
The fox said, “I shall suggest a way to get out of the danger. Have you not heard the story of an old stork who got his food by his cleverness? The stork went to the banks of a pond feeling hungry. There were plenty of fishes in the pond. The stork stood still on the banks pretending to be sad. A crab seeing the sad-looking stork came and enquired the cause of his grief. The stork said ‘You well know that we storks live on flesh and fish. I now understand that a fisherman has planned to catch all the fish in this pond. This is the cause of my worry.’ The fishes who overheard this conversation between the crab and the stork came before the stork frightened and requested him to save them from the fisherman somehow. The stork said ‘I am not strong to fight the fisherman. But I can do what little help
I can give you. I shall every day remove you one by one from this pond to another one without the knowledge of the fisherman.’
The poor fishes agreed to the proposal and the stork carried away one fish everyday from the pond and ate it at a place hidden from the view of the others. This went on for one or two months without break and somehow the crab got suspicious and he requested the stork to take him also to the other pond. The stork carrying the crab reached its usual place and the crab was horrified at the sight of the bones of the fishes eaten before by the stork. The crab knew its death was sure even if it did not fight with the stork and so started a fight and in the end killed the stork by crushing the neck of the stork.”
The crows crew hilariously when they heard the story of the fox. The fox then told them a plan.
“When any of those who come to bathe in a pond nearby removes the necklace and places it on the shore you are to pick it up and hang it on a branch of the tree.”
The crows did like that and pedestrians going that way saw the necklace hanging from the branch and took it after killing the cobra in the hole beneath the tree.”
On hearing the story told by Damanaka the idea of putting the lion against the ox gained strength in Karāṭaka’s mind. To confirm the idea in his brother’s mind Damanaka told another story. Damanaka said, “Once there was a lion named Madotaka. He lived in a forest harassing all the beasts that lived there,
All the subjects of King Madotkaṭa joined together, went to him and represented to him that they would go to his cave one by one every day to be killed and eaten by him. The lion agreed to that and the beasts one by one went to his cave each day. One day it was the turn of a clever hare. The hare walked slowly and reached the lion's den late. The King was very cross at this and asked him to explain why he was late. The hare said "Oh lord, on my way another lion accosted me and I had to take a round-about route to get away from that lion." The lion got angry and asked the hare to take him to the other lion who dared to come to that forest and question his authority. The hare took the lion to a well and asked his lord to pеп in. When Madotkaṭa did so he saw his own reflection in the still waters of the well and mistook it for another lion. It jumped into the well and was killed.

Karaṭaka had implicit confidence in Damanaka after hearing all these stories and he sent his brother to the King to create a rupture between the lion and the ox. Damanaka went to the King Pīṅgalaka and apologised for the mistake he had committed. Then the King enquired what the mistake was. Damanaka said that the ox Sañjivaka was not such a simpleton as he took him to be. He was ambitious and wanted to snatch away the kingdom from Pīṅgalaka. It was unwise to keep one single minister always. "After all what can an ox do? He can plough the fields. I have come to inform you all these out of my regard for you," Damanaka said.

Even after hearing all these, Pīṅgalaka did not have the heart to abandon the ox. Pīṅgalaka asked what a poor bullock could do against a lion. Damanaka then said that one would come into grief if one believed too much in any body. "Have you not heard the story of the house which believed the bug?" Damanaka asked. Then he narrated a story. "Mandavisarpini was a house which was living happily on the silken bed of a King. A bug went there and made friends with the house. The poor house believed the bug to be harmless and allowed it to stay that night with him. The bug said that it was very greedy to suck the blood of the King. At night the bug bit the King. The King woke up and ordered his servants to search for the thing that bit him. When lights were brought the clever bug slipped away. The royal servants conducting the search found out the house and killed it."

The lion liked the tale very much and yet was reluctant to dismiss the ox. The lion wanted proof that the ox was at fault. So Damanaka went straight to the ox in his house and said "We are all small people. What does the master do for our welfare? If small people seek the friendship of big people the small ones will always suffer." The ox endorsed the view and told a story to illustrate the truth. "A lion named Madotkaṭa had a tiger, a fox and a crow as his ministers. When the ministers were once walking in the forest they saw a camel. They had never seen a camel before and so they were wonderstruck by the animal. They went and talked with it and gathered that the curious animal was a camel which had been carrying loads for a merchant. It had now escaped from the merchant because of the heavy work it had to do. The camel wanted to remain in hiding. The ministers took the new animal to the lion. The lion liked the camel very much and soon they became good and intimate friends. The intimacy increased and soon the King lost all interest in his other subjects. At this stage the ministers found out a plan. They advised the King to kill and eat the camel but the King refused to do so. Then the crow went before the King and requested the lion to kill and eat it. But the crow was so small a food for the lion and so it refused to kill the crow. Then the fox made a similar offer but the lion refused to kill the fox also. Then came the tiger with the offer and the lion refused to kill the tiger also. Seeing all this the camel also made a similar offer and the moment his consent was out from his mouth the fox and the tiger together killed the poor camel and ate it. So one should be careful in believing others. In my case I am sure some wicked persons must have advised him against me and that is the reason why the lion is angry with me. But I will always work true to my conscience. There is no harm in fighting either for self-protection or for destroying one's enemies. So if it is necessary I will fight the lion."

Hearing this Damanaka said "To go to war without knowing the strength of the enemy is wrong. Once upon a time a water-fowl quarrelled with the ocean. The water-fowl was living happily on the shores of an ocean with his mate. They ate the worms that lived on the shores. The she-fowl got pregnant and when it was time to lay her eggs she asked her mate to show her a safe place to lay the eggs. The male mate asked her to lay the eggs on the shore itself. But the she-fowl said that the waves would carry away the eggs and so it was not wise to do so. The male fowl assured her that the ocean was not bold enough to do anything against his interests. But the she-fowl still hesitated. Then the male fowl said "I am the nearest relative responsible for your protection and welfare. If one does not heed the words of a relative one will fall into danger. I shall tell you the story of a tortoise which came to grief by not obeying the instructions of its friends.

In olden times there lived on the banks of a pond a tortoise who had two swan-friends in the lake named Saṅkaṭa and Viṅkaṭa. Once the lake became empty of water and the swans decided to go to another lake with water. They never wanted to part with their friend the tortoise and so decided to take the tortoise also along with them. But the tortoise could not fly and so they found a plan to carry the tortoise to the other lake. They brought a stick and the tortoise was asked to hang at the middle of the stick clutching the stick tightly with its teeth. The swans then took the stick by its two ends each holding one end in its beak. The swans gave strict instructions that the tortoise should not open its mouth and then rose up into the air and flew towards the other lake. On the way some children saw the funny sight in the air and so hooted and howled. The tortoise got angry and abused the children. The moment it opened its mouth it lost hold on the stick and fell down to the ground. This happened because the tortoise did not heed the words of its friends."

The water fowl continued 'It is cowardice and foolishness to remain sad expecting dangers in future. Just hear this story' he said 'Once in a pond there were three fishes named Anāgata, Utplannamati and Yadbhavīṣya. Hearing that fisher men were coming to fish in that pond Anāgata warned them and suggested going to another pond to escape from the fishermen. But Utpannamati and Yadbhavisya did not care. They said that some plan could be found out when the danger came. But Anāgata felt diffident and so he went away to another pond. Soon the fishermen came and spread their nets. Utpannamati lay still pretending to be dead. The fishermen took it and deposited it on the shore and started to fish again. The moment the fishermen turned their heads Utpannamati slipped into a mud pit nearby and remained there till the departure of the fishermen. But poor Yadbhavisya could not think of any plan and so was caught and carried away by the fishermen. So just like Utpannamati I will also come across some plan when the danger comes and so you do lay your eggs on the shore of the ocean itself.”

Hearing the assured words of her husband the she-fowl laid her eggs on the shore. But very soon waves came and carried them away. She complained to her husband. The water fowl called a conference of all the birds living there and explained to them his misadventure and all of them went on a deputation to Garuḍa, the best of the birds and requested him to find out a remedy. Garuḍa represented the matter to Mahāvisṛgū who in turn called Varuṇa to his side and ordered him to give back the eggs to the fowl.

After telling this story Damanaka went to the lion and told him many misleading lies about the ox. Gradually the lion and the ox became enemies. Damanaka then triumphantly went and informed his brother Karataka of his achievement. But Karataka said “Brother, you have done a very unjust thing. There are four methods to achieve your object namely, Sāma, Dāna, Bheda and Daṇḍa. Of these Bheda is to be used only last of all. I shall tell you a story:

Once a chetty (Merchant) had two sons named Dharmabuddhi and Duṣṭabuddhi. Once they were both travelling through a forest when Dharmabuddhi got a treasure from a hole at the base of a big tree. Duṣṭabuddhi advised his brother not to take the treasure to the city as it was dangerous to do so and made him bury it at a place beneath the same tree. That night itself Duṣṭabuddhi went and dug out the treasure and got it buried in his own room. After some days both of them went together to see the treasure and found the place empty of the treasure. They accused each other of stealing the treasure. Both of them complained to the King. The King asked them whether they had any witnesses and they replied that only the tree was there as a witness. The King decided that both of them should go beneath the same tree and dip their hands in burning oil to prove their innocence. Duṣṭabuddhi went to his father and requested him that he should hide in the hollow of that tree and say that it was Dharmabuddhi who had stolen the treasure. Hearing this the father said “Child, when you think of a trick you must also think of the danger involved in it. Once there lived a stork with his wife on a tree. A serpent living in the same tree began to eat the young ones of the stork and the stork complained to his friend fox about it. The clever fox suggested to him a plan. There was a mongoose living near the tree. The stork was to drop fishes in front of the hole of the mongoose and continue dropping fishes in a line leading to the abode of the serpent. The mongoose would thus be led to the hole of the serpent. The stork did so and when the mongoose reached the hole of the serpent it saw it and killed it. I cannot do such cruel things.” But when Duṣṭabuddhi insisted, the father half-heartedly agreed to it and went and sat in the hollow of the tree. Next day the servants of the King came to the foot of the tree with burning oil. They asked the tree to tell the truth regarding the theft. Then there came a voice from the tree denouncing Dharmabuddhi as the culprit. Dharmabuddhi then said there was no truth in the bodiless voice and requested them to fumigate the tree from beneath. The royal servants did so and then the father came out and confessed everything. The servants of the King nailed Duṣṭabuddhi on a spike and killed him.

After having told the story Karataka tried to dissuade his brother from his deceitful intentions. Karataka said:— “Pingala and Saṇḍjivaka are kind-hearted and simple people. There need be no treachery with them. Treachery is allowed against wicked people. I shall tell you the story of a merchant—

This merchant had as his entire wealth a thousand pounds of iron and one day he went on a pilgrimage after entrusting his entire wealth to a friend and neighbour of his on the understanding that the latter should return it on his return after the pilgrimage. After ten months the merchant returned but the friend did not give back the iron. He regretted that all the iron was eaten by rats in which his house abounded. The merchant knew that his neighbour was speaking falsehood but kept silent over the matter. After a few days the merchant somehow enticed the only son of his neighbour to his house and locked the young boy in a room. The friend went in search of his son to the merchant’s house and asked him whether he had seen his son anywhere. The merchant replied that he saw the boy being carried away by a kite. The friend could not believe the story and suspecting some foul play on the part of the merchant went to the king and reported the matter to him. The king sent for the merchant and asked him about the missing boy. The merchant gave the king the same reply he gave his friend. The king was surprised and asked the merchant whether it was believable that a boy aged eighteen would be carried away by a kite. The merchant very coolly replied that such things could happen in a country where rats could eat a thousand pounds of iron. The king asked the merchant to explain and he then told him everything that had happened. The king ordered the friend to return the iron and the merchant got back his wealth. Karataka after telling this story added that deceit in return for deceit was no sin. Damanaka stuck on to his plan and made the lion and ox fight each other. The poor ox was killed and the lion became his old self again.

2) Suḥṣṭāḥka. (Gaining friends). Once there lived on a tree a crow named Laghupatanaka. The crow saw a hunter coming and spreading a net beneath the tree. A flock of doves coming that way was caught in the net. But the doves flew up in a body and the net was carried from the ground freed of the pegs that held it. The crow followed them and when they were safely landed at another place Citragrīva the leader of the doves, told the crow thus “I shall now show you the benefit of gaining friends.” Citragrīva and his doves flew again with the net and landed before the hole of a rat named Hiranyaka. The rat was a friend of Citragrīva.
On hearing the voice of Citrāgrīva outside, Hiranyakṣa came out and felt sorry for the plight of the doves. The rat pointed out that nobody could oppose fate and proved it with illustrations. He added:—"Though elephants and cobras are mightier and fiercer than men, it is because of fate that they are being controlled by smaller people than they themselves. Hiranyakṣa cut to pieces the threads of the net and set the doves free. Next day the doves flew away to their places. Seeing the generosity shown by the rat, the crow wanted to be friendly with the rat. The crow mentioned this to the rat. But the rat refused to be friendly thinking that it was a ruse to get him killed for his food. But the crow promised to be grateful for ever to the rat for saving the doves which belonged to the community of birds to which the crow also belonged. But the rat retorted that gratitude was a quality which was absent in any living being and generally harm was the reward for any favour done. The crow was greatly grieved to hear the words of Hiranyakṣa and told him that he (crow) would commit suicide if the rat did not take him as his friend. At last the rat took pity on the crow and they became friends. Time passed on and then there broke out a famine in the land. The crow decided to shift his abode and told the rat about it. He said he was going to a lake on the banks of which lived a friend of his, a tortoise. The tortoise, he added, would fetch for him from the lake plenty of fish to eat. The rat was also affected by the famine and so he also decided to accompany the crow. The crow took the rat in its beak and they both reached the lake where lived the tortoise named Manthara. The crow introduced Hiranyakṣa to the tortoise and the tortoise asked him the reason why he left his previous abode.

The rat said:—"There was a bhikṣu (one who lives on alms) named Cūḍākārpa living in a house in my place. He used to eat only what was required to maintain life in him. He would cook his own food and keep the remains everyday in his kitchen. I used to eat that food and live. Then one day another Sannyāsī named Bhatsphik (Viṇākarna) came to this house. Every night Viṇākarna used to read the Purāṇas to Cūḍākārpa. Cūḍākārpa would sit and make a sound on the bow kept nearby to drive me away. The first time he did so Viṇākarna who was reading resented the interrupting sound and asked Cūḍākārpa why he made it. He then explained that it was intended to drive away the rat coming to steal the food. I was forced to starve and I became lean and weak. Even rivers would go dry if there are no rains. Only those with wealth would have friends. Begging is a nuisance to others. Everyone it is important to acquire good and faithful Friends. When a good man is in danger only good men rush to help him. When an elephant falls into a pit it is always another elephant which comes to its rescue. Therefore I desire to make friends with you."

All the three, the crow, the rat and the tortoise lived together happily. Then one day a deer named Citrāṅgada escaping from a hunter came frightened to their midst and started living with them. One day the deer which went in search of food did not return even after dusk and so the crow went in search of the deer and found it trapped in a hunter’s net. The crow informed the rat about it and the rat immediately came and started gnawing at the strings of the net. In the meantime the tortoise desirous of knowing the plight of Citrāṅgada crawled to the place of accident. The rat had already torn to pieces the net and the crow and the rat said that it was unwise of Manthara to have come so far crawling as there was danger from the hunter coming to the place soon. Before the deer could endorse the views of his friends the hunter came to the scene. The deer, the crow and the rat escaped. The hunter saw the crawling tortoise and caught it. Binding it with a string the hunter placed it on the ground. In the meantime the friends of Manthara who had escaped hit upon a plan to rescue the tortoise. The deer lay down pretending to be dead at a place far away from the place but within the sight of the hunter. The crow sat perched on its body as if pecking at its flesh. The hunter saw it and went to take the dead body of the deer. The moment the hunter turned away from the tortoise the rat went and cut the string binding the tortoise and set it free. Before the hunter reached the deer it ran away. So all were saved. This is the benefit of having good friends.

3) Sandhiṣṭigraha (Peace and war). We must make friends with people only after knowing them well. There was once a big banyan tree in a forest which was inhabited by many crows. Their leader was a crow named Meghabarṣa. About three kilometres away from this tree was another banyan tree on which lived a number of owls. Their leader was an owl named Amardana. The crows and the owls were great enemies.

One day Amardana king of the owls with a large army of a lāhik of his subjects attacked the crows at night. The crows could not see at night and so all the crows excepting a few of the top ones were killed. Meghabarṣa, the king, and his ministers, Uddipaka, Sandīpaka, Anudīpaka and Ciraṇjīvi and a few other subjects were the only ones who escaped from there somehow. They sat in council at a place and thought of the ways and means to wreak vengeance on the owls. Uddipaka said that when the strength of the enemy was great it was advisable to move away to another place, or to seek the aid of mighty people or to surrender to the enemy. It was the nature of dogs to leave one’s place and go to another place, Sandīpaka said. Others also were of the same opinion. Ciraṇjīvi alone did not express any opinion and so the king asked him why he was sitting silent.

Ciraṇjīvi said:—"Oh King, we became enemies of the owls because of our bad tongue. I shall tell you the story of an ass which met with its death because of its bad words. Once a washerman had a donkey to carry his load of clothes to and fro. The poor washerman did not have sufficient earnings to feed the donkey well and so he let it loose to go and eat of its own accord to appease its hunger. The donkey started going to the fields of other people and eating their grains. People started hurting the donkey and so the washerman did a clever thing. He covered the donkey with the hide of a tiger and let it loose. People mistook it for a tiger and did not dare to go near and hurt it. Then one day a farmer keeping watch over the fields at night felt suspicious of the fake tiger and covering himself with a blanket and with a bow and arrow in his hand stealthily approached the donkey. The poor donkey mistook the farmer for a she-donkey and brayed and approached him with amorous movements of its body. The farmer knew from its voice that it was a donkey and so removed his disguise and stood before the donkey. The be-fooled donkey got angry and abused the farmer using very vulgar language. The farmer got angry and killed him with an arrow.

Cīraṇājīvī continued:—Once upon a time a few birds joined together and decided to elect their leader. The owl was the bird selected to lead them. An aged crow condemned it. The crow said: “Are you making this ugly bird which is blind all day your leader? If only you make a worthy creature your leader you will be respected. I shall tell you a story to illustrate my point.” He then narrated the following story:

Once upon a time there came a period of twelve continuous years without any rain at all on the earth. Wells, ponds, lakes and rivers were all empty. A huge herd of elephants walking in the forests represented to its leader the grave situation and the leader sent messengers to all sides to find out watering places with water. One of the messengers came back and reported that he had found out a beautiful lake full of water and that on its banks lived a number of hares. The elephants immediately went to that place and started enjoying swimming and bathing in the waters of the lake. Many rabbits on the bank of the lake died when trodden upon by the elephants. The aggrieved rabbits sat in a council to consider the steps to be taken to stop this deadly nuisance of the elephants. One of the hares, Vijaya by name, promised to handle the matter by himself. He knew it would be unwise to go anywhere near the elephants. So Vijaya climbed on to the top of a hill near the lake and when he saw the elephants coming to the lake as usual hailed them from the top of the hillock. When the elephants turned their heads to the place from where the sound came they saw a hare speaking to them. The hare bawled out thus: “We are all servants of Candra, the moon-god. This lake has been given to us by him. Candra Bhagavān has deputed me to verify a report which has reached him that some elephants are making the water of the lake muddy. He will surely be cross with you if you again enter the lake. So it is better for you to go away from this place.” The elephants were frightened and they all left the place. Cīraṇājīvī added that this happened to the elephants because of the lack of a wise and proper leader.

The aged Cīraṇājīvī continued: “It is unwise to place confidence in small people. I had an experience. Near my abode on a tree there lived a bird called Kapīṅjalā. We became friends. One day Kapīṅjalā did not come home as usual. Taking advantage of it a rabbit came to Kapīṅjalā’s abode and started living there. I did not like it and I told the rabbit about it. But the rabbit did not mind it. After four or five days Kapīṅjalā returned home and on finding a rabbit in his nest got angry and asked him to leave the place. The rabbit refused to go and an argument ensued. The rabbit said that lakes, rivers and trees were for all and did not belong to any particular individual. “He who is in possession of it is its owner,” the rabbit argued. So they decided to take the case for arbitration and for that purpose approached a cat named Dadhiṅkārṇa doing penance on the banks of the river Yamunā. I followed them curious to know the decision of the ascetic cat. They did not see me. Both of them on approaching him started presenting their case before the cat. The cat pretended to be deaf and asked both of them to come nearer and talk into his ears. They moved nearer and the cat caught hold of them both and ate them. Those poor beings lost their lives by placing too much confidence in the aged cat. That is why I say that we should not select a small being like an owl as our leader.

On hearing the story of the crow the birds withdrew from their first decision of selecting an owl as their leader. The owl was offended and felt insulted and roared that his community would one day wreak vengeance on the crows. A wound made by an arrow would heal in due course and a tree would grow even if its branches are cut but any wound on the pride of an individual is never healed.

Cīraṇājīvī continued:—“This is how the crows and owls became enemies. We have to fight the owls. It is impossible to serve mean people. I shall tell you a story of what would happen if one believes in mean people:—

Once a brahmin decided to perform a Yāga to increase the prosperity of the land. He wanted a goat for the same and some wicked young people knew that he was going to buy one. They worked out a plan to deceive the poor brahmin. They sat hiding at different places on the way the brahmin was returning with the goat. As he came near the first of the wicked young men accosted the brahmin and asked him where he was taking the dog. The brahmin was surprised that the young man mistook his goat for dog and went his way. When he walked some distance more the second of the group came to him and put the same question. This time the brahmin was a bit perplexed that two people should have put the same question which he thought was absurd. When a third man put this question again he became worried and when this same question was repeated two more times the brahmin got mad and left the goat on the road and went his way. The wicked youngsters took the goat cooked it and ate it.

After narrating several such stories and maxims Cīraṇājīvī said he would lead the owls into a trap and come back. Cīraṇājīvī then went to the owls and their friends on the top of Rṣyaśṛṅga.

Cīraṇājīvī shaved his head and smearing the blood of the dead crows on his body went and sat alone on a branch of their former abode, the banyan tree. When night came the owls came and surrounded the tree. Cīraṇājīvī made some pitiable groans and the owls took him before their king. The king questioned Cīraṇājīvī and he said thus:—

“I am Cīraṇājīvī the minister of Meghvārṇa. Once I praised your greatness before my king and he shaved my head and dismissed me from his service.” The king of the owls asked his ministers what should be done with Cīraṇājīvī. The minister of the king of owls, Baka, immediately jumped from his seat and said:—

“Once a fox went to steal the cow of a brahmin. On his way he met a Brahmarākṣasa and they became friends. The Brahmarākṣasa was going to kill and eat the brahmin. Both exchanged their ideas and when they reached the gate of the house of the brahmin the fox said he would go first and eat the goat. But the Brahmarëksa said he would enter first and eat the brahmin. The quarrel developed into a noisy one and hearing the sound outside the brahmin came out. The fox accused the Brahmarëksa of having come to eat the brahmin while the Brahmarëksa accused the fox of having come to eat the goat. The brahmin was glad that he escaped from a danger and pardoning them sent them both with presents. This is the benefit of a split among the enemies.

The king of the owls gave refuge to Cîrâñjîvi and the latter expressing gratitude for the favour done took a vow that he would wreak vengeance on the crows after getting himself born as an owl in his next birth. At once the king said "Oh Cîrâñjîvi, it is not wise to change one’s clan. Once a kite picked up a girl rat and flew up. On the way the young rat slipped from the beak of the kite and fell down into the open palm of a sage doing his sandhyâvandana. The sage by his yogic powers made it into a beautiful girl and presented her to his wife. The girl attained womanhood and the sage was anxious to get her married to a suitable person. He first approached the Sun and the Sun replied "You are in search of a powerful husband. Megha (cloud) is more powerful than myself since at any time it can cast a shadow over my brilliance. So go and ask Megha about this." The sage went to Megha and Megha said that wind which could carry him away at his will was more powerful than himself and so directed him to the wind. The sage approached the wind and it said that the mountain which could obstruct its path was more powerful and so the sage went to the mountain. The mountain said that the rat which could make holes in him was more powerful and so finally the sage went to the rat. The rat agreed to marry her but asked how it could keep her in the hole which was his abode. The sage said that it was easy and changed her into a rat. This is how a girl rat became a girl rat again. So do not change your clan, be a crow and live with me."

Cîrâñjîvi from that day onwards started living with the owls. During day time when the owls slept, the old crow would fly hither and thither and collect such easily combustible materials as hay, dry grass and cotton and stock them beneath the tree covered with dry leaves. Two months went by like this and one day when the owls were sleeping Cîrâñjîvi set fire to the stock of dry materials beneath the tree. The owls were all burnt to death. Meghavarna and his friends congratulated Cîrâñjîvi on his success. Cîrâñjîvi said: To obtain difficult situations great men pass through difficult situations. If one is prepared to suffer hardships any object can be achieved. Once a cobra began to starve for want of food. It went to the land of frogs and told the king of frogs thus: "Friend, I am in difficulties. I happened to bite a brahmin boy and that boy died. The boy’s father cursed me. I asked for forgiveness and then he said:—‘You must carry your enemies, the frogs, on your back from one pond to another pond and live on the food they give you.” The king of the frogs believed him and allowed his subjects to be carried away to another pond from the one in which they were then staying. The cobra ate all the frogs on the way and at last the king also was eaten. Thus to destroy the enemies one will have to carry them on one’s backs sometimes. The crows were happy their enemies the owls were destroyed and they lived more happily and peacefully than before.

4) Labdhânâsa. (Losing what you got.) Once a monkey named Bâlimukha separated himself from his group and came to a fig tree on the banks of a river. When he jumped from branch to branch on the tree a great many ripe figs fell into the river. Seeing this a crocodile named Simhûmâra came to the foot of the tree and started eating the fruits. This went on for a few days and then the crocodile and the monkey became good friends. One day the crocodile sat chatting with the monkey and eating fruits and did not go home. The wife of the crocodile got worried on not seeing her husband back at home and sent a maid of hers to go and enquire what happened to her husband. The maid came and reported that the crocodile was spending his time with a she-monkey. The wife of the crocodile was very sad and angry to hear this and she sent word through her maid that she was seriously ill and if he wanted to see her alive he must return to her immediately. The crocodile returned home immediately and he called a doctor to examine her. The doctor who had been previously bribed by the crocodile’s wife said that she should be given the heart of a monkey if she were to be saved from her present ailment. The crocodile was in a fix. He weighed in his mind the lives of his wife and friend and then decided to take the life of his friend to save the life of his wife. The crocodile went to its place near the fig tree as usual and the monkey made enquiries about his family. Then Simhûmâra said that his wife wanted to see the monkey-friend and had asked him to take him home that day. The monkey believed the story and started for the house of Simhûmâra on its back. When they reached half way in the river Simhûmâra told Bâlimukha thus: “My wife is seriously ill. The doctor has prescribed the heart of a monkey as the only medicine for it.” The monkey went pale-white with fright but instantly he hit upon a plan. Bâlimukha said “Simhûmâra, what a fool you are. Why did you not tell me this at least at the time of our departure? I kept my heart on the tree before starting, for I never knew you were in need of it. Let us go back and take it.”

The poor crocodile believed the story and went back with the monkey to the fig tree. As soon as they reached the shore the monkey jumped from the back of the crocodile and ran to the tree. The crocodile asked the monkey to bring his heart soon but the monkey laughed from the top of the fig tree and said thus:—“Dull-witted crocodile, I am not an ass like you. Have you not heard the story of the foolish ass?” The monkey then narrated the story of the ass thus:—“Once a lion calling his minister, the fox, to his side said that he wanted to eat the flesh of an ass as a remedy for the stomach trouble he was having by drinking too much of elephant’s blood. The minister started in search of an ass and found one in the house of a washerman. The fox said that he was surprised that the ass was doing such heavy work daily with a washerman when a happy life in the palace of the lion was easily available. The ass was tempted and it went to the den of the lion. When it reached there it got frightened and taking the opportunity of the absence of the lion for his evening worship left the place in a hurry. The lion sent the fox again to fetch the ass. The fox came and laughed at the timidity of the ass. He said that the lion was of a loving nature and last time when it approached the ass to embrace him out of affection he ran away like a fool. The lion knew that the asses were as a class good musicians and the lion himself a great lover of music was anxious to hear the ass sing. The poor ass believed the story and went to the lion along with the fox. When the ass reached the lion’s den the lion was waiting for him and the ass in all simplicity bowed before the lion. The lion with one stroke killed the poor beast and leaving the carcass to the care of the fox went for his Sandhyāvandana. When the lion returned the fox had already eaten the heart of the ass. The King of the beasts not finding the heart in its place questioned the fox and the fox replied that the asses do not possess either a heart or neck:

When the monkey concluded his story by adding that never again would he be trapped like this, Śīnūmāra, the crocodile, went its way. Labdhānāśa is the act of losing what came into your possession once.

5) Asampreksyakārita. This is a tale which explains the danger behind doing things adventurously without properly studying the pros and cons of an issue.

Once upon a time there lived in Gauḍādeśa a brahmin named Devasārmā. His wife Yajñāsaṇē became pregnant. The father started saying that the son to be born would be a very fortunate boy. One day the wife of the brahmin told him thus:—“It is not good to build castles in the air. Once a brahmacārī walked home carrying the fried grain he got as his dakṣinā in a pot on his head. He started thinking thus—‘I will sell this fried grain and with the money will buy a lamb. The lamb will grow and give birth to two kids. I will then sell the goat and the kids and buy a cow. The cow will give birth to calves in a short time. I will buy some land to raise paddy. After selling the paddy I will renovate my old house and then I will marry. She will deliver a beautiful son. I will name the child Somaśārmā. At times leaving the child alone my wife will go to milk the cow and then I will hit her like this.’” So saying the brahmacārī hit with his stick the mud pot on his head containing the fried grain. The pot broke and the whole thing inside fell on the road.

Devasārmā on hearing the story of Yajñāsaṇē became pensive. After five or six days Yajñāsaṇē delivered a son. Days went by and one morning Yajñāsaṇē went for her bath in the river nearby entrusting the child to the care of her husband. Some moments later a messenger came from the palace asking him to go over there. The brahmin was in a fix. There was nobody around to whose care he could leave the child. He had a mongoose. The brahmin asked the mongoose to look after the child and went to the palace. Some time later a big cobra came creeping towards the child. The mongoose jumped at it and killed it. The mongoose was smeared with blood after that. The brahmin returned hurriedly from the palace only to see the blood-smeared mongoose waiting at the doorstep. Thinking that the mongoose must have killed his son the brahmin thrashed the poor mongoose to death. But on entering the room the brahmin found out his mistake, for there near the child was the dead body of a deadly cobra. The brahmin regretted his foolish act of doing a deed before knowing things well, when Yajñāsaṇē came back after her bath and was greatly disturbed by the foolish deed of his husband. She said:—“Once there was in a place a very poor brahmin boy. He was an orphan with nobody to help him and he suffered from hunger daily. One night the boy had a dream. He was told that at midday next day three beggars would come to his place and if he slew them they would turn themselves into treasure jars and that the boy could become rich by using the wealth so received. Next day the brahmin boy was having his head shaved when as predicted in the dream three beggars entered his house. The brahmin boy ran away from the barber and taking a stick thrashed the three to death. All the three turned into treasure jars. The barber was astonished. The brahmin boy gave the barber a sovereign taken from the jar as his wages. The barber thought that beggars would turn themselves into treasure jars if they were thrashed to death. So he waited daily in his house for beggars to enter his house. One day after a long waiting three beggars entered his house and the barber with a hard stick which he had kept ready started thrashing the beggars. The beggars shrieked and shouted and ran away abusing the barber. Servants of the King came on hearing this and took the barber away and by the command of the King killed him nailing him on to a spike. Yajñāsaṇē concluded by saying that even death would be the result if one does anything without properly understanding things.

PANCATĪRTHA. A holy place. There is a pond at this place. Once a nymph called Vargā with her four companions lived in this pond as crocodiles as a result of a curse. Arjuna came to that pond and rescued them from their curse. From that day onwards the pond came to be known as Paṅcatīrtha or Saubhadrakārīrtha (For details see under Vargā and Saubhadrakārīrtha).

PANCĀVAKTRA. A soldier who fought bravely against the asuras on the side of Subrahmānya.

PANCĀVATI. The sacred place where Śrī Rāma built an āśrama and lived for some time with Sītā and Lākṣmānā during their exile in the forests. There is a story about Paṅcāvatī in the Kamba Rāmāyaṇa. Paṅcāvatī is on the southern bank of the Godāvari. Five Vaṭāvṛkṣas (banyan trees) stand here in a circle and therefore, the place got the name Paṅcāvatī. There is a legend about these banyan trees. Once five Gandharva youths encircled the sage Agastya in the forest as a sport and prevented him from moving towards any direction. The enraged sage cursed them to stand in the same position as banyan trees. Thus by obstructing the movements of a divine man they were forced to remain without movement as trees. Before they took the form of trees they begged the sage for deliverance from the curse. Agastya said, “One day Śrī Rāma with his wife and brother will come and stay in an āśrama built in your midst. Their holy presence will give you salvation from my curse.” Śrī Rāma and Lākṣmānā when they came to that forest decided to build an āśrama in the centre of the circle formed by the five banyan trees. Lākṣmānā started to build the hermitage. At first he cut down one of the trees standing tall and straight and to the surprise and astonishment of all the fallen trunk of the tree disappeared and there in its place lay the dead
While she was living in the palace of Kuntibhoja the sage Durvasās came and stayed in the palace as the king’s guest. Kuntī was a little girl then and yet she served the sage with such care, patience and devotion that the sage was greatly pleased with her and gave her a divine mantra. He said: “If you call upon any god repeating this mantra he will manifest himself to you and bless you with a son equal to him in glory and valor. You can use this only five times.” The impatient curiosity of youth made Kuntī give a test to the power of the mantra and though unmarried she invoked the Sun. The Sun immediately presented himself before her and by his grace she conceived and got a son whom she secretly set afloat in a river. A childless charioteer named Adhiratha happened to see the child and he took it home and brought it up. When he grew up he was sent to Hastinapura and the sons of Dṛḍharaśtra took him in their service. He was Karna, the celebrated warrior of the Kauravas. Kuntī married Pāṇḍu after the birth of Karna.

Dṛḍharaśtra got of Gāṇḍhārī a hundred sons and a daughter named Dūśālā. The children of Dṛḍharaśtra were known as Kauravas or Dṛḍharaśtras. Pāṇḍu had a curse that he would die the moment he entered into sexual sport with his wives. (See under Kīrtiśāma). So under instructions from his husband Kuntī invoked Dharma, Vāyu and Indra and got the sons Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīmāsena and Arjuna. She gave the remaining one chance to Mādrī and Mādrī invoked the two Aśvinīdevas, Nāśa and Daśra and got two sons named Nakula and Sahadeva. All these five were accepted as the sons of Pāṇḍu and so they got the name of Pāṇḍavas. (Upto Chapter 123, Ādi Parva).

2) Life in Hastinapura and the lac-palace incident. After the birth of the Pāṇḍavas, Pāṇḍu with his wife and children spent a very long time in the forest of Śataśīra. Kaśyapa, the royal priest of Vasudeva, performed the Upanayana (initiature with the sacred thread) and such other religious ceremonies ordained for boyhood. They were educated under the sage Śuka. One day in the Spring season Pāṇḍu’s resolution broke down under the exhilarating influence of the season and he caught hold of Mādrī and embraced her despite earnest and repeated protests from Mādrī. At once the curse of the sage took effect and Pāṇḍu fell dead. It was the custom then that the wife should end her life in the funeral pyre of her husband and so Kuntī and Mādrī came forward to do so. But Mādrī said that one of them should live to take care of the children and so entrusting her children also to the care of Kuntī, Mādrī jumped into the funeral pyre and ended her life. The sages of the Śataśīra forest took the children and Kuntī to Hastinapura and handing them over to the charge of Dṛḍharaśtra came back.

The Pāṇḍavas grew up in Hastinapura along with the Kauravas. But there was no real affection or intimacy between them. The naturally strong Bhīmā found it a sport to tease and torment the Kauravas whenever he got an opportunity. Gradually the teatings of Bhīma became unbearable a wicked thought of somehow putting an end to Bhīma’s life found place in the minds of the Kauravas. They once poisoned Bhīma and binding him tight with ropes threw him into the ocean. But Bhīma went to the world of the Nāgas and came back unscathed with added siddhis (acquired power). This annoyed the Kauravas. It was at this time that Droṇa a renowned preceptor in archery, came to Hastināpura. Bhīṣma enrolled the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas as disciples of Droṇa. Arjuna became an extraordinarily brilliant bow-man. This came off as another reason for the Kauravas to drift away from the Pāṇḍavas. After the end of their course of education a contest was held in which Arjuna ranked first. The time came for Gurudakṣiṇā (fees paid in bulk at the end of the studies to a preceptor). Droṇa asked his disciples to bring King Drupada bound hand and foot before him. The Kauravas failed in that mission and the Pāṇḍavas under the leadership of Arjuna fulfilled the demand of their Guru. When the training and Gurudakṣiṇā were over, Dhrta-rāṣṭra crowned Yudhiṣṭhira as the heir-apparent and this increased the power and status of the Pāṇḍavas in Hastināpura. The jealousy of Duryodhana knew no bounds when he found the Pāṇḍavas in the pinnacle of power and popularity. He decided to kill them. He therefore, built a new palace in a place called Vārāpāvata and with the permission of Dhrta-rāṣṭra made them change their residence to the new building. The new building was cunningly built of lac and other combustible material. The wise and intelligent Vidura knew this deceit beforehand and so he had warned the Pāṇḍavas of the danger through a messenger named Khanaka. The Pāṇḍavas had, therefore, made ready a secret passage by underground to escape from the building when an emergency arose. The passage was to lead them from the palace to the forest nearby. One night Purocana, a minister of Duryodhana, came stealthily and set fire to the palace. The Pāṇḍavas with their mother Kuntī escaped from the palace to the forest nearby. That night a huntress and her five sons were sleeping in a part of the building and they were burnt to death. They were all sleeping fully drunk and so could not escape from the building. Purocana also was burnt to death. Thus the Pāṇḍavas had to go away from Hastināpura for a brief period.

3) The Exile and its end. The Kauravas thought that Pāṇḍavas died in the fire and in that belief conducted the funeral rites of their brothers. The Pāṇḍavas after their escape from the fire walked a long distance through the forests and came to the banks of the river Gaṅgā. On their way a demon named Hūṣāmba attacked them and Bhīma killed him but at the request of Dharmaputra married his sister Hūṣāmbi. After that while they were continuing their journey crossing the river a Gandharva of name Cītraratha attacked them. Cītraratha was defeated in a battle and he later became friendly with the Pāṇḍavas. He gave them many valuable presents and also narrated to them the story of Tapati-saṁvaraṇa. Then they went and stayed in the house of a brahmin in the village of Ekačakrā. It was at that time that the Svayaṁvara of Pāñcāli was held. The Pāṇḍavas went for the Svayaṁvara and married Pāñcāli. The news then spread that Pāṇḍavas were not dead but still alive. Dhrta-rāṣṭra then sent for them and the Pāṇḍavas returned to their palace in Hastināpura. Yudhiṣṭhira was crowned as King of half of the country and he built his palace in a place known as Khāṇḍavapraṣṭha. The palace was designed and built by a demon named Maya with beautiful Crystals and costly diamonds. When the Pāṇḍavas were living there Nārada went to them once. He suggested that Pāñcāli should remain as wife to the Pāṇḍavas in turn, one year each to one of them. They accepted the suggestion and started living like that. Yudhiṣṭhira married Devikā, daughter of King Śibi, also. (Śloka 70, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva). Bhīmasena and Arjuna with the help of Śrī Kṛṣṇa slew Jadāśandha. After that they conducted a victory march over the country and established their overlordship by conducting successfully a Rājasasya yajña. Duryodhana and his brothers once visited Indraprastha, the palace of the Pāṇḍavas. They were fooled at the palace and this enraged them. Duryodhana invited Dharmaputra for a game of dice and the latter lost everything. Yet Dhrta-rāṣṭra gave them back everything and sent them to Indraprastha again. Before Dharmaputra reached the palace Duryodhana once again challenged him for a game of dice. Despite protests from all sides Dharmaputra went and played and lost again everything. To fulfil the conditions of the game Yudhiṣṭhira went to the forests with his brothers and wife to spend twelve years in exile and a year incognito. At that time Kuntī lived with Vidura. It was during this period of exile that the Pāṇḍavas got the Akṣayapātra (never-empty pot) from the Sun. They dwelt first in Dvaivatavana and then in Kāṁyakavana. Then they went to the mountain of Gandhāmadana and from there to Badarikāśrama. From there they came back again to Kāṁyakavana and while they were living there Duryodhana and his men went to that forest to see the sufferings of the Pāṇḍavas and gloat on their sad plight. But Īcīrasena, a Gandharva, captured Duryodhana and Arjuna got him released. Duryodhana sent Dvrāvasa to tease Dharmaputra but the sage was sent back after being received duly and well-attended to earn his blessings. During their stay in that forest Jyādratha kidnapped Pāñcāli but the Pāṇḍavas rescued her immediately. They went from there again to Dvaivatavana. Dharmadeva tested them once while they were there. The twelve years of exile came to an end and as per directions from Dharmadeva they spent their incognito period of one year in the court of the King of Viśa. After the end of their incognito life the King of Viśa gave in marriage his daughter Uṭtarā to Abhimanyu son of Arjuna. Even after the return of the Pāṇḍavas from the forests after successfully fulfilling the conditions of the game, Duryodhana showed obstinate reluctance to part with even five pin-points of land in favour of the Pāṇḍavas. A peace mission of Śrī Kṛṣṇa from the Pāṇḍavas to avoid a war and settle matters amicably to Dhrta-rāṣṭra failed and the stage was set for a great battle between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas. 4) Ascension to Heaven. A great and grim battle was fought at Kurukṣetra between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas lasting for eighteen days. Śrī Kṛṣṇa neither fought nor took arms even once against the Kauravas but acted as the charioteer of Arjuna. When the war came to an end the Kauravas were completely annihilated. Yudhiṣṭhira became King. He performed an Aśva-medha Yāga. After a few years of reign the Pāṇḍavas crowned Parīkṣit, son of Abhimanyu, as the King and started for their Mahāprasthāna (departing this life). They walked in a line in the order of their age, Dharmaputra leading and Pāncālī following last. At first Pāncālī fell dead, but nobody turned back. Then Sahadeva fell and nobody worried. This continued thus till Dharmaputra was left alone. A dog which followed them from their very start also remained alive with Dharmaputra. The dog was none other than Dharmadeva, father of Dharmaputra. When Dharmaputra reached the top of the Himālayas Indra was there ready with the divine car to take him to heaven. But Dharmaputra said that he would not come to heaven leaving his brothers and wife elsewhere. Then Indra informed him that they were already in heaven and so Dharmaputra went to heaven with Indra. (Only a general and succinct history of the Pāṇḍavas is given under this head. For details see under the heads of each of the Pāṇḍavas as well as Pāncālī, Kuntī, Bhīṣma and Vyāṣa).

PĀṆḌĀVAPRAṆEṢĀṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆAṆ. A sub-divisional Parva of Viṛāṭa Parva. This includes chapters two to eighteen of Viṛāṭa Parva.

PĀṆḌīṬAṆĀ. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great battle by Bhīmasena. (Chapter 88, Bhīṣma Parva).

PĀṆḌU I. Father of the Pāṇḍavas.

1) Genealogy. Refer to the genealogy of Arjuna.

2) Birth. Śantanu, a King of Candravanīśa, had two wives, Gaṅgā and Satyavatī. Even while Satyavatī was a maiden she got of the sage Parīśara a son named Vyāsa. But because of the blessing of the sage Satyavatī did not lose her maidenhood. She got of Śantanu two sons, Citrāṅgada and Vicitrāvira. Citrāṅgada died young. Vicitrāvira married the two daughters, Ambikā and Ambālīkā, of the King of Kāśi. Vicitrāvira died before any progeny was born to him. To save the dynasty from extinction Satyavatī asked her first son Vyāsa to beget children of Ambikā and Ambālīkā. Accordingly Dhṛtarāṣṭra was born to Ambikā of Vyāsa and Pāṇḍu to Ambālīkā. (Chapters 63 and 105, Ādi Parva).

3) How Pāṇḍu got his name. Vyāsa came to Hastināpura by the command of his mother to beget sons of Ambikā and Ambālīkā. Vyāsa was an ugly sage with matted hair and he was dressed in garments of deerskin. Satyavatī that night called Ambikā to her side and in secret commanded her to go and lie with Vyāsa. She was reluctant to have a sexual union with that old and ugly sage. Yet obeying the orders of her mother-in-law she did so shuttering her eyes during the whole period. The result was she got a child born blind who became known later as Dhṛtarāṣṭra. The next day Satyavatī ordered Ambālīkā to go and lie with Vyāsa. Ambālīkā on entering the bed chamber went pale on seeing the ugly Vyāsa and the result was she got a child that was pale white in colour. That child became known as Pāṇḍu. The third day Satyavatī asked her servant-maid to go and lie with Vyāsa. She did it with pleasure and she remained happy and cheerful during the whole period. The result was she got a beautiful child who became an intelligent scholar of great wisdom. He was known later as Vidyura. (Chapters 1, 63, and 105, Ādi Parva).

4) Boyhood and kingship. Bhīṣma took care of Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu and Vidyura as his own sons. Bhīṣma taught them all the Vedas including Dhanurveda, and all warfare like mace-fight. They were trained in the use of elephants also. Bhīṣma taught them law and acquainted them with all the Itihāsas and Purāṇas. Pāṇḍu became second to none in archery. The people were all happy. When the boyhood was over Pāṇḍu was crowned as Yuvārāja. Pāṇḍu was the most eligible of the three to become King, for Dhṛtarāṣṭra was a born blind man and Vidyura was the son of a servant-maid. (Chapter 109, Ādi Parva).

5) Married life. Obeying the behest of Bhīṣma, Pāṇḍu married Pṛthū, daughter of the Yādava King Śūrasena. She was the sister of Vasudeva, father of Krṣṇa. She got the name Kuntī because she grew up in the palace of King Kuntibhoja. While Kuntī was staying in the palace of Kuntibhoja Durvasā came and stayed in the palace as a guest of the King. Kuntī then served the sage with such devotion and patience that Durvasā at the time of his departure gave Kuntī a divine mantra for begetting children. The mantra was to be used only five times. If she called upon any god repeating that mantra, that god would manifest himself before her and bless her with a son equal to him in glory. Out of impatient curiosity of youth Kuntī tried it before getting married. One morning, seeing the beautiful and brilliant sun in the sky she invoked him by the mantra and instantly the Sun stood in all bewitching brilliance before her and she got of him a son who was known as Karna later. Unmarried as she was, Kuntī sent the child aloft in the river nearby. Even after a child-birth Kuntī remained a virgin by the blessing of the Sun and so got married as a virgin. Many Kings were present for the Svayānivara of Kuntī and she put the wedding garland round the neck of Pāṇḍu.

Once Bhīṣma went to the country of Madra. The King of Madra received Bhīṣma with respect and Bhīṣma took-Mādri daughter of Madra as a bride for Pāṇḍu. He brought her to Hastināpura and married her to Pāṇḍu. Pāṇḍu lived with his two wives happily and ruled the country well. Once Pāṇḍu attacked Daśāntra with a huge army and defeated him. Later he defeated Dirgha, King of Magadha. Then he conducted a victory march capturing many kingdoms like Kāśi, Mithilā, Suhma and Pāṇḍra. Thus many of the Kings of Uttara Bhārata became feudatory princes of Pāṇḍu. In consultation with his brother Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu gave all the wealth he got by his might to Satyavatī and Bhīṣma. He gave enough riches to Vidyura also. Then Pāṇḍu went and stayed with his wives in a forest to the south of the Himālayas. (Chapters 110 to 114, Ādi Parva).

6) Curse of a sage. While Pāṇḍu was once walking with his wives in the forest he saw a couple of deer playfully running about and the hunting nature in him made him send an arrow against one of them. The deer was none other than the sage Kindama who in the guise of a deer was having sport with his mate. While falling dead Kindama cursed Pāṇḍu thus: "Oh wretched King, you will fall dead the moment you touch your wife in amorous sport." From that day onwards Pāṇḍu could not touch his wives. (For details see under Kindama).

7) Sannyāsa and death. With the death of the innocent sage Kindama there occurred a great change in the life of Pāṇḍu. At first he thought of committing suicide.
But he changed that decision and started for the Himālayas to perform penance there. Kunti and Madrī accompanied him. They gave away all their jewels and ornaments as gifts to brahmans. People followed them to the border of the forests and returned to the country weeping. Pându and his wives visited such holy places as Nāgadādāri, Caitrarahata, Kālakūṭa, Himālayas, Gandhamādāna and the lake Indradymuna. Then they went to Sātaśrīga and started performing penance. Once Pându and wives along with a few sages went to Brahmaloka to attend a Yāga there. The long travel tired them much and on the way Pându wept thinking of his pitiable state of having no issue. Then Pându told them of his helplessness in the matter because of the curse of the sage Kīndama hanging over him. Then Kuntī confided in him the secret of the divine mantras in her possession. Pându was extremely pleased and with his permission Kuntī got three sons, Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīmasena and Arjuna. She gave one chance to Mādri and she got two sons out of it named Nakula and Sahadeva.

Pându was living happily with his children in Sātaśrīga when spring time arrived in the forest with all its blossoming brilliance and fragrance conducive to amorous thoughts in all living beings. Pându one day walked alone with Mādri enjoying the sight of the flowering plants and trees. Bees and Beetles hummed around the flowers and on the branches sat the Cuckoos singing. There was a seductive fragrance all around and Pându was excited beyond controllable limits. Pându’s resolution broke down under the exhilarating influence of the season and despite repeated protests from Mādri, Pându caught hold of her and embraced her. The curse of the sage took effect instantaneously and Pându fell down dead.

The inhabitants of Sātaśrīga assembled there weeping. In the presence of a huge crowd including the relatives who had come down from Hastinapura the dead body of Pându was cremated according to religious rites. Both the wives came forward to end their lives in the funeral pyre of Pându. But Kuntī was asked to remain to take care of the children and Mādri leaving her children to the care of Kuntī jumped into the funeral pyre and ended her life. It was the sage Kaśyapa who performed the funeral rites of Pându. (Chapters 115 to 126, Ādi Parva).

8) After the demise. Pându’s soul is shining in the court of Yama. (Śloka 25, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva). Pându sent a message to Yudhiṣṭhira from Devaloka that Yudhiṣṭhira should conduct a Rājaśyā Yañja. The message was carried by Nārada. (Śloka 24, Chapter 12, Sabhā Parva). He lives in Indraloka with Mādri and Kuntī. (Śloka 15, Chapter 5, Sāvargārohaṇa Parva).

9) Synonyms of Pându. Pându is known under the following names. Bhārata, Bharataśabba, Bhāratasata-tama, Kaurava, Kauravanandana, Kauravasabha, Kauravya, Kauravyadāda, Kausalyānadavardhana, Kurudvaha, Kurukulodvaha, Kurunandana, Kurupati, Kurupavirā, Nagapurādhīpa and Nagapurashīma.

PĀṆḌU II. The second son of Janamejaya. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

PĀṆḌURA. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 73, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PĀṆḌURĀṢTRA. A place of habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 44, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PĀṆḌYA. I. A King of Vidarbha who was a great devotee of Śiva. One day while he was performing Śivapūjā at dusk he heard a loud noise outside the city and before completing the worship he went out and faced the enemies who were attempting to enter the city and killed its leader. He returned after the fight and without completing the worship took his meals. It was a sin to do so and the King was therefore born in his next birth as Satyaratha, a King, and was killed by his enemies. (Śatarudrasyāmhitā, Śiva Purāṇa).

PĀṆḌYA. II. (A Tamilian dynasty of Kings.) A place of Purāṇic fame in Dakṣiṇa Bhārata. The three states Cera, Cola and Pāṇḍya were from early times renowned states of Dakṣiṇa Bhārata. Historically and Purāṇically Pāṇḍya was a state of eminence.

(A) Historically. The Pāṇḍya dynasty of Kings is very ancient. The exact period of its beginning is still unknown. Megasthones who lived in the fourth century B.C. has made mention of the Pāṇḍya dynasty in his diary. Julian, an emperor of Italy, who lived in 361 A.D. is stated to have received visitors from Pāṇḍya-deśa. The Pāṇḍya dynasty was revived and elevated under the leadership of Kātukka in the 7th century A.D. From that time till the 16th century Madura was the capital of Pāṇḍya-deśa. The Uccāṅgi dynasty which was ruling the places to the south of Tungabhadrā during the period from 9th century to 13th century A.D. is believed to be a part of the Pāṇḍyavarniśa which had gone from Madura. A continuous history of the Pāṇḍya line of Kings is not available. Many Kings bear names like Jātvārmā or Mārvārmā. The Pāṇḍya Kings were devotees of Śiva even from the period of the Jainas. At times they have ruled over the combined kingdoms of Cera and Cola. During the period from the 12th to the 14th century A.D. Pāṇḍya was ruled by five of the most valiant rulers and at that time the Pāṇḍyadeśa included all the places in south India up to Nellor. But the power of the Pāṇḍyas waned when the power of the Sultans who ruled Delhi spread to the south. After 1370 A.D only on rare occasions has the power of the Pāṇḍyas spread to the north of river Kāverī. In 1312 A.D. Kerala got herself free from the hold of the Tamilian Kings. (Pāṇḍyavarājya).

(B) Purāṇic fame. The statements found in Mahābhārata about Pāṇḍyadeśa are given below:—

(i) Śrī Kṛṣṇa once slew a Pāṇḍya King who was the father of Malayadhvaja. Malayadhvaja who was a very valiant archer started for Dvārakā to kill Kṛṣṇa to avenge the death of his father. Friends dissuaded him from his attempt and so he dropped the idea. During the time of Mahābhārata Malayadhvaja was the King of Pāṇḍya. (Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

(ii) Malayadhvaja, King o’ Pāṇḍya, was a frequent visitor to the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 24, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

(iii) The King of Pāṇḍya presented gifts at the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 35, Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva).

(iv) In the Kurukṣetra battle the Pāṇḍya King fought on the side of the Pāṇḍavas with a large army. (Śloka 9, Chapter 19, Udyoga Parva).

(v) On the chariot of the Pāṇḍya King flags bearing the insignia of ocean flew. The Pāṇḍya King wounded Droṇa. (Śloka 72, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

(vi) The King of Pāṇḍya fought against Vṛṣasena and Aśvatthānā. (Śloka 46, Chapter 20, Karna Parva).

PĀṆI (S). A tribe which opposed the Aryans during the time of Rgveda. Yāśaka’s Nirūta states that their profession was trade and commerce.

PĀṆIKHĀṬA. A holy place on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in the sacred pond there and performs worship of the Manes one will get the benefit of conducting the three yājñas, Agniṣoma, Atirātra and Rājāṣṭiya. (Śloka 89, Chapter 13, Vana Parva).

PĀṆIKŪRÇA. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 76, Chapter 43, Śalya Parva).

PĀṆIMĀN. A serpent. This serpent is a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Śloka 10, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

PĀṆINI. The author of the Sanskrit Grammar, Pāṇiniya.

1) General information. There is nowhere else in this world a grammar so scientific and so complete as Pāṇiniya. The book contains about four thousand aphorisms. Pāṇini was an inspired sage and he got his knowledge from Śiva. It has not been possible to gather much information about the life of such a celebrated grammarian. Patañjali believes that he was the son of Dākṣiṇ. He addresses Pāṇini as Acarya, Bhagavān and Mahārṣi. The Chinese traveller Huen Tsang says that the grammar of all the languages in this world has its origin from Pāṇiniya. Rāmabhadrakīśa says that Pāṇini was the son of the sage Pāṇi.

2) Life period. There is difference of opinion regarding the period during which Pāṇini lived. Dr. Goldstucker and Bhandarkar believe that Pāṇini lived before 500 B.C. while Vincent Smith and Belvèlkar fix the period in 700 B.C. Patañjali, the author of the celebrated ‘Mahābhāṣya’ (commentary on Pāṇiniya) lived in 200 B.C. Patañjali has contradicted many of the unjust criticisms made by Kātyāyana about Pāṇiniya. So Pāṇini must have lived before Kātyāyana. Pāṇini has made no reference to Buddha and he must have lived before Buddha. Pāṇini has shown great grasp over the laws of Smṛti and so he must have lived after Manu. Considering all these facts together it will be proper to fix the period of the end of the sixth century or the beginning of the seventh century B.C.

3) Place of birth. Evidences are lacking to correctly fix the birth-place of Pāṇini. Many pandits believe that Pāṇini was born in the village of Śālavatā in the city of Attōc in the state of Gāndhāra. But Pāṇini has spent the major portion of his life in Pāṭaliputra. So some pandits are of opinion that only the ancestors of Pāṇini belonged to the village of Śālavatā and Pāṇini was born and brought up in Pāṭaliputra. Jaimini and Bhartṛhari have stated that Pāṇini was a Śiṣṭa. Śiṣṭas were brahmans well-versed in the Sāstras and devoid of earthly pleasures who inhabited the area surrounded by the Himalayas in the north, Kālakavana (Bengal) in the east, Vindhyā mountains in the south and the Ādārśa (Aravalli mountains) in the west.

4) A legend. There was a preceptor named Vārṣa in Pāṭaliputra and Pāṇini had his education under him. Vārṣa gradually acquired a large number of disciples and Pāṇini was the most dull-witted among them. But he was greatly devoted to his Guru and this pleased the wife of the Guru and she took great interest in Pāṇini. One day she called Pāṇini to her side and advised him to go to the Himalayas and do penance to propitiate Śiva to get knowledge from him. Pāṇini obeying instructions went and performed penance. Śiva was pleased and he granted him knowledge about a new grammar. By the time Pāṇini came back from the Himalayas with his grammar another disciple of Vārṣa, Vararuci by name, had come down with a grammar from Indra. Pāṇini challenged Vararuci for a polemical context. It took eight days and on the eighth day Vararuci defeated Pāṇini. At once there was a great humming sound from the sky and the grammar book of Vararuci was destroyed. After that Pāṇini defeated all his co-disciples in polemics and emerged as the greatest grammarian of the world. (Kathāpīthabhāmbaka, Kathāsāratīsāgara, Tarāṅga 4).

5) The birth of Pāṇiniya. When Pāṇini was doing penance to propitiate Śiva the latter appeared before him and started dancing. He sounded his musical instrument ṭhākā (a large double drum) fourteen times. Each of it produced a different sound as follows

1) Aiūn (2) Ṯjāk (3) Eōn (4) Aiāuc (5) Hayavarat (6) lañ (7) ḫāmahaṭanam (8) ḫabbañ (9) ḫahada (10) ḫabaghadad (11) ḫahabhaṭhaṭhacacin (12) Kapay (13) Saṣāsar (14) Hal. Pāṇini accepted these fourteen sounds as fourteen sūtras (aphorisms). They are called Prayāhārasūtras. (The comprehension of several letters or affixes into one syllable effected by combining the first letter of a Sūtra with its final indicative letter.) These Sūtras are now known as Māheśvarasūtras.

Pāṇini’s grammar contains eight chapters and each chapter has got four pādas and each pāda contains many sūtras. He has taken examples from worldly and spiritual texts in literature. He has dealt with the origin of sounds, connection between two words and all such etymological details. Pāṇini’s grammar is not a mere grammar book. It is a science of language in itself.

PĀṆITĀKA. One of the two pārṣadās presented to Subrahmanyā by a deva named Puṣā. The name of the other pārṣada was Kālika. (Śloka 43, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PĀṆKADIḌHĀNGA. A deva who fought bravely against the asuras along with Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 68, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PĀṆKAJIT. Son of Garuda. (Śloka 10, Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

PĀṆPĀṢODHANA. A sacred place of Bhārata. Indradatta, King of Cedi, once constructed a temple near this place. (Tarāṅga 8, Kathāsāratīsāgara).

PARAI. An ancient King of Bhārata. (Śloka 234, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

PARAI. A Brahmaṇvādi son of Viśvāmitra. (Śloka 55, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀṆĀ. Another name for Kauśikī river. (Śloka 32, Chapter 71, Ādi Parva).

PARABRAHMAN. The Supreme Spirit.

1) General information. Brahma is the root cause of this universe. From Brahma originated Aṅgā (sky). From sky came air, from air came Agni and from Agni came water and from water was born this earth. (Chapter 377, Agni Purāṇa).
2) General characteristics. Brahman is such that he who says he knows it does not know it and he who says he does not know it, knows it. It is beyond the experiences of time and space. The chief attributes of Brahman are Sat, Cit and Ananda. Sat means existence, the really existent truth. The one and undivided existence. There are pandits who say that it was undivided, Nastīvā (nonexistence) that was at the beginning of the Universe. Since nothing can be born from 'nothing' the world should have started from astīvā (existence). There is a saying in Rigveda explaining the position thus:—“There was neither Astīvā nor Nastīvā (existence or non-existence) at the beginning.” It is a matter to ponder how strongly conscious was the Rśi who made the above statement about the Parabrahman's Nirguṇa (devoid of attributes) and how clearly he tries to make it understandable to those who have not experienced the idea. Cit means knowledge, splendour, consciousness. Ananda means bliss. Paul Deussen writes that the ancient Upanīṣads do not include in the definition of Brahman the term 'ānanda'.

3) The two forms of Brahman. Brahman has two forms—Parabrahman and Aparabrahman. Parabrahman is Amūrtā (formless, incorporeal) and Aparabrahman is Mūrtā (embodied, corporeal). The Amūrtā Brahman is known by such names as Parabrahman, Paramātma and Nirguṇa Brahman. The corporeal or material Brahman is Aparabrahman and thus this whole world is Aparabrahman.

4) The Upaniṣads about Brahman.
   Aśābadamarpāsamārpanāmavayāni
   Tathāgṛasām nityāmagnandhavacca yat /
   Anādyanantaṁ mahatḥ paraṁ dhruvaṁ
   Vicārya tamasyāmukhāḥ pramucyate / (Kaṭhopanishad)
(With no sound, touch, form, taste or smell, with neither beginning nor end Brahman is imperishable. Na tatra caksurṣagacchati na vāk gacchati na mano Na vidmo na vijnāmi yathaitadunāśyate /
Anyadeva tadvidādatho avidūtadadi
Iti śūruma pūrveśan eva nastavacca kaśire.
(Muṇḍakopanishad)
(No eye goes there, no word goes there, no mind, no intelligence—we do not see it, we cannot describe it—you cannot imagine it nor can you understand it—It is distinct from the known and above the unknown. We have heard it spoken thus).
YASY āmataṁ tasya mateṁ mateṁ yasya na veda saḥ /
Avijñātaṁ vijñātaṁ vijnātam avijnātam. // (Kenopanishad)
(He understands It who comprehends It not; and he understands It not who feels He has understood. It is the unknown to those who have acquired real knowledge while it is the known to those who are ignorant of true knowledge).
Yat caṣuṣāṁ na paśyati
Yena caṣuṣini paśyati /
Tadeva Brahma tvam viddhi
Nedaṁ yaddaṁupāsate. // (Kenopanishad).
(That which is not seen by the eye but that by which the eyes are able to see—That alone is Brahman and not that which people do worship, do know that). Yato vaṣo nivartante Aprāpya manuṣā saha. (Taittirīya Upaniṣad).
Avijñātaṁ Vijnātaṁ vijnātaṁ avijnātaṁ. // (Kenopanishad)
(It is unknown to people who think they know but known to those who did not profess to know it).
Naiva vācā na manuṣā prāptum śākyo na caṣuṣa /
Aṣṭiḥ bruvaṭoṣ nyatra kathāṁ tadupalaksyate. // (Kaṭhopanishad)
(It is not possible to reach it by mind, speech or the eyes. How is it to be identified; or described?—
Digdēfagunādiphaladheśānyāṁ hi paramārtha—
Sat tad adavaṁ Bhṛmā mandabuddhīnāṁ asadīva pratibhāti.
(Saśikārācārya).

The sublime Truth (Brahman) is beyond time, place and attributes. Brahman is one (not two) and it is Sat (existent) but for the dull-witted, ignorant people it is as Atat (non-existent).

PĀRADA. An ancient place of Bhṛrata. Those who resided there were called Pāradas. The descendants of these people live in north Baluchistan. Pāradas gave Dharmapūtra many valuable presents. (Chapter 51, Satbā Parva). They followed Bhīṣma. (Chapter 87, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARAHAN. A king of ancient Bhṛrata. (Sloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva, Mahābhārata).

PARAMAKĀMBOJA A place of habitation situated on the northwestern side of Bhṛrata. Arjuna conquered this land. (Sloka 25, Chapter 27, Satbā Parva).

PARAMAKRORDHI. One of the Viśvadevas who are worthy of accepting a share of the obsequial oblations. The others are: Balandhṛt, Viṣṇu, Pūṇaka, Pāvana, Pārśnikeṣa, Saṁhuva, Dhīyasūna, Vivasvān, Viśyavān, Hṛmaṇ, Kṛttimāṇ, Kṛta, Jītāṁśa, Munivīrya, Dīptarāma, Anukarman, Prafīta, Pradātā, Arūṣīam, Sālībha, Hṛṇoṣipī, Bhūpati, Śrīja, Vajrīviri, Viḍyud-varcas, Soṇavārcas, Śūraśīr, Sopāṁ, Śūraśāmita, Dattāṁ, Puṇḍariyanaka, Uṣīnāavī, Nākoḍa, Viśvāyus, Dīpti, Caṁmūhuha, Sura, Vīyavān, Bhūvāna, Dīpti, Kaṁmūhuha, Śrīja, Bhūvāna, Visvākṛt, Kavi, Anugopā, Sudgopā, Naptā and Iśvāra. (Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).

PARAMĀNU. See under Trasareṇu.

PARAMĀTMA. The Supreme Spirit. The vitality behind Jīvātmā (soul). (See under Jīvātmā and Brahman).
PARAMEŚTHI I. A king of Chandravāna (Lunar race).

He was the son of Indradhumā and the father of Praithāra. (Chapter 1, Amśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PARAMEŚTHI II. A Vaidikaśūktadraṣṭā. He was a disciple of Brahmā. (Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad). According to Jamini Brāhmaṇa Parasemšthi was the disciple of Prajāpati.

PARAMEŚTHI III. A king of Pāṇḍāladeśa. He was born to Ajaṃidha of Nīlī. Parasemšthi and the sons of Duṣyanta, his brother, are known as Pāṇcālas. (Ādi Parva, Mahābhārata).

PARANTA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 47, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARAPURANJAYA. A prince of the Hēhaya race. He once sent an arrow against a sage mistaking him to be a wild animal. (See under Arīṣṭanemi).

PARASARA I.
1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu—Brahmā—Vasiṣṭha—Sākti—Parāśara.

2) Birth. Sākti, son of Vasiṣṭha begot of his wife Adrṣyanti the son named Parāśara. Even at the time of his birth he was a scholar. (For details regarding birth see under Adrṣyanti).

3) Rākṣasaśayāga. Even before the birth of Parāśara, Kalmāṣapāda in his demoniacal form ate his father, Sākti. Therefore Parāśara nurtured an obstinate hatred against the Rākṣasas. So he performed a Yāga to kill all the Rākṣasas. Thousands of Rākṣasas were burnt to death at this yāga and Vasiṣṭha, grandfather of Parāśara felt sorry for the innocent Rākṣasas. He approached Parāśara and said “Son, do not give way to such anger. Abandon this wrath. What harm have these poor Rākṣasas done? Death was in the destiny of your father. Every one has to suffer the result of his own deeds. Anger destroys the fame and austerity which one has attained by years of toil. Therefore abandon your anger and wind up your Yāga.”

Parāśara accepted the advice of his grandfather. Vasiṣṭha was pleased with his grandson and at that time Pulastya mahārṣi son of Brahmā also came there. Vasiṣṭha gave arghya (water and flowers) and received him. Then Vasiṣṭha and Pulastya jointly blessed him and said he would be the author of Purāṇasaṃhitā. Thus Parāśara became the best of the Guruparamparā (traditional line of preceptors). (Chapter 1, Amśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

4) Birth of Vyāsa. Parāśara begot of a fisher-woman named Satyavatī and the boy became later the celebrated Vyāsa.

5) Other details.
(i) He got the name Parāśara because even from the womb of his mother he consoled Vasiṣṭha when his son Sākti, father of Parāśara was eaten by the demoniac form of Kalmāṣapāda.
(ii) See under Guruparamparā the status of Parāśara in that traditional line of Gurus.
(iii) Among the Śūktas, Śūkta 65, Anuvāka 12, Manḍala 1 of Rgyveda was sung by Parāśara.
(iv) Parāśara was one among the several sages who visited Būṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Chapter 47, Śanī Parva).
(v) Once Parāśara visited king Janaka and talked with him on Ādhyātmika topics (spiritual matters). (Chapter 290, Śanī Parva).

(vi) Chapter 150 of Anuśāsana Parva mentions Parāśara as describing the power of Śāvitrmantra to an audience.

PARASARA II. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtārāśtra. This was burnt to death at the sarpastras of Janamejāya. (Śloka 19, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PARASARYA I. Vyāsa, son of sage Parāśara. (See under Vyāsa).

PARASARYA II. This sage is different from Vyāsa. This Parāśarya was a member of the court of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Śloka 13, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva). He was a member of the court of Īndra also. ŚrīKrṣṇa once met him while he was going to Hastināpura from Dvārakā. (Śloka 64, Chapter 83, Udyoga Parva).

PARASAVA. A child born to a brahmin of a śudra woman. Vidura was a son born to Vyāsa of a śudra woman and was therefore called Pāraśava. (Śloka 25, Chapter 101, Ādi Parva).

PARASIKI. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Śloka 25, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARASURĀMA. An incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu, as man.

2) Cause for incarnation. Once god Agni went to Kārtavīryājuna and begged for food. The king allowed him to take from his vast territory as much food as he wanted from anywhere he liked. Agni started burning forests and mountains and consuming them. Deep inside one of the forests a sage named Āpava was performing penance and the fire burnt the āśrama of Āpava also. Enraged at this the sage cursed thus: “Kārtavīryājuna is at the root of this havoc. The arrogance of Kṣatriyas has increased beyond limits. Mahāviṣṇu would therefore be born on earth as Parasurāma to destroy this arrogance of Kṣatriyas.” Accordingly Mahāviṣṇu was born as Parasurāma in the Bhārgava race. (Chapter 40, Harivarṇaśa).

Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa gives another version: Viṣṇu promised Bhumidevi (mother earth) that he would be born on earth as Parasurāma when Bhumidevi went to him in the form of a cow and complained to him about the atrocities of the wicked Kṣatriya kings.

3) Birth. Parasurāma was born as the son of sage Jamadagni of his wife Renukā. Their āśrama was on the shores of the Narmadā river. Renukā, mother of Parasurāma, was the daughter of King Prascenajit. She had four sons even before the birth of Parasurāma (Chapter 58, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

4) Boyhood and education. Parasurāma spent his boyhood with his parents in the āśrama. An important event in his life then was his slaying his mother at the behest of his father. (See under Jamadagni, Para 6). Though Parasurāma was a brahmin there is nothing on record to show that he did study the Vedas. Perhaps he might have had the Vedic instructions from his father during his life with him. He had even from the beginning shown an interest in learning Dhanurvidyā (archery). For obtaining proficiency in archery he went to the Himālayas and did penance to please Śiva for many years. Pleased at his penance Śiva on several occasions extolled the virtues of Parasurāma. At that time the asuras (demons) acquired strength and attacked the devas. The devas complained to Śiva. Śiva called Parasurāma and asked him to fight with ard eka...
The sermon. Paraśurāma was without weapons and he asked Śiva how he could go and fight the demons without weapons. Śiva said: "Go with my blessings and you will kill your foes." Paraśurāma did not wait for a moment. When Śiva thus assured him of success, on he went straight to fight with the demons. He defeated the asuras and came back to Śiva when the latter gave him many boons and divine weapons.

Till that time his name was only Rāma and he became Paraśurāma because among the weapons given to him by Śiva was a weapon named Para-"u (axe). There is a story behind this weapon Para-"u. Once Śiva was not invited for a Yāga conducted by Dākṣa. An angered Śiva threw his spike into the Yāgašala (sacrificial hall). The spike spoiled the Yāga and smashed the hall and after that roamed about aimlessly for sometime and then turned towards Badaryāśrama where at that time Nara-Nārāyaṇas were engaged in penance. The spike went straight to the heart of sage Nārāyaṇa. Nārāyaṇa made the defiant sound 'hum' (hūṃkāra) and the spike turned away. Śiva felt angry for thus showing disrespect to his spike and he attacked the sage. At once Narāṛṣi plucked a grass and reciting a mantra threw it at Śiva. The grass became a Paraśu (axe) and it attacked Śiva. Śiva broke it into two. Then Nara-Nārāyaṇas bowed before him and worshipped him. Thereafter the two pieces of the Paraśu remained with Śiva. It was one of these that Śiva gave to Paraśurāma. When Paraśurāma was returning happy and glorious with boons and weapons he got on his way a disciple named Akṛtavrāṇa. (See under Akṛtavrāṇa). Guru and disciple lived in an āśrama and Paraśurāma became a noted Guru in dhanurveda (archery). (Chapter 34, Karna Parva; Chapter 49, Sānti Parva and Chapter 18, Anuśāsana Parva).

5) Instruction in archery. According to Purāṇas Paraśurāma did not spend his life as an instructor in archery. There are statements, however, mentioning that Karṇa and Droṇa took instructions from him. Pretending to be a brahmin Karṇa commenced taking instructions in archery from Paraśurāma. When his education was complete Paraśurāma taught him Brahmāstra. One day tired after a long walk in the forests Paraśurāma took rest placing his head on the lap of Karṇa and soon fell asleep. At that time a beetle came and started sucking blood from the thigh of Karṇa. Karṇa remained still, bearing the pain, lest any movement of his body should disturb the sleep of his Guru. Blood was oozing from his thighs and it slowly made the body of the Guru also wet. Paraśurāma woke up and the sight of the bleeding thigh and the calm demeanour of Karṇa raised doubts in him. He questioned Karṇa saying that no brahmin could ever bear such a pain with such calmness and Karṇa had to tell the truth. Then Parāurāma cursed him for deceit against his Guru saying that he would never be able to remember the Brahmāstra when the time to use it came.

There is a story behind Alarka, the beetle that bit Karṇa. This beetle was in his previous birth a demon named Daṁśa. Daṁśa once tried to molest the wife of the sage Bṛgu. The Mahārṣi cursed him and made him into a beetle. On his request for mercy he said he would get release from the curse by Paraśurāma. So the beetle became the Rākṣasa again and left the place. Karṇa took leave of Paraśurāma and went to Hastināpura. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 3).

Another famous disciple of Paraśurāma was Droṇa. There is a story behind Droṇa getting Dhanurveda from Paraśurāma. After travelling throughout the world exterminating the Kṣatriya race Paraśurāma gave all his wealth to Kaśyapa. On hearing that Paraśurāma was giving away all his riches as gifts to brahmans Droṇa rushed to Mahendra-parvata to see Paraśurāma. By then Paraśurāma had distributed all his wealth excepting Dhanurveda. Paraśurāma called Droṇa to his side and said that only two things remained with him, his body and Dhanurveda. Droṇa, he added, could take anyone of the two and then Droṇa took Dhanurveda from him. After that Paraśurāma went to Mahārāyaṇa for the sake of penance. (Chapter 130, Ādi Parva).

There are some apparent inconsistencies in the above stories: It is said Droṇa taught Dhanurveda to Karṇa. Droṇa was the last person to receive Dhanurveda from Paraśurāma because the latter, surrendering his Dhanurveda in entire, left for the forests for doing penance. Then, when did Karṇa learn Dhanurveda from Paraśurāma? Could it be before Droṇa went to Paraśurāma? Then it must be accepted that Droṇa had not studied under Paraśurāma when he was teaching the the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas. He learnt it from somewhere before he became the preceptor of the Pāṇḍavas. Karṇa after studying under Droṇa for some time went to Paraśurāma for higher studies and Droṇa approached Paraśurāma after Karṇa had left him. 6) The destruction of the Kṣatriyas. The most important event of his life was the total extermination of the Kṣatriya race. The Purānic belief is that he went round the world eighteen times to massacre the Kṣatriyas.

In many places in the Purāṇas it is stated that Paraśurāma fought against the Kṣatriyas eighteen times. But in chapter 29 of Aśvamedha Parva it is stated that Paraśurāma fought against the Kṣatriyas twentyone times. So it is to be surmised that Paraśurāma fought eighteen big battles and three minor ones. There are some old stories to explain this revengeful enmity of Paraśurāma towards the Kṣatriyas.

1) Family enmity. The Ḫehaya dynasty was the most powerful kingly race then. Paraśurāma was a descendant of Bṛgu, a brahmin sage. That is why he gets the name Bhārgava also. The Bhārgavas were for generations the family preceptors of the Ḫehaya kings. Taking advantage of their supreme position in the royal palace the Bhārgavas accumulated great wealth at the cost of the royal riches. Gradually the Bhārgavas rose in prosperity in inverse proportion to the decline of the Ḫehaya wealth. It was at the time of Ṛṣika, grandfather of Paraśurāma that they touched the rock-bottom of their wealth and they found funds lacking even for the day to day administration of the state. In despair they went and requested the Ṛṣikas to lend them some money. But they hid their money and refused to give them anything. The Kṣatriya kings got angry and killed the brahmans. What stock was left of them went to the base of the Himālayas. The wife of Ṛṣika who was pregnant then kept the child in her womb for twelve years afraid to bring forth the child. After that the child came out breaking open the thigh (úru) and so the child was called Aurva. Even at the time of his birth Aurva shone like a brilliant torch and not only that, the child cried aloud “Oh, wicked Kṣatriyas, I will kill every one of you. I heard from my mother’s womb the din of the swords you raised to kill my ancestors. I will never wait for another moment to wreak vengeance on you.”

The fire that emanated from the face of Aurva burnt even Devaloka, Kṣatriyas as a class came and prostrated before him. The devas came and requested him to abandon his anger and Aurva agreed. The devas picked up the fire sparks from Aurva’s face and deposited them in the ocean. From those sparks put in the ocean was born Baḍavāgni alias Aurva.

(ii) Curse of the sage. From Aurva was born Jamadagni and from Jamadagni was born Parasurāma. In the race of the Hehayas was born at that time a very valorous king named Kārtavijyājuna. Once Kārtavijyājuna gave a dinner to Agnihbhavān. Agni began to devour all the mountains and forests in the world. The burning was so indiscriminate that it burnt the āśrama of a sage named Āpava also. The sage cursed Kārtavijyājuna saying that the thousand hands of the latter would be cut off by Pasaṣurāma born in the family of Bhārgavas. From that day onwards the latent feud in him against the Bhārgavas was roused into action.

(iii) Varuna’s ridicule. Kārtavijyājuna who got a thousand hands by a boon from a sage named Dattātreya subdued all enemies of his status and not satisfied with that he went to the shores of the ocean and challenged Varuṇa for a fight. Varuṇa came before him and very modestly admitted that he was incapable of meeting the challenge thrown and suggested that perhaps Jamadagni’s son, Parasurāma might accept the challenge and give him a fight. Hearing this Kārtavijyājuna turned towards the āśrama of Jamadagni on the shores of the Narmadā river.

(iv) Causes of the war (immediate). Kārtavijyājuna went for hunting in the forests and feeling exhausted after some time went to the āśrama of Jamadagni with his retinue. Jamadagni received them well and with the help of the Kāmadhenu (wish-yielding cow) named Suṣilā, Jamadagni gave a sumptuous feast to the King and his followers. When after the meals were over they started to take leave of the sage, Candragupta, a minister of Kārtavijyājuna brought to the notice of the king the superior powers of the Kāmadhenu, Suṣilā. The king wanted to get the cow and asked Candragupta to tell the sage about it. Though the minister told Jamadagni about the royal desire the sage refused to part with the cow. Then the minister with the help of the other royal servants took the cow by force and the sage followed the cow weeping. On the way Candragupta beat Jamadagni to death and brought the cow to the presence of the king. The king was pleased and the royal hunting party returned to the palace happy.

Jamadagni’s wife Renukā went in search of her husband and to her grief found him lying dead. Renukā wept beating her breast twentyone times and by that time her son Para’urāma came there and he declared that he would travel round the world twentyone times, the number of times his mother beat her breast, to kill and exterminate the Kṣatriyas from this world. Then the dead body of Jamadagni was placed on a pyre and they were singing Viṣṇugūḍa before placing fire on the pyre when Śukramuni appeared there and brought Jamadagni to life by invoking the art of Mrtaśaṃjñāni. By that time Suṣilā somehow escaped from the custody of the King and came there without the calf. Then Parasurāma vowed that he would bring the calf soon and taking with him his disciple Akṣavatra he left for the city of Māhiṃṣati the abode of Kārtavijyājuna. There they fought a grim battle and after killing Kārtavijyājuna and many of his followers brought back the calf. To atone for the sin of this massacre Jamadagni advised his son to go and perform penance in Mahendragiri. Taking advantage of the absence of Parasurāma from the āśrama, Śūrasena son of Kārtavijyājuna, with his followers went to the āśrama of Jamadagni and chopped off his head. Parasurāma returned from Mahendragiri at once and cremated the dead body of his father. Renukā, his mother, jumped into the funeral pyre and abandoned her life. From that moment onwards started Parasurāma’s fierce programme of mass massacre of the Kṣatriyas.

(v) Victory march. Para’urāma’s world-tour was confined to an all-Bhārata tour. The wars of Parasurāma are not described in detail in the Purāṇas. They mention that Parasurāma killed the Kings of Cola, Cera and Paṇḍra. To stop the birth of Kṣatriyas in future Parasurāma destroyed even the embryo in the wombs of Kṣatriya women. Then the Bhārgava ancestors like Recli and others came to the sky and requested Parasurāma to stop this slaughter. They said: “Oh son, Rama, stop this slaughter. What good do you get by killing innocent Kṣatriyas?” By that time Parasurāma had made twentyone rounds around Bhārata killing the Kṣatriyas. (Chapter 64, Ādi Parva; Chapter 38, Sābhā Parva; Chapter 116, Vana Parva; Chapter 49, Sānti Parva and 10 chapters from chapter 83 of Brāhmaṇa Purāṇa).

7) Samantapaṇiṣanāṁya. Samantapaṇiṣa is Kurukṣetra itself where the great battle was conducted. This is a holy place and it was Parasurāma who constructed it. He stored the blood of the Kṣatriyas he killed in the twentyone rounds of killing in five lakes in Samantapaṇiṣa. He offered blood to the Manes in those lakes. The Manes led by Recli appeared before him and asked him to name any boon he wanted. Then Parasurāma said, “Revered Manes, if you are pleased with me you must absolve me from the sin of this mass massacre of the Kṣatriyas and declare the five lakes where I have stored their blood as holy.” The Manes declared, “Let it be so.” From then onwards the place became holy under the name Samantapaṇiṣa. At the end of the Dwāpara-yuga and the beginning of Kaliyuga a great battle lasting for eighteen days took place at this holy place between the Pāṇḍavas and the Kauravas. (Chapter 2, Ādi Parva).

8) Atone ment. To atone for the sin of slaughtering even innocent Kṣatriyas, Parasurāma gave away all his riches as gifts to brahmins. He invited all the brahmins to Samantapaṇiṣa and conducted a great Yāga there. The chief Ṛtvik (officiating priest) of the Yāga was the sage Kaṣyapa and Parasurāma gave all the lands he conquered till that time to Kaṣyapa. Then a platform of gold ten yards long and nine yards wide was made and Kaṣyapa was installed there and worshipped. After the worship was over according to the instructions from Kaśyapa the gold platform was cut into pieces and the gold pieces were offered to brahmans.

When Kaśyapa got all the lands from Parasurāma he said thus:—“Oh Rāma, you have given me all your land and it is not now proper for you to live in my soil. You can go to the south and live somewhere on the shores of the ocean there.” Parasurāma walked south and requested the ocean to give him some land to live. Varuṇa then asked him to throw a winnow into the ocean. There is a legend saying that it was a Paraśu that Parasurāma threw. Parasurāma threw the sieve (śūrpa) and the ocean gave way for land to a distance where the winnow fell from where he stood. This is the place Śūrpaśaka now known as Kerala. (Śūrpa=Winnowing basket). After giving this land also to the brhmans, Parasurāma went and started doing penance at Mahendragiri. (Chapter 130, Adī Parva; Chapter 117, Vana Parva and Chapter 49, Śānti Parva).

9) Other exploits of Parasurāma.
(i) Meets Śrī Rāma. Śrī Rāma and Lakṣmanā were returning to Ayodhya from Mithilāpuri after the marriage along with the sage Vasiṣṭha through a deep forest when Parasurāma blocked their way and addressing Śrī Rāma said thus, “Oh Rāma, son of Daśaratha, I heard that you broke during the marriage of Śīta the great Saiva bow of the palace of Janaka. It was a Saiva bow and I have now come here to test your prowess. I am giving you a Vaiśāvaya bow now. Can you string this bow?” Vasiṣṭha tried his best to pacify Parasurāma. But Parasurāma without heeding it started describing the story and greatness of the Saiva bow and the Vaiśāvaya bow. (See under Vaiśāvaya bow). Then Śrī Rāma took the bow from Parasurāma and started to string it. The brilliance of Śrī Rāma dazzled him and he stood dumbfounded at his skill. Parasurāma was immensely pleased and he blessed Śrī Rāma. After that he went again to Mahendragiri to perform penance.

This same story is told in Kamba Rāmāyaṇa with some slight changes:—Parasurāma did not like Śrī Rāma breaking the bow of his Guru Siva. So an angered Parasurāma blocked the way of Śrī Rāma and challenged him to string and take aim with the mighty Vaiṣṇava bow he (Parasurāma) was carrying with him then. Śrī Rāma with perfect ease took the bow, strung it, and taking the missile asked Parasurāma to show the target. Parasurāma was astonished and was in a fix. The missile could destroy even the entire Universe. So Parasurāma asked Rāma to aim at the accumulated tapobala (power accrued by penance) of his self and Rāma did so, then Parasurāma surrendered to Śrī Rāma the Vaiśāvaya bow and arrow and the Vaiśāvaya tejas (divine brilliance) in him. Parasurāma after having carried out the purpose of his incarnation gave instructions to Śrī Rāma to continue the purpose of his incarnation and then after blessing Śrī Rāma went again to do penance at his holy āśrama.

This same story is told by the sage Lomaśa to the Pāṇḍavas during their exile in the forests. This story is much different from the previous ones: “When the fame that Śrī Rāma was the best of Kings spread far and wide Parasurāma once went to see Śrī Rāma. Giving him the bow and arrow with which he had done the mass massacre of the Kṣatriyas he challenged him to string it and take aim. With a smile Śrī Rāma did so and then Parasurāma said Rāma should draw the string up to his ears. Śrī Rāma got angry and then on the face, which became fierce, by his anger, Parasurāma saw besides himself, Aditya-Vasu-Rudras, Sādhyas, Bālakhilayas, Devarshis, oceans, mountains, the Vedas and all such things of this universe, Śrī Rāma sent out his missile from the bow. The whole universe was thrown into chaos. Thunder and lightning rocked the world. Heavy rains flooded the whole land space. Burning stars and meteors fell to the ground. Parasurāma then knew that Śrī Rāma was the incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu and he stood bowing before him. Ashamed of his defeat he took leave of Śrī Rāma and went to Mahendragiri. When he reached there he found he had lost all his brilliance. Then the manes appeared and advised him to go and bath in the river Vadhūsarā. Accordingly Parasurāma went and bathed in the river and regained his lost brilliance. (Chapter 99, Vana Parva).

(ii) Parasurāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The Purāṇas describe two important occasions when Parasurāma met Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

The first meeting was at the mountain of Gomanta. Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma with a view to enjoying the abundance of Nature went to the beautiful mountain of Gomanta and ascended to its top. On their way they met Parasurāma engaged in penance there. They exchanged greetings and talked to each other for some time. Then Parasurāma requested Śrī Kṛṣṇa to kill Śrgalavasudeva, King of Karavīra on the base of that mountain. Śrī Kṛṣṇa promised to do so and left the place carrying with him the blessings of the sage.

The second meeting was when Kṛṣṇa was going to the court of the Kauravas as a messenger of the Pāṇḍavas. On his way Śrī Kṛṣṇa saw a company of sages coming and, alighting from his chariot Kṛṣṇa talked with them. Parasurāma who was in that company then embraced Kṛṣṇa and said that he should give a true picture of the situation to the Kauravas when he was conducting his mission. The sages blessed Kṛṣṇa and wished Kṛṣṇa all success in his mission. (Chapter 83, Udyoga Parva; 10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

10) Other details.
(i) Parasurāma along with a few other sages was present at the Sabhāprāvesa of Dharmaputra. (Śloka 11, Chapter 53, Sabhā Parva).

(ii) Parasurāma was present at the court of the Kauravas when Śrī Kṛṣṇa was speaking to Dhartrāṣṭra on behalf of the Pāṇḍavas. When the Kauravas did not reply the question put by Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Parasurāma rose up to tell a story to illustrate the evils resulting from the arrogance of man. There was once a King called Dambbodbhava who was very arrogant because of his great strength. He wanted to diffuse his energy by fighting and laboured much to get good opponents and roamed about in search of fighters. One day the brahmans directed him to Naranāraṇyas and accordingly Dambbodbhava went to their āśrama at Badarikā and challenged them for a fight. They refused to fight and yet the King showered arrows on them. Then the sages took a few blades of the iṣṭikā grass and threw them at him. They filled the sky as great missiles and the King begged to be pardoned and prostrated before the sages. They sent back the be-fooled King to his palace. (Chapter 96, Udyoga Parva).

(iii) Once a grim battle was waged between Paraśu-rāma and Bhīṣma. (See under Ambā).

(iv) Paraśu-rāma sits in the court of Yama. (Sloka 19, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PARASURĀMAKUṬDA. Another name for Paraśu-rāmahrađa. Paraśu-rāma-kūṭa comprises of five pools of blood called Samantapaścaka constructed by Paraśu-rāma on the borders of Kurukṣetra. (See under Paraśu-rāma).

PARASUVANA. A forest in hell. The sinners after climbing out of Vaiṭāraṇ, a river in hell in which hot blood flows, reach Aspaṭrāvanā. There the bodies of the sinners are cut by the leaves of aspaṭra which are as sharp as a sword’s edge. Leaving that they reach Paraśu-vana. (Sloka 32, Chapter 322, Sānti Parva).

PARATANAGA. A place of habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 64, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARAVAHAN. One of the seven forms of Vāyu. Prāṇa-vāyu has got seven forms:—

1) Pravaha. This vāyu makes lightning in the sky.

2) Araha. It is by this vāyu that the stars shine and waters of the ocean go up as water-vapour and down as rains.

3) Udvaha. This vāyu makes movements among the clouds and produces thunder.

4) Saṁvaha. This vāyu beats the mountains. Saṁvaha is also engaged in shaping the clouds and producing thunder.

5) Vyavaha. Preparing holy water in the sky and making Agkāsagāṇa stay there static is the work of this vāyu.

6) Pratvaha. This vāyu gives strength to one who sits in meditation.

7) Parāvaha. It is this vāyu that fans the devas to make them cool. (Chapter 329, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARAVARTANAKA. One of the twenty-eight hills. (See under Kāla).

PARAVASU. Son of a sage called Raibhya. He was the brother of Arvāvasu. (See under Arvāvasu).

PARAVATA. A serpent born in the family of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PARAVIDYĀ. See under Aprāvidyā.

PARIBARHA. One of the children of Garuḍa. (Chapter 101, Udyoga Parva).

PARIHADRIKAS. The inhabitants of the place called Parihadrā. The soldiers from Parihadrā fought on the side of Duryodhana during the great battle. (Sloka 9, Chapter 51, Bhīṣma Parva).

PARIGHA I. One of the five pārāsadas presented to Subrahmanya by the deva, Anśa. The other four are:—Yaṭa, Bhima, Dañiti and Dañana. (Chapter 138, Sānti Parva).

PARIGHA II. A forerester. (See under Bīḍālopaḫhyāna).

PARIHARA. A King of the country of Kālāṇja situated near Citra-kūṭa. Parihara who was an Atharvapārāyaṇa (devoted to the Atharvaveda) ruled the country for twelve years and during his reign he gave a strong opposition to the spread of Buddhism. (Pratisarga Parva, Bhāviṣya Parāṇa).

PARIHYANGA. A mahārṣi. One of the sons born to Rṣi Marici of his wife Urṇā. There were six sons and the five others were: Smara, Udgiftha, Kuḍrabhṛt, Agniśvātta and Gṛñjī. In his next birth he was born as one of the relatives of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and was killed by Kanisā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PARIJATA. The sage who came to the court of Maya along with Nārada. (Chapter 3, Sabhā Parva).

PARIJATA II. See under Kalpavīkṣa.

PARIJATA III. A serpent born in the family of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 51, Ādi Parva).

PARIJATĀKA. A sage who was a brilliant member of the court of Yudhīṣhṭhira. (Sloka 14, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

PARIKŚIT I. A brilliant King of Candravadanā. He was the grandson of Arjuna and son of Abhimanyu. (For genealogy see under Abhimanyu).

1) Birth. Parikśit was the son born to Abhimanyu of Uttarā. This was a still-born child and it was Śrī Kṛṣṇa who gave it life. There is a story in Mahābhārata about this:

Uttarā, wife of Abhimanyu, was pregnant when the war between the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas started at Kurukṣetra. Aśvatthāmā, son of Droṇa, entered the camp of the Pāṇḍavas at night and slew Dhiṛṣṭadyumna. He then sent the most fierce Brahma-irātra (missile of Brahma’s) to exterminate the Pāṇḍavas. To face it and oppose it Arjuna also sent an equally fierce Brahma-irātra. The sight of two such powerful weapons opposing each other made all the sages anxious and they led by Vyāsa entered the field and requested them to withdraw their missiles. It was in vain. The missile of Aśvatthāmā went and struck the womb of Uttarā. Once when the Pāṇḍavas after their exile were staying in the village of Upaplaya a brahmin had predicted to Uttarā that at the edge of the life of the Pāṇḍavas Uttarā would bear a son who would be tested even while in her womb and that the child should be named Parikśit. (Parikśī —test).

The child in the womb died when the missile struck it. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was greatly agitated by this wicked act of Aśvatthāmā and he said thus: “Oh Aśvatthāmā, the child now dead in its womb would surely come to life again. You will be called a sinner because of this infanticide. Because of this you will roam about on earth for three thousand years and during that time nobody would mingle with you. You will not get a seat anywhere. All diseases will find an abode in your body. But this infant would grow up into a king and rule the country for sixty years. He would become celebrated as the next Kururāja.” (Saṃpāṭika Parva, Mahābhārata)

When the Bhāratayuddha came to an end Dharma putra performed an āsvamedhya. Many prominent persons including Śrī Kṛṣṇa assembled at Hastināpura for this purpose. Vidura received them all. At that time they were informed that Uttarā had delivered a still-born child. Pariśit was born when the embryo was only six months old (Sloka 82, Chapter 83, Ādi Parva). Everybody assembled there was sad and depressed when he heard this news. Śrī Kṛṣṇa went in and saw the dead infant. Uttarā wept bitterly and everybody asked Śrī Kṛṣṇa to give life to the infant somehow. Śrī Kṛṣṇa did so and the child was named Pariśit remembering the prophetic words of the brāhmaṇa.

2) Marriage. Pariśit married a princess named Mādramati and got of her four sons named Janamejaya, Śruta-sena, Ugrasena and Bhimasena. Chapters 3, 4, 5, Ađi Parva).

3) Curse of a sage. Parikśīt was greatly interested in hunting. Once he went to a big forest with his large retinue to hunt. While hunting he followed a deer which the king had struck with his arrow and he separated from the rest and went a long way deep into the forest. It was midday and the king was tired. Then he saw a sage sitting there and the king went in and asked him about the deer. The sage engrossed in his meditation did not hear that. The king mistook his silence to be arrogance and taking the dead body of a cobra lying nearby with the tip of his bow threw it round the neck of the sage and went his way. The sage did not know even that. The king returned to the palace after the hunting.

The sage had a son named Gavījāta (In many places the name Śṛpig is used for Gavījāta). He was playing with the sons of other sages. One munikumāra (son of a sage) said, “Oh Gavījāta, your father is equal to Sīva. Both have a serpent round their necks. But there is only one difference. The serpent round your father’s neck is a dead one.” Gavījāta was greatly disturbed by this jeer and he immediately went to the āśrama to make enquiries. When he knew that an unknown person had done that foul deed he took water in his hand and said “Whoever be the person who put this dead snake round the neck of my father will die being bitten by the fierce cobra Taksaka within seven days.” Only after pronouncing this horrible curse did he find out that the perpetrator of that crime was none other than the most noble and charitable king, Parikśīt. Gavījāta repented greatly and immediately sent word to the king about his curse through Gauramukha, a munikumāra. The king was a bit frightened first but then he started thinking about the way to escape from the curse. (Chapter 40, Ađi Parva, and 2nd Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) Taksaka gets ready. As soon as the messenger Gauramukha departed from the palace Parikśīt called the ministers to his side and conferred with them to find a way to escape from the cobra Taksaka. They built a building on a huge pillar and gave all protections to the building. Brahmins well-versed in all the mantras and Viṣṇavāidyas (physicians in the treatment of snake-poisoning) of fame were asked to sit around the pillar and the place was well-guarded. The King sat in a room tightly closed. Six days went by. On the seventh day the celebrated Viṣṇavāidya Kaśyapamahārāj was on his way to the palace at the summons of the king. Taksaka was also on his way to the palace in the guise of a brahmin. They met on the way and though Kaśyapa did not know him first Taksaka introduced himself when he knew that Kaśyapa was going to the palace to treat the king if anything happened. He said “Oh Kaśyapa, I am Taksaka and none of your wits would be able to fight against the effects of my poison. If you want to know it we shall make a trial.” Saying so Taksaka went and bit a big banyan tree standing nearby, and lo! the whole tree was burnt to ashes by the strength of the poison. Kaśyapa smilingly recited the Viśahārī mantra and sprinkled some water on the ashes and lo! the tree stood in its place again with not a single mutilation anywhere. Taksaka was astounded. He then bribed Kaśyapa. He said he would give him more than what could be, expected of the king and requested him to return home. Kaśyapa returned and Taksaka went to the palace.

5) Death of Parikśīt. Taksaka went and inspected the palace of Parikśīt. There was no way to step in and Taksaka was astonished at the perfect protection given to the king. Taksaka called all his relatives to his side and asked them to go to the King in the guise of brahmins carrying several kinds of fruits as presents. Taksaka crept inside a beautiful fruit in the shape of a worm and was carried along with the fruits taken to the king. The servants of the king took the fruits brought by the brahmins to the king and the king struck by the size and beauty of a fruit among them took it and cut it open. He saw a worm inside red in colour with two black spots as eyes. The king took it in his hand and at that instant it changed into Taksaka and bit the king. After that it rose up into the air and disappeared. (Chapters 42 to 49, Ađi Parva and 2nd Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

6) Parikśīt as a king. Many researches have been made to fix the period of the reign of Parikśīt.

“Saptarśya mahāyuktāḥ
Kāle Pārīkṣīte śāhavan
(Chapter 271, Matsya Purāṇa),

“Te tu Pārīkṣīte kāle Maghāsvāsan dvijottamāḥ”

(Chapter 24, Aśīśa 4, Viṣṇu Purāṇa)

Following these statements in the Purāṇas, astronomers and astrologers searched for the year or years in which the Saptarśya maṇḍala (the constellation of a group of seven stars) and the month of māgha came into the same zodiac. It came in B.C. 3077 and then in B.C. 477. This would again occur in 2223 A.D. Parikśīt, according to other facts, also must have lived in B.C. 3077.

Pāṇḍavas went for their mahāprasthāna after entrusting the administration to the care of Parikśīt. The Mahābhārata battle was fought in the year 3138 B.C. Dharmaputra ruled for 36 years and so Parikśīt must have taken charge of the administration in 3102 B.C. Parikśīt ruled for 60 years and his son Janamejaya became king in 3042 B.C. It was this Janamejaya who conducted the famous Sarpasatra.

7) Parikśīt attained Svarga. Parikśīt did not enter heaven as soon as he died. So Janamejaya at the advice of Nārada conducted a yāga called Ambayāga for the salvation of the spirit of his father. It was during the navarātri period that this was done. Many eminent sages took part in the ceremony. All were received well and given gifts in plenty. He made pure brahmins read the Devībhāgavata with devotion in the presence of the deity to please Jagadambikā (mother goddess), queen of all queens (Rājarājē varī). When it was over, a divine brilliance like burning fire was visible in the sky and Nārada appeared before Janamejaya and said “Oh Janamejaya, King of Kings, your father was lying bound by the shackles of his life on earth. But today he acquired a divine form and wearing divine apparels and ornaments went to the divine seat of Devī in a sacred Vimāna from Indrapura while Indra, devas and the celestial maidens stood praising him (Skandha 12, Devī Bhāgavata).

8) Other details.

(i) Parikśīt ruled the country for sixty years, with all virtues and goodness. (Chapter 49, Ađi Parva).
(ii) After the great battle, one day at the request of a few, Vyāsa by his yogic powers arrayed all the dead great ones of the Pāṇḍava-Kaurava company. Parīksit was also called then to the Gaṅgā where it was arranged and Janamejaya who was present to witness the show then gave an Avabhūtsanā (ablution after a sacrifice) to his father. Parīksit disappeared after that. (Chapter 35, Āramavāsīka Parva).

(iii) The synonyms of Parīksit are (1) Abhimanyusuta (2) Bhārataśreṣṭha (3) Kṛiṣṭanāyātmaja (4) Kuruśreṣṭha (5) Kurunandana (6) Kururāja (7) Kuruvardhana (8) Pāṇḍaveya.

Parīksit II. There is a story about another Parīksit belonging to the Ikṣvāku dynasty of kings in chapter 192 of Vana Parva:

Once this Parīksit went after a deer while hunting in a forest and he traversed a long distance following it. On the way he felt tired by hunger and thirst. He saw a green grove and a river running still by its side, then. The king entered the waters of the river with his horse and after quenching the thirst of the horse and drinking some water to quench his own thirst, he bound the horse to a nearby tree and lay on the shores to take rest. Then he heard from somewhere a melodious song. The king raised his head and enjoying the music, waited to see the origin of it. Then a beautiful damsel appeared before him and the king talked with her and their conversation ended in the king requesting her to be his wife. The beautiful maiden consented on one condition that she should not be made to touch water. The king agreed and by that time the king's followers came and the king took her to his palace in a decorated palanquin followed by his retinue. The king took her to a secret chamber and stayed with her allowing nobody to enter the room. The chief minister came to the palace and enquired what was happening there and the maidens attending on the queen said that it was strange that no water was allowed inside the room. Then the minister arranged a garden with beautiful flowers and fruits with no water anywhere and a pond in the middle in which water was not visible from outside. He then went to the king and told him of his arrangement and the king took his wife into the garden and started having amorous sport with her there. After some time they reached the pond; water was not visible and so they entered the pond. The moment they entered the pond they touched water and the queen disappeared in the water. The King asked the water of the pond to be emptied and then he saw a frog sitting at the bottom. The king accused the frog of having eaten the maiden and he started killing all the frogs of his state. The frogs became frightened and they went to their king and complained. The frog-king in the garb of a mahārṣi went and requested the king to stop this massacre of frogs but the king refused to yield saying that a frog had eaten his wife. Hearing that, the sage was shocked and revealing his identity said "Oh King, be pleased with me; I am Āyus, the king of the frogs. Your wife was my daughter. She is called Suśobhanā and she is an obstinate bad-natured girl. Even from times of old she has cheated many kings like this."

Hearing this the king pleaded to the frog-king to give him back Suśobhanā. He gave Suśobhanā to Parīksit.

But he cursed his daughter that she would bear misbehaving children because of her cheating many kings before. Āyus disappeared then. Parīksit begot of Suśobhanā three princes named Śala, Bala and Dala. When Śala grew up Parīksit crowned him as king and left for the forests for doing penance. (Chapter 192, Vana Parva).

Parīksit III. He was the son of Avikṣit, a king of the Kuru line of kings. Parīksit was the eldest son and he got six sons named Kākṣasena, Ugrasena, Citrasena, Indrasena, Suśena and Bhimasena. They were all virtuous scholar and Jñānins. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

Parīksit IV. Son of Anaśvā, a king of the Kuru line of kings. His mother was Aṃśṭā. This Parīksit begot of his wife Suyāṣā a son named Bhimasena. (Sloka 41, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

Parīksit V. A king of the Kuru line of kings. (Chapter 150, Sānti Parva).

Parīplava I. A king of the race of Bhārata. He was the son of Nṛcākṣus and the grandson of Nala. Parīplava got a son named Medhāvī. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

Parīplava II. A holy place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If anyone visits this holy place he would get the benefit of conducting an āgniṣṭoma Yajña and an Atirātra yajña. (Sloka 12, Chapter 63, Vana Parva).

Parīṣkuta. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

Parīvaha. A Vāyu (wind). (See under Parāvaha).

Parīvyādha. One of the nine sages who lived in the western regions of Bhārata. The others were: Uṣaṅga, Kuruṣa, Dwumya, Suvirayāṇ, Ekata, Dvita, Trita and Sārasvata (Chapter 208, Sānti Parva).

Parīyāttra. A mountain of Purānic fame. The deity of this mountain Parīyāttra was a member of the court of Kubera. The āśrama of the celebrated sage Gautama, was on this mountain. The sage Mārkaṇḍeya once saw this mountain in the belly of Bālamukunda. This mountain is situated on the western side of Mahāmeru. (Sloka 115, Chapter 188, Vana Parva).

Parījanya. A deva. See under Devavatī III.

Parīnāda I. An ancient sage of Bhārata. He was a member of the court of Yudhīṣṭhira (Sloka 18, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

Parīnāda II. A brahmin of the country of Vidarbha. It was Parīnāda who was sent out to know whether Nala was alive and he found out Nala living in disguise under the name of Bāhuca and after collecting all information about him returned to Vidarbha. (See under Damayanti).

Parīnāda III. A sage who acted as priest for a yāga conducted by a brahmin named Satya who lived in the country of Vidarbha. (Sloka 8, Chapter 273, Sānti Parva).

Parīnāsa. A river of western Bhārata. This river sits in the court of Varuṇa in the form of a nymph. (Sloka 9, Chapter 1, Sabhā Parva). Šrutāyudha, a valiant soldier who fought against Arjuna in the great Kurukṣetra battle was the son of Parīnāsa. Varuṇa was the father of Šrutāyudha and at the time of the birth of a son for her she requested Varuṇa to grant her a boon that her son would not be killed by anybody. Varuṇa while granting her the boon gave the son a mace.
mace had a peculiarity. If the mace was used against anybody who was not fighting, the mace would turn back and kill the user. With the help of that mace Śrutāyuddha gave Arjuna a fierce fight and in the midst of the heat he forgot the condition stipulated by Varuṇa and used it against Śrī Kṛṣṇa who was standing nearby watching their fight. The mace turned back and killed Śrutāyuddha. (Chapter 92, Droṇa Parva).

ARṆĀṆĀṆĀ. A Village situated in the valley of the mountain Yāmuna. This mountain stands between the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā. During the period of Mahābhārata this village was the abode of a great number of eminent scholars. Once there lived in that village a brahmīn of Agastyagotra, well-learned, named Sarmī. One day the messengers of Kāla (god of death) came to that village and by mistake took Sarmī to Yamaloka. It was only then they reached there that they understood their folly and Kāla then asked his men to carry him back to earth. Then Sarmī said he would spend the balance of life due to him in Yamaloka itself. But Yama did not allow that. Kāla then told Sarmī the greatness in giving as gifts Til and Vastra (Gingelly and clothes) and sent him back to earth. (Chapter 68, Anuśāsana Parva).

PARNAYA. A demon of Rgvedic times. He had two friends named Karāṇjaya and Vaṅgrda. They attacked the two Kings belonging to the group of Āryas named Atithīvā and Rjīvā. The asuras were defeated because of the help sent to the kings by Indra. (Sūktā 54, Anuvākā 10, Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

PAROKṢA. A King of Candravāṃśa. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PAROPAKĀRĪ. See under Kanakarekha.

PĀRṢIKSEMĀ. A Viśvadeva. (Sloka 30, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva). (Viśvadevas are a particular group of deities, ten in number, supposed to be the sons of Viśvā).

PĀRVAMAUΛI. Another name for the demon named Maṇicara. There is a story behind this demon getting the name of Maṇicara. (See under Maṇicara).

PĀRVAROMA. A place of human habitation of ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 56, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PĀRTHA. Son of Prthō (Kuntī). (See under Kuntī).

PARUCHEPA. A sage of Vedic times who was a Śūktadraṣṭā. He used some sounds too often in his talks.

Nṛmedhas and Parucchepa vied with each other in their mantric skill. One day Nṛmedhas in great pride produced smoke from wet firewood without igniting it and then Parucchepa produced fire without firewood. Nṛmedhas admitted defeat. (Taittirīya Sanhitā).

PARUNĪTHA (PURUNĪTHA). A King extolled in the Ṛgveda. (Maṇḍala 1, Ṛgveda).

PARUṢA. A Rākṣasa (demon). He was one among the twelve demons who supported Kharā when the latter fought against Śrī Rāma. (Sarga 26, Aranyā Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyāṇa).

PARĀṆA (S). A company of rākṣasas and devils. Parvanas, Patanās, Jambhas, Kharas, Krodhavaśas, Haris, Prarūjas, Arujas and Praghasas belonged to a group of invisible demons and they fought against Śrī Rāma on the side of Rāvana. (Chapter 285; Vālmiki Rāmāyāṇa).

PARVASANGRHAṆAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Ādi Parva. Chapter twenty is included in this Parva.

PARVATA I. A sage who was the nephew of Nārada.
1) Genealogy. Descending in order, from Viśṇu—Brahma—Maṇīci—Paunānāsa—Parvata. Prajāpati Maṇīci got his wife Sambhūti a son named Paunānāsa. Paunānāsa got two sons Virajas and Parvata. Parvata's mother was the sister of Nārada. (Chapter 10, Anīśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).
2) Nārada and Parvata. These two sages lived for a long time as inseparable friends. Once they travelled on earth in the form of human beings. They decided that each should speak out what he felt without reserve and if anybody broke the arrangement the other had the right to curse him.

During their travels they reached the palace of a King called Śrīyāja (Saṭṭhāja) and they stayed there as his guests for a long time. Damayantī (Madayantī) daughter of the King served them both and Nārada fell in love with her. Nārada hid this fact from Parvata and within a few days Parvata came to know it and he according to the agreement cursed Nārada to take the form of a monkey. Nārada gave a counter curse disabling Parvata from attaining Svarga. Both separated from there and after some time both lost their bitterness against each other. Parvata met Nārada in his monkey form in a forest. Both were sorry for their curses then and each withdrew his curse and Nārada got his original form. He married Damayantī and started living together and Parvata went to Svarga. (Chapter 30, Śantī Parva).

3) Other details.
(i) Parvatamuni was a member of the assembly of sages at the Sarpastra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 8, Chapter 53, Ādi Parva).
(ii) Nārada and Parvata were present for the Draupadi-svayaṁvara (marriage of Draupadi). (Sloka 7, Chapter 156, Ādi Parva).
(iii) Parvata and Nārada were members of the court of Yudhiṣṭhirā. (Sloka 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).
(iv) This uncle-nephew combination was present in Indrasabhā also. (Sloka 10, Chapter 7, Sabhā Parva).
(v) They were members of Kuberasabhā also. (Sloka 26, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).
(vi) When the Pāṇḍavas were living in Kāmyakavana, Parvata went there and advised them to conduct a pilgrimage. (Sloka 18, Chapter 93, Vana Parva).
(vii) Parvata showed the Pāṇḍavas daylight at night one day when the great battle was going on. (Sloka 15, Chapter 163, Droṇa Parva).
(viii) Parvata swore that he was not a party to the theft of the lotus of Agastyā. (Sloka 34, Chapter 94 Anuśāsana Parva).

PARVATA II. It is believed that in Kṛtyagāla all mountains had wings. They flew all over the world with the swiftness of Garuḍa or Vāyu. All beings including rṣis and devas lived in a state of suspense since at any moment any mountain might fly and land down on their heads. They complained to Indra and Indra asked the mountains to remain at one place which they flatly refused. Indra got angry and started cutting down the wings of the mountains with his Vajrāyuddha. No mountain was able to escape from this punishment; but Vāyubbhagāvān carried away his bosom friend, the mountain Maṅīkā, and put it in the ocean without anybody noticing it. So Maṅīkā... alone did not lose its wings. It was this Maināka which rose from the ocean and gave a resting point to Hanumān, son of Vāyu, when he took a leap from the shores of Bhārata to Lanka. This was but an expression of gratitude to Vāyu whose son Hanumān was, for the help he had given when Indra was cutting off the wings of all mountains. (Sarga 1, Sundara Kānda, Vālmiki Rāmāyana.)

PARVATIŚVARA. A King of Vindhyadeśa. He tortured his people because of his greed for money and Yama sent him to hell when he died. In his next birth he was born as a monkey. At that time a priest of the King had taken life as a Sār ASA bird. One day the monkey tried to catch the bird and then the bird (priest) reminded him of his previous birth and told him that in their next birth both of them would be swans and in the birth after that they would become men again. (Uttara Khaṇḍa, Padma Pūraṇa.)

PARVATĪYA. A rājārṣi (A King who is also a rṣi). He was born of the species of a demon named Kapaṭa. (Śloka 30, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva.)

PĀRVATI. Wife of Śiva.

Pārvati is known under different names and worshipped in different forms. Amarakośa (Sanskrit lexicon) gives the following synonyms for Pārvati:

Uma, Kātyāyāni, Gauri, Kālī, Haimavati, Iśvari, Śīvā, Bhavāni, Rudrāṇi, Śarvānāgāla, Aparnā, Durgā, Mṛdāni, Candra, Ambikā, Āryā, Dākṣāyaṇi, Girijā, Menakātmaṇi, Čaṇḍū, Kārṇa-, moṭi, Carciṣka, Bhairavī.

Some of these names refer to the various dispositions of Pārvati, while a few are the names in the various incarnations of Pārvati. The origin of Pārvati and her other prominent births are given below:

1) Incarnation of Śati. Śiva was born from Brahmā. To make Śiva active, Śati, an aspect of Mahāmāyā, was born as the daughter of Dakṣa, one of the Prajāpatis. The 9th Skandha of Devi Bhāgavata gives the following story about the incarnation of Śati:

While Brahmā was engaged in creation a few daityas named Hālāhala were born. They were very violent and ferocious and they did penance to propitiate Brahmā and after obtaining boons from him conquered the three worlds and asserted their supremacy in all the three worlds. They defied the Trimūrti (trio of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva). Śiva and Viṣṇu in despair went to war against them. The war continued for sixty thousand years and both the daityas and Devas were exhausted. Viṣṇu and Śiva refused to attend to their duties. Brahmā understood the situation and taking into his hands the work of Śiva and Viṣṇu also and calling his sons, Sanaka and others to his side said “Oh sons, Śiva and Viṣṇu are incapable of doing their work now. I have therefore, taken on myself the charge of their duties also and hence I do not find time to do penance. You must therefore, do penance to propitiate Mahāmāyā. Let her be pleased and when she incarnates in this universe the world will be happy.”

As soon as they heard this the Prajāpati headed by Dakṣa went to the forests on the side of the Himālayas. They started doing penance reciting the mantra of Māyābhija. The penance lasted for a hundred thousand years and then the goddess was pleased. She graciously appeared before them with three eyes and four hands bearing pāśa, aṅkuśa, vara and abhīti. Dakṣa and others praised her and she granted them boons. She did also promise to be born as the daughter of Dakṣa. Dakṣa and others returned happy.

Mahāmāyā incarnated as Śati in the house of Dakṣa. Śati blossomed into a beautiful maiden and all the Prajāpatis joined together and made Śiva marry her. The bride and bridegroom lived in the bride’s house.

At that time the sage Durvāśas worshipped Jagadambikā seated at Jāmbūnāda meditating on her and reciting the māyābhija mantra. The devī was immensely pleased and appearing before him gave him the divine garland lying round her neck. The garland was highly perfumed. Honey flowed from it always. Wearing that garland the sage travelled through air and reached the palace of Dakṣa, father of Śati, and gave that garland to him. Dakṣa received it with great delight and took it to his bed-room and placed it there. That night Dakṣa inhali ed the perfume of the divine garland and enjoyed an amorous spirit with his wife. This act made the garland impure and the latent curse in it made Dakṣa hate his daughter Śati and her husband Śiva. After that Dakṣa conducted a Yāga and insulted Śiva by not inviting either him or his wife. Śati, however, attended the Yāga uninvited and she was insulted. Unable to bear the insult Śati leapt into the fire and committed suicide. From that day onwards Śiva roamed about in the world crying “Śati, Śati.”

2) Śati, Pārvati (Kālī). During that time a son named Vajrāṅga was born to Kaśyapa of his wife Diti. This virtuous asura practised austerities for a thousand years and when he opened his eyes after his long penance he did not see his wife. Vajrāṅga started in search of her collecting fruits and roots for his food on the way. Then he came across her standing underneath a tree weeping and she said: “All the time you were doing penance, Indra was teasing me. I was living without food on the banks of the river keeping a vow of silence. Indra came there in the form of a monkey and threw away all my articles used for worship. Then he came in the form of a lion and frightened me. Then again he came in the form of a serpent and bit me. Oh lord, am I, your wife, an orphan?” Vajrāṅga got angry and decided to do penance again to find a remedy for this unjust act of Indra. Then Brahmā coming to know of the fierce decision of Vajrāṅga appeared before him and said “Why do you go in for a penance again? Ask me what you want and I shall grant you.” Vajrāṅga said “Oh Lord, I did penance all these thousand years to get rid of the demoniac disposition of mine. But when I was engaged in meditation Indra tormented my virtuous wife very much without any reason. If you will bless me I must get a son named Tāraka to kill all the devas including Indra.” Brahmā granted the boon.

Varāṇī became pregnant and after twelve months was born a son to her named Tārakāsura. Tāraka did severe penance sitting in the midst of Pañcāgni (five fires) for a long time and Brahmā was pleased and appeared before him. Tāraka then said: “If I were to die I must die at the hands of a seven-day-old babe. You must grant me a boon like that.” Brahmā granted the boon. Tāraka became arrogant with that boon and joined hands with such fierce demons as Prasena, Jambha and Kālanemi to create havoc in the three worlds of Svarga, Bhūmi and Pātāla. They blessed the wicked and killed the virtuous. It was the time when Śiva was sadly roaming about in search of his lost wife Sāti.

All the devas headed by Indra went and complained to Brahmā. Brahmā said:—"After all, this calamity is not without remedy. There is an escape from the boon I have given him. Tārakāsura himself has allowed him to be killed by a seven-day-old babe. If there should be such a babe it should be from the virility of Sāti. Tārakāsura thinks that since Śiva is observing brahma-caryā after the death of Sāti there is no chance of a babe being born to him. That was why he was prepared to allow that clause in that boon. I shall therefore suggest a plan. Sāti herself should be born as the daughter of Himāvān and Menā in the name of Kāli. Kāli should do great penance and break the vow of celibacy of Śiva. If Śiva accepts her as his wife and a child is born to them we are saved."

Śiva was all this time spending his time thinking of Sāti. Once during this time Śiva bathed in the river Kālindī and then the waters of the river Kālindī became black and the waters remained black ever since that.

Indra and others on their return from Brahmā went to Bṛhaspati to think about further procedure in the matter. Bṛhaspati said:—"No obstacle would ever come to any act of the devas. Himāvān was doing penance for a long time to obtain a child and by the grace of Sāti, Sāti has already been born as the daughter of Himāvān. (Skanda Purāṇa in its Sambhava Kāñḍa states thus about the birth of Sāti as Pārvati. "Sāti before jumping into the fire meditated on Śiva and prayed that she should be born in her next birth as his wife. Sāti granted that request. It was at that time that Himāvān along with his wife Menā went to the vicinity of Amṛtasaras and started doing penance to get a child. One day when Himāvān and his wife were bathing in the saras they saw a gem of a girl in the waters and they took it. Then they found the child with four hands and all other emblems of goddess on her. They praised her with verses from Vedas and soon the divine emblems faded away and Himāvān gave the child to his wife."

Brahmā never wanted Tāraka to know that the child was an incarnation of Devī and so he made the babe black by sending Niśā to do so. Niśā entered the womb of the pregnant Menā while she was sleeping with her mouth open one day. The child was like a sapphire idol. Himāvān was surprised to see the child. The child will do severe penance and obtain Śiva as his husband. Śiva and Sāti will never be separated in any of their births. Oh Indra now go and try to get Śiva interested in a married life."

Himāvān and Menā had three daughters and a son. The devas were watching who among the three—Rāgini, Kuṭjā and Kāli—would become the consort of Śiva. All the three were interested in penance. The devas took Rāgini to Brahmāloka and showed her to Brahmā and the latter declared that Rāgini was incapable of bearing the virility of Śiva. Rāgini got angry and Brahmā cursed her and made her into Sandhyārāga and she took her place in the sky. Then the devas took Kuṭjā to Brahmā and the latter said that she was also incapable of being a mate of Śiva. Kuṭjā also got angry and Brahmā made her into a river and kept her in Brahmāloka. Menā was greatly distressed at the loss of her two daughters and so she advised Kāli, her third daughter to go home, discontinuing the penance. She at first said Umā (Mā—do not) and so she got the name of Umā She was the daughter of a Parvata (Himāvān is a parvata (mountain) and so she got the name Pārvati (mountain-girl) also. Kāli later went home. But after some time the natural inclination in her led her to start a severe penance again. The young Kāli, who was only a small girl then, accompanied by two of her girl companions went to the shores of a river deep in the forests and started practising austerities. In summer she would sit in the midst of Pañcāgni (five fires) and in the rainy season she would sit in water and do penance. The penance lasted for a thousand years.

Śiva who was roaming about in search of Sāti went once to the palace of Himāvān. Śiva agreed to stay there for some time at the persistent request of Himāvān. During his stay there Śiva understood that one of the daughters of his host was doing penance meditating on Śaṅkara. Curious to know more about her, Śiva one day went to the āśrama of Kāli, Kāli saw Śiva and she stood up bowing before him. Śiva was pleased with her. But before Kāli could have another look at Śiva, he vanished from there.

Kāli was disappointed and continued her penance again. Years went by and one day there came to her āśrama a Vātū (a brahmin brahmacāri). Kāli and her companions stood up and worshipped the Vātū who looked brilliant with ashes on his body and wearing rudrāksha and aksāmālā (berry of a tree and rosary made of it) and carrying in his hand a dāryā (stick) and a Kamanḍalu (water pot). After formal introduction the Vātū asked Kāli the purpose of her penance and Kāli told him all about it. Then the Vātū asked her in tones of surprise why such a beautiful girl like herself born to be the wife of a king, should go after a crudely dressed aged man like Śiva who goes on the back of a bullalways. Pārvati resented the statement of the Vātū and got angry with him. Then Śiva appeared before her in his real form and married Pārvati (Kāli alias Umā) in the presence of devas and mahārṣīs.

3) Pārvati changes into Gaurī. Śiva and Pārvati spent their honeymoon travelling throughout the world. Years went by like that. One day Śiva in a spirit of sport called Pārvati 'Kāli, Kāli'. Kāli meant black one and Pārvati was as black as sapphire. Pārvati misunderstood Śiva addressing her thus two times and thought, perhaps, Śiva did not like her black body and trembling with grief said "If a wound is made by an arrow it will heal in due course; if the top of a tree is chopped off it will again blossom when the season comes; but the wound in the minds of others by harsh words is never healed. It was not my fault that I was born black and I would never again come near you with this black body. I am going." Saying thus with a firm determination, she rose up into the air and travelling for some time reached a big forest. She created by her reciting the smarana mantra four attendants for her named Somaprabhā, Jayā, Viśāya and Jayantī and started doing penance there. She practised severe austerities standing on one foot for a hundred years and then Brahmā appeared before her and sought the reason why Pārvati, wife of Paramēśvara should do such severe penance and then she narrated to him all that had happened. Brahmā after hearing her story told her thus;— “Virtuous woman, from today onwards, your black complexion would change into one of the hue of a lotus petal. Because of that ‘gaurā’ hue you would be called ‘Gaurī’. By the time Brahmā finished blessing her the colour changed into the one described by Brahmā.

4) Gaurī changes into Kātyāyani, Vindhyaavāsini, Caṇḍikā and Cāmugātikā. When Devī became Gaurī her superficial skin peeled off and dropped down, it is said.

At that time there were two great demons called Rambha and Karambha. They had no sons and they started severe penance. Karambha was doing penance standing in deep waters and a crocodile swallowed him. The crocodile was none other than Indra. Rambha did penance standing in the midst of fire and finding no result even after a long time decided to sacrifice himself into the fire. Agnideva then appeared before him and blessed him thus: “Oh Rambha, you will get a mighty son of the woman you love.” Rambha stopped his penance and returned home with the boon. On the way he saw a beautiful she-buffalo and passion rose in him and he made contacts with the buffalo. The buffalo became pregnant and in due course delivered a child which later on became the notorious Mahiśāsura. In the meantime a buffalo loved Mahiśāsura’s mother and it attacked Rambha and gored him to death. The Yaksas burnt his dead body in a funeral pyre and the she-buffalo jumped into the pyre and abandoned her life. From that pyre there arose then another demon and he was the notorious Raktabija. Mahiśāsura became the king of demons and Raktabija, Caṇḍa and Muṇḍa became his ministers. They attacked the devas and drove them to exhaustion. The devas took refuge in Brahmā to think of a plan to kill these asuras. Viṣṇu, and Śiva took part in the conference. Viṣṇu the eternal, got angry along with Śiva and became fierce like the fire of death. Brahmā and the devas also became fierce and from the face of everyone a brilliance emanated and all these briliances joined together and reached the holy āśrama of Kātyāyana maharṣi and that eminent sage also sent out a brilliance. The asctic brilliance joined with the divine brilliance and the combined brilliance shone like a thousand suns. Then this superior brilliance entered the peeled-off skin of Kāli to produce the fierce and divine form of a goddess named Kātyāyani. Each limb of the new form was made up of the brilliance from a particular god as follows: From the brilliance of Mahendra was formed the face; from Agni, the eyes; from Yama, the hair; from Viṣṇu, the eighteen hands; from Indra, the central parts; from Varuṇa, the hip and the thighs; from Brahmā, the feet; from Śūrya, the toes; from Prajāpāti, the teeth; from Vās, the fingers of the hands; from Yaksā, the nose; from Vāyu the ears and from the ascetic brilliance, the erotic eyebrows. Thus Kātyāyani shone in the world with a figure formed with distinctive perfection.

All the gods and devas presented Kātyāyani with gifts:—Śiva gave her a trident (trīṣūla); Viṣṇu a Discus; Varuṇa, a conch; Agni, a javelin; Vāyu, a bow; Śūrya, a never-empty quiver; Indra, Vajragaṇpta; Yama, a daṇḍa (stick); Vaśravaṇa, a mace; Brahmā, a rosary garland; Kāla, a sword and shield; Candra, Cāmara (white brush-like fan) and a pearl necklace; Ocean a garland; Himavān, a lion; Viśvakārmā, a moon-disced Cādyamani, earrings and a dagger; the King of Gandharvas, a silver-plated drinking cup; the King of nāgas, a nāgarāhā; and the Rtu (seasons), never-fading flowers. The three-eyed Kātyāyani on getting all these was highly pleased and made a roaring sound. Devī, thus worshipped and adored by all, mounted on the lion and went to the topmost peak of the Vindhayas. Indra and Agni went and served Kātyāyani thus living there. Vindhya called Devi, Kauśikī and Agastya called her Durgā.

Mahiśāsura once went to the Vindhayas after conquering all the three worlds. He was accompanied by his ministers, Raktabija, Caṇḍa, Muṇḍa, Cikṣura and Narakā. They met there the goddess Kātyāyani. Mahiśāsura fell in love with the beautiful and well-figured Kātyāyani and he sent Dundubhi as messenger to the goddess to make her know his desire. Dundubhi approached Kātyāyani and told her to become the wife of Mahiśa, the emperor of all the three worlds. Devī replied that she would accept as her husband one who defeated her and that was the custom also in her caste. Mahiśāsura with a huge army and heavy equipment went to war with her. But Kātyāyani entered the field alone mounted on her lion and the devas watching her enter the battlefield without wearing even an armour were shocked. Devī went forward reciting the mantra of Viṇu-vaścakara given to her by Śiva and lakṣh and lakṣhs of demons were killed by the adroit sword-swinging and the dinning roar of Kātyāyani. Mahiśa and his ministers surrounded her and Devī stepping down from the lion started to dance wielding her sword. Swinging her sword to the rhythm of her dance-steps Devī picked up the leading demons one by one and killed them. Seeing that, Mahiśāsura approached her, burning with rage like the pralayāgni. All the attendants of Devī fled. Those who remained were trampled to death by Mahiśāsura. Devī at first killed the ministers and then faced Mahiśāsura. Mahiśa became an elephant and Devī cut off its trunk. The elephant became a buffalo then. Devī sent a spike and it broke. Even Devī’s Discus, granted to her by Viṣṇu was blunted when it hit the rock-like body of Mahiśāsura. Varuṇapāsa, Yamaṇaṇḍa and Indravajra were all alike fruitless against the mighty Mahiśāsura. Angered Devī jumped on the buffalo form of the demon and drove it to exhaustion and when at last its power of resistance had failed, Devī plunged her spear into the ears of the buffalo and the demon fell dead.

Many years went by. Kaśyapa begot of his wife Danu three great sons named Sumbha, Niśumbha and Namuci. All were fierce demons. Namuci attacked Indra but they soon came to a compromise. But Indra hid in the foam of the ocean which entered the ears, nose and mouth of Namuci while he was playing in the ocean. Indra used his Vajrayudha from inside and killed him. Sumbha and Niśumbha were angry and they entered sarga and defeating everyone there, carried all the riches from there to the earth. They met Raktabija and he said “Oh Lords, I am Raktabija, minister of Mahiśāsura. Kātyāyani Devī killed virtuous Mahiśāsura. His two ministers Caṇḍa and Muṇḍa are hiding inside the ocean afraid of Kātyāyani devī.” While he was speaking thus Caṇḍa and Muṇḍa also came there. When they all exchanged ideas Sumbha called one of his men and said “Bho: Sugrīvāsura, go and tell Kātyāyani to be my wife.” Sugrīva went to Kātyāyani and returned disappointed and said “Lords Sumbha and Niśumbha,
I told Devi your message and she only laughed. She said that Sumbha and Niśumbha might be mighty lords but only those who defeated her could marry her. Enraged at this arrogance of Kātyāyani, Sumbha sent Dhūmraśa to drag Kātyāyani down to him. Dhūmraśa with six Aksauhini of soldiers went to the seat of Kātyāyani and challenged her to a fight. Devī stepped down from her seat and stood before Dhūmraśa and the latter leaped forward to catch hold of her. But Dhūmraśa was burnt to death by the hunhāra fire of the goddess. Not only that, the hunhāra sound reached the ears of Sumbha. Sumbha felt small by this prowess of the Devī but his rage increased. Sumbha then sent Cāṇḍa, Munḍa, and the great demon Ruru also with an army of a hundred crores of demons to face Devī Kaūśīkī. When the enemies reached Vindhīya the bhūtas of Devī made loud and shrill noises. The lion of Kātyāyani roared and she leaped into the midst of the army sword in hand. Lakhīs and lakhs of asuras fell dead by the sword of the goddess. Devī first opened her mouth and lakhs of asuras entered it and then she shut her mouth keeping in her stomach the asuras till they all died. Devī beat the demon Ruru to death. Devī plucked her matted hair and struck it on the ground and from there arose the fierce form of Cāṇḍu. Cāṇḍa and Munḍa fled but Cāṇḍu fiel d Devī and Cāṇḍu followed them to Pāṭala and catching hold of them chopped off their heads and presented them to Kātyāyani. Then Devī, Cāṇḍu and the bhūtas together tore to pieces all the remaining asuras and stored them all in their stomachs. Hearing this Sumbha’s rage knew no bounds and he started with an army of thirty crores of men. The army swept on like an ocean and finding it moving forward Cāṇḍu roared. Kātyāyani made a sound like a lion’s roar. Brahmāṇī holding high the dagger jumped down to fight. Māheśvari with snakes and the spike, with the three eyes open got down in fits of anger. Kaumārī with the javelin hanging round her waist and bright eyes entered the field. Vaiṣṇavī swinging her sword and whirling the mace with many weapons rushed to the field. Vārāhi breaking open the earth with its tusk and bearing a large wooden pedestal came to fight. Indrāni with diamond on her sides came to fight. Nārasīnhi brushing the manes on her breast, shaking the stars and whirling the planets and making a fierce appearance came to the field. (Cāṇḍu, Brahmāṇī, Māheśvari, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhi and Nārasīnhi are the different forms of Kātyāyani. They are called Saptamātrī (seven mothers). These saptamātrīs were born when Kātyāyani in her wrath beat the earth with her matted hair). Cāṇḍu roared. The world became dark. Hearing the roar Siva descended to the field. The Asuras surrounded the Devī again. But they all fell dead with blood flowing in a stream. The dead bodies of the asuras became heaped up and in despair Sumbha and Niśumbha wept. Seeing that, Raktabija got angry and rushed at Devī. The Saptamātrīs shouted and Cāṇḍu opened her mouth. The lower jaw of Cāṇḍu touched Pāṭala when she opened her mouth from the sky. Raktabija, wounded and bleeding by a dagger stroke of Cāṇḍu, fell into the mouth of Cāṇḍu and disappeared. Then Niśumbha interfered and the fight became one between Niśumbha and Devī. The fat and sturdy hands of Niśumbha and the mace he was carrying fell by an arrow sent by Devī. Then Devī struck him with her spike and Niśumbha was killed. Both Sumbha and Niśumbha who came to wreak vengeance on her were thus killed. (See under Laṅkākāṣmī to know how Parvati became Laṅkākāṣmī).

5) Parvati takes the forms of Elephant and monkey. Siva and Parvati went about enjoying amorous sports in the forests. Siva turned himself into a tusker and Parvati became a she-elephant then. Gaṇapati was born as a result of that sport. Siva became a monkey and Parvati became his mate and Hanūmān was born as a result of that sport. (See under Gaṇapati and Hanūmān).

6) Parvati became Siṭā. This happened when Rāma and Łakśmaṇa along with Siṭā were in the forests. One day Siṭā went to the Godāvari river nearby to bring water to the āśrama and she stayed for some time watching two swans playing in the midst of lotuses in the lake there. Hearing a sound she looked into the river and saw Śrī Rāma bathing there. She was surprised. When she left the āśrama Rāma was sitting there. At the same time another thing happened in the āśrama. Śrī Rāma found Siṭā coming to him and when he arose to receive her the figure disappeared. Then Śrī Rāma found bathing by Siṭādevī also disappeared. When an astonished Siṭā reached the āśrama she found an equally astonished Śrī Rāma sitting there. They then told each other their experiences and Śrī Rāma on meditation understood that in the guise of Rāma and Siṭā Śiva and Parvati had come from Kailāsa to know about the welfare of the princes in exile.

7) Parvati, Vīnūḍa and Jalandhara. See under those names.

8) Other details.

(i) Parvati shines in the court of Brahmā. (Sloka 41, Chapter 11, Sabhā Parva).

(ii) When the Pāḍava were in exile Parvati guarded Arjuna always. (Vana Parva, Chapter 37, Sloka 38).

(iii) Once Parvati appeared in person and blessed Dharmaputra. (Chapter 6, Virāṭa Parva).

(iv) Once Śrī Kṛṣṇa pleased Parvati and she granted Kṛṣṇa boons. The first was that he would have sixteen thousand wives. The next was a beautiful form for Kṛṣṇa and the next was love of his relatives. Another boon was that Kṛṣṇa would have the prosperity to be able to give food for seven thousand travellers daily. (Sloka 7, Chapter 15, Anuśasana Parva).

(v) It was because of a curse of Parvati that devas do not get sons by their own wives. There is the following story behind that.

Siva and Parvati went to the Himālayas after their marriage and started living there. Siva and Parvati were so much engrossed in their amorous sport that they were oblivious of the happenings outside. After a long time when their sport continued without a break the devas went in and informed Siva that the whole universe was trembling by their sport and if Siva produced a son the world would be incapable of bearing it and so he should withdraw from the act of producing a child. Siva agreed and drew his virile strength upwards. Parvati did not like that and she cursed the devas that they would never have sons of their own wives. (Chapter 94, Anuśasana Parva).

(vi) Parvati once taught Gaṅgādevī the duties of women. (Sloka 33, Chapter 146, Anuśasana Parva).

(vii) Parvati resides in the mount of Muṇjāvān in Kailāsa with Paramāśiva. There is a mount called
PĀRVATĪYA

Muhāvān in the Himālayas. Bhagavān Umāpati (Śiva) shines there on tree-tops, underneath the trees, on the mounts and in caves. (Chapter 8, Aśvamedha Parva).

(viii) The Mahābhārata uses the following synonyms for Pārvatī: Ambikā, Āryā, Umā, Bhīmā, Sailaputri, Sailarājasūti, Śikambhari, Śarvāni, Deveśī, Devi, Durgā, Gaũ, Girisūtī, Girirājmatajā, Kālī, Mahābhāmā, Mahādevi, Mahākāli, Mahēvari, Parvatara-kaṇyā, Rudrāni, Rudrapatni and Tribhuvanāvari.

9) Pārvatī pratīṣṭhā. The installation of the goddess Pārvatī in temples is done with the following sacred rites.

An inner temple should be constructed and the idol of Devi should be installed there. Before that, on the bed of the platform bearing the idol, amulets with spiritual inscriptions on them should be deposited there just as in the case of the installation of Mahēvara. Then Parāśakti should be consecrated there with recitals of mantras followed by the deposition of Paṃcara-ṇas meditating on Piṅgūkā. Then the idol of Devi should be fixed on the platform. After that Kriyā-śakti should be consecrated on the platform and Jāna-śakti on the idol. Finally Ambikā named Sīvā should be invoked with the mantras as ordained in the scriptures.

The different zones like the east and the west and the guards of the Universe like Indra should also be worshipped. (Chapter 98, Agni Purāṇa; Sarga 36, Bāla Kāṃḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa; Chapters 51 and 53, Vāmanā Purāṇa; 7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata; 4th Skandha, Bhāgavata; Chapter 43, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa; Āraṇya Kāṇḍa, Uttara Rāmāyaṇa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa; Chapter 121, Padma Purāṇa; Chapter 186, Ādi Parva; Chapter 37, Vana Parva, Chapter 6, Vīrāṭa Parva; Chapter 23, Bṛham Parva; Chapter 202, Droṇa Parva; Chapter 283, Sānti Parva; Chapters 15, 84, 140 and 146, Anuśāsana Parva; and Chapter 8, Aśvamedha Parva).

PĀRVATĪYA I. (PĀRVATĪYA). A king who lived during the period of Mahābhārata. He was born of the species of the dānava called Kuksi. (Sloka 56, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PĀRVATĪYA II (PĀRVATĪYA). Those who resided in the country called Pārvatīya in ancient Bharata were called Pārvatīyas. Pārvatīyas were also present for the Rājaśīya of Dharmaputra. When the Pāṇḍavas had to fight against Jayadratha during their exile in the forests these pārvatīyas fought on the side of Jayadratha. Arjuna killed them all. In the Kurukṣetra battle the Pārvatīyas fought on the side of the Kauravas. Pārvatīya was a very important country of ancient Bharata. Once the Pārvatīyas fought against Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa conquered them. In the great battle the pārvatīyas fought against the Pāṇḍavas under the banners of Śakuni and Ulīka. The Pāṇḍavas destroyed them all. (Chapter 52, Sabhā parva; Chapter 271, Vana Parva; Chapter 30, Udvyoga Parva; Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva; Chapter 11, Droṇa Parva; Chapter 46, Karṇa Parva and Chapter 1, Sālya Parva).

PĀŚA. A divine weapon of Varuṇa. There is nothing to excel this in swiftness. (Sloka 29, Chapter 41, Vana Parva).

PĀŚAṆATĪRTHA. A sacred place. This is located in the Jamadagnivedi in the temple of Śūrparakā. (Sloka 12, Chapter 38, Vana Parva).

PĀŚĀSINĪ. An ancient river of Bhārata. (Sloka 22, Chapter 9, Bhīma Parva).

PĀŚI. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. Bhīma killed him in the great battle. (Sloka 5, Chapter 84, Karṇa Parva).

PĀŚIVĀṬA. A place of habitation in ancient India. (M. B. Bhīma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 64).

PĀŚUḤUMĪ. The country of Nepal. The place got the name of Pāśuḥumī because it is located near the birth place of Pāṇḍu (Śiva). (Chapter 30, Sloka 9, Sabhā Parva).

PĀSUDĀ. A female follower of Subrahmanyaya. (Sloka 28, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PĀŚUPATA I. An aged brahmin. (See under Virūpākṣa).

PĀŚUPATA II. The missile of Śiva. Arjuna during his exile in the forests performed penance to propitiate Śiva and got this missile from him. Śiva has a bow named Pānaka. Pāṇḍu was the arrow that is used on that bow. Pānaka is a serpent with the colours of a rainbow. It has seven heads and has fierce canine teeth. Poison flows from them always. The string of the bow is wound round the neck of Śiva. The arrow, bright like the sun and equal to the fire of death, is the Pāṇḍu. It will burn all that it touches. Neither Nārāyaṇastra, Brahmāstra, Agneyastra nor Vāruṇastra can stand against this. In times of old Śiva burnt the Tripurās (three cities of the notorious three demons) by this arrow. Even Brahmā and Viṣṇu could be killed by Pāṇḍu. (Chapter 14, Anuśāsana Parva). Devotees worship Pāṇḍu as a deity. If the Pāṇḍu mantra is recited once it will remove all obstacles from the way and if recited a hundred times it will end all your calamities and bring success in any war for you.

PĀŚUPATA (S). The bhūtakaṇṭhas (spirits and devils attending on him) of Śiva as a class are called Pāśu-putas. (Chapter 67, Vāmanā Purāṇa).

PĀŚUSAKHA. Husband of Gaṇḍā, servant-maid of the saptārsis. (See under Saptārsis).

PĀṬACARĀ. A place of habitation in ancient Bhārata. During Purānic times the people of this place migrated to south India because they were afraid of Jārāsandha. (Chapter 14, Sabhā Parva). Sahadeva, one of the Pāṇḍavas during his victory tour of the south, subdued the people of this place. The pāṭacaras fought against the Kauravas on the side of the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva). It was the pāṭacaras who stood at the back of the Krauṇa Vyūha constructed by the Pāṇḍavas. (Chapter 50, Bhīma Parva).

PĀṬAKI. A soldier of the Kaurava army. Duryodhana gave instructions to Śakuni to attack Pāṭaki along with him for help. (Chapter 156, Droṇa Parva).

PĀṬALĀ. A monkey. This monkey met Śrī Rāma at Kiṣkindhā when the latter was going to Laṅkā to meet Vibhīṣaṇa. (Chapter 88, Śrīti Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PĀṬALĀ. The last of the seven regions or worlds under the earth said to be peopled by Nāgas. The seven regions one below the other are (1) Atala (2) Vītala (3) Sutala (4) Talātala (5) Rasātala (6) Mahātala and (7) Pāṭalā. In all these regions there are beautiful cities and buildings built by Maya, the great architect. The dāiyas, dānava and nāgas live in these regions. Pāṭalā is seventy thousand yojanas high each division being ten thousand yojanas high. The earth in these regions is of different hue like white, black, red and yellow. Once Nārada on his return to Śvarga from Pātalā said that Pātalā was more beautiful than Śvarga. The ornaments worn by nāgas are profusely studded with shining diamonds. Daytime is lighted by the Sun and the night by the Moon. There is neither heat nor cold there and the happy nāgas living contentedly do not feel the passage of time.

Under the Pātalā is Ādiśeṣa, a tāmasic form of Mahāviṣṇu, known to the Śiddhas as Ananta. He has a thousand heads and Svāstika as his badge. Holding in one hand a plough and in the other a wooden pestle he sits worshipped by Śrīdevī and Vairūṇīdevī. At the time of the end of the world the Saṅkarṣanamūrti, Rudra, is born from the face of Ādiśeṣa shining brightly like poisonous fire and it consumes all the three worlds. Ādiśeṣa worshipped by all gods bears this earth on his head like a crown and sits in Pātalā. When Ananta yawns this world begins to quake along with its oceans, rivers and forests. Nobody has seen an end of his qualities and that is why he is known as Ananta (no end). It was by worshipping this Ananta that the ancient sage Garga learned the truth about the results of Nimittāsāstra (predictions by omens) a division of Jyotiṣa-śāstra.

The distinguishing characteristics of each of the seven divisions of Pātalā are given below:

1) Atala. The first region of Pātalā. Here lives Bala, the celebrated son of Maya. He has created ninety-six kinds of magical arts capable of giving everything one desires. Those interested in magic are even now using some of these. When Bala yawns three kinds of women will come out of his mouth. Punācalis (harlots), Śvaśirūṇis (adulteresses) and Kāminis (lustful maidens). These women have a charm called Hāṭaka to tempt all who enter Atala. This Hāṭaka is a raśāyana which will excite sexual passion in men so that the women can enjoy a sexual life with them for a prolonged period. These women after enticing the men would live with them enjoying a life of bliss produced by bewitching side glances, charming smiles, erotic embraces and exciting amorous talks. The men who live with them will be in such a state of bliss that they would say with pride "I am perfect, I am god. I am one with the might of ten thousand elephants."

2) Vitala. This is the abode of Hāṭakeśvara who is none other than Pāramaśiva. This god accompanied by Bhavānīdevi and surrounded by pramabhagaṇas (prominent demigods who attend on him) and worshipped by devas, presides over this place increasing the praṇjas created by Brahmā. The semen virile of Pārvati-Paramēśvaras flows there as the river Hāṭaki. The gold named Hāṭaka is what is vomited by the wind-blown Agni after drinking the rasa of that river. The wives of dāityas wear ornaments made of this gold.

3) Sutala. This is the abode of Mahābali. Here lives Mahābali meditating on Mahāviṣṇu with more glory and grandeur than Indra. To please Indra, Mahāviṣṇu once went to Mahābali on earth and by deceit took all his possessions and binding him with Varaṇapāśa pushed him to Sutala through a hole made on earth. Later Mahāviṣṇu felt he did a wrong in thus sending away Mahābali from earth by deceit and to remedy the sin committed he even now acts as a gatekeeper to Mahābali in Sutala. Once Rāvaṇa went to Sutala to attack Mahābali and then Mahāviṣṇu keeping watch over the palace-gate in the form of Vāmana gave Rāvaṇa a kick and sent him back.

4) Talātala. This is the place where Maya lives. This Maya is a mighty magician among demons. After the Tripurādhāna (burning the three demons to death) Śiva blessed Maya and the latter is living as Tripurādhīpati (chief of Tripura) in Talātala. Maya is the preceptor of all demon-magicians and many fierce-looking demons worship him always.

5) Mahātala. This is the abode of Kādraveyas. They got the name because they are all children of Kadrū, the cobra. All these cobras are fierce-looking multi-headed ill-tempered ones. The prominent ones among them are Kuhaka, Taṣṣaka, Suṣeṇa and Kālīya. All these are long lean serpents possessing big hoods and great strength. These bad-tempered cobras live with their family terribly afraid of Garuḍa.

6) Raśātala. This is the residence of the notorious Nīvātakavaca-Kālakeyas. They were enemies of the devas and they tormented them in many ways. The majestic authority of Mahāviṣṇu decreased their virility. They are now living in Raśātala frightened by the threats and beatings with a magic wand of Saramā, a mantraṛūṇīpi (a sacred chant incarnate) deputed by Indra.

7) Pātalā. This is the abode of serpents. The nāgalokādhīpatis (chiefs of the serpent world) like Vāsuki, Saṅkha, Gulika, Śveta, Dhanaṇjaya Mahāśikha, Dhrtaṛṣṭra, Saṅkhacūḍa, Kāmbala, Aśvadhara and Devadatta live here. These are all strong, long-bodied, greatly poisonous snakes with very bad tempers. They all possess hoods varying in numbers from five to hundred and the lustre of the diamonds on their hoods keeps the region of Pātalā always illuminated. At the base of this Pātalā-world is a place, separated from the rest, thirty thousand yojanas in area. It is here that the tāmasic Viṣṇukalā resides under the name Ananta, Ādiśeṣa or Ananta is the manifestation of this Viṣṇu-kalā. Śrī Ananta has got a name Saṅkarṣaṇa meaning one who proudly and arrogantly pulls at every thing that is seen and unseen.

It is well-known that all the worlds are being borne on his head by the thousand-hooded Ādiśeṣa. When, while bearing the worlds like this, he feels that he should destroy the animate and inanimate objects of the world, he brings forth from the forehead Rudra named Saṅkarṣaṇa with eleven demigods and weapons like trīśūla (trident). Ananta is very beautiful with divine brilliance. Other serpent chiefs prostrate before him and at that time they see their reflection on the diamond-mirror-like nails on the toes of Ananta and for some time the serpent chiefs lie there pleasantly looking at the reflection of their own faces in the nails. The earrings of dazzling brilliance worn by these serpent chiefs reflect on their cheeks and the serpents feel extremely happy when they see the reflection of their faces on the nails.

The daughters of the serpent kings are all beautiful damsels with fair, spotless and lustrous bodies. They smear their bodies with fragrant pastes made from Aloc, Sandal and Saffron. They then stand around Adiśeṣa with their bewitching smiles and amorous movements of their bodies accompanied by erotic side glances expressing their carnal desires. The mighty, virtuous, celebrated Adiśeṣa sits there surrounded by serpents for the welfare of the world. He sits there worshipped by Devas, Siddhas, Gandharvas, Vidyādhara and Mahaṛṣis, bearing the divine garland ‘Vāljyanitā’ and wearing fragrant flower garlands, blue apparels and ornaments in ears and neck and holding in his hand the Halāyudha. Suppressing his anger and keeping calm and serene he pleases all around with his pathetic look.

(9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

Pāṭalaketu. A demon. This demon once carried away Madālasa, daughter of Viśvavasu to Pāṭāla. Rādhvajāra defeated Pāṭalaketu and rescued Madālasa from Pāṭāla. (See under Rādhvajāra).

Pāṭalaraṇa. A leader among the demons. Ravaṇa, the lord of Lāṅka, and Pāṭalaraṇa are different. Pāṭalaraṇa was the son of the sister of Māyāvān. Heti, son of Brahma, begot of his wife Bhayā a son named Viduyutēsa. Viduyutēsa married Sālakaṭāṅka and got of her Sukēsa. Sukēsa married Devavati and got of her three sons, Māyāvān, Sumālī and Mālī. Of these Sumālī got Prahasta and others who were the ministers of Rāvaṇa. Pāṭāla-Rāvaṇa was the son of Māyāvān’s sister.

A set of demons afraid of Mahāviṣṇu, the destroyer of demons, fled to Pāṭāla. Their leader was Pāṭalaraṇa. On reaching Pāṭāla he became their leader and emperor and he got the name of Pāṭalaraṇa from then onwards.

Pāṭalaraṇa performed severe austerities to propitiate Brahma and got from him three extraordinary boons:—
1. To travel freely in all the worlds without the use of any vehicle
2. To be well-versed in all magical arts
3. To be alive till the beetle-shaped blue diamond in his possession is broken into two.

Pāṭalaraṇa used all these boons for the welfare and emancipation of his own people. He was interested in teasing his enemies by the power of his boons. Ravaṇa, king of Lāṅka, had an alliance with Pāṭalaraṇa. Pāṭalaraṇa had a cruel and huge brother named Kumbhodara who was an adept in magic. This brother always helped Pāṭāla-Rāvaṇa in all his activities.

The Rāma-Rāvaṇa Yuddha was going on and Rāvaṇa began to suffer defeat after defeat in quick succession. Ravaṇa then sent for Pāṭalaraṇa and his brother Kumbhodara. Pāṭalaraṇa felt sorry at the pitiable plight of Lāṅka and both the Ravaṇas sat together to discuss future plans. Though they had lost a major portion of their army, Ravaṇa suggested they should fight with the rest of the army and kill Rāma. Pāṭalaraṇa was to kill Rāma and Lāṅka-Rāvaṇa was to marry Sītā. Pāṭalaraṇa said that it was unwise to continue the fight with a small army but promised he would make a trial by using his magic powers. Pāṭalaraṇa and Kumbhodara on leaving Lāṅka made themselves invisible and travelled above the camp of Śrī Rāma to investigate the strength and manoeuvres of the Rāma-army. It was night and the whole place was lit by moonlight. The monkey soldiers were taking rest in different places. Vibhiṣṭa and Sugriva were talking in secret about grave matters. Śrī Rāma was lying resting his head on the lap of Lakṣmīṇa and Lakṣmīṇa was mildly massaging the divine body of his brother. Hanumān was sitting on a big dais created by his tail and keeping watch over the whole camp. Pāṭalaraṇa knew from what he saw that any attempt to carry away Rāma from the surface of the ground was impossible and so he returned to Pāṭāla. From there they made a tunnel up to the base of the seat of Hanumān and from there to where Rāma lay. Then they carried Rāma and Lakṣmīṇa to Pāṭāla before anybody could find it out by making them smell a sammohana-dīvyāvyasadha (divine medicine causing unconsciousness). They brought them to a temple of Mahākāli with the intention of offering them in a sacrifice to the deity the next day morning. They made all preparations for the same. Hanumān used to inspect the camp often and yet when after midnight he looked at the place where Rāma and Lakṣmīṇa were sleeping he could not find them. He immediately woke up and made a search and they then found the big hole of a tunnel near the place where Rāma and Lakṣmīṇa were sleeping. All the leaders including Sugriva and Vibhiṣṭa assembled there and then Vibhiṣṭa told them what had happened. He then took Sugriva, Hanumān, Jāmbavān and Aṅgada and a big army to Pāṭāla and went straight to the Mahākāli temple. There Pāṭalaraṇa had already started the ceremonies for the sacrifice.

Vibhiṣṭa then asked Hanumān to go and get the beetle-shaped diamond of Pāṭalaraṇa from a secret place in his bed chamber. Hanumān took it and kept it in his mouth and attacked Pāṭalaraṇa who came running to slay him. Pāṭāla-Rāvaṇa faced Hanumān in a very indifferent manner and a fight ensued. After sometime Hanumān lost patience and cracked the diamond within his mouth and the moment it cracked Pāṭāla-Rāvaṇa fell down dead. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

Pāṭalāvatī. A holy river of Uttara Bhārata. (Śloka 11, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

Pāṭalīputra. An ancient city of Purānic fame in Uttara Bhārata. The former name of this city was Pāṭalīputraka. There is a story behind the city getting this name:—
There was once a sacred pond named Kanakhalon the banks of river Gaṅgā. A brahmin from Dakṣa’s bhārata along with his wife came to this pond and started practising severe austerities there. He got three sons while living there. After some time the parents died. The three sons went to a place named Rājaghra and studied there. The three were very poor and they went from there to perform penance to propitiate Subrahmaṇya (Kumāravāṁ). On their way they entered the house of a brahmin named Bhojika living on the sea-coast. Bhojika had three daughters and the brahmin after knowing all details about them gave his daughters in marriage to them along with all his wealth. The brahmin went to perform penance and the three brahmins boys with their wives lived in that house.
Once there occurred a famine and the three brahmans left their homes leaving their wives alone. The second girl was pregnant at that time and she and her sisters went to the house of a friend of their father named Yājñadatta. In due course she delivered a son and all the three women looked after the child as their common son.

Siva and Pārvatī were travelling by air once and seeing this child Siva said thus:—"I am blessing this boy. This boy in his previous birth jointly with his wife worshipped me with great devotion. They are now born again to enjoy life. His wife in his previous birth was born as the daughter of King Mahendra. Her name was Pātiḻi and she would again be the wife of this boy in this life."

That night Paramāśiva appeared before the mother of the boy in a dream and said "You must name this boy Putraka. Everyday morning when he rises up a lakh of small gold coins will fall to the ground from his head."

They therefore, named the boy Putraka and every morning they would collect and store the gold coins falling from his head. When Putraka grew up he was immensely rich and started giving away his riches to brahmmins as gifts. The news of this spread far and wide and brahmmins from all sides began to flock to his house.

One day among the brahmmins who flocked to his house were his father and his two brothers. The fathers felt envious of the extraordinary progress in wealth and fame of their son and they cleverly took the son to a lonely place in a temple in the heart of the Vindhya mountains to kill him. After engaging some murderers to kill him they left the place. Putraka bribed the murderers with his costly dresses and ornaments and escaped from there. There was a great storm then and Putraka walked through it. On his way he met the two sons of Mayāsura quarrelling for the three things left over to them by their father. The paternal property consisted of a stick, a pair of sandals and a pot all of which had some strange powers. If you draw on the ground with the stick you will have at that spot anything you desire. If you wear the sandals you can travel in the air. If you dip your hands into the pot you will get plenty of food.

Putraka immediately hit upon a plan and addressed the quarrelling brothers thus:—"Why do you fight like this? It is better you decide it by a competitive race. He who wins the race should have the right to get the things." The two brothers agreed to it and leaving the things with Putraka started running. When they had gone a long distance away from the spot, Putraka put on the sandals and taking the stick and pot with him rose into the air. He landed at a city far away from the spot and started living at the house of an old woman. The King of that country had a daughter named Pāṭalī. When the old lady described to him the beauty and good qualities of Pāṭalī, Putraka wanted to marry her. So at night when everybody in the palace was asleep Putraka put on his sandals and entered the room of Pāṭalī through the windows. Pāṭalī woke up; she liked Putraka and they were married according to Gandharva rites. Then they both went out of the palace by air with the help of the sandals and landed at a place on the shores of the Gaṅgā. Then at the request of Pāṭalī Putraka made a city there with the help of the stick and they named it Pāṭaliputra. (Kathāpīṭhalaṁbaka, Kathāsaritsāgara).

PATĀNGA. A mountain. There are twenty small mountains around Mahāmeru and Patāṅga is one of them.

PATAṆJALI. A celebrated commentator in Sanskrit. Patañjali is one of the best commentators of Pāṇini's Vyākaraṇasūtras. Pandits are of opinion that he got his name Patañjali to mean that people should worship (anjali) at his foot (pāda). He was such an adorable person. Pandits believe that Patañjali is the author of Yogasūtras and Carakasāṁhitā. A few believe that Patañjali was the incarnation of Adiśeṣa. But modern scholars are of opinion that Patañjali, the commentator and Patañjali the author of Yogasūtras are two different persons.

In his book on Patañjalicaṁita, Rāmaḥadradikṣita writes about the birth of Patañjali:—"Once Goṅikā, daughter of a sage, prayed to the Sun-god for a son. At once Ananta, King of the serpents, fell on her palm in the form of a sage. The ascetic girl brought up that sage as her son. After some years the sage went to Cīdambārā and prayed to Śiva to bless him with enough knowledge and wisdom to write a commentary on Kāṭyāyanā's Vyākaraṇaṁvatītika (explanatory rules on Pāṇini's sūtras). Siva blessed him and the sage wrote the commentary. Many disciples went to him to learn the commentary and the sage accepted them all as disciples and promised to teach them provided they would abide by a condition, namely, that nobody should remove a curtain he would place between him and the disciples while teaching. The teaching went on for some time. He would reply to their doubts but the replies were peculiar and ambiguous and the disciples, getting disappointed, removed the curtain one day. The sage cursed them all. One of the disciples was away from the place when then and the sage cursed him for leaving the place without permission during the course of study. He begged for relief and the sage was pleased. The Guru said if he could teach his commentary to one who would say logically that the Bhūtakarmavācyakṛdanta (past participle of a verb) of the root 'Pac' was 'Pavka' he would be released from the curse. Gandragupta who came from Ujjayinī gave the correct answer and he was taught the Mahābhāṣya. Bharatṛhari was the son born to Gandragupta of a Sudra woman.

Patañjali, according to Professor Goldstucker, was a courtier of King Puṣyamitra and was alive when Menander attacked Sāketa. This would mean that Patañjali lived before B.C. 150.

PATANA (S). A company of devils. (Chapter 285, Vana Parva).

PATA TR. A valiant warrior who fought on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle. He lost his chariot in a fight with Bhimasena. (Chapter 48, Karṇa Parva).

PATAJĀVĀSAKA. A serpent belonging to the race of Dhrtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PATHARVAN. A rājārsi well-praised in Ṛgveda. (Sūktā 112, Maṇḍalā 1, Ṛgveda).

PATHYA. A great preceptor in the tradition of ancient Gurus. (See under Guruparmparā).

PATHIKRTA. An agni. If a Yāga comes to a stop during its course this Agni is to be worshipped. (Chapter 221, Vana Parva).
PATINEţţARAKKAVI(S). (Eighteen and a half wise men).

Mānāvikrama, the zamorin who ruled the old state of Kozhikkoţu in the beginning of the seventh century (Malayālam Era) was a talented man well-versed in all arts. He kept in his court a company of nineteen wise men whom he called by the well-known name Patineţţarakkavis meaning eighteen and a half kavis. The kavis of the zamorin were the nine Paţţeris of Pavyūr, the five Nambūtiris of Tiruvēgappūr, Mullappily Nambūtiri, Uddanāsāstri, Kākkāsēri Bhāṭṭātiri, Cennās Nambūtirippādu and Punam Nambūtiri. Of these eighteen were scholars in Sanskrit and the nineteenth, Punam Nambūtiri was a vernacular poet and so the then zamorin gave only half a unit value to the vernacular member and thus named the assembly as a company of eighteen and a half members. There is another explanation given to the word 'arakkavi'. 'Ara' means 'half'; but modern pandits say that 'ara' was a prefix to show a sign of royalty as is found in the words 'aramana' meaning royal mana or palace of the King. So 'arakkavi' would mean a Kavi attached to a King. Then the question which of the nineteen was not included in the original company to reduce the number to eighteen. We can leave the matter for further research.

Pavyūr Accan Bhāṭṭātirippādu, the top-most of Kerala pandits, was the president of the council of Patineţţarakkavis. The illam (house) of this Bhāṭṭātirippādu belonged to the Kunnakulam taluk near Guruvayūr of Cochin state. He was known as Mahārṣi also Uddanāsāstrikal in his Mallikāmāruta states that one of the Paţţeris was Pavyūr Mahābhāṭṭātirippādu named Paramesvara. Uddanāsāstri belonged to Kāṭcippura. Kākkāsēri Bhāṭṭātiri was born to defeat the invincible Uddanāsāstri. Cennās Nambūtiri was the author of Tantrasamuccaya. Many poets and pandits were born in the family of these Kavis after their death.

PATIVRATAMĀHATMYAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Vana Parva of Mahābhārata. This comprises six chapters commencing from Chapter 293 of Vana Parva.

PATRESVARA. A sacred place. This is situated on the northern shore of river Narmadā. If one bathes in the tirtha (pond) there, one will be able to enjoy the company of celestial maidens for five thousand years.

(Chapter 17, Padma Purāṇa)

PAṬṬATTĀNA. This was a custom which was in force in the ancient temples of Kerala from the 9th century A.D. Patṭa means a 'Sanskrit pandit' 'Paţţas' is used as its plural. To give instructions in śāstras and upaniṣads to the three upper classes and to read in public at fixed times the Purāṇas, to make people more and more religious minded, it was the custom to appoint Paţţas in temples in ancient Kerala. This position which was the loftiest that could be attained by a pandit of those times was called by the name Paţṭattāna. From the 9th century A.D. references are found about Paţṭattāna in official records. In all important temples a māvāratapaţṭa used to be appointed. His duty was to read and explain Mahābhārata to people.

Urāḷars who conducted the day to day administration of the temples and the Koiladhiķārī who represented the supreme authority, and the King, jointly granted the Paţṭattāna to deserving people. Pandits used to come to temples and engage themselves in religious polemics to make themselves worthy of the grant of Paţṭattāna. The Paţţas were entitled to some profits from the temples. Records of the 3rd century Malayālam Era regarding the routine expenditure in the Tiruvallua temple mention about 'five nāzhis of rice to be given to each of the Paţţas within the temple'. Paţţas also were given many lands free of tax as were given to Urāḷars. In the Manalikākara order of 1236 A.D. and the Padmanābhapura order of 1237 A.D. mention is made about these grants. Paţṭasthāna and Urāyavasthāna became hereditary after some time and began to decline in importance.

Even the meaning of the word Paţṭattāna underwent a change. In Cochin it meant the ceremony of giving feasts followed by money-bags to invited brahmans by the Kings to obtain punya for the dead members of the royal family. The zamorins of Calicut meant by Paţṭattāna the act of giving fifty-one bags each containing fiftyone rupees to the successful candidates in śāstrarīha contests held at the Tali temple during the period between Revati and Tiruvatīra (Ardra) in the month of Tulām. There is a difference of opinion regarding the number of money-bags and the amount in each. Ullūr S. Paramēsvara Iyer in his Viţjānāndipākā (page 148) states that the number of bags were 46 and the money in each was two hundred rupees. Of these, twelve bags each were sanctioned for Prabhākara Māmānāsā and Bhāṭṭāmānāsā, nine for Vāyākaraṇa, and thirteen for Vedānta. According to certain records 46 bags were given in the year 1679 A.D. Contests in Prabhākara Māmānāsā were held on the southern temple-tower gate of the Tali temple and in Vāyākaraṇa on the southern platform of the northern temple tower gate of the same temple. The custom of giving hundred and one rupees each to one hundred and eight scholars in Śrī Padmanābhasvāmi temple of Trivandrum is also called Paţṭattāna.

PATTI. A division of the army. (See under Aksaṉuñi). PATTORṆA. A Kaḷāтриya King. He brought gifts for the Rājasāya of Yudhiṣṭhīra. (Śloka 18, Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva).

PATTU (TEN).

B. Ten Indriyas, (organs of sense). There are ten organs of sense comprising five Jñānendriyas and five Karmendriyas.

T. Upacāras. There are ten articles of worship: (1) Arghya (oblation of valuables) (2) Pādyā (water for washing feet) (3) Ācamana (water for cleansing mouth) (4) Madhuparka (a mixture of honey with four other sweet articles) (5) Panuracamana (water for cleansing mouth again) (6) Gandha (Sandal paste) (7) Puspa (flowers) (8) Dhūpa (frankincense) (9) Dīpa (light) (10) Nivedya (articles of food offerings).

U. Upānisads. There are many Upānisads of which only 108 ones are in print; of these the most important are ten in number and they are the following: (1) Īsāvāsya (2) Kena (3) Katha (4) Praṇā (5) Mūndā (6) Māṇḍūkyā (7) Chāndogya (8) Taittirīya (9) Aiśkreyā (10) Bhādāranayaka.

PAṬUŚA. A demon. During the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle this demon fought against Panasa a monkey warrior on the side of Rāma. (Chapter 285, Vana Parva).

PAUDANYA. An ancient city of Bhārata. The founder of this city was Asmaka son of King Saudāsa. Pandits believe that the present city of Paithan on the northern banks of river Godāvarī was the old Paundanya.

PAULASTYA. The demons born in the race of Pulastya are called Paulastyas. They were born like the brothers of Duryodhana. Rāvaṇa born in the family of Pulastya is also called Paulastya. (Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PAULOMA. A tīrtha (holy place). Another name of Paṅcatīrtha. (See under Pancatīrtha).

PAULOMAS. The sons of the demon named Pulomā.

PAULOMAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of the Ādi Parva of Mahābhārata. (See under Bhārata).

PAULOMI. Saṭīdevi, wife of Indra. (See under Saṭi).

PAUNARBHAVA. See under Bandhudhāyāda.

PAUNDRĀ I. One of the barbarous tribes of men who had originated from the tail of Nandini. (Śloka 37, Chapter 174, Ādi Parva).

PAUNDRĀ II. A resident of the state of Paṇḍra. This state was in existence during the Mahābhārata period. The king of the state was also called Paṇḍra. Paṇḍra was present for the marriage of Paṅcālī. (Chapter 186, Ādi Parva). Paṇḍras were also present for the Rāja-siya conducted by Dharmaputra. During the big battle the Paṇḍras fought against the Kauravas constructing a Krauṇcavyuha (a battle array in the shape of a stork). (Chapter 50, Bhīṣma Parva). Kṛṣṇa and Karna on two different occasions conquered this country. (Śānti Parva, M. B. The Paṇḍras were Kṣatriyas once. But the brahmins cursed them and changed them into Śūdras. (Chapter 85, Anuśāsana Parva).

PAUNDRĀ III. The conch of Bhūmasena. He blew his conch at the beginning of the Mahābhārata battle and also at the time when Duryodhana fell down dead. (Chapter 61, Śalya Parva).

PAUNDRĀKĀ I. A son of Nikumbha. When during the Rāma-Rāvaṇa battle Nikumbha died, his son Paṇḍrāka took up the fight against Rāma and was killed. (Ananda Rāmāyaṇa).

PAUNDRĀKĀ II. (Paṇḍrākavāsudeva). A king of ancient Kāruṣa. Once he sent a messenger to Dwārakā and told Kṛṣṇa thus: "Oh Kṛṣṇa, I am the real Vāsudeva. Therefore put down all your royal emblems and robes and come and worship at my feet." As soon as Kṛṣṇa heard it he got angry and moved to Kāruṣa with a large army and killed Paṇḍrākavāsudeva. 10th Skandha, Bhāgaṇaṭa).

PAUNDRĀKĀ III. The name of the buffalo which is the vehicle of Yama (Chapter 9, Vāmana Purāṇa).

PAUNDRĀMĀTSYAKA. A Kṣatriya king. He was the son born to the demon Vīra of a woman named Danāyus. (Śloka 43, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PAURARA I. An ancient Rājārṣi. He became Parvatarāja when he grew up after being born of the species of the daitya, Śarabha. Once Arjuna defeated this king. The Paṇḍavas invited him for the Mahābhārata battle. But he did not accept it but joined sides with the Kauravas against the Paṇḍavas. Parurava was considered a prominent commander in the Kaurava army. In the Kurukṣetra battle he at first fought against Dṛṣṭaketu and then was wounded when he fought against Abhimanyu. It was Arjuna who killed him in the end. (Chapter 67, Ādi Parva; Chapter 27, Sabhā Parva; Chapters 4, 128, Udyyoga Parva; Chapter 116, Bhīṣma Parva; Chapter 14, Drona Parva; Chapter 3, Karna Parva).

PAURAVA II. Those born in the Puru line of kings are as a class called Paurevas. Both Kauravas and Paṇḍavas have been mentioned as Paurevas in the Purāṇas. (Chapter 172, Ādi Parva).

PAURAVA III. An ancient king of the kingdom of Aṅga. This Paureva was also one among the kings who gave money to king Śrījaya when he conducted an Āśvamedha (Chapter 57, Drona Parva).

PAURAVA IV. One of the Brahmagāda sons of Viśvāmitra. (Śloka 55, Chapter 4, Anuśāsana Parva).

PAURAVAKA. A Kṣatriya tribe. These people fought against the Kauravas joining the Krauṇcavyūha constructed by Dharmaputra in the great battle. (Chapter 50, Bhīṣma Parva).

PAURAVI I. Wife of Vasudeva, father of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. He had many other wives. (9th Skandha, Bhāgaṇaṭa).

PAURAVI II. Wife of Yudhiṣṭhira. Yudhiṣṭhira begot a son named Devaka of Paurevi. (9th Skandha, Bhāgaṇaṭa).

PAURUSEYA. A demon who travels along with the sun in the month of Jyeṣṭha. (June), (11th Skandha, Bhāgaṇaṭa).
PAURIKA. A king of the ancient country Purikānagarī. He was such a sinner that he was reborn as a jackal in his next birth. (Chapter 111, Śanti Parva).

PAURĀṆAŚA. Son of Āṅirāsa. His mother was called Sambhūti. Paurāṇamāsa had two sons named Virajas and Parvata. (Chapter 10, Āriśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PAUSAJIṬ. One of the sages belonging to the tradition of the disciples of Vyāsā. (See under Guruparamparā).

PAUSAMĀṢA. The month of Pausā (January). During this month, on the full moon day the constellation Puṣya and the moon join in a zodiac. He who takes food only once a day during this month will get beauty, fame and prosperity. (Chapter 106, Anuśāsana Parva).

PAUSPIṆIṆI. A sage belonging to the tradition of disciples of Vyāsā. (See under Guruparamparā).

PAUSṬI. Wife of king Puru. Puru begot of Pausṭi three sons named Pravīra, Īvara, and Raudrāṣva. Pausṭi is called Kausalyā also. (Ślokā 11, Chapter 9, Ādi Parva).

PAUSYA I. A Keśatriya king. The queen of this king gave her earrings as a gift to a sage called Uttānaka. (See under Uṭṭanaka).

PAUSYA II. Son of Puṣā, king of Karavāra. Pausya had three wives and yet was not fortunate enough to get a son. At last by the grace of Śiva, he got a son named Candrasēkharā. The palace of Candrasēkharā was in Karavīranagārī situated near Brahmāvarta on the banks of the river Dr̥ṣadvaiṣ. (Kālikā Purāṇa, Chapter 49).

PAUSYAPARVA. A subsidiary Parva of Ādi Parva. Chapter three is included in this.

PAUSYANĪ. A preceptor of the tradition of disciples of Vyāsā. (See under Vyāsā).

PĀVAKA. A son of Agni. Agni got of his wife Śvāhā three sons, Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śuci. These three brilliant sons got together 45 sons and they were also called Anegi. Thus there were 49 Agni made up of the father, his three sons and their 45 sons. Pāvaka had another name also—Mahān (Chapter 219, Vana Parva).

PĀVAMĀNA I. An Agni (fire). The eldest son of Brahmā, Agni, got of his wife Śvāhā three sons, Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śuci. These three got forty-five children and they are called Agni. Thus, father, three sons and their forty-five sons constitute the 49 Agni. (Chapter 10, Āriśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PĀVAMĀNA II. A mountain. This mountain is situated near Meru. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

PĀVAMĀNA III. One of the three sons of Vijitāśva. He was in his previous birth an Agni but was cursed by Vasīṣṭha to be born on earth as a man. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PĀVANA I. A Viśvedeva (one of the ten sons of Viśvā). (Ślokā 30, Chapter 91, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀVANA II. A son born to Kṛṣṇa of Mitravindā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PĀVANA III. A sacred place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one worships the Devas and Manes at this place one would get the benefit of conducting an Āśvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PĀVANAHRAḌA. A marudgāna tirtha (a sacred pond) situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. If one bathes in this one would attain Viṣṇuloka.

PĀVITRĀROṆA. A Pūjāvidhi (a mode of worship). If you perform a Pavitrāroṇa worship you will get the benefit of worshipping Viṣṇu for a year. This worship is to be conducted in the months of Āṣāḍha (July), Sravana (August) Prauṣṭhapada (September), Āśvina (October) and Kārttika (November) A sacred Pavitra (sacred thread or ring of Kuśa grass) is to be prepared either in gold, silver, copper, cotton or silk. A specially purified cotton thread is also enough. The Pavitra is to be made of three threads woven together. The Pavitra is to be made holy by reciting 108 times the Gāyatrī mantra or even half of that number is enough. Reciting 108 times or more is considered to be Uttama (best); half of it is considered Madhyama (tolerable) and less than it is considered adhama (worst). The Pavitra should then be tied to maṇḍalas and the mantra to be recited at the time of tying it, is this :

Oṁ Nārāyaṇāya vidmahe Vāsudevāya Dhīmahi tanno Viṣṇuḥ pradacayāt.

(Chapter 34, Agni Purāṇa).

PĀVITRĀṆĀḌI. A sage who shone in the courts of both Indra and Yudhiṣṭhira. (Ślokā 15, Chapter 4, Sabhā Parva).

PĀVASYA. Son of the sage Anāgaras. He had eight sons named Varupas. They were:—Bṛhaspati, Uṭṭāthya, Pāvasya, Śanti, Ghora, Vīrūpa, Saṅhvarta and Sudhanvā. (Ślokā 130, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀYODĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmaṇya. (Ślokā 28, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PĀYOṆI. A holy river. This river starts from the Vindhyā mountains and flows to the west. Nala and Damayanti walked through the banks of this river. (Chapter 61, Vana Parva). Those who bathe in this river will get the benefit of doing a thousand godānas (gifts of cows). There is a sacred place on the shores of this river called Varāhātīrtha. King Nṛga performed a Yāga at this place at which Indra came and had Somapāṇa and the brahmins received daksīṇā (fees) and got drunk. (Chapters 88 and 121, Vana Parva). Even the mere contact of water-drops of Payoṣṇī river would absolve one of all sins. The musical instrument Śrīga of Śiva is in this river. Dharmaputra once came to this river and stayed there for some time drinking its water. (Chapter 120, Vana Parva). On another occasion Gaya son of King Amūrtarayas conducted seven Āśvamedhas at this place and pleased Indra. (Chapter 21, Anuśāsana Parva).

PĀYVANṆUṆ PĀṬṬU. This is a work in Malayāḷam written during a very ancient period of Malayāḷam literature. A complete edition of the same has not yet been received. The plot as could be gathered from records available is the following:

Nilakeṭi, a woman born in a very noble family in Trīśśivapuruṣūr did not have any sons though she accepted many husbands for the sake of progeny. At last she decided to perform penance. She left her place alone on a pilgrimage and reached Kāccal, a famous trading centre near Ėzhimala. There lived a merchant named Nambucetty alias Combucetty who was the chief man of the place. He talked with Nilakeṭi and accepted her as his wife. She got a son of him named Nambu’āri Aran. Pleased at the birth of a son the parents gave a grand feast at the big Payyannūr plains. At that time the brothers of Nilakeṭi reached the place in a ship. They climbed the fort-walls and tried to enter the grounds. Some people objected to it and at that time Nambucetty came there and beat them to death. On hearing about this Nilakesi left everything behind including her son and went again on a pilgrimage. When the son grew up the father taught his son everything about trade and ships. The father gave him a new ship for trading and the son taking along with him Pándyas, Jonakas, Coiliyas, Páppavas and a Yavana and a huge stock of goods put the ship into the sea and fearlessly went for trading. After passing through many ports and crossing another ocean he reached Ponnma (the mountain of gold) and bartered his goods for a heap of gold. He came back to his own land and was one day playing chess with his father when a Sannyásini (female ascetic) came there. When she was given alms she requested to be allowed to talk to the young merchant. The Sannyásini was none other than Nilakesi the mother of Nambusāri Aran, the young merchant. She requested him to come to Payyanūr for a feast conducted by a woman there and he agreed to that. But the father objected to it. But when the son persisted in going, the father sent him with the sons of a cetty, a few people from Manigrāma and a huge stock of goods for trade. The poem ends there thus with 104 verses. There are different opinions about the story among literary critics and historians. Gundert writes about it thus:—"This is a piece of Malayālam work most ancient of all that I have seen. This is a creation in Malayālam before that language became diluted with meaningless indeclinable Sanskrit words." According to Gundert this poem was written before the poem Rāmacarita was written and thus in the 3rd century M.E.

PEDU. A Rājarṣi otherwise named Aitkāśa. (Maṇḍala I, 1, Gṛveda).

PERIYĀLVAR. Viśṇucittar, father of Aṇḍāl. (See under Viṣṇucittar).

PERUKA. A King of Vedic times. He was the āśraya-dātā (one who gives refuge) of Bharadvāja. (Anuvīka 63, Maṇḍala 6, Gṛveda).

PHA. This letter means ṇhaṇḥāvāta. Phū is phūtkāṛa, a sound resembling hissing and means 'useless' also. (Chapter 348, Agni Purāṇa).

PHALAKAKŚA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa was a member of the court of Kubera. (Śloka 16, Chapter 10, Sābhā Parva).

PHALAKIVANA. A sacred place. Once the devatās started practising severe austerities at this place and it lasted for a long time extending to thousands of years. From then onwards this became a holy place. (Chapter 83, Vana Parva, Śloka 86).

PHALAUDAKA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa lives in the court of Kubera. (Chapter 10, Sābhā Parva).

PHALGŪ. A holy river. If one visits this place one would get the benefit of doing an Aśvamedha. (Śloka 98, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

PHALGUNA. Another name of Arjuna. Arjuna was born in the Uttarāphalguni constellation in a mount of the Himālayas. So he was called Phalguna and also Phālguna. (Śloka 9, Chapter 44, Viṣṇu Parva).

PHĀLGUNA. A month (March). It is so called because the phalgunīnakṣatra yoga occurs in that month. He who gives away as gift his meal for a time of the day will become more loved by his wife. Not only that, the Purāṇas declare that such a man would attain Candraloka. (Chapter 109, Anuśāsana Parva).

PHALGUTANTRA. The father of Sagara. During the old age of Phalgutantra the Haihayas led by Taḷaṇṟinghas attacked Ayodhya and drove out the royal family from the palace. Phalgutantra fled from the palace with his wife and stayed in the āśrama of Auruva. The King died before long. The queen who was pregnant then delivered a son in due course and he became the celebrated Sagara. (Chapter 3, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

PHALŌDAKA. A Yakṣa of the court of Kubera. (Śloka 16, Chapter 10, Sābhā Parva).

PHENA. A King of the race of Uśīnara. His son was Sutapas and his grandson Ausīnara. (Harivāma’s, a, 31, 32).

PHENAPA. A gotra-maker of the Bhṛgu family. Phenapa is mentioned in the context of describing to Yuddhiṣṭhira the greatness of cows. Phenapa’s original name was Sumitra. He lived on the shores of the river Kukku in the mountain of Trīśikharā drinking the foam of cow’s milk alone and thus getting for him the name Phenapa. (Phena = foam; Pa = drink). (Anuśāsana Parva, M.B.).

PICHELLA. A serpent born in the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 6, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PICCHILA. A river of Purāṇic fame which runs through Uttarā Bharata. (Śloka 29, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

PINĀKA. The bow of Śiva. Pināka was formerly the three-forked spike of Śiva. Once it fell down from the hands of Śiva and on falling down took the shape of a bow. From then onwards it was used as a bow. See under Pāśupata. (Chapter 38, Sābhā Parva; Chapter 141, Anuśāsana Parva; Chapter 289, Śānti Parva).

PINĀKI I. One of the eleven Rudras. He was the grandson of Brahmā and the son of Sthānū. Pināki attended the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 66, Ādi Parva; Chapter 208, Śānti Parva; Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PINĀKI II. Śiva got this name because he wields the bow named Pināka.

PINḌĀRAKA I. A serpent born in the family of Kāśyapa. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 17, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PINḌĀRAKA II. A sacred place situated near Dvārakā in Saurāṣṭra. He who bathes in a holy river there would get immense gold. The place is worshipped by the sages. He who stays there for one day bathing in that river would get the benefit of conducting an Agniṣṭomaṇḍaya. (Chapter 82, Śloka 62, Vana Parva; Śloka 21, Chapter 88, Vana Parva; Śloka 57, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

PINḌASEKTĀ. A serpent of the race of Takṣaka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 8, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PINḌIKĀ. A stool to install idols. The length of this stool should be equal to that of the idol. The breadth should be its half and the thickness equal to that is the breadth. The exact place where the idol is fixed called Mekhalā and the hole in the mekalā should sitting. The pipe (exit hole for the water to flow out) called Pranāla should be as wide as a fourth part of the area of the pīṭha. For a pranāla of a Śiva temple the length of the same should be half of that of the Piṅḍikā.

The sanctum sanctorum of the temple should be divided into seven divisions and the Piṅḍikā should be fixed by a learned priest in the Brahmabhāga of the garbhagṛha (sanctum sanctorum). (Chapters 50 and 60, Agni Purāṇa).

PIṅGĀKṢA. See under Durmukha.

PIṅGĀKṢI. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 18, Chapter 46, Sāhya Parva).

PIṅGALĀ I. A devote who is an attendant of the Sun-god. Śūrya (Sun-god) rides in a one-wheeled chariot drawn by seven horses and he bears in his hand two lotuses. On his right side stands the attendant Daṇḍī with an ink-pot and a writing stick and on his left side stands the attendant Piṅgalā with a stick. Both these are demi-god attendants of Śūrya. (Chapter 51, Agni Purāṇa).

PIṅGALĀ II. A prominent serpent born to the sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kadrū. (Sloka 9, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

PIṅGALĀ III. A sage. He was a Yajva (priest) in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 6, Chapter 53, Ādi Parva).

PIṅGALĀ IV. A King of the Yaksas. He is a friend of Śiva. He acts as body-guard to Śiva who spends his time in cremation grounds. This Yaksā gives happiness to all in the world. (Sloka 51, Chapter 23, Vana Parva).

PIṅGALĀ V. A lion, who is a character in the book Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

PIṅGALĀ VI. A brahmin of very bad manners. This brahmin was killed by his own wife who was a prostitute. In their next birth Piṅgalā became a vulture and the prostitute, a parrot. Both had memories of their previous birth and the vuluture (Piṅgalā) with vengeance killed the parrot. After that Piṅgalā was eaten one day by a tiger. A brahmin residing on the shores of Gaṅgā read to their souls the fifth chapter of Gitā and they got salvation and entered Pitrloka (world of the Manes). (Chapter 40, Srṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PIṅGALĀ VII. A rākṣasa (demon). Once when this demon was going through a forest he met a forester. The latter got afraid and climbed up a Śāla tree. Then a branch broke and it fell on the head of Gaṅgā sitting beneath that tree. It was an act of worship and because of that both the forester and the demon were elevated. (Gaṅgā Purāṇa).

PIṅGALĀ I. A prostitute. (See under Rṣabha II).

PIṅGALĀ II. A prostitute of the country of Avanti. Piṅgalā was born as the daughter of King Candrāṅgada in her next birth because of the virtuous act she did in doing service to the sage Rṣabha. The King named the girl Kirtimālī and Bhadrāyu married her. (See under Bhradāyu).

PIṅGALĀ III. A woman of the city of Ayodhyā. Once this woman approached Śrī Rama with amorous intentions and Śrī Rama who was strictly observing a vow of one-wife refused to satisfy her desire and said:— "During the incarnation of Kaṃsa you will be born as a servant maid of Kaṃsa and then I will in my form as Kaṃsa accept you."

Sitā on hearing this cursed Piṅgalā. She said "Oh beautiful woman who has approached my husband with amorous intentions, you will have three bends in your body when you are born next as the servant maid of Kaṃsa." Piṅgalā weeping bitterly craved for pardon and then Siṭā said that Kṛṣṇa would make her perfect. (Vilāsa Kāṇḍa, Ananda Rāmāyaṇa).

PIṅGALĀRĀJĀ. A Yakṣa who lives in cremation grounds. He always acts as a pilot to Śiva in his travels. (Sloka 31, Chapter 231, Vana Parva).

PIṅGATĪRTHA. An ancient holy place. (Chapter 82, Vana Parva.)

PIṅJALĀ. A river of Purānic fame. The greatness of this river is described in Sloka 27, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

PIṅJARAKA. A son born to the sage Kaśyapa of his wife Kadrū. (Sloka 6, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

PIṅPALĀ I. The youngest of the three sons born to the dayita named Mitra of his wife Revati. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

PIṅPALĀ II. A brahmin born of the race of Kaśyapa. Piṅpalā did severe penance and became arrogant of the power acquired by it. Once he happened to see the eminent sage Sukarmā serving with devotion his own mother and father and that made his arrogance fade a bit. (Bhūmi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa, Chapter 61).

PIṅPALĀDA. An ancient sage belonging to the tradition of preceptors. (See under Guruparāmparā). It is said that this sage got that name because he was in the habit of eating Pippalī in large quantities daily. Praṇopaniṣad tells a story of how the sages Sukesa, Saibya, Satyakāma (Kaśyapa), Kaśyapa, Bhārgava and Kabanḍhi went to Piṅpalāda seeking Ātmajāna (spiritual knowledge) and how he gave them instructions on the same.

Padma Purāṇa gives the following information regarding Piṅpalāda:— "Once Kuniḍala, a brahmin residing in Kurukṣetra, got a son named Sukarmā. Sukarmā's parents were old and Sukarmā spent most of his time looking after his sickly aged parents. Kuniḍala taught his son all the Vedas and Śastras. At that time in the gotra of Kaśyapa was born a brahmin named Piṅpalāda. Controlling his senses and abandoning all passions he did severe penance in a forest called Daśāraṇya. The greatness of his penance made the animals of the forest leave their mutual enmity and live in perfect peace. Even the devas were astonished at the power of his penance.

Piṅpalāda did penance sitting as majestic and motionless as a mountain for a thousand years. Ants made a sand-heap over him like a mole-hill. The sage sat inside without any motion; poisonous black cobras circled round him and yet the sage made no movement. Three thousand years went by like that and then the devas showered flowers on him. Brahmā appeared and gave him the boon of Sarvakāmāsiddhi (getting all that one desired) and by the blessing of Brahmā he became a very learned person also.

Piṅpalāda became arrogant with the boon of Sarvakāmāsiddhi in his possession. One day while he was sitting on a river-bank a swan appeared before him and in clear tones said:— "Piṅpalāda, why are you so proud of your greatness? I do not believe you have that power of universal attraction. This art is arvācina (modern); you do not know Prācīna because you are illiterate. You take pride unnecessarily for having done penance for three thousand years. Do you know Sukārma, the wise son of Kuḍāla? He is the man who has acquired this power of attraction. There is no mahājñāni (one possessing spiritual knowledge) like him anywhere else in this world. Sukārma has given no gifts, he has not practised meditation, he has not performed yāgas or yajñas nor has he ever done a pilgrimage. He has not done any of these virtuous deeds and yet he is well-versed in all the śāstras and Vedas. Even though he is a child you do not possess enough knowledge to equal his. Why? Because he is always engaged in the care and welfare of his parents. You take pride in your achievements without reason."

Hearing that Pippalāda went and met Sukārma, Pippalāda knew that the bird was none other than Brahmā himself. They talked to each other for a long time and then Pippalāda admitted that Sukārma was a greater man than himself. (Chapters 60-62, Padma Purāṇa.)

PIPPALASTHĀNA. A division of land included in the Jambuḍīvīpa. (Śloka 37, Chapter 6, Bhīṣma Parva.)

PIPPALĀYA. One of the nine sons born to Rśabhadeva of his wife Jayanti. Pippalāya was a very pious king. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata)

PIṢĀCA I. (Devil, Satan)

1) Origin. A malevolent being which is the very manifestation of evil. Everybody, everywhere in the world, from the very birth of this universe believed in the presence of such a wicked soul. According to Hindu Purāṇas, Piṣāca is a creation of Brahmā. In the beginning Brahmā created the eighteen prajāpatis headed by Dakṣa, the Yāṣas, the Gandharvas and the Piṣācas. (Chapter 1, Ādi Parva.) This wicked being is called in English a ‘Devil’. This word is derived from the Greek word ‘diabolos’. People of the West and East equally believe that Piṣāca (Satan) is an enemy of men and gods alike.

2) Bible and the Piṣāca. It is not clearly stated in Bible how Satan was born but it is being referred to at several places as a wicked soul which leads men to evil.

3) The Bhāratya Saṁkalpa. Piṣāca, the creation of Brahmā, has taken important roles in the Purānic stories. Though Piṣāca is the instigator of all evils its manifestation appears in many contexts in the Purāṇas:—

(i) Piṣāca lives in the court of Kubera and worships him. (Śloka 16, Chapter 10, Saṁbhā Parva.)

(ii) Piṣāca lives in the court of Brahmā and worships him. (Śloka 49, Chapter 11, Saṁbhā Parva.)

(iii) Piṣāca lives in the Gokarṇatīrtha and worships Śiva. (Śloka 25, Chapter 83, Vana Parva.)

(iv) Piṣāca is the head of all evil spirits. Marīci and sages like him have created many evil spirits. (Śloka 46, Chapter 272, Vana Parva.)

(v) The bhūtas (evil spirits) made Rāvaṇa their king. (Śloka 88, Chapter 275, Vana Parva.)

(vi) The food of Piṣāca is flesh and its drink, blood. (Śloka 9, Chapter 50, Droṇa Parva.)

(vii) In the battle of Bhārata, the horses attached to the chariot of Alambuṣa were Piṣācas. (Śloka 38, Chapter 167, Droṇa Parva.)

(viii) The Piṣācas fought Karṇa acting as helpers to Ghaṭotkaca. (Śloka 109, Chapter 175, Droṇa Parva.)

(ix) Arjuna conquered the Piṣācas at the time of Khaṇḍavadāḥa. (Śloka 37, Chapter 37, Karṇa Parva.)

(x) The Piṣācas were present during the fight of Arjuna with Karṇa (Śloka 50, Chapter 87, Karṇa Parva.)

(xi) The Piṣācas worship Parvaṇi and Paramesvara doing penance on the top of the mountain Muṇjavān. (Śloka 5, Chapter 8, Āśvamedhika Parva.)

(xii) During the time of Mahābhārata many Piṣācas incarnated as kings. (Śloka 6, Chapter 31, Āśramvāsika Parva.)

PIṢĀCA II. A Yāṣa. (Śloka 16, Chapter 10, Śaṁti Parva.)

PIṢĀCA III. An inhabitant of the country of Piṣāca in ancient Bhārata. These Piṣācas fought against the Kauravas on the side of the Pāṇḍavas during the great battle. It was these piṣācas that stood on the southern side of the Krauṇḍavyūha of Yudhiṣṭhirā in the great battle. (Śloka 50, Chapter 50, Bhīṣma Parva.) A few of these Piṣācas were with Bhagadatta in the army of Duryodhana. (Chapter 87, Bhīṣma Parva.) Śrī Kṛṣṇa cursed the piṣācas. Chapter 11, Droṇa Parva.

PIṢĀNGA. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 17, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva.)

PIṢṬAĆANAVAM. See under Navamīrata.

PIṬAMĀḤASARAS. A sacred place in the base of the Himalayas. If one bathes in the holy pond there one would get the benefit of doing an Agniṣṭōma. (Śloka 148, Chapter 94, Vana Parva.)

PIṬHA. A demon. He was killed by Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Śloka 5, Chapter 11, Droṇa Parva.)

PIṬHARA. A dāitya who was a member of the court of Varuṇa. (Śloka 13, Chapter 9, Saṁbhā Parva.)

PIṬHARAKA (PIṬHARAKA). A prominent serpent born in the family of Kaśyapa. This was burnt to death in the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 15, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva.)

PIṬR (S). Piṭṛs are a set of demigods. From Manu-prajāpati, son of Brahmā, were born the Saptarṣis like Marīci and they in turn created the Piṭṛs. Besides Marīci and his set many others like Viśā Puruṣa and Brahmā have created Piṭṛs. Some Piṭṛs state that Piṭṛs are of daily creation. Brahmā in the beginning created three sets of Piṭṛs with form and four with brightness making thus seven sets. The three sets of bodied piṭṛs are Agniśvāttas, Barhiṣadās and Somapās and the four bright ones are Yama, Anala, Soma and Aryanman (10th Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

"Manor hairapyaggarbasya ye maricyadayaḥ suṇāḥ Teśmarṣānāṁ sarveṣaṁ putṛḥ pitṛgdānīṁ smṛtah"

(Śloka 194, Chapter 8, Manusmṛti.)

Piṭṛs (manes) are classified into two types: The Agniśvāttas and Barhiṣadās. Of these the Agniśvāttas do not perform Yāgas and the Barhiṣadās are those who perform yāgas. Besides these two major divisions they are classified into many other groups as follows:

1. Somasadasya (s). Viśā Puruṣa is the creator of these Piṭṛs. Somasadasyas are the Piṭṛs of Sādhya devās.

2. Agniśvātta (s). They are the piṭṛs of devas.

3. Barhiṣadās. These Piṭṛs are the creation of the sage Atri. They are the manes of dāityas, dānavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, urāgas (serpents), rākṣasas (demons), suvaṃśas and kinnaras.
4. Somaṇā (s). They are the sons of the sage Bhṛgu and are the manes of brahmins.
5. Hāuirbhuk (s). The sage Aṅgiras is the father of these Pitṛs who are the manes of Kṣatriyas.
6. Aśväṭa (s). These are the sons of the sage Pulastya and are the manes of Vaiśyas.
7. Sukālikā (s). Sons of the sage Vasiṣṭha, these Pitṛs are the manes of the Śūdras.

To the seven sages like Marici were born the pitṛs and to the pitṛs were born the devāsuras (devas and asuras) and to the devāsuras were born everything else in this universe, animate and inanimate. (Chapter 3, Manusmṛti.)

Performing a Śrāddha (offering obsequial oblations to the departed) is just like a yajña. The oblations should be offered in either silver or silver cut copper pots. Viśvedevas are the guardians of the pitṛs. Therefore the oblations should be offered after worshipping the Viśvedevas first and then the pitṛs and then Viṣṇu. (See under Śrāddha.)

PITRĪRTHA. The Kumbhālpakanaraka (the hell of Kumbhālpaka) in the land of the manes is called Pitrīrtṛtha. There is a story about this in Devī Bhāgavata:

Once the sage Duryāsas with his body smeared with ashes and wearing sacred berries went to Piṭloka muttering "Śivaṇākara sarvāṃ pan śrīmātā bhuvanēvasārī". The lord of the Piṭloka received him with respect and worshipped him. While they were talking, Duryāsas heard cries of agony from somewhere and the sage then asked Piṭrīrtṛtha thus: "Oh lord of the Pitṛs, I have heard you described as a very virtuous man. How can then such painful cries of distress be heard from here? "Oh, I am dying beaten", "Oh, I am being killed" "Oh, I am dying" and "Oh, I am being burnt" are some of the woeful shrieks I hear. What is the reason for this?"

Hearing this Dharmaṛāja said: "Great sage, this is in fact a land of virtue. Nothing but righteous things are done here. I can tell you from where you hear that wail. The Yamaprī named Saṁvyamanī is nearby. There Yama sits to punish the sinners. Yama is a dispenser of Justice and he has got several cruel and mighty servants to carry out his orders. There are eighty-six hells to punish the sinners and of these Kumbhālpanaraka is the most horrible. Great sinners like those who insult the gods, fornicators and those who insult their parents are put in this hell and punished. You are now hearing the cries of such sinners from that hell.

Duryāsas was curious to see the hell and the lord of the Manes gave permission and asked his servants to show Duryāsas the Kumbhālpakanaraka. The hell was found to change into a heaven. The residents were laughing, singing dancing and doing such acts of happiness. The servants of Yama were astonished and they went and reported to Yamaṛāja this sudden change. Yamaṛāja was also amazed to hear the news. He immediately rode on his vehicle, the buffalo, to the hell to learn the details personally. He could not find out the cause for the change. The place looked like the Svargarūpa of Indra. King Yama sent a messenger to Indra with the news and Indra at first thought that it must be due to some māyā and so came to the place swiftly on his Airāvata. The news spread and one by one Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Aṣṭādikāpākas (the eight guardians of the quarters) and all such people came to Kumbhālpānakaraka. Nobody could find an explanation for this change and so Mahāviṣṇu accompanied by a few devas went to Kailāsā and reported the matter to Śiva and Śiva said smilingly "Oh Viṣṇu, all this happened because of the greatness of the holy ashes. When the sage Duryāsas bent down to have a good look at the hell, particles of ashes from his body fell into the hell. From that moment onwards Kumbhālpānakaraka became a holy place for the Manes. This hell will henceforth be known as Pitrīrtṛtha and those pitṛs who bathe in the holy pond there will become virtuous people. Do install on the shore of this pond an idol of mine, a Śivalīṅga, and by my side the idol of Umā, which is my power in an embodied form." The devas returned and did as they were directed.

PITRVARTTI. See under Brahmaddatta I.

PIVARI. Wife of Sukabrahmarsi, son of Vyāsa. Suka got of Pivari four sons named Kṛṣṇa, Gauraprabha, Bhārī and Devasruta and a daughter named Kirtī. (See under Śuka.)

PLAKŚADVĪPA. One of the seven dvīpas (islands). (See under Saptadvīpa.)

PLAKŚAJĀTĀ. A tributary of river Gaṅgā. It is believed that this river is an incarnation of Sarasvatī and that the sins of those who drink the water of this river will vanish. (Chpter 169, Adi Parva.)

PLAKŚAPRASRAVANATĪRTHA. The place of origin of the river Sarasvatī. This is a very holy place. (Sloka 11, Chapter 54, Śalya Parva.)

PLAKŚĀVATARĀNA. A sacred spot at the place of origin of Yamunā. The ancient people of Bhārata used to worship this place as a gate of Heaven. (Sloka 4, Chapter 90, Vana Parva.)

PLAKŚĀVATĪ. A river. This is referred to as a holy river in the Purāṇas. (Sloka 25, Chapter 165, Anuśāsana Parva.)

PLAKŚĀYANA. A Vaiyākāraṇa (grammarians). His opinion on Visargaśandhi (a point in grammar) is described in Taittirīya Prāṇīkāhīya.

POTAKA. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva.)

PRĀBĀHU. A brave soldier who fought against the Pāndavas on the side of the Kauravas in the great battle of Kurukṣetra. He showered arrows on Abhimanyu. (Chapter 37, Drona Parva.)

PRĀBĀLAKA. A Yakṣa. This Yakṣa sat in the court of Kubera and worshipped him. (Sloka 17, Chapter 10, Śanti Parva.)

PRĀBĀ I. A devī. This devī sits in the court of Brahmā worshipping him. (Chapter 11, Śanti Parva.)

PRĀBĀ II. A celestial maiden of Alakāpūrī. Once when the sage Aṣṭavakra went to Alakāpūrī this maiden gave a dance performance in his honour. (Sloka 45, Chapter 19, Anuśāṣana Parva.)

PRĀBĀ III. Daughter of a dānava called Svarbhānu. She was married to king Ayus and Ayus begot of her sons like Nahuṣa and others (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, 3–6–26).

PRĀBĀ IV. One of the two wives of King Puspārṇa, (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).
PRABHĀDRA. Wife of the son of Karna, King of Anga. She is called Bhadrāvatī also. (Jaimini Bihārata, Aṣvamedha Parva, Chapter 63)

PRABHĀDRAKA. A special division of the army of Pāṇcālara. This division comprises of Kṣatriyas only. The rest of the Prabhadrakas were killed by Āśvataḥmā while they were sleeping. (Chapter 8, Saunātka Parva; Chapter 57. Udyoga Parva; Chapter 19, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Vaiśalya Parva).

PRABHĀKARA I. A serpent born of the race of Kaśyapa. (Sloka 15, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

PRABHĀKARA II. A great sage born of the race of Atri. This sage married the ten daughters of Gṛhsta born of Raudrāva (Bhadrasva) of the family of Puru. The names of the daughters are Rudra, Śūdra, Maladā, Bhadra, Malāhā, Khalādā, Nalādā, Śurasā, Gocapālā and Sūrīratnakūṭā.

Once when the Sun was in distress while he was being devoured by Rāhu, Sage Prabhākara said 'Svastī' to give salvation for the Sun and instantly the Sun came out from Rāhu's hold and shone brightly as before. It was as a result of this virtuous deed that the sage got the name Prabhākara. By his great knowledge and eminence he kept glowing the fame of Atrikula earned by generations.

Sage Prabhākara conducted a Yāga and on the occasion the devas presented him with great wealth and ten sons (Harivarṣā, I. 81-8.17).

PRABHĀKARA III. The sixth division of the land of Kuśādvipa. (Sloka 13, Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRABHANJANA I. The first son of Citravāhana, king of Maṇipura. Citravāhana who was without a son for a long time did penance for obtaining a son. Śiva was pleased with his penance and he blessed him and assured him of a son soon. (Sloka 29, Chapter 214, Ādi Parva).

PRABHANJANA II. A king. He performed Śiva-worship for ten thousand years and attained Dīkpālakatva. The name of his son was Pūtāṭmā. (Skanda Purāṇa, 41, 13).

PRABHANJANA III. A Kṣatriya king. Once this king killed a deer while it was breast-feeding its child and by a curse of the mother-deer Prabhājanā had to live as a tiger for a hundred years. When the period of the curse was coming to an end, the tiger heard the advice of a cow called Nandā and got himself transformed into his original form of the king. (Chapter 18, Śrīsti Kanṭha, Padma Purāṇa).

PRABHĀNU. A son born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa of his wife Satyabhāmā. (10th Sandhā, Bhāgavata).

PRABHĀSA I. A son born to Dharmadeva of his wife Prabhātī. This Prabhāsa is considered to be one of the aṣṭavasus. Prabhāsa's wife was the sister of Bhṛṣapati, a widely travelled virtuous woman of renowned chastity and great yogic attainments. (Sloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva; Chapter 15, Anātha, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRABHĀSA II. The sacred place called Prabhāsārāta. This place of Purānic importance is situated in Saurashtra on the west coast. This is called Somārāta also. Some facts about this tirtha from the Purāṇas are given below:

(i) During the pilgrimage of Arjuna he did penance for a thousand divine years standing on one foot at Prabhāsa. (Sloka 15, Chapter 12, Vaiśalya Parva).

(ii) Agnideva resides in this place. One who bathes in the holy pond there would get the benefit of doing Agni's asvāyasā. (Sloka 58, Chapter 82, Vaiśalya Parva).

(iii) Once Yudhīśṭhīra along with his brothers came and did penance here. (Sloka 13, Chapter 110, Vaiśalya Parva).

(iv) Prabhāsārāta is dear to Indra. (Sloka 7, Chapter 130, Vaiśalya Parva).

(v) Those who bathe in the holy pond in Prabhāsa are taken to heaven in Viṁānas and they then by songs of praise wake up the celestial maidens there. (Sloka 9, Chapter 25, Anuśāsana Parva).

(vi) It was at this Prabhāsārāta that the Yādavas fought against one another and destroyed themselves. (Sloka 10, Chapter 3, Mausala Parva).

(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma merged with the Supreme spirit at this place. (Chapter 4, Mausala Parva).

(viii) The son of sage Sāndipani was kidnapped by Pāṇcajana while the former was bathing at this tirtha. (10th Sandhā, Bhāgavata).

(ix) It was while standing on the shore of the Prabhāsa pond that Arjuna first heard about Subhādra, (10th Sandhā, Bhāgavata).

PRABHĀTA. See under Śrīstī.

PRABHĀTĪ. Wife of Dharmadeva. Dharmadeva begot of her two sons named Pratyūṣa and Prabhāsā. Both were Vasus. (Sloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

PRABHĀVATĪ I. A woman who was engaged in penance at the abode of Maṉyaśura. One of the batches of monkeys that went to different places in search of Stūtī met Prabhāvatī. (Sloka 4, Chapter 282, Vaiśalya Parva).

PRABHĀVATĪ II. The wife of Sūryadeva. (Sloka 8, Chapter 117, Udyoga Parva).

PRABHĀVATĪ III. A female follower of Subrahmanya. (Sloka 3, Chapter 46, Śāla Parva).

PRABHĀVATĪ IV. Wife of Citarathi, king of Anga. This Prabhāvatī was the eldest sister of Ruci, wife of Devārma. (Sloka 8, Chapter 42, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRABHĀVATĪ V. Daughter of the demon Vajranābha. She was married to Pradyumna, son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

There was once a very valiant demon called Vajranābha. He went into the valley of Meru and performed penance to propitiate Brahma. Brahma appeared before him and he got from him boons such as strength to conquer and subdue all kings, the secret of leaving the body and entering that of others etc. Empowered with these boons he made Vajranābhapura his capital. He got a daughter named Prabhāvatī. His brother Sunābha had two daughters named Candravatī and Guṇavatī.

While he was thus living there, he set out on a campaign of victory. He conquered the whole world and then turned his eyes towards Svarga. Going to Indraloka he told thus: "Hi, son of Kaśyapa, I am also born of Kaśyapa. Your mother Aditi and my mother Diti are both wives of Kaśyapaprajapāti. You ruled over Svarga till this time. Now, let me rule over it for some time." Indra was embarrassed by this logical challenge and could not give any reply to him. Kaśyapaprajapāti was then performing a long Yāga and Indra replied he would find a solution to his demand when their father returned after the Yāga. From that moment onwards Indra started thinking of plans to destroy Vajranābha. He went and sought help from Śrī Kṛṣṇa residing in Dvārākā. Kṛṣṇa promised to help him when the time came.
After returning to Devaloka, Indra started planning to kill Vajranābha. Vajranābhapūrṇa was surrounded by sky-scraping fortresses and admission inside was restricted. He, therefore, called the daily loitering swans of Devaloka to his side and told them thus: "Look here, swan—ladies. You should go to Vajranābhapūrṇa and see Prabhāvatī and then describe to her the beauty and goodness of Pradyumna. Your description should be such that Prabhāvatī should fall in love with Pradyumna. After that you should go to Pradyumna and tell him about Prabhāvatī in a similar way. On completing your mission you should come and report to me."

Obeying the orders of Indra the swans flew to Vajranābhapūrṇa. They saw Prabhāvatī in a secluded spot and told her just what they were asked to tell her. Then they flew to the side of Pradyumna and told him about Prabhāvatī. After successfully completing their mission they flew to Devaloka. The marriage day of Prabhāvatī drew near. The swans went to Prabhāvatī again and made her request her father to include the performances of a dramatic troupe also in the programme of marriage festivities. Vajranābha agreed and a troupe was invited. The dramatic troupe comprised among others many Yādava soldiers, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Pradyumna and his brothers, all in disguise. Their drama was Kāmāyaṇa. The performance was superb and even Vajranābha stood amazed at their skill. The troupe was encamped in another palace and treated as royal guests. The companion maid of Prabhāvatī, Śūcimukhi, united her with Pradyumna during the dark hours of the night and they spent the nights in amorous sports. The daughters of Vajranābha’s brother, Candravatī and Guṇavatī came to know of these secret meetings and they requested Prabhāvatī to find out suitable persons among the Yādavas for them also to enjoy with. Prabhāvatī introduced them to Gada and Śamba both sons of Kṛṣṇa. The amorous sports of all of them continued freely during the nights.

When things progressed so far, Indra and Kṛṣṇa persuaded Pradyumna to kill Vajranābha. Pradyumna started a war with Vajranābha and in the great battle that ensued Pradyumna killed Vajranābha. Pradyumna and his brothers then took the demon girls to Dvārakā. Pradyumna, Gada and Śamba married Prabhāvatī, Candravatī and Guṇavatī respectively. By this time Kaśyapaprajāpati returned to Devaloka after his long yāga. (Viśṇu Purāṇa, Chapters 91 to 95).

PRABHU. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 69, Chapter 45, Śalya Parva).

PRABUDDA. A king born of the line of Priyavrata, son of Manu. (4th Kanda, Bhāgavata).

PRACANDA. A demon. Pracanda fought against Kārttikeya in the fight between Pāramaśīva and the Tripuras. (Chapter 1, Gaṇeśa Purāṇa).

PRACETAS. The emperor Prthu, had two virtuous sons named Antardhāna and Vādī. Antardhāna got a son named Hāvīrdhāna of his wife Śikhāndī. Śiśaṇa of the race of Agni became the wife of Hāvīrdhāna. She got of Hāvīrdhāna six sons named Pracīnabarhīs, Sukra, Gayabha, Kṛṣṇa, Vāraja and Ajina. (Chapter 14, Aṁśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa). Pracīnabarhīs had ten sons named Pracetas. They were Prajāpatis. Dakṣa was born of the ten Prajāpatis to Vārkiśa alias Māriśa. Therefore he got the name Pracetas. (Śloka 3, Chapter 75, Ādi Parva).

PRACĪNĀVĪTA. Wearing of an upper apparel or sacred thread by brahmins on the left shoulder and through the right arm-pit is called Upaśīva and vice versa is called Pracīnāvīta. If it is worn as a necklace it is called Nīvīta. (Chapter 2, Śloka 63, Manusmṛti).

PRACĪNABARHĪS. A prajāpati. (For genealogy see under Prthu).

Prthu got two sons named Antardhāna and Vādī who were very virtuous. A son named Hāvīrdhāna was born to Antardhāna of his wife Śiśaṇa. Hāvīrdhāna born of the family of Agni became the wife of Hāvīrdhāna and they got six sons named Pracīnabarhīs, Sukra, Gayabha, Kṛṣṇa, Vāraja and Ajina. Of these Pracīnabarhīs became a great Prajāpati. He carpeted the world with darbha grass with its head turned towards the east and thus got the name (Pracī-east : barhīs-bed of Kuśa grass) Pracīnabarhīs. He performed great penance and married Savarṇā, daughter of the oceans. They got ten sons who were called Pracetases and who were all masters of dhanurveda (archery). They all performed penance for ten thousand years lying submerged in water. Brahmā persuaded Pracīnabarhīs to request his sons to refrain from remaining unmarried. Pracīnabarhīs informed his sons about Brahmā’s wish. They sat in meditation in the ocean for ten thousand years as per directions from their father and sang songs in praise of Viṣṇu. Mahāviṣṇu was pleased and he gave darśana (vision of god) to them on the surface of the ocean itself with the brilliance of blue lotus. Pracetases went into ecstasy when they saw Bhagavān coming to them riding on the back of Garuda and they bowed down in great devotion before him. Mahāviṣṇu asked them what they wanted and they reported they wanted a boon for the progress and prosperity of the prajās. Granting them the boon Mahāviṣṇu disappeared and the Pracetases went back to their father. (Chapter 14, Aṁśa 1, Viśṇu Purāṇa).

PRACĪNĀVAN. A king who was the son of Janamejaya and grandson of Pūru. His mother’s name was Anantā. This king conquered in one day all the countries in the east (pracī) and got his name Pracīnāvan. He got of his wife Aśmaki a son named Sāhityā. (Śloka 12, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva). Pracīnāvan got a son named Manasyu. (Chapter 278, Agni Purāṇa).

PRĀCYA. A place of habitation of Purānic fame. (Śloka 58, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRADĀTA. Viśvadeva. (Śloka 32, Chapter 91, Anuśasana Parva).

PRADIPAKA. A character in Pañcatantra. (See under Pañcatantra).

PRADHĀNA. An ancient Rajaśri. A learned woman named Sulabha was born in his family and king Janaka conducted scholarly discussions with her. (Śloka 104, Chapter 320, Sānti Parva).

PRADOṢA. The grandson of Dhrūva. Puṣpāṇa, son of Dhrūva, begot of his wife Prabhā three sons named Pradoṣa, Nīthana and Vyuoṣa. (Bhāgavata, 4th Kanda).

PRADVEŚI. Wife of Dirghatamas. (See under Dirghatamas).

PRADYOTĀ I. A Yakṣa. He was a member of the court of Kubera. (Śloka 15, Chapter 10, Sānti Parva).

PRADYOTA II. The first king of the dynasty of Pradyota. He was the son of a king called Sunaka. Pradyota is referred to as Sūnakaputra in Vāyu Purāṇa.
Kṣemaka alias Śunaka father of Pradyota was killed by Mlecchas (a barbarous tribe). To avenge the death of his father Pradyota under the advice of Nārada decided to conduct a Mleccha Yajña and for that purpose dug a Yajñākūṇḍa seventeen miles long and seventeen miles wide. The Yajña started and in that Yajña different kinds of Mlecchas were burnt to death. From then onwards Pradyumna got the name ‘Mlecchahantā’ (killer of Mlecchas). (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa).

PRADYUMNA.

1) General information. A son born to Śrī Kṛṣṇa of his wife Rukmīṇī, Pradyumna was the rebirth of Kāmadeva. (For genealogy see under Kṛṣṇa)

2) Birth. It was at the time when Kāmadeva and Ratidevi were living together that Pārvatī, daughter of Himavān, started her penance to get Śiva as her husband. It was a need of the devas to get a son of Śiva to kill the fierce demon Tārākāśura. The devas employed Kāmadeva to create feelings of love in the ascetic Śiva and make him marry Pārvatī. Taking instructions from Indra, Kāmadeva took aim at Śiva with his bow and arrow. Śiva was then in deep meditation and Kāmadeva broke his concentration and Śiva got angry. He opened his third eye and burnt Kāmadeva to death.

Griefstricken by the death of her husband Ratidevi performed penance near the Himālayas to propitiate Mahādevi. Mahādevi appeared before her and consoled her thus: “Little girl, Kāmadeva would be reborn as the son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa of Rukmīṇī. He would then be named Pradyumna. The devas have cursed Śambara the leader of the asuras, during the battle between the demons and the demi-gods that he (Śambara) would be killed by Pradyumna. So Śambara is now searching for the infant which is a rebirth of Kāmadeva. So you abandon your present body and be born again as Māyāvatī to be the wife of Śambara. Pradyumna, the reborn Kāmadeva, would kill Śambara and accept you as his wife.” Devī disappeared after saying this.

Obeying the instructions of Mahādevi, Rati abandoned her life and was born in the world of asuras. She grew up under the name Māyāvatī and became the wife of Śambara.

While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was living as the chief of Dvārakā his first wife Rukmīṇī was yearning for a child. Kṛṣṇa was deeply moved by the grief of Rukmīṇī and he flew on the back of Garuḍa to Kailāsa to obtain a boon for the birth of a child for her. On the way he alighted in the āśrama of Naraṇārāyaṇa and after obtaining the blessings of the sages there, went to Kailāsa and bowed before Śiva and explained to him the purpose of his visit. Śiva blessed him and said that Kāmadeva who was burnt to death by the fire of his third eye would take birth again as the son of Rukmīṇī. Kṛṣṇa returned to Dvārakā well-pleased, Rukmīṇī became pregnant and gave birth to Pradyumna, a rebirth of Kāmadeva. The demon Śambara knew of this birth and coming to Dvārakā in an invisible form carried away the infant when it was seven days old.

The demon threw the child into the ocean and a great fish swallowed it. The fishermen of the country of Śambara caught this fish and following the custom prevalent there presented the king with the fish. Śambara called his wife Māyāvatī and asked her to take the fish and get it cooked. When Māyāvatī cut open the fish for cooking she found to her surprise a beautiful child inside it. Even from the first sight of the child Māyāvatī had a great liking for it and so she took the child and brought it up as her own child.

When Pradyumna grew into a youth all the charm and beauty of Kāmadeva were found in him. Māyāvatī was excited to find a resemblance in him of her lost husband Kāmadeva. One day the great sage Nārada came that way and calling Māyāvatī to his side secretly revealed to her that Pradyumna was the incarnation of Kāmadeva and was thus her lost husband. From that day onwards Māyāvatī’s affection for him changed into one of love. She taught him all the magic and witchcraft of Śambara. When Pradyumna found that Māyāvatī’s affection for him was gradually changing into one of passionate love he questioned her about it. Māyāvatī then told him everything that happened and Pradyumna decided to kill Śambara and take Māyāvatī away.

3) War with Śambara. Pradyumna waited for an opportunity to kill Śambara. One day Pradyumna went under the flagstaff of Śambara which flew the royal flag of the king with an emblem of the figure of a lion embossed on it. He dropped it down by one stroke of his arrow. Hearing of this Śambara ordered his sons to kill Pradyumna. The eleven sons of Śambara, viz., Atisena, Citrasena, Viśvaksena, Śrutasena, Suṣeṇa, Somasena, Ākkāla, Vikāla, Kumbhakesu, Sudaraṇa and Kesī, attacked Pradyumna. The devas came in their vimānas and joined sides with Pradyumna. The army of the demons teased him with various kinds of weapons like javelins, arrows, spears and battle axes. But Pradyumna cut them all by his arrows and cut to pieces all the sons of Śambara. Then Śambara sent an army against him. They were also made to flee by the arrows of Pradyumna. Then Śambara himself came on the scene. The fight became horrible. The continuous flow of arrows made it impossible for even Sun’s rays to reach the earth. Then Śambara started his magical war. But Pradyumna faced that also. Śambara sent phantom lions; but Pradyumna made them immobile. Śambara then in turn created storms, rains, wild animals, serpents and vultures. All of them were killed by Pradyumna. Then with a well-aimed arrow Pradyumna killed Śambara. Then he rushed to Dvārakā carrying Māyāvatī with him. The people of Dvārakā were astounded to see them. Pradyumna went to Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Rukmīṇī and told them the whole story. They were overjoyed to find them and blessed them. Aniruddha who married Uṣā the daughter of Bāṇa was the son of Pradyumna. (Chapters 103 to 108, 10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) Prabhāvatīparinaya. Marriage with Prabhāvatī. (See under Prabhāvatī).

5) Other details.

(i) Pradyumna was born of a part of Sanatkumāra. (Sloka 152, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

(ii) Pradyumna was one among those who came to Arjuna from Dvārakā with dowry for his marriage with Subhadra. (Sloka 31, Chapter 220, Ādi Parva).

(iii) Pradyumna was present for the Rājasūya Yajña of Yudhiṣṭhira. (Sloka 16, Chapter 34, Sahā Parva).

(iv) Pradyumna consoled and encouraged the Yādava army which stood dumb-founded before the valorous exploits of King Sālva. (Chapter 17, Vana Parva).

(v) Pradyumna fainted during a fierce fight between himself and King Sālva. (Chapter 17, Śloka 22, Vana Parva).

(vi) Pradyumna slew King Sālva in the end. (Chapter 19, Vana Parva).

(vii) Pradyumna means the merging of Bhūtajāla during Pralaya. (Śloka 37, Chapter 340, Śānti Parva).

(viii) Pradyumna fell dead by the beatings of the Bhōjas during the Mausala fight. (Śloka 33, Chapter 3, Mausala Parva).

(ix) After his death Pradyumna took the form of Sanatkumāra. (Śloka 13, Chapter 5, Svargārohaṇa Parva).

PRĀGAHI. A preceptor. He has expressed his views on Yajña in the book Sāṅkhya Yāna. Brāhmaṇa. Prāgahī describes what should be done in case any of the Karmans is left out by mistake during a Yajña. (Sāṅkhya Yāna Brāhmaṇa).

PRAGHAŚA I. A rākṣas (demoness). She was one among the several leading demonesses who sat around Sītā in Lāṅkā to coax her into accepting Rāvana as her husband. An ill-tempered woman, this demoness tried several methods to win Sītā to the side of Rāvana. (Sarga 23, Sundara Parva; Chapter 48, Udyoga Parva and Chapter 75, Aśvamedha Parva).

PRAGHAŚA II. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 16, Chapter 46, Śalya Parva).

PRAGHAŚA(S). A tribe of rākṣasas (demons). (Chapter 283, Vana Parva).

PRAGHOSA. A son of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAGJYOTISA. The palace of Narakāsura, Narakāsura was known as Bhaumāsura also. After the death of this asura Bhagadatta became King there. After Bhagadatta Vairadatta became ruler there. Pragjyotisa was an invincible fortress of the asuras. (Chapter 23, Verse 28, Śabhā Parva; Chapter 48, Udyoga Parva and Chapter 75, Aśvamedha Parva).

PRAHĀṢA I. A serpent born of the family of Dhṛta-rāstra. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sapār-satara of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PRAHĀṢA II. A soldier of Subrahmanyā. (Śloka 68, Chapter 43, Śalya Parva).

PRAHASTA. A minister of Rāvana.

The demon Sukesa got of his wife Devavati three sons named Mālyavān, Sumāli and Māli. Of these Sumāli got of his wife Kṛtumati ten sons named Prahasta, Akampana, Vikata, Kālakāmukha, Dhumrākṣa, Daṇḍa, Supārśva, Saṁhīrāda, Pravāta and Bhāsakarpa and four daughters named Veśaka, Puspotakāja, Kaikasi and Kumbhānasi. Most of the sons were of the ministers of Rāvana.

2) Other details. (i) Prahasta was the chief minister of Rāvana. (Uttara Rāmāyana).

(ii) In the Rāma-Rāvana battle Prahasta fought against Vibhīṣana and was killed by the latter. (Śloka 4, Chapter 286, Vana Parva).

PRAHETI I. A demon. Once Brahmā, the creator, became hungry and in his anger he produced some sounds which became Rākṣasas and Viṣṇu. When one said “Rākṣamāhe” the rākṣasas (demons) came into being and when the other said ‘Viṣṇu’ the Viṣṇu came into being. It was Praheti who became the father of the rākṣasas and Heti, the father of the Viṣṇu. Both of them became mighty and powerful like Madhu and Kaṭākha. Of these Praheti knew that only by virtuous life could one attain happiness in the next world and so remaining unmarried went to the valley of the Himalayas and doing penance there attained mokṣa. Heti when he came of age married Bhāyā, sister of Kāla, and got a son named Vidyutkeśa. Vidyutkeśa married Sālakaṭāṇi, daughter of Śandhīya. The rākṣasas race born of them lived in Pāṭala and Lāṅkā. In the Rāma-Rāvana battle all were killed.

PRAHETI II. A demon. This demon travels along with a Sūrya named Aryaman during the month of Vaiśākha (May). (12th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAHLĀDA I. 1) General information. Son of a rākṣas king who saw Mahāviṣṇu by means of his devotion in the form of Narasarītha (man-lion). His father was Hiranya-kaśipu and mother Kayādhu.

3) Birth. Kaṣyapa-prajāpati got of his wife Diti two sons named Hiranyakāṣa and Hiranya-kaśipu and a daughter named Śīnihīka. Of these two, Hiranyakāṣa got boons from Brahmā and roamed about as a very valiant hero destroying everything on earth and finally pulling down the earth to the depths of the ocean. Mahāviṣṇu then incarnated as Varāha and after killing Hiranyakāṣa lifted the earth from the ocean and put it in its original position.

Hiranya-kaśipu became very angry at Mahāviṣṇu for killing his brother and with a view to wreaking vengeance on him performed penance to propitiate Brahmā. When the emperor of the demons, Hiranya-kaśipu, thus went to the forests for performing penance the Devas attacked the land of the demons. A great fight ensued in which the devas were defeated. While fleeing away thus Indra took away Kayādhu wife of Hiranya-kaśipu by force. Nārada who heard the moanings of the poor woman under the clutches of Indra got her released from Indra’s hold. For some time she stayed in the āśrama of Nārada worshipping him. Kayādhu was pregnant then. Nārada taught the child in Kayādhu’s womb lessons in Vedas, moral philosophy, duty and spiritual knowledge. When Hiranyakāśipu returned after his penance Kayādhu joined him and very soon gave birth to a son. That boy was Prahlāda.

Hiranyakāśipu begot of Kayādhu five sons, Prahlāda, Sāmībhāta, Anuḥlāda, Śibī and Bāṣkala. Prahlāda got three sons named Vīročana, Kumbha and Nikumbha. The celebrated emperor Mahābali was the son of Vīročana. Bāṇa was the son of Mahābali. Uṣa, daughter of Bāṇa, was married to Aniruddha, son of Pradyumna and grandson of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 65, Adi Parva; Chapter 19, Agni Purāṇa; Chapter 15, Amāśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa and 7th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

4) Boyhood and education. Hiranyakāśipu decided to make Prahlāda an instrument to wreak vengeance on Mahāviṣṇu. Entrusting the education of his son to able preceptors he instructed that the boy should never mutter ‘Nārāyaṇa namah’ but should on the other hand mutter ‘Hiranyāya namah’ only. Not only that, he wiped out the name of Nārāyaṇa from the land altogether. Prahlāda stayed in the house of the preceptor and studied his lessons. One day Prahlāda went to see his father along with his preceptor. Hiranyakāsippu was drunk then. Prahlāda went andprostrated before his father and Hiranyakāsippu lifting the boy up from the ground asked him with affection to repeat to him all the good things, he had learned so far and Prahlāda quickly repeated thus:—“I bow down to Mahāviṣṇu, the root cause of all things seen and unseen, the protector of this visible universe, who is without beginning, centre and end and who is without origin, growth and decay.”

The words of Prahlāda struck his father like a thunderbolt. With his lips trembling with anger Hiranyakāsippu stared with his blood-red eyes at the preceptor. The frightened Guru again and again submitted that he had never taught him any of the kind the boy had repeated before his father. Then who must have taught him those things? the emperor enquired. Then Prahlāda said that all those things were put into his mind by Mahāviṣṇu himself. A hot discussion then took place between Prahlāda and his father and in the end Hiranyakāsippu ordered the preceptor to take away Prahlāda and make another earnest attempt to correct him and bring him round to the emperor’s liking. Prahlāda stayed for another period with the Guru serving him with devotion and studying well. After a long time Prahlāda was again taken before his father and the latter as before asked him to repeat what he had studied so far. To the shocking disappointment of Hiranyakāsippu Prahlāda again repeated verses in praise of Mahāviṣṇu. The emperor’s rage knew no bounds and he ordered his men to kill his son. (Chapter 17, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

5) Torturing Prahlāda. On hearing the order of Hiranyakāsippu many armed soldiers surrounded Prahlāda. Prahlāda addressed them thus:—“Oh daiyās, Mahāviṣṇu resides in your weapons, in you all and in me also. Since that is the real truth your weapons will not injure me.” The daiyās struck him hard with their weapons but Prahlāda did not feel pain at all. Hiranyakāsippu then sent thousands of poisonous serpents led by great ones like Taksaka. When they started thrusting their venomous fangs into his body, Prahlāda stood cheerfully meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and he did not even feel the bitings. On the other hand the fangs of the serpents dropped out from their mouths and the gems on the heads of the big ones burst out and all the snakes felt sorry for their action. Hiranyakāsippu then sent the aṣṭadigajas (the eight elephants who bear the burden of this earth) to kill Prahlāda. The huge animals bigger than the biggest of mountains threw the boy to the ground and struck him with their long and pointed tusks. Prahlāda lay meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and the tusks that hit the body of Prahlāda were broken to bits. Prahlāda was then thrown into a pit of fire. But the wind-blown ferocious fire was not able to burn him and as he lay in the fire-pit meditating on Mahāviṣṇu he felt he was lying on a bed of lotuses. When things progressed so far the astonished priests of the palace advised the emperor to put a stop to torturing Prahlāda. Their consoling words alleviated his rage and he sent Prahlāda again to his Guru for another term of study. He stayed with his Guru and continued his studies. Whenever he got leisure he taught the other inmates of the āśrama lessons in Viṣṇumārga. Hiranyakāsippu was informed of this and obeying orders from him the asuras gave poison to Prahlāda. That too was of no avail. The royal priests got angry and they created a devil as ferocious as the flames of fire. The devil with mighty thumps on earth dashed towards Prahlāda and hit him on his breast with its spike. The spike broke into pieces and the devil turning back cursed the priests. Then the dāityarāja took him to the top of a mountain twenty-four miles high and pushed him down from there. The boy fell down meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and the goddess of earth received him with extended hands and prevented a painful impact with the ground. The father became furious and sent Śambara-sura to kill his son. Śambara tried many magical attacks. Prahlāda without any ill-feeling towards Śambara sat meditating on Mahāviṣṇu and then Viṣṇu sent his Sudarśana wheel against the demon and he was forced to retreat. Then by orders from Hiranyakāsippu the winds god entered the body of Prahlāda. Prahlāda knew it and he sat meditating on Viṣṇu and the latter entering the body of Prahlāda drank the wind inside him. When Hiranyakāsippu was defeated in all his attempts to kill Prahlāda he sent his son again to his Guru. Then the preceptor taught him everything that was needed for a king and also the science of justice written by Śukrācārya. When Prahlāda completed his education and the Guru felt the boy had become humble he took him back to Hiranyakāsippu.

Once again Hiranyakāsippu entered into a discussion on god with his son and dissatisfied with his continued devotion to Viṣṇu decided again to kill his son. He was thrown into the ocean bound hand and foot. With every movement of Prahlāda the ocean became turbulent and water rose on all sides. There was a deluge on earth. Hiranyakāsippu called the daiyās to his side and said:—“Oh daiyās, bring all the mountains on earth and create a barrier round the ocean so that my wicked son cannot get outside the ocean. Fire does not kill this boy; he is not wounded by any of the weapons; wind, poison, devils, magic, falls from heights and even the diggajas could not kill him. So let him remain in water for thousands of years together and then he will die.”

The daiyās and dānavas brought mountains and dropped them over Prahlāda lying inside the ocean. The mountains lay spread over thousands of miles. Lying thus in the ocean the pious boy prayed to Mahāviṣṇu and the latter appeared before him and granted him boons. Escaping from the ocean Prahlāda went to his father and prostrated before him. Hiranyakāsippu was astounded to see him alive and taking him in his arms embraced him and with tears rolling down his cheeks for having tortured him so far asked him “My son, you are still alive, are you not?” After that he started treating him as his son. (Chapter 20, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

6) The incarnation of Narasimha. But as days went by Hiranyakāsippu got wild again. He could not bear his son’s increasing devotion to Viṣṇu. He hated to hear Prahlāda’s chants of Viṣṇu’s name and so one dar while Prahlāda was repeating hischantings of Viṣṇu’s name Hiraṇyakaśipu jumped up from his seat with sword in his hand and asked Prahlāda where his Viṣṇu was. Prahlāda very calmly replied that Viṣṇu was present everywhere even in stones, trees or the pillars of the palace. Hiraṇyakaśipu in uncontrollable rage struck the nearest pillar with his sword. Then to the shock- ing surprise of Hiraṇyakaśipu Mahāviṣṇu in the form of a fierce man-lion (Narasimha) jumped out from the pillar. The figure was terrifying to look at. It had fiery eyes, a dagger-like tongue with blood oozing from it, shaggy neck with trembling eyebrows, two teeth one on each side curved like the crescent moon, a black face inside a cave-like heap of manes, hairs strong and point ed like diamond needles, nails white and cup-like and a body as bright and brilliant as a thousand cores of suns. Only Prahlāda could stand before the figure and look at it.

The man-lion jumped on the body of Hiraṇyakaśipu and tearing open the belly of Hiraṇyakaśipu took the bloody intestines out and wearing it round its neck performed a naked dance. Everything happened in no time and the Narasimha changing into the form of Mahāviṣṇu blessed Prahlāda and then disappeared.

(7th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

7) Prahlāda and Naraṇāraṇa. When Hiraṇyakaśipu was killed Prahlāda was crowned as emperor of the demons in Pāṭalā. At that time, once Cyavana the best of the Bhṛgus, went to Nāgakuleśvaratīrtha to bathe in the Narmadā. He saw Mahādeva there. When he entered the waters of the river a serpent Kekaralohita by name bit him and took him to Pāṭalā. Cyavana meditated on Viṣṇu when he was bitten by the serpent and so he was not affected by the poison of the serpent. He therefore, roamed about in Pāṭalā accepting the hospitality of the serpent maidens. Travelling thus he reached the land of the dānavas. He was worshipped by the dāityas there and Prahlāda finding an ascetic of great saintliness honoured and worshipped by his people received him with respect and worshipped him and enquired about him. Cyavana said: “I came today to see Nāgakuleśvara and bathe in the Narmadā river. But as soon as I entered the river I was caught by a serpent and was brought to Pāṭalā. I was thus able to see you.” Hearing the words of Cyavana the lord of the dāityas said: “Oh, Bhagavan, which are all the sacred tīrthas of the earth, which are in the heavens and which all in Pāṭalā? Please do enlighten us.” Cyavana replied: “Mighty king, Naimiśa is the best of all tīrthas on earth, Puṣkara in the heavens and Cakrātīrtha in Pāṭalā.”

The dāitya emperor turned to the dānavas and said “Make all preparations immediately. We must go to earth to bathe in the holy tīrtha, Naimiśa. We can then see Puṇḍarīkakṣa (lotus-eyed) Viṣṇu sitting there as Pūtāmbara (robbed in yellow).” Hearing this dānavas with heavy equipments started from Pāṭalā with their king to the earth.

All the mighty dānavas reached the forest of Naimiśa and after bathing in the holy pond there went for hunting. During their wanderings they found the river Sarvasvatī, flowing with crystal-like water. On the shore of the same they saw a pine tree covered with arrows. The arrows were sticking to it one above another. The arrows looked like serpents and the gruesome sight roused Prahlāda’s anger. Near that tree sat two ascetics wearing the hide of Krṣṇa deer and matted hair on their heads. By their side were two divine bows, Sārīraga and Ajagava with two never-empty quivers. Prahlāda mistook them for two fake sannyāsins and therefore questioned them thus: “Why are you thus falsely trading on virtuousness? What connection is there between matted hair and penance and weapons of such supreme quality?”

Then one of the rṣis, Naraṇśi, said “King of dāityas, why do you think like that? If one is powerful whatever one does will be right.” Prahlāda jeered and said “When I, who have fixed limits for virtue and righte ousness, am here what power can you wield?” Naraṇśi replied “Oh king, our ability is really supreme. There is nobody in the three worlds to conquer us in a fight.” Prahlāda got furious on hearing the boasting of the rṣi and took a vow thus immediately: “I will fight and win against Naraṇāraṇa.” Then the great Prahlāda keeping aside his army in the forest took his bow and made a thundering noise with it.

At once Nara took his Ajagava bow and showered arrows on Prahlāda with it. But Prahlāda broke them all with his gold-plated matchless arrows. Nara got angry when he found all his arrows broken to pieces so easily by Prahlāda and he sent different kinds of arrows in quick succession. But the dāitya king replied with astonishing rapidity, for one arrow of Nara the dāitya sent two and the fight became grim. Nara covered the whole world above with arrows and the dāitya emperor smashed them all to pieces by his gold-plated ones.

The fight then turned to one with divine weapons. The asura chief took the divine Brahmatāra and then Nara took the fierce Naraṇāraṇāstra. They met in the air and fell down powerless. When his Brahmatāra got fused Prahlāda got wild with anger and taking a mace jumped out of his chariot and rushed at Nara. When Naraṇāraṇa saw the dāitya chief rushing towards Nara with his mace he asked Nara to step aside and faced the demon himself. Prahlāda then attacked Naraṇāraṇa and hit him with the mace. But the mace broke into a hundred pieces and Prahlāda was forced to use other weapons. The fight became ghastly and even devas assembled above to witness the fight. When Prahlāda found it was getting more and more difficult for him to defeat the Naraṇāraṇaṇa he prayed to Mahāviṣṇu for help, Viṣṇu appeared before him and when Prahlāda asked him the reason why he could not defeat Naraṇāraṇaṇa, Viṣṇu replied that they were the sons of Dharmadeva who were invincible by weapons. They could be won over only by devotion.

Hearing that Prahlāda returned to Pāṭalā and entrusting the administration of his kingdom to his cousin Andhaka, son of Hiraṇyakaśa, Prahlāda returned to Badarikāśrama and erecting an āśrama there started a penance to propitiate Naraṇāraṇaṇas. When Naraṇāraṇaṇa appeared before him Prahlāda requested to be pardoned for fighting against them. They pardoned him and blessed him and Prahlāda returned to Pāṭalā. Even after his return Prahlāda did not take back the administration from Andhaka. He constructed an āśrama away from the palace and lived there performing penance. He spent many years there as an advisor to the asura Kings. (Chapters 7 and 8, Vāmana Purāṇa).

8) Blessings of Śukra. Andhaka, son of Hiraṇyakaśa, ruled over the empire only for a short time. At that time there was a fight between the asuras and the devas in which the asuras were defeated. After a truce with the devas Bali, son of Viṣṇu, and grandson of Prahlāda was crowned the emperor of the asuras. Prahlāda then went to the mountain Gandhamādana and started doing penance to increase his personal power. Bali ruled as an antagonist of the devas and so very soon a grisly battle ensued between the devas and the asuras and Mahāviṣṇu defeated them. They fled from their land and took refuge under their preceptor Śukrācārya. Śukra then told them thus: “You remain here without fear, I shall protect you by my power of mantra and medicines. I shall devote my cogent brilliance to your advantage. It is enough if you remain here with full confidence in me.”

The devas understood all these plans of the dāityas through spies and they met in conference to consider their future plans. They knew that Śukrācārya was very powerful and if the dāityas attacked them with the help of Śukrācārya the defeat of the devas was sure. They feared that they might even be compelled to flee from Svargaloka. How could the dāityas under the shield of the mighty Śukra be destroyed? That was the worrying thought of the dāityas.

They were thus worrying about this when Śukrācārya went to do penance for attaining more power. The dāityas awaited the return of their acārya. In the meantime they sent Prahlāda who was, though a dāitya, a friend of the devas to talk peace terms with the devas. The mission was successful and the devas agreed to a no-war treaty. Prahlāda returned triumphant.

Śukra did severe penance to propitiate Śiva and Śiva appeared before Śukrācārya and when he knew that the purpose of Śukra was to defeat the devas he was a bit embarrassed. So he told him thus: “Oh sage Śukra, you take a vow and do penance with your head downwards over smoky incense for a thousand years. You will then attain power and happiness as you desire.” In fact Śiva thought Śukra might not be able to complete the penance and so not succeed in his plan of destroying the devas. But Śukra started the penance in right earnest.

The devas were frightened when they knew the deceit of the dāityas and the strategy of their preceptor. They decided to go to war with the dāityas immediately. The dāityas were in a fix. They knew that if they fought without the help of their guru defeat to them was sure. So they ran to the mother of Śukra and sought her help. The devas rebelled against Śukra’s mother and she invoked the goddess of sleep and put all the devas into deep slumber. Mahāviṣṇu stealthily carried away Indra lying asleep. Indra persuaded Mahāviṣṇu to kill Śukra’s mother and he cut off the head of Śukra’s mother by the divine discus, Sudaraśana.

Bhrigu Maharṣi, father of Śukra, was angry at that arrogant and cruel deed of Mahāviṣṇu and cursed him saying that he would be born on earth several times as man. After that he brought to life by sprinkling water his wife lying dead with her head severed from her body. Knowing well the havoc that would be created when Śukra came back after his penance Indra sent his daughter Jayantī to destroy the penance of Śukra. She went in the guise of a demon girl to serve Śukrācārya. In the meantime at the request of Indra Bhraspati took the form of Śukrācārya and presented himself before the dāityas. The dāityas believed him to be their real guru Śukra and were pleased.

Ten years went by and one day Śukrācārya remembering the old events left Jayantī and went to his court in the demon land. Bhraspati had by that time returned to devaloka fully satisfied with his mission. The devas not knowing that Śukra had returned started for a war with the dāityas. Śukra when he came back went wild when he knew that his people had been worshipping Bhraspati for ten years. The angered preceptor was not to be pacified by any amount of arguments and so they sent Prahlāda to Śukrācārya and Prahlāda pleaded for controlling his anger and Śukra did so.

Śukra then saw with his divine vision the maneuverings in mind of the devas and was convinced that a war with the devas at that juncture would be an utter failure. So he advised the dāityas to desist from war and assured them that during the period of Sāvārṇa Manu to come, emperor Bali would become all-powerful and he would then fight and win the devas. Prahlāda returned and told the asuras the message of Śukrācārya. But the dāityas were not satisfied and compelled Prahlāda to go to war with the devas. At last Prahlāda was forced to agree and a fierce devāsura battle ensued. Prahlāda met Indra in a single combat and it prolonged for a hundred years. In the end Prahlāda won. Indra prayed to the goddess and fearing that she might destroy the demon world, Prahlāda also prayed to her. The devi was pleased with both of them and she pacified them both and each went back to his own place.

9) Other details.

(i) Once there was a fight between Prahlāda and Kāla. (Bhaviṣya Parva, Chapter 59).
(ii) Bali who was trampled down to Pāṭāla built a Viṣṇu temple and worshipped Viṣṇu following the advice of Prahlāda. (See under Bali).
(iii) Once Prahlāda taught Indra the rules of good conduct. (Sloka 23, Chapter 124 Sānti Parva).
(iv) Once Uṣanas sang in honour of Prahlāda. (Sloka 50, Chapter 139, Sānti Parva).
(v) Once Prahlāda learnt the importance of Ājagarvṛti from a sage. (Chapter 179, Sānti Parva).
(vi) During the reign of emperor Prthu when the goddess of earth (Bhūmidevi) was milked, the asuras used Prahlāda as the calf to milk madya (wine) from her. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).
(vii) Prahlāda sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. (Sloka 12, Chapter 9, Sahā Parva).
(viii) Prahlāda once went to the court of Brahmā to worship him. (Sloka 19, Chapter 11, Sahā Parva).
(ix) Prahlāda acted as mediator in the controversy between Virocana and Sudhanvā. (See under Sudhanvā). (For knowing more details about Prahlāda please see under Virocana and Bali.)

PRAHLĀDA II. A Kāśtriya King born of the family of Bālīka. This King belonged to the line of kings under the demon king Salabha. (Sloka 30, Chapter 67, Ādi Parva).

PRAHLĀDA III. A serpent. This serpent sits in the court of Varuṇa and worships him. (Sloka 10, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRAHLĀDA IV. A place of human habitation of Purānic fame. (Sloka 46, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).
PRAHUTA. A great yajña.
Manusmṛti states that respecting each of the following five is considered as a yajña in itself:—A devatā, a guest, servants, parents and the self. Of these the first is called Ahuta, second, huta, third, prahuta, fourth brahmahuta and fifth, prāti (Slokas 72, 73, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti)

PRAJĀGARA. A celestial lady. Once when Arjuna went to the court of Indra this celestial maiden gave performance in dance at the request of Indra. (Sloka 30, Chapter 43, Vana Parva).

PRAJĀGARAPARVA. A sub-division of Udyoga Parva of Mahābhārata. This comprises chapters 33 to 40 of Udyoga Parva.

PRAJĀNGHA. A rākṣasa (demon) of the party of Ravaṇa. This demon was killed by Aṅgada. (Sarga 76, Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRAJĀPATI(S). Creators of the world. With a view to making creation easy Brahmag at first created twentyone Prajāpatis (creators). They are Brahmag, Rudra, Manu, Dakṣa, Bhṛgu, Dharma, Tapa, Yama Marici, Anirūṣa, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kṛatu, Vasishtha, Parameśti, Śūrya, Candraw, Kardama, Krodha and Viṅkita. (Chapter 384, Sānti Parva; Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

PRAJĀPATIVEDI. This is a holy place situated in the middle of four sacred places in Kurukṣetra named Tarantuka, Arantuca, Paraśuramakunda and Macakraka. This place is called the Uttarā (north) vedī of Prajāpati also. Besides this, four other places, Pratishṇāpuri (with Prayāga), Kambala, Aṅvatara and Bhogavati are called Prajāpativedi. The aforesaid five sacred Places are called Brahmadevi also. (Chapter 53, Sālya Parva; Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

PRAJĀPATYA. A kind of marriage.
Sahobhau caratāṁ dharmamiti vaśāṁbhāśya ca
Kanyāpādānaṁabhāryacca
Prajāpatya vidihiṁ śmrtaḥ //
(Sloka 30, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

Giving in marriage to a brahmacāri one's daughter after inviting him to his house and worshipping him is called Prajāpatya.

PRAKĀLĀ. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Chapter 57, Adi Parva).

PRAKĀSA. A brahmin born of the family of Bhṛgu. He was the son of Tamās who belonged to the race of Gṛiṣamada. (Sloka 63, Chapter 30, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRAKKOSALA. The place east of Kosala. Sahadeva conquered this place situated in Daśāṁbāhārata (Sloka 13, Chapter 31, Sabhā Parva).

PRAKRĪTA. A Yakṣa. He became very rich within twelve days. (Sloka 19, Chapter 194, Vana Parva).

PRAKRĪT; PURUṢA. Prakrit (matter) and Puruṣa (spirit) are two basic factors essential for production of the Prapāṇḍa (the visible world which is the scene of manifold action) as man and woman are for the production of progeny. From Puruṣa (male) Prakriti (female) originated and then they together created the Prapāṇḍa. The Vedas and Puruṣa make statements everywhere regarding Prakriti and Puruṣa and three of the most important ones are given below:

1) 'Pra' means 'principal' and 'Kṛti' means 'creation'. Therefore the word is meant to convey the meaning 'one that is the principal factor for creation'. 'Pra' means 'sattvic', 'Kṛti' means 'rajasic' and 'ta' means 'tamasic' and the word 'Pra-kṛti' thus conveys the power of the three guṇas. 'Pra' means 'before' and 'Kṛti' means creation and so Pra-krīt means that which existed before creation.

Before creation Prakrit lay merged with the Supreme Spirit without separate existence. But when the desire for creation was aroused, this Supreme Spirit divided itself into Prakriti and Puruṣa. Then the right half becomes 'Puruṣa' and the left half 'Prakriti' Even though they are thus two vastādā (kings among sages) they say them both as merged, with the eternal One like fire and heat and assert the truth Sarvāṁ Brahmāmayam (everything is Brahman, the Supreme Spirit).

It was this basic Prakriti that took forms as the five goddesses, Durgā, Lakṣṇi, Sarasvatī, Sāvitrī and Rādā. (9th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata).

2) Puruṣa is the vital sentient Truth that sets in action the entire Prapaṇḍa. This Puruṣa is Supreme among the Supreme, beyond human comprehension, without form, colour, name, without origin, growth, change or end, residing in himself and that which can only be imagined to exist. This puruṣa has got two different forms, the visible and the invisible and also a third imaginary one, time. The sages call puruṣa the Sūkṣmapraṇā (The subtle all-pervading spirit, the supreme soul). This Sūkṣmapraṇā which cannot be measured by any unit of measure, is not attached to anything, is imperishable, is without decrepitude, is immovable and is without the senses of sound, touch smell or form. This Prakriti endowed with the three guṇas, without beginning or end is eternal, is the root cause of this Prapaṇḍa. This Prakriti pervaded over Prapaṇḍa from the beginning of the great Deluge to the beginning of creation. Brahmarājānins who were great seers and who knew the truth of the Vedas speak about Prakriti thus:

"There was no night or day then, neither the earth nor the sky, neither light nor darkness. There was nothing but this. There was only one Brahman merged in which were Prakriti and Puruṣa, a brahman which could not be understood by any of the five senses nor by intelligence. It was from the supreme being of Viṣṇu that the two forms Prakriti and Puruṣa originated. These two were separated from Viṣṇu at the time of the great deluge and again joined together at the time of creation. The form of Viṣṇu from which these occurred was termed Time. During the last great deluge this visible Prapaṇḍa merged with it and so, this deluge was called Prakritapralaya. Time is eternal, having no end and so the process of Śrīti, Sthiti and Samhāra (creation, existence and destruction) continued without any interruption.

After that, during Pralaya (deluge), Prakriti and Puruṣa stand apart due to equality of the guṇas, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas in Prakriti. Viṣṇu in the form of Time starts the work to join them both together. Then when the time of creation came Viṣṇu, the Supreme Being, the supreme among the god of all living beings, omnipresent, and omnipotent by his will entered the emotionless Puruṣa and emotional Prakriti and created sensations in them. Smell is the sense which creates sensation in one by its nearness to it. Just like that Viṣṇu by his very presence near them created disturbances in them. It is Viṣṇu, the best of Puruṣa, who acts as Prakriti which can disturb and which can be disturbed, which exists in states of contraction and expansion. It is Viṣṇu, the god of the gods, who exists in forms of Śūkṣma and Sthūla, and as the great tattva and as the devas like Brahmā.
The Mahattattva originated from Praṁṛti, which was existing as emotionless due to the equalisation of the three guṇas, when at the time of creation Viṣṇu, Truth in the form of Kṣetrajña (knower), merged with Praṁṛti.
The Mahattattva in its three forms, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas lay enveloped by Praṁṛti just as a seed is covered by its husk. From this Mahattattva originated the three egos, Vaikārika, Taïaja and Tāmasa, the cause of the Pañcabhūtas. Because that ego contained the three guṇas it became the cause of the origin of the bhūtas (elements) and indriyas (senses). Ego pervaded the Mahattattva just as the Mahattattva pervaded (Aṅśa I, Chapter 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

3) In the beginning during the Deluge the world was all water. Then Śiva tore open his thigh and dropped a drop of blood in the waters. It became a huge egg. He broke it and from it came out Puruṣa and from Puruṣa he made Praṁṛti for the creation of the Prapāñca. These two, Praṁṛti and Puruṣa, created the Prājāpatis and they in turn created the prajās. Puruṣa seeing the vast creation going on due to him became arrogant and Śiva chopped off his head. Śiva became repentant of his hasty deed later. To atone for his sin he took the skull in his hand and vowed that he would ever carry a skull in his hand and that he would live in cremation grounds.
The two halves of the great egg became ākāśa and bhūmi (earth and sky). (Taranaga II, Kathāpithalambaka, Kathāsārañjīgara).

PRALAMBA I. A notorious dānava born to Kaśyapa-prajāpati of his wife Danu. (Śloka 29, Chapter 65, Adi Parva).

PRALAMBA II. An asura (demon). He attacked Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma and was killed by Balarāma. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRALAYA (Destruction). Pralaya is of four kinds. The first is nityapralaya. This is the destruction going on daily for all animate and inanimate objects born on earth.
The second is Brāhmaṇapralaya or nāmītiṣṭkapralaya. The third is Prākṛtrapralaya. This is the great deluge made by prakṛti (nature) at the end of a thousand Caturyugas (four yugas). The fourth is ātyantikapralaya. This is the union of the soul with the Supreme Being due to Jānā.
Of the above the Brāhmaṇapralaya, or nāmītiṣṭkapralaya happens at the end of a Kalpa or a day of Brahmā or a thousand yugas. The nature of this pralaya is as follows: At the end of a thousand yugas the world will look famished. Then there will be excessive drought for a hundred years together and everything in this world would be destroyed then. Then Mahāviṣṇu, lord of everything in this universe, would present himself in the seven big rays of the Sun and drink to emptiness all the waters of all the three worlds, earth, ocean and pātāla. Then by the divine power of Mahāviṣṇu the seven rays of the Sun which had grown fat by drinking this water would become seven separate Suns. These Suns would burn all the three worlds including Pātāla. Then the earth would look like the back of a tortoise (Kūrmapāṭḥa). At that time Rudra, equal in brilliance to Kālāgni, would from beneath burn the pātāla sending breaths from Ādīsēṣa. After pātāla Kālāgnirudra would burn the earth and then the heavens. Because of this all the worlds would look like globes of fire. Then the inhabants of these worlds would go to Mahāloka unable to bear the heat and from there to Janaloka. Thus Viṣṇu in the form of Rudra would destroy everything.

Then from the face of Viṣṇu would originate clouds and lightning in different forms. Those clouds would rain incessantly for a hundred years and destroy the fire prevailing everywhere. When the rains become unbearable Vāyū would encroach upon the seats of the Saptarṣis in the ocean and by the breath of Viṣṇu destroy all the clouds. At that time Viṣṇu, lord of all, would lie on the back of Ādīsēṣa in that one big ocean drinking vāyū (air). Viṣṇu will lie thus for a period of a Kalpa in yogic slumber meditating on Viśuveṇa taking the name Madhusūḍdana and form of Brahmā praised by the siddhamunis inside the ocean.
After that he would take the form of Brahmā and start creation.

In Prākṛtrapralaya this whole universe would lie in extinction for a period of two parārddhas. One parārddha is 1000000000000000000000 years (one followed by seventeen zeroes) and so the period of a prākṛtapralaya is double the above number of years. The world would then come into the grip of a great drought; fires would break out and burn away everything in this world from Mahattattva to Viṣṇeṇa. Then prompted by the desire of Viṣṇu, pratisaṅcarana (back into nature) would occur. Then Jala (water) would absorb the guṇas of bhūmi like gandha (smell) and when the qualities of the earth are thus absorbed the earth would merge with pralaya. Jala is rasātmaka.
Agni will absorb the rasa of Jala and Jala would be kindled. The guṇa of Agni is form and is in the form of Sun. Vāyū would absorb it and Agni would be destroyed. Vāyū would then become powerful and shake the world. The quality of Vāyū is touch and the ether would absorb that guṇa of Vāyū and Vāyū would be destroyed. The quality of ether is sound and it would be absorbed by the elements. If the elements are absorbed one by one the earth would merge into water (Jala) and Jala in Agni, and Agni in Vāyū and Vāyū in ether and ether in Ahaṅkāra (ego). Ahaṅkāra would merge in Mahattattva. This Mahattattva would be absorbed by Praṁṛti. Praṁṛti has got two forms:
Vyakta and Avyakta (Manifest and Un-manifest). The Vyakta would merge with Avyakta. Puruṣa is single, pure and without decay. But he is also part of Para-mātma (the Supreme Being). So Praṁṛti and Puruṣa would both merge into the Supreme Being. There are no distinctions, fabrications in Paramātma, the lord of all. It is only an existence. It is such a Paramātma that should be known and which itself is knowledge.
The Paramātma is beyond the Ātmā (soul). It is in such an indescribable Paramātma that all are dissolvated during a Prākṛtrapralaya. (Chapter 368, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAMĀDA. A son of Vasītha. He was one of the Saptarṣis of Utama Manvantara. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRAMADVĀRĀ. Wife of Ruru.

1) Birth. Pramadvārā was the daughter of the nymph Menakā born of the Gandharva Viśvāvasu. As soon as the child was born, Menakā threw the child into the forest and left for Devaloka.
Sthūlakesā, a sage who was engaged in penance in that forest in a hermitage heard the cry of a child and came out of his āśrama. On seeing a new-born child lying unclaimed and uncared for, he took the child to his āśrama and named her Pramadvarā and brought her up. She grew into a charming maiden and one day Prince Ruru coming that way while hunting saw her and fell in love with her. The sage was pleased to give her in marriage to the King and so fixed the date of marriage.

The day previous to her marriage she trampled over a poisonous snake while walking in the forest with her companions and immediately she fell dead by the bite of the serpent. Ruru's grief was uncontrollable.

He wept bitterly crying aloud "If I have from my very birth with great devotion taken vows, let Pramadvarā rise up alive." Then a devadūta (messenger from god) appeared before him and said that all his wails were of no avail since it was only in the order of things that one whose āyus (period of life on earth) was over should die. Ruru then enquired of him a way of escape from this inevitable calamity and then the devadūta said that if Ruru was prepared to surrender half of his āyus in favour of Pramadvarā she would come back to life. Ruru agreed and they went to Dharmarāja (god of Death) and told him of his wish. Dharmarāja brought back Pramadvarā to life and she stood before Ruru as if just woken up from sleep. Their marriage was duly conducted. (Chapters 8 and 9, Ādi Parva).

Pramagandha. The King of Kikaṭas mentioned in Rgveda. (Sūktas 14, Anuvāka 53, Maṇḍala 3, Rgveda).

Pramāṇakoṭi. A sacred place on the banks of the river Gaṅgā. There is a great banyan tree named Pramāṇakoṭi at this place. It was at this spot of the river that Duryodhana poisoned Bhīmaśena and threw him into the river, bound hand and foot. The Pāṇḍavas who went for their exile in the forests spent their first night at this spot. (Sloka 41, Chapter 1, Vana Parva).

Pramandhu. A Yakṣa who was the custodian of the wealth of Hariścandra. Vīśāmītra removed the bad smell of the body of this yakṣa by pouring holy water over his body. (Chapter 2, Skanda Purāṇa).

Pramatakas. A sage. He was one of the members of the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 7, Chapter 53, Ādi Parva).

Pramāṇa. A son of Dīṛtarāṣṭra. (Sloka 13, Chapter 116, Ādi Parva).

Pramāṇa. One of the two pāṛṣadas given to Subrahmana by Yamarāja. The other one was named Unmātha. (Sloka 30, Chapter 45, Sālva Parva).

Pramāṇā. A rākṣasa (demon). This rākṣasa was a minister of demons Khara and Dūṣaṇa. (Sarga 23, Aranyakāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

Pramathagaṇa. Śiva's attendants. They were well-versed in Dharmadharmas (What is virtuous and what is not). (Chapter 131, Anuśāsana Parva).

Pramāṇī. One of the hundred sons of Dīṛtarāṣṭra. He was killed by Bhīmaśena in the great battle. (Chapter 157, Droṇa Parva).

Pramāṇī. Brother of Dūṣaṇa who was an associate of Rāvaṇa. When Rāma and Laksmana were in exile in the forests they had to fight Khara-duṣaṇaṭriśirisas. Then the captains of their army, Mahākapāla, Sthūlākṣa and Pramāṇī attacked Rāma-Laksmaṇas. Pramāṇi attacked Laksmaṇa and then Nila an army-chief of the monkeys killed Pramāṇi. (Sarga 26, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa and Sloka 22, Chapter 287, Vana Parva).

Pramāṇī. A rākṣasa who was a friend of Ghatotkaca. In the Kuruksetra battle Duryodhana killed this Pramāṇi. (Sloka 20, Chapter 91, Bhīṣma Parva).

Pramāṇini. A celestial woman. This woman gave a dance performance during the Jāmnottava of Arjuna. (Sloka 21, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

Pramati. I. (Pramiti). 1) General information. Great Sage Bṛghu, got of his wife Pulomā Cyavaya and Cyavaya got of his wife Sukanyā, Pramati. This sage Pramati married the beautiful Pratāpi and their son was Ruru.

2) Other details.

(i) Pramiti visited Bhīṣma while he was lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 5, Chapter 26, Anu'āsana Parva).

(ii) Pramiti is described as the son of Vāgīndra born in the family of Gṛtsamada son of Vitahavya. (Sloka 58, Chapter 30, Anuśāsana Parva). For details see under Ruru).

Pramati. II. Son of a brahmin named Śūra of Prayāga. During the fag end of Kṛṣayuga the brahmins made Pramati their army-chief and defeated the Kṣatryias. (Viṣṇuḥdarmottara Purāṇa).

Pramati. III. One of the four ministers of Vibhīṣaṇa. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Chapter 77. Verse 7, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

Prāmila. Chief of the Strīrājya (country of women) in the Himālayas. The Pāṇḍavas conducted an aśvame-dhayāga after the great battle. It was Arjuna who followed the sacrificial horse. Roaming about without anybody daring to tie it the horse reached Strīrājya and Prāmila tied the horse. Arjuna challenged her and in the fight that ensued Prāmila defeated Arjuna. At that time there was a voice from heaven which said "Arjuna, you will never be able to take back the horse after defeating Prāmila. So if you want to save the sacrificial horse, enter into a truce with her and make her your wife." Arjuna took the advice and saved the horse after marrying Prāmila. (Jaiminiya, Āsvamedha Parva, 21—22).

Pramlocō. A nymph who enticed the sage Kaṇḍu. (See under Kaṇḍu).

Pramodā. I. A serpent born of the family of Airāvata. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 11, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

Pramoda. II. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Sloka 65, Chapter 45, Sālva Parva).

Pramoda. III. One of the Maṇasa-paturas (Spiritual sons) of Brahma. Pramoda was born from the neck of Brahmā. (Maṇṣya Purāṇa).

Pramohini. A Gandharva maiden. Pramohini and four Gandharva maidens were absolved from their curses by a drop of water from the river Narmadā. The story recounted to Yudhiṣṭhira by Nārada is as follows: Five Gandharva maidens Pramohini, Su'īlā, Susvarā, Candrikā and Sutārā were friends. Pramohini was the daughter of Sukasaṅgī, Su'īlā that of Suśīlā, Susvarā of Svaravedi, Candrikā that of Candraka and Sutārā of Suprabha. On a day in spring all the five went about collecting flowers in a forest. As they went on walking they reached the pond named Acchoda. They bathed in that pond and after that made an idol of Ambikā with clay and adorned it with golden ornaments. Putting marks on it with Kumkum (Saffron) and Candana (Sandalwood-paste) they danced around the idol with devotional songs. As they were doing so, the eldest son of sage Vedanidhi came to bathe in the Acchoda pond. He was very charming to look at with eyes like lotus, broad chest and round and brawny hands. He looked like another Kāmadeva (Cupid). He was wearing a deer-hide and around his waist was a yellow waist-band of Muñja-grass. The five girls were attracted by the ascetic youth and stopping their dancing they at last thought of making him their guest. The more the girls looked at him more they saw a resemblance of Kāmadeva in him, and they decided to make him their husband. The girls started to approach him with amorous looks and perplexed by this move, the ascetic youth fled away from the place. The girls searched for him everywhere and he was not to be found. They found an emptiness on all sides. They thought that perhaps he might be a magician. They felt themselves in the plight similar to that of the gopis who searched for the missing Kṛṣṇa. Somehow taking courage they reached their homes and fell down before their mothers. The mothers asked them why they were so late and they replied they knew not the passage of time speaking with the Kinnaris who arrived there. Their bodies were hot and the mothers thought that it might be due to their brisk walking for such a long distance.

Telling a lie like that to hide their secret, they lay on the ground and thinking about him and him alone. They did not make the Kelamāyura (peacock kept for pleasure) dance, did not teach the parrot in the cage, did not pet the mongoose nor did they converse with their pet Śārikā. The night seemed to them like a yuga and as soon as it was morning they ran up to the Acchoda pond. The brahmin boy came there that morning also for bathing. The five girls encircled him and requested him to marry them. He made several excuses and tried to get away from them. Then Prañohini breaking the circle went and caught hold of him by his legs, Susūla and Susvarā caught hold of his hands, Sutārā embraced him and Candrīkī kissed him on his cheeks. At last in despair the brahmin boy cursed them and turned them into devils. The girls were not to be subdued like that. They also cursed him in return and made him also a devil. All the devils formed like that by curses and counter-curses lived in the same place in the forest. After a long time one day the sage Lomaśa came that way by chance and the burning effulgence of Lomaśa due to his severe penance made him unapproachable to the devils and they stood at a great distance from him. But the brahmin devil by the strength of his penance in his previous life knew Lomaśa and falling before him in prostration told him everything that had happened. Lomaśa was greatly moved by his story and he took them to the banks of the river Narmadā. At that time a wind blew and drops of water from the river, changed them into their original forms and they stood praising Narmadā. Then following the advice of Lomaśa the brahmin boy married the five girls and lived on the shores of Narmadā bathing in it, drinking its water and worshipping it. They lived there for long happily and then attained Viṣṇuloka. (Chapter 22, Padma Purāṇa) PRAMĀṬTA. One of the ways of earning wealth. There are five ways according to Manusmṛti.

PRAṆADHARA

(Rtam is the collection of grains from paddy fields with two fingers. Amṛta is that which is obtained without begging and Mṛta is that which is obtained by begging. Wealth that is obtained by agriculture is Pramāṭa and that which is obtained by trade is Satyāṇṭa. Wealth obtained by sevā (flattery and service) is to be avoided.)

PRAMSUNRGA. A Manu, Ikṣvāku, Nabhāga, Dhṛṣṭa, Śaryāti, Nārisyanta, Prāṁśunṛga, Diśta, Karuṣa and Pṛṇadhara are all Manus. (7th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata)

PRAΜUCI (PRAΜUCA). A sage who lived in Dākṣiṇabhārata. (Śloka 29, Chapter 208, Sānti Parva.)

PRAṆA I. Grandson of sage Bhṛgu. Bhṛgu got of his wife Khyāti a daughter named Laksīmi and two sons named Dhātā and Viḍhātā. They married Ayati and Niyati respectively and they got two sons named Prāṇa and Mrkanḍu. Mārkanḍeya was the son of Mrkanḍu. (Chapter 10, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa.)

PRAṆA II. A son born to the Vasu named Soma of his wife Manohara. This Prāṇa was the younger brother of Varccas. These brothers had two other brothers named Śiśira and Ramaṇa. (Śloka 26, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva.)

PRAṆA III. Prāṇāyū. The wind of life. (See under Parāvaha.)

PRAṆADHARA. A carpenter of Purāṇic fame. There were two celebrated carpenters in the country of Kānci named Prāṇadhara and Rājyadhara when King Bāhubala was ruling that country. They learnt many mechanical arts in carpentry and architecture from the great architect, Maṇḍūra. Prāṇadhara, the elder brother, became an addict to wine and women and gambling and lost all his wealth. Rājyadhara gave a portion of his wealth to his brother and before long both became poor. Then Prāṇadhara found out a plan and they both together made a mechanical bird and tying a rope to its legs sent it into the treasure-house of the King through a window. The bird picked up diamonds or ornaments which it could carry in its beak and came back to them. This continued daily for some days and then Rājyadhara advised his brother to stop it acquainting him with the dangers if it was ever found out. But Prāṇadhara did not heed the advice and continued the theft. When the keeper of the treasury found things missing he was worried. He mused: “Doors arc not open. Can it be rats? No, there has never been a single rat here before. Then how did it happen?” Thinking thus he went and reported the matter to the king. The King was confident of the keeper. Soon he put guards over the treasure-house to keep watch over it at night. Little knowing that he was being watched Prânapadhara put his bird into action that night also. The watchmen caught hold of the rope as soon as the bird came out with the booty from the treasure-house. Prânapadhara knew that the trick had been found out and he rushed to his brother and told him what had happened. Immediately Prânapadhara made a Vimâna and escaped from the place with his family. Râjayadharo also made a Vimâna and escaped. When he had travelled in the Vimâna for four hundred Kâtas (Kāta=four miles) he reached a sea-shore and then leaving the Vimâna there started walking. On the way getting tired he slept inside a garden. When he woke up, a man on a peacock came to his side and said “You live here. When you are hungry and feel like taking food go to the second floor of this house and you will find there whatever you want.” The visitor disappeared and he found a house in front of him. When he had finished his daily ablutions he went inside the house which was empty. But when he went up he saw ample food in gold vessels arranged there. He never heard about his brother again. (Târanâga 9, Ratnaprabhâlambaka, Kâthasârîtâsâgara).

PRÂNAKA. Son of an agni called Prâna. (Sloka 1, Chapter 22, Vana Parva).

PRÂNÂRODHA. One of the twenty eight hells. (See under Kâla).

PRÂNAYÂMA. Prâna means the wind in the body and āyama means restraint. Prânayâma means restraining or suspending breath. Spread on the floor a piece of cloth, or animal-skin or Kuśâ grass and sitting on it cross-legged, controlling all actions of the sense-organs and concentrating on one single object do prânayâma for the purification of the soul. There are three different kinds of prânayâmas namely Recakaprânayâma, Pûrâkaprânayâma and Kumbhakaprânayâma.

Holding the nostrils with the left hand and massaging the belly with the other hand one sends out the air within the belly. It is called Recakaprânayâma. Doing just the reverse and getting air inside is called Pûrâkaprânayâma. Then the yogi sits, with his belly full of air. Sitting thus without either letting the air out or letting it in is called Kumbhakaprânayâma. Here the yogi sits like a pûrâna-kumbhâ (full jar). The body of man is a chariot, the sense organs its horses, mind the charioteer and prânayâma the whip. (Chapter 373, Agni Purâṇa).

PRÂNIDH. Son of an Agni called Pâñcachayana. (Sloka 9, Chapter 220, Vana Parva).

PRÂNTA. A son born to one’s own wife by the grace of great men. (Sloka 19, Chapter 119, Adi Parva).

PRÂNNADH. A sacred place. He who visits this place would attain Indraloka. (Sloka 15, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

PRAPÂNGA. See under Šrîti.

PRAPÂNGABUDH. A beggar with astonishing powers mentioned in Kâthasârîtâsâgara.

PRÂPTI. A wife of Kâtiṣa. Kâtiṣa had two wives and the other was called Asti. (10th Skandha, Bhâgavata).

PRÂRJUJA I. A division of râksasas (demons) and Pîsācas (devils). (Sloka 1, Chapter 285, Vana Parva).

PRÂRJUJA II. A deva who once guarded the Âmrta (nectar). Once there was a fight between Prârjuna and Garuḍa. (Chapter 28, Adi Parva).

PRASÂDA. A King of the family of Manu. (4th Skandha, Bhâgavata).

PRÂSAMI. A nymph of Alakâpûrî. This nymph once gave a dance performance in honour of Aśâvakra. (Sloka 45, Chapter 19, Anûśasana Parva).

PRÂSANDHI. A son of Vaivasvata Manu. Kûspa is the son of Prasandhi. (Sloka 2, Chapter 4, Aśvamedha Parva).

PRÂŚÂNTÂTMA. A synonym of Sûrya (Sun). (Sloka 27, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).

PRÂSÂSTÂ. A holy river. During their pilgrimage the Pândavas came to this place and bathed in this river. (Sloka 2, Chapter 118, Vana Parva).

PRÂSENA I. A son of Karna. He was killed in the great battle by Sâtyaki. (Sloka 6, Chapter 82, Karna Parva).

PRÂSENA II. A King of Vrṣipâvanâ.

2) Prasena and the Sîyamantaka. Satrâjît and Sûrya (Sun) were friends. Once Satrâjît requested Sûrya to give him some gift as a token of their friendship. Then Sûrya gave him the Sîyamantaka gem. If that stone was worshipped daily with pûjâs by brâhmaṇas it would yield eight loads of gold daily. When once Satrâjît travelled by air with that gem round his neck the people of Dvârâkâ mistook him for Viṣṇu. Śrî Kṛṣṇa was attracted by the beauty and power of that stone and he asked Satrâjît that gem for a good price. Śrî Kṛṣṇa offered as much money as he wanted and still Satrâjît did not part with it.

Once Prasena went hunting with that gem round his neck and he was attacked and killed by a lion. The lion while carrying the Sîyamantaka was killed by Jâmabhâvân and the latter carried the gem to his den and gave it to his children to play with.

When Prasena did not return from his hunting and was found later lying dead without the gem the news spread that the stone might have been stolen by Kṛṣṇa after killing Prasena. The slander reached the ears of Kṛṣṇa also and he went to the forest in search of the Sîyamantaka. He found the cave of Jâmabhâvân and peeping in found the children of Jâmabhâvân playing with the gem. Jâmabhâvân attacked Kṛṣṇa and after a grim battle which lasted for several days Jâmabhâvân was defeated. When Kṛṣṇa knew that it was Kṛṣṇa who had defeated him he gave him along with the Sîyamantaka his daughter Jâmavati also Kṛṣṇa brought the gem and the girl to Dvârâkâ and gave back the gem to Satrâjît. (Chapter 38, Harivamśa; Chapter 13, Part 8, Padma Purâṇa).

PRÂSENAJIT I. Father of Suyajînâ, wife of Mahâbhâma. As a King he did godâna (gift of cows) for many years and attained Puñyaloka in the end. (Sloka 20, Chapter 95, Adi Parva).

PRÂSENAJIT II. Father of Râpkâ, wife of the sage Jamadagni. Jamadagni abandoned the beautiful Râpkâ once but fearing a curse Prasenajit gave her again to Jamadagni. (Chapter 58, Brahmânḍa Purâṇa).
PRASENAJIT III. A distant brother of Satrājīt called Bhava. (Dākṣinātyya Pātha, Chapter 14, Sabhā Parvā).

PRASENAJIT IV. A King who lived in the city of Śrāvaṇī. Once a very virtuous brahmin came to this city. Finding him to be a man of great virtues a Vaśīya took him to his house and kept him there worshipping him. Many rich men coming to know of the brahmin came and worshipped him with offerings of costly clothes and ornaments. Within a short time the poor brahmin got a huge heap of gold and silver. He collected his lot and at night without letting anybody know went and buried it in a secret place in the forest. After some days he went and looked for it and found his buried wealth missing. When the brahmin returned weeping, the host, the Vaśīya, gathered from him all that had happened. The house-holder consoled him but the miserly and greedy brahmin was not to be pacified thus and he started to commit suicide. He went to a pond nearby and was about to jump into it when Prasenajit who heard about this came to the spot and told him thus:—“Do not grieve over your loss. I shall make enquiries about it and if the stolen wealth is not recovered I shall give you compensation from my treasury.”

After consoling the brahmin thus the King went to his palace. He pretended to be ill and called the physicians of the city to his side. He asked them about their patients, their illness and the medicines prescribed for them. One of the physicians during the enquiry said thus: “Oh lord, Māṇḍrattavanik is my patient. Yesterday I prescribed to him the root of Īraka plant.” The King soon dispersed the physicians and sent for Māṇḍrattavanik and asked him who had brought for him the root. When Māṇḍrattavanik replied that it was his servant the King sent for the servant and on questioning the servant the latter confessed having taken the hidden treasure. Thus because of the intelligence and wisdom of the King the brahmin got back his wealth. (Taraṅga 7, Madanāyaṇiukālambaka, Kathāsārītāgama).

PRASĪTA. One of the Pañcamaḥāyaṇajas. The five vajñas are Alata, Huta, Praluta, Brāhmaḥuta and Prāśita. (Sloka 73, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

PRASKAṆṆA. I A King who was the son of Medhātiṅki. The Kings of Prakṣaṇa were Kaśtriyas formerly but they became brahmīns later. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASKAṆṆA II. A sage who was the son of Kaṇva-muni. The sūkta 44 of anuvāka 9 of maṇḍala one of Ṛgveda was written by this sage.

PRASRĀYA. A King of the family of Manu. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASRĪTA. A demon. This demon was killed by Garuda. (Sloka 12, Chapter 105, Udyyogī Parvā).

PRASTHĀLA I. The palace of Suṣārmā. (See under Suṣārmā).

PRASTHĀLA II. A greatly condemned place. (Sloka 47, Chapter 44, Karṇa Parvā).

PRASŪṆMA. A country which was conquered by Bhīmasena during the Mahābhārata times. (Sloka 16, Chapter 30, Sabhā Parvā).

PRASŪṆRUTA. A King who was a descendant of Śrī Rāma. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRASŪṬI. A daughter of Svāyambhūva Manu. Svayaṃbhūva Manu had two sons named Priyavrata and Uttānapāda and three daughters named Ākūṭi, Devahūti and Prasūṭi. Ākūṭi was married to Ruciprajāpati, Devahūti to Kardama-prajāpati and Prasūṭi to Daśakāraprajāpati. Yajñā is the son of Ākūṭi. Kapila is the son of Devahūti. Prasūṭi got only a number of daughters. (8th Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

PRATĀPA. A prince of the country of Sauvīra. He stood behind the chariot of Jayadratha holding his flag. Arjuna slew him. (Sloka 10, Chapter 265, Vana Parvā).

PRATĀPAMUKUTA. Father of Vajramukuta. Vajramukuta is the hero in the tale of Vetalakāthā described beautifully in Kathāsārītāgama. (See under Vetalā).

PRATĀPI. Aryamanahārī got of his wife Sukanyā a son named Pramati. Pratāpi is the beautiful wife of Pramati. Kuru is the son born to Pramati of Pratāpi. (2nd Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

PRĀṬARA I. A serpent born of the Kauravya race. This serpent was burnt to death at the Saraspatra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 13, Chapter 5, Ādi Parvā).

PRĀṬARA II. A son born to Dhātā, the seventh aḍīya, of his wife Rākā. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATARDANA.

1) General information. A King of the line of Pṛśu. Pratardana who was the son of the daughter of King Yayāti ruled the country after making Kāśi his capital. Pratardana's mother was Mādhavi, Yayāti's daughter, and father, Divodāsa. Pratardana once found on his way his grandfather, King Yayāti, who had fallen from Svarga. (See under Yayāti).

2) Other details.

(i) Emperor Śibi gave Pratardana a sword. (Sloka 80, Chapter 166, Śanti Parvā).

(ii) He once gave a gift of a netra (eye) to the brahmīns. (Sloka 20, Chapter 224, Śanti Parvā).

(iii) He slew the son of Vitahavya. (See under Vītahavya).

(iv) Pratardana courted death after appointing his sons for the service of brahmīns. (Sloka 5, Chapter 137, Anuśāsana Parvā).

PRATĪBHĀNÚ. A son born to Śri Kṛṣṇa of Satya-bhāmā. Bhānu, Subhānu, Svarbhānu, Prabhānu, Bhānunām, Candrabhānu, Bhadbhānu, Havirbhānu, Śrībhānu and Pratībhānu are the sons born to Satya-bhāmā. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATĪCYA. A King born of the race of Bharata. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATĪCAYA. Wife of Pulastyamahārī. (Sloka 17, Chapter 116, Udyyogī Parvā).

PRATĪHĀRA. A King born of the race of Bharata. Pratīhāra was the son of Pareṃśu and the father of Pratīhartā. (Chapter 1, Arisā 2, Viśu Purāṇa).

PRATĪHARTĀ. A King who was celebrated for his yajñakarmans. His father was Pratīha and mother Suvarcalā. Pratīhartā got two sons of his wife Stuti. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIJNĀPARVA. A sub-divisional Parv of Droṇa Parvā. This comprises chapters 72 to 84 of Droṇa Parvā.

PRATĪKA. Son of a King called Vasu. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATĪKĀMĪ. The charioteer of Duryodhāna. It was Pratīkāmī who brought Pṛṇcāḷī to the court of the Kauravas when the Paṇḍavas were defeated at the game of dice by the Kauravas. He was killed in the Kuruksetra battle by the Pândavas. (Chapter 67, Sabha Parva; Chapter 33, Salya Parva).

PRATIKŚATRA. A King born of the family of Paraśurāma. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIMATSYA. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRATĪPA. A King of Candra-vasūśa (Lunar dynasty). He was the father of King Sanatana. There is a story behind the birth of the son Sanatana to Pratīpa. One day this Rāja Ārūṣi was worshipping the Sun-god in the waters of the river Gaṅgā, when a beautiful maiden rose from the waters and sat on the right thigh of the royal ascetic. The King was embarrassed and he told her thus:—"Oh sweet girl, who are you? Do you realise what an unrighteous deed you have done? Why did you thus climb on my thigh without seeking my permission? The right thigh is for the daughter and the wife of the son. Since you have thus sat on my right thigh, you shall be the wife of my son when one is born to me."

Hearing this the maiden jumped out from the thigh of the King and left the place and the King went to his palace. After some time Pratīpa got a son named Sanatana. Sanatana was none other than emperor Mahābhāṣāk who was forced to be born on earth due to a curse of Brahmā. When Sanatana came of age Pratīpa decided to spend the rest of his life in forests and calling his son to his side gave him all advice and added "Son, perhaps a maiden may come to you and if she comes accept her as your wife. Do not ask about her identity. By making her your truthful wife you will acquire a great many benefits.

Pratīpa, thereafter, entrusted the kingdom to his son and after performing severe penance in the forests attained divyaloka. (2nd Skandha, Devi Bhāgavata).

PRATĪPĀDA. A King of the race of Bhārata. He was the son of Gangamādana and the father of Sva-valkala (?) (Navama Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIRATHA. A King of the Pūru line of kings. Pratiratha, Dhrūva and Sumati were the sons of King Anti bhāra. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRATIRŪPA. An asura (demon). This demon who held sway over all the worlds also died. His story was told to illustrate that there was an end to all lives. (Śloka 53, Chapter 227, Sānti Parva).

PRATĪŚĀKHYA. See under Kramapātha.

PRATĪŚRASAVAS. A son born to the queen Kuṁāri of king Bhumāsena of the family of king Parīkit. Pratiśrasavas had a son named Pratīpa. (Śloka 42, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

PRATĪŚṬHĀ I. A female follower of Subrahmaṇya (Śloka 29, Chapter 46, Sālya Parva).

PRATĪŚṬHĀ II. The installation of deities in temples. According to Agni Pu'rāṇa it is the installation of Śiva linga which is called Pratīśṭhā. The πiṭha is Śakti (Power) and Liṅga is Śiva. It is the union of Śakti in the form of Piṭha and Śiva in the form of Liṅga that is called Pratīśṭhā. This Pratīśṭhā is attained by means of Śivamantras. There are five different kinds of Pratīśṭhās:—

1) Viśeṣapratīṣṭhā. Any pratīśṭhā in which Brahmaśālā is used in combination is called Viśeṣapratīṣṭhā.

2) Śhīśapaṇa. Fixing the liṅga on the piṭha (platform) is called Śhīśapaṇa.

3) Śhitasthāpana. The fixing of the liṅga (idol) on the piṭha (platform) when the liṅga gets shaky on it is called Śhitasthāpana.

4) Uthāpana. Taking the idol out from the platform and refixing it, is called Uthāpana.

5) Aśṭhāpana. A pratiṣṭhā in which after the fixation learned priests conduct purification ceremonies, is called Aśṭhāpana.

PRATĪŚṬHĀNAPURA. A sacred place in Prayāgā. The place is at present called Jhūsi. Once this place was ruled over by a king called Yāyāti. The sage Gālava accompanied by Garuda visited this king one day. (Śloka 9, Chapter 114, Udyoga Parva).

PRATĪṬA. A Viṣvadeva. (Śloka 32, Chapter 92, Anuśāsana Parva).

PRATIVINDHYA I. A son born to Pāṇcālī of Dharma-putra. The details available about him from Mahābhārata are the following:—

(i) Pratīvindhya was born from a part of a Viṣvadeva. (Śloka 127, Chapter 37, Ādi Parva).

(ii) On the first day of the Kuruksetra battle Pratīvindhya fought against Śakuni. (Śloka 63, Chapter 45, Bhīṣma Parva).

(iii) Pratīvindhya was defeated in fight with Alambuṣa. (Śloka 39, Chapter 100, Bhīṣma Parva).

(iv) He fought against Ayakatāmā. (Śloka 29, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

(v) Pratīvindhya accepted defeat after fighting with Duṣṭāsana. (Śloka 34, Chapter 166, Droṇa Parva).

(vi) He slew king Citra in a battle. (Śloka 20, Chapter 14, Kaṃa Parva).

(vii) Pratīvindhya died fighting A'vatāthmā at night. (Śloka 48, Chapter 8, Sauptika Parva).

(viii) The synonyms found used in the Mahābhārata for Pratīvindhya are the following:—Yauḍhiṣṭhīra and Yauḍhiṣṭhīrī.

PRATIVINDHYA II. A violent king born of the family of Eka-ācāra. Arjuna defeated this king during his victory march. (Śloka 5, Chapter 25, Sabha Parva).

PRATĪYAGRAHA. An ancient king of Bhārata. He was the second son of Uparīcara-vasu. (Śloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

PRATYAŅGA. An ancient king of Bhārata. (Śloka 238, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

PRATYUṢA. A son born to Dharma-deva of his wife Prabhātā. Pratyuṣa is one of the Aṣṭavasus. The Aṣṭavasus are Āpa, Dhrūva, Soma, Dharma, Anila, Agni, Pratyuṣa and Prabhāsa. The sage Devala is the son of Pratyuṣa. (Śloka 17, Chapter 66, Ādi Parva).

PRAVAHA. A vēyu (wind). This wind of life in the body always moves upwards. (Śloka 21, Chapter 301, Sānti Parva).

PRAVĀHA. A soldier of Subrahmanya. (Śloka 64, Chapter 43, Sālya Parva).

PRAVĀHANA. A king of Pāṇcāladesa. He was a contemporary of Uḍḍālaka. Pravāhana was a great Dārśanika (philosopher) and he once held a Tatvajñāna Parīṣad (seminar of philosophers). With a view to defying the king in a discussion Śvetaketu also attended the seminar. But Śvetaketu was unable to answer the five questions put to him by Pravāhana. Ashamed of the defeat Śvetaketu went to his father Uḍḍālaka, who was his Guru in Jñānavidyā also, and asked him the questions put by Pravāhana. Uḍḍālaka also was unable to answer the questions and they both went to Prayāṇa and the latter gave as a gift to those brahmins whatever knowledge he had on the confluence then. (Chandogyopanishad).

PRĀVĀLAKA. A Yākṣa of the court of Kubera (Sloka 17, Chapter 10, Sābhā Parva).

PRĀVARA. A Yādava. He was one of the ministers of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (Chapter 71, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRĀVARA. A river of Purānic fame. (Sloka 23, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

PRĀVARAKĀR (PRĀVARA). An ancient Purānic place included in Krauceadīva. (Sloka 22, Chapter 12, Bhiṣma Parva).

PRĀVARAKARṇA. An owl without death living in the Himalayas. (See under Indradyumna).

PRĀVARASENA. A Sanskrit poet who lived in the sixth century A.D. He is the author of the book ‘Setubandha’ written in Prakrit language. The book is called ‘Setukaśya’ and ‘Rāvanavadha’ also.

PRĀVARŚANA. A peak of the mountain Gomanta. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma once went to its top to observe the movements of their enemy Māgadha. (10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRĀVASU. A son born to Ilina of the Candravānśa (lunar dynasty) of his wife Rathantarī. Pravasu had four brothers named Dusyanta, Śūra, Bhiṣma, and Vasu. (Sloka 17, Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

PRAVĒṆI. Kaṇḍārama was on the shores of this river. (Sloka 11, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

PRAVEṆAPA. A serpent of the family of Takṣāka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpastra of Janamejaya. (Sloka 9, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PRĀVIRA I. A king of the Pūru dynasty. His father was Santurodha. He had two brothers named Dusyanta and Sumanta. (Chapter 27B, Agni Purāṇa).

PRĀVIRA II. A son of Pūru, a king of the Pūru dynasty. His mother was Pauṣṭī. He had two brothers named Iśvara and Raunḍrāva. Pravira got his wife Sūrasenī a son named Manasyu. He was known by the name Janamejaya also. After conducting three aśvamedhas, Pravira accepted. Vānaprastha (third stage of life). (Sloka 11, Chapter 95, Ādi Parva).

PRĀVIRA (S) III. A special class of Kṣatriyas. King Vṛṣadhvajā was born in this class. (Sloka 16, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).

PRĀVIRA IV. A caṇḍāla (the lowest and most despised of all classes of people). In order to keep his word of honour Harīścandra allowed himself to be sold to this caṇḍāla Pravira. He was none other than Lord Śiva himself. (See under Harīścandra).

PRĀVṚṢEYA. A place of human habitation in ancient Bhārata. (Sloka 50, Chapter 9, Bhiṣma Parva).

PRĀVRTTA. All religious ceremonies are divided into two classes, Pravṛtta and Nivṛtta. All ceremonies connected with worldly life are classed under Pravṛtta and those of a spiritual nature under Nivṛtta. (Chapter 262, Agni Purāṇa).

PRĀYAGA. A sacred place situated at the meeting point of Gaṅgā and Yamunā. He who bathes at this holy spot would get the benefit of doing ten aśvamedhas. (Sloka 35, Chapter 84, Vana Parva).

It is believed that at Prayāga there is the presence of Brahmā, devatās, dikpālakas (guardians of the quarters), lokapālakas (guardians of the world), Śadhyas (realised souls), Pīṭhs (manes), Mahāris like Sanatkumāra, Ṛggaras, Brahmārs, Nāgas, Garuḍa, Śidhās, Śūryadeva and Mahāviṣṇu. There are three fire-pits there. The river Gaṅgā runs through the centre of these pits. The Centre of the confluence of Gaṅgā and Yamunā is believed to be the waist of the world. There is at Prayāga the world-famous Trivenī confluence. If one bathes at that place one gets the benefit of Āśvamedha and Rāja-sūya together.

The greatness of Prayāga is described thus: Prayāga-tīrtha, Pratiṣṭhānātīrtha, Kambalātīrtha, Āsvatāratīrtha, and Bhogavatītīrtha are said to be the Yāgavedīs of Prājāpatī. At such a Prayāga Vedas and Yajñas live personified. If one praises it or chants its name in songs or smears the mud from it on one’s body, one would be absolved of all sins. If one gives away anything in charity at this place or conducts Śrāddhā (ceremony of giving offerings to deceased relatives) or does pious utterings one would get benefits of an imperishable nature. There are about seventy thousand tirthas in this world, ten thousand of one kind and sixty thousand of another kind. Prayāga has the presence of all these tirthas and so it is considered as the best of all tirthas. Here is the Bhogavatītīrtha of Vāsuki and the tīrtha called Hāṁsapatanata. If one bathes in the ponds there for three days together one would get the credit of giving as charity a cow of cows. The three important places are the Gaṅgādvāra, Prayāga and Gaṅgāsāgarasāngama. Chapter 211, Agni Purāṇa).

PRĀYĀṢCITTA. In ancient Bhārata sacred injunctions existed about religious rites to be performed for the atonement of sins committed. The following are a few of them.

Murder is that act which ends in loss of life. One who kills a brahmin is a Brahmagāthātaka. Even if murder is actually committed by one man, all those involved in a conspiracy for murder are murderers. If death occurs while treating a patient it is no murder. If death occurs when you punish your son, disciple or wife it is no sin. If he who has killed a brahmin or a cow commits suicide he will be absolved from his sin. Or he should go about begging with a skull and the organ of generation of any animal. If he spends twelve years begging eating little and with repentance in his heart the Brahmagāthātaka will be absolved of his sin and he will become pure. If the murder is done to serve a purpose of his he should live as a beggar for twelve years but if it is not done to gain any end of his, he need live only for six years as a beggar. If a brahmin attempts to murder another brahmin he should observe the above vow for three years. If the attempt is made by a Kṣatriya he should double the period; if by a Vaiśya or Śūdra, triple the period. If a brahmin kills a Kṣatriya he need observe only three fourths of the pṛāyaścitta. If a brahmin kills a Vaiśya or Śūdra he need observe only an eighth part of the pṛāyaścitta. If he kills a woman he should observe the punishment fixed for killing a Śūdra.

If a brahmin does ‘gohatyā’ (killing a cow) he should practise penance drinking Pañcegavavya (five products of the cow taken collectively). He should sleep in a cowshed and go about feeding the cow and should also give away cows as gift. If a gohatyā is committed by a person of any other caste, he need observe only three fourths of the pṛāyaścitta. Hitting the cows by fists, piercing their body with nails and cutting their horns are to be classified under gohatyā. If one kills a cow mongoose, frog dog, or a bird, one should drink milk for three days. Though wine, date-palm-juice sugar-cane-juice, black-palm-juice, tamarind-juice and toddy are intoxicants they are not classified under alcoholic liquors. Real liquor or surā is that made from rice flour. Drinking liquor is prohibited to Brahmins, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas. If any one of these castes drinks he should drink water after performing penance or live eating pippali (long pepper) for a year or eat oil cake at night for a year. If one drinks water in a pot used for taking liquor one should observe the práyaścitta for seven days. If he drinks water from a cāṇḍāla he should observe the práyaścitta for six days. If one eats rice from a cāṇḍāla one should observe Cāndrāyaṇa. (an expiatory penance of decreasing and then increasing food according to the waxing and waning of the moon). If one eats food in the house of a Śūdra during times of distress, one would be absolved of the sin by repentance alone. Taking another man’s property and appropriating it to himself is called theft. He who steals gold should be struck on the head by a wooden pestle by the king and killed. Alternatively he should live for twelve years with matted hair, eating one time a day only such things as leaves, fruits and roots and lying on earth. He who steals diamonds, pearls, corals, copper, silver, iron, bronze and granite stones should fast for twelve years. He who enjoys sexual intercourse with his father’s wife, own sister, daughter of his preceptor or wife of the preceptor should burn himself in a hot iron pot. Alternatively he should embrace a red hot iron idol of a woman and die. (Chapters 183 and 184, Agni Purāṇa).

PRAYUTA. A Devagandharva. He was born to Kaśyapa-prajāpāti of his wife Mūni. (Śloka 43, Chapter 133, Adi Parva).

PREKSĀGRHA. A building for staging dramas, and conducting festivals well-designed and ornamentally constructed. Dronācārya made the royal architects construct a Preksāghra for exhibiting the skill of the Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas in archery. (Śloka 11, Chapter 133, Adi Parva).

PRETATRANATHA. A very ancient book of the Egyptians. There are only two books which can claim to be as old as the Ṛgveda, the most ancient treasure-book of mankind. One of them is Pretatranathha which the English people call the Book of the Dead. The other is Gilgamish of the Babylonians.

PRITI. Wife of sage Pulastya. Priti got a son named Dattoli of her husband Pulastya, That Dattoli was in his previous birth the Agastya of Śvāyambhuva Manvantara. (Chapter 107, Amśa 17, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRIYABHṛTYA. An ancient King of Bhārata. (Śloka 236, Chapter 1, Adi Parva).

PRIYADARŚANA I. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 59, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYADARŚANA II. A son of the king Drupada. In the battle that ensued after the marriage of Draupadi, Karna killed him. (Adi Parva, Mahābhārata).

PRIYAKA. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya. (Śloka 65, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYAMALYĀNULEPANA. A soldier of Subrahmaṇya (Śloka 60, Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PRIYAMVADĀ. A companion of Rādhikā. This girl gave all protection and service to Arjuna when the latter was conducting Jalānuṣṭhāna taking the form of a woman named Arjunī. (Chapter 74, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PRIYAVARCCAS. A nymph of the court of Kubera. Arjuna saved her when she was lying as a crocodile due to a curse. (Chapter 1, Skanda Purāṇa).

PRIYAVRATA. The eldest son of Śvāyambhuva Manu. He had another son named Uttānapāda and three daughters named Ākūti, Devahūti and Prahūti. The daughters were married to Ruci, Kardama and Dakṣa respectively. (8th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata). Priyavrata married Barhiṃśatai daughter of Kardama-prajāpāti. He got of her two daughters named Samrīt and Kuksi and ten sons named Agniḥrtra, Agnibhūt, Vapūṃmān, Duyumīn, Medhās, Medhāṭīti, Bhavya, Savāna, Putra and Jyotiṃnān. Of these Jyotiṃnān was really possessing jyotis (brilliance). All the sons, Medhas, Agnibhūt and Putra, were interested in the practice of yoga and were aware of their previous births. Priyavrata distributed seven islands to seven of his sons as follows: Jambūdvipa to Agniḥrtra; Plāskadvipa to Medhāṭīti; Sālmalīdvipa to Vapūṃmān; Kuṣadvipa to Jyotiṃnān; Krauṣcadvipa to Duyumīn; Sākadvipa to Bhavya; and Puṣkaradvipa to Savāna. Agniḥrtra had nine sons named Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Hārivarṣa, Ilāvṛta, Ramya, Hiraṇvān, Kuru, Bhadrāvā and Ketumāla. (Chapter 1, Amśa 2, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

Priyavrata once circled round Meru in his chariot. As if competing with the Sun Priyavrata started his circling along with sunrise and ended it at sunset. He did so seven days making nights look like day and the sun appear dim and faded. The Sun was dejected and it was at the request of the Trimūrtis that Priyavrata stopped his circumambulation. It was the path of Priyavrata's circling for seven days that later became the seven oceans of Purānic fame. (Yuddha Kāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa).

PROṢAṬA. An ancient place of human habitation in western Bhārata. (Śloka 61, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PROṢṬHA. An ancient city of Bhārata. (Śloka 61, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PRṢADĀṢAṬA. An ancient King who got a dagger from king Aṣṭaka. (Śloka 80, Chapter 166, Śaṅti Parva).

PRṢADHRA I. The ninth son of Vaivasvata Manu. He is described as one of the sacred and virtuous persons to be remembered during early mornings. He did penance at Kurukṣetra and attained Svarga. (Śloka 11, Chapter 20, Āśvamedha Parva).

Even from boyhood Prṣadhra started practice of penance. He got disgusted with life even from his boyhood. A story is told how it happened so. Once when Prṣadhra was studying under his Guru, a tiger entered the shed of the cows at night. Hearing the pitiable wails of the cow he went to the shed with his sword and gave a strong and fatal cut to the tiger with it. Unfortunately the stroke fell on the cow instead of the tiger and not knowing the truth in the darkness Prṣadhra went and slept peacefully. In the morning when he went to the shed he found the cow lying dead with his sword-cut. He then knew the mistake he had made at night and was so distressed with the accident that he at once left for Kurukṣetra and started doing penance there.
PRŚADHRA II. A son of King Drupada. He was killed in the great battle by Aiśvāthmā. (Śloka 18, Chapter 156, Dāruḍa Purva).

PRŚADHRA III. A brahmin boy. One night while he was living in the āśrama of his Guru he saw a lion going out from the premises of the āśrama with an āśrama cow in its mouth. The brahmin boy rushed at it and struck the lion with a sword. But due to want of proper light the sword-cut fell on the cow and the cow fell down dead. The next day the Guru finding the cow lying dead mistook it for a deliberate killing by his disciple and cursed Prśadhra to death, to be born as a Śūdra. When Prśadhra was thus roaming about in the forests in his cursed form he fell into a big forest fire and was burnt to death. (Chapter 2, Śrṣṭi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa; Chapter 1, Aṁśa 4, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PRṢATA. A king of Pāṇcāla. He was the father of Drupa and a friend of the sage Bharadvāja. It was from Prṣata that Pāṇcālī, daughter of Drupada, got the name Pārṣaṭī. (Śloka 41, Chapter 129, Ādi Parva).

PRṢATĀŚVA. A King of the Sūryavāṇa (solar dynasty). He was called Viśūpa also. Himself, Kṣetumān and Śambhu were the sons of king Ambarāṣṭra. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRŚNI I. Wife of the Prajāpati named Sutapas. (See under Aditi).

PRŚNI II. An ancient sage. He approached Drona during the Kurupāṇḍava battle and commanded him to stop the battle. (Śloka 34, Chapter 190, Drona Parva). He attained svarga by the power of his penance. (Chapter 26, Śancti Parva).

PRŚNIGARBA. A name of Mahāviṣṇu. There are two opinions in the Purāṇas regarding how Viṣṇu got this name.

1) In the early part of the period of Śvāyambhubhuvaka Manu the Prajāpati named Sutapas and his wife Prśni did penance for twelve thousand divine years to get Viṣṇu as their son. As a result of that Viṣṇu was born in the womb of Prśni as Prśnigarba. The name was suited for Śrī Kṛṣṇa the incarnation of Viṣṇu also. (Chapter 3, 10th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

2) Anna (rice), Veda, Jala (water) and āṃtra (nectar) are called Prśni and so Mahāviṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) who bears these inside is called Prśnigarba. (Śloka 45, Chapter 342, Śancti Parva).

PRṬANĀ. The name of a division of the army. (See under Aiśuṁhiṁ).

PRṬHĀ. See under Kuntī.

PRṬHĀŚVA. An ancient king who worships Yama. (Śloka 19, Chapter 9, Sabhā Parva).

Manu, son of Cākṣusā, got of his wife Nāḍvala eleven sons Puru, Kuru, Pṛru, Saṭādyumna, Tapasvi, Sātyavāk, Śuci, Agrīṣṭu, Atiratha, Śudhumana, and Abhiranyu. Of these the second son Kuru got of his wife Aiṛeyi seven sons named Aiṅga, Sumanās, Śvāti Kratu, Aiṅgrīs, Gaya and Śibi. Aiṅga married Sūṣṭhi. She delivered a very wicked son named Vena. Prṭḥu was born to Vena. Prṭḥu got six sons named Antar-dhāna, Vāḍi, Śūta, Māgdha, Pāḷita and Vījītāśva.

2) Birth and Coronation. Sūṣṭhi, wife of Aiṅga, was the eldest daughter of Yama. Vena was born of her. Vena, the grandson of Yama, because of hereditary traits from his grandfather, was very wicked even from birth. When Vena was crowned king by the mahārsis and he became the supreme lord of the world he announced to the world thus: ‘Yāgas should not be performed; gifts should not be given; no kind of homa should be done. There is nobody but me to accept as Yājñapurāṣa the share of yajñas. I am the sole lord and consumer of yajñas.”

The sages were dumbfounded. They all approached Vena and impressed upon him the necessity of performing a Yāga to propitiate Mahāviṣṇu. Vena who got angry at this request of the sages told them thus: “There is nobody greater than I and I have none to be worshipped. Who is Hari, your Yaṁjcvara? (lord of the yāga). All such great powers who can bless and curse alike and such eminent deities and entities like Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Varuṇa, Śūrya, Agni, Dhātī, Pūṣā, Bhūmi and Candra are merged in me, the king. Do understand this fact and obey my orders.”

Despite repeated requests Vena did not give permission to conduct a Vaisṇava yajña. The sages got angry and cried aloud “Kill this wicked man”, “Kill this wicked man”. Saying thus the sages killed Vena by Kuśa grass made sacred and powerful by mantras—Vena, who was spiritually dead because of his contempt of the gods even before. Then the sages saw dust rising in columns from all sides and asked the people the cause of the same. The people said “When they knew that there was no king poor people have turned themselves into rogues and are plundering the wealth of the rich. The swift movements of these running in haste are raising dust from the ground below.”

The rājas conferred together and to get a son from the dead Vena they churned the thigh of the wicked king. Then from the thigh came out a short and black (as black as a burnt pillar) man with a compressed face who stood before the sages in distress and asked “What am I to do?” The sages said ‘Niśāḍa’ meaning ‘sit down’. He thus became Niśāḍa (an illiterate forest-dweller). He went to the mountain of Vindhyā and along with him went all the sins of Vena. Niśāḍas thereafter are said to be those who have destroyed the sins of Vena.

Then the sages churned the right hand of Vena and from it came out a brilliant boy of great strength and power and he was named Prṭḥu. At the time of his birth there dropped from heaven the divine bow Ajagava and many powerful arrows and a divine armour. All animate objects of the world were happy at his birth. Vena attained svarga for having delivered such a brilliant son. For the coronation of Prṭḥu the oceans brought very many precious diamonds and the rivers holy water. Brahmā along with Aiṅgrāses came and crowned Prṭḥu as the emperor. Brahmā saw the line of Candra in his right hand and was, therefore, pleased to know that he was part of Mahāviṣṇu. Thus Prṭḥu, valiant and brilliant, was crowned their emperor by the virtuous people of Bhārata.

He united his people by his love for them. When he travelled through the ocean the water stood still and when he travelled on land the mountains gave way and his flag-pole was never obstructed anywhere.

3) Sūṭa-Māgadhas. Brahmā in Sūta performed a yāga as soon as Prthu was born. From that yāga was born a very wise and intelligent demon named Sūta. A scholarly Māgadhas also was born from the yāga. The mahārṣis commanded the Sūta-Māgadhas to praise Prthu and they then said “Oh revered sages, we do not know anything good or bad about this king just born. He has not earned a name or fame. Then on what basis are we to sing praises about him?” The mahārṣis said that they should praise him for the qualities he should have in future. Prthu heard that and feeling elated decided to become a very virtuous emperor. When Prthu was thinking like that the Sūta-Māgadhas sang in melodic tones thus: “This king speaks the truth always, is charitable, is one who keeps his promises, is valiant and full of all good qualities.” Thus with the blessings and good wishes of all, Prthu started his reign.

4) Prthu attacks the Earth. The people were hungry for want of proper food crops. They approached Prthu and told him that during the short interval between Vena’s death and Prthu’s assuming charge the goddess of earth drew inside all her vegetation and so the people were put to great difficulties. They requested him to generate vegetation again.

Prthu got angry on hearing this and taking his bow Ajagava and several arrows went in search of the goddess of the earth. The goddess got frightened and fled taking the form of a cow. She went to all lokas but Prthu followed her with his bow and arrows everywhere. At last desiring to escape from the arrows of such a valiant king Bhūmidevi went to him and trembling with fear said “Oh king, why do you make such a persistent attempt, to kill me which would be the great sin of Surfadh? (killing a woman).” The Rāja replied that there was no sin in killing wicked persons. The goddess asked what refuge was there for the people if the earth was destroyed. The king said that he would protect his people by the power of his yoga. Bhūmidevi was frightened and she said “Oh king, I shall give you back all I have destroyed in the form of milk. Therefore, virtuous as you are, if you are really interested in the welfare of the people I shall allow you to milk me and take back everything you want. Do bring a calf.”

5) Prthu milks the Earth. Prthu by the end of his bow put in arrangement at one place the thousands of mountains which were lying scattered over the country. The mountains were not even and so there were formerly no divisions into villages and towns. There were no grain-plants like paddy or wheat, no agriculture, no cow-protection and no trade. It was since the time of Prthu that all these came into being. People desired to live in places where the grounds were even. Then the people lived on fruits, leaves and roots. When they were all destroyed people found it difficult to live. Therefore Prthu making Svāyambhuva Manu as calf milked for the welfare of his people all plants from the earth. People do live even today by what was milked then. Prthu, because he gave life to Bhūmidevi, became her father and she got the name Prthvi.

The brahmin sages milked the cow of earth again. Then Agastya became the calf and Bhāspati milked. When the planets milked, Candra became the calf and again Bhāspati milked. The devas even now feed on the Urjākṣīra (milk rich in food value) they got then. All the animals live because of their virtue and truth. The rṣis milked truth and virtue. The manes made Yama the calf and Antaka the milker. They milked Svadhā in a silver pot. The cobras and serpents making Takṣaka the calf milked poison making Dhrātarṣa the milker. They live by their poison which is their great defence also. The dānavas and dānavas using Virocana as calf and making the two-headed Rtvik Madhu as the milker milked jointly courage, valour and the sarvaśatruvināśiṇi māyā (māyā, the destroyer of all enemies). They milked in an iron pot. All their knowledge, bodily health, strength, vigour, brilliance and valour are made from this and that is why they are adept in the art of māyā even now.

Yakṣas milked in an iron pot milk that disappeared from the earth. Rajatānabha milked using Vaisravaṇa as calf. That Yakṣarājaputra was sarvajña (knowing all) and Sarvadharmanājī (consorptant with all charitable things) with two heads and eight hands. The rākṣasas, piśācas and wicked maruts using Rajatanabha as milker and Sumāli as the calf milked blood in a pot made of a skull. They live on this.

The Gandharvas and nymphs using lotus as their pot, Suruci as milker and Citraraṇa as calf milked music from her. The mountains making Mahāmeru as milker and Himalayas as the calf milked diamonds and medicines. The sacred trees made Sāla the milker and plakṣa the calf and milked in a pot of palāśa Chinmadhagharopana (the power of growing again even if cut or burnt). The siddhaguhyaśaścaśrāvyādyādhara also milked her each using different pots, calves and milkers and they all got what they wanted.

6) Āśvamedha. Prthu’s land became rich and prosperous. Then he performed an Āśvamedha. The Yāga horse was led by Viśjītaśva, son of Prthu. Indra did not like Prthu conducting the yāga. Indra hid at a place on the path of the yāga horse. The sage Atri helped Indra. Indra bound the horse and a fight ensued between Indra and Viśjītaśva in which Indra was deplorably defeated and confessing his guilt he craved for pardon and Prthu granting him pardon became his great friend. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

7) Prthu’s rule. In the history of Bhrārata the period of Prthu’s rule is considered a golden period. When Prthu became the emperor, Brahmā divided the universe into several kingdoms and made a separate ruler for each of them. Soma was appointed King of the stars, planets, brahmans, plants, āyās and austerities. He appointed Kubera as the lord of Kings, Varuna as the lord of all waters, Viṣṇu, as the lord of all adīyas and Pāvaka as the lord of all Vasus. Dakṣa was given lordship over prajāpatis, Indra over maruts, and Prahlāda over all dānavas and dānavas. Yama, the Dharmarāja was made lord of the manes. Airāvata was made King of all elephants and Garuḍa King of all birds. Ucchāśravas was made King of all horses and Viśabhā of all cattle. The lion was made King of all beasts and Himāvān the lord of all immovable things. Kapila became chief of all sages and the tiger the leader of all beasts with nails and snouts. Plakṣa was made the King of all trees.

After distributing kingdoms thus, Brahmā appointed Dīkālakas (guardians of the zones). In the east he posted Sudhanvā, son of Vairājaprajāpati, in the south he posted Saṅkhaṇāda son of Kardamaprajāpati, in the west he put Ketu'mān, son of Rajas and in the north Hiranyaromā. Thus Brahmade organised a universe with suitable emperors to control and supervise. (Chapter 22, Amīśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

8) The end of Prthu. After several years of benign rule Prthu became old. He then entrusted the affairs of the state to his son Vijñātāśva and left for penance with his wife Arccis. After doing severe penance for a long time he merged with Parabrahman. Arccis who was all along serving her husband with devotion ended her life by jumping into the funeral pyre of her husband following her husband like Laksīṁ following Viṣṇu.

9) Prthu's sons. Prthu had five sons named Vijñātāśva, Hārīyaśka, Dhūmrakeśa, Vṛka and Draviṇa. The eldest of these Vijñātāśva, with the help of his brothers ruled the country. Hārīyaśka ruled over the east, Dhūmrakeśa over the south, Vṛka, west and Draviṇa, north. (Padma Purāṇa).

PRTHU II. A virtuous brahmin of good conduct. Once when Prthu was travelling he met five ugly devils. They became devils for their sins of not doing any charity and behaving rudely with beggars. Prthu gave them advice on āhāra (food), ācāra (conduct) and vrata (vow) so that they might get salvation from their dev-ilives. (Chapter 27, Śrīpi Khaṇḍa, Padma Purāṇa).

PRTHUĐAKA. A sacred pond on the borders of Kurukṣetra. This is one of the celebrated tūrthas of Bhārata. He who bathes in this pond would get the benefit of doing an aśvamedha. (Chapter 83, Vana Parv; Chapter 39, Sāya Parv).

PRTHUĐARA. A celebrated Yakṣa. This Yakṣa got a daughter named Sāudāmīṇī. Her father took her to different mountains to entertain her. One day while she was playing with her companion Kapiṣṭabhṛu she met a Yakṣapura named Aṭṭāhāsa. They fell in love and Sāudāmīṇī's father agreed to their marriage and fixed it. After fixing the marriage Prthuḍāra took his daughter to his house. Next day her companion Kapiṣṭabhṛu came to Sāudāmīṇī in a sorrowful mood and when she asked her the reason she said “Friend, how am I to report to you this sad news. On my way to you I passed through a garden named Citarathala in the valley of the Himālayas. To have some sport with the love-stricken Aṭṭāhāsa his friends staged a drama in which Aṭṭāhāsa was made Vaiśravaṇārāja and his brother Dīptāśka, Nakalūvara, and the rest, his ministers. They were thus acting and enjoying when Nakalūvara himself came that way and seeing his servant Aṭṭāhāsa in the robes and form of his father was angry and calling Aṭṭāhāsa to his side said: “A servant like you is ambitious of becoming a king. Let this ambition be the cause of your downfall. You will be born as man.” Aṭṭāhāsa was shocked and he craved pardon “Oh Lord, I did this only for some entertainment. I did not do it with any desire for a big position. Pardon me for my mistake. Nakalūvara then by his divine power understood everything and taking pity on him consoled him and said “She with whom you are in love will be your wife in your life as man. Your brother Dīptāśka will then be born as your son. Both of you will then be released from the curse. Dīptāśka after ruling the country for some time will also be free from this curse.” Aṭṭāhāsa and Dīptāśka soon disappeared by the power of the curse.

Aṭṭāhāsa was born as king of Trigartta in the name of Pavitradhara and Sāudāmīṇī became his wife. A son was born to them named Dīptāśka and as soon as he was born the parents were released from the curse and entered heaven. (Sāāṅkavatīlambara, Kathāsīrīt-sāgara, Tanaṇa 6).

PRTHUDARBHA. A king of the race of Aṅga. (Chapter 277, Aṇī Purāṇa).

PRTHUGRĪVA. When Rāma and Laksmaṇa were staying in Pāṇcavaṭī a demoness named Sārpaṇahā made approaches to them and Laksmaṇa cut off her limbs and sent her away. Then a rākṣasa army came under the leadership of Khara, Dūsana and Triśiras and Prthugrīva was one of the twelve prominent soldiers of that army. (Sarga 26, Aranya Kanda Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa).

PRTHUKA. A devaṇga of Raivata Manvanta.

PRTHULĀKṢA. A king born of the race of Aṅga. This king lived in the court of Yama and worshipped him. (Śloka 22, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PRTHULĀŚVA. A king of the race of Ikṣvāku. He was the son of Prthu and father of Adra. (Chapter 1, Brahmadeṇī Purāṇa).

PRTHUṆŚMI. One of those who are named ‘Yati’. The Yatis were a people of anti-yajñā feelings and were all burnt to death in Indra's fire of wrath. But three yatīs, Bhaḍadgrī, Rayovāja and PrthuṆśmi were taken care of by Indra and Indra taught them Brahma-vidyā, Kṣatriyavidyā and Vaiśyavidyā. PrthuṆśmi compelled Indra to grant him Kṣatra-ṛtta also along with Kṣatriyavidyā. There is now a sāma even in the name of PrthuṆśmi. (Paśca-viṇāsārāma).

PRTHUṆENA. A King of ancient Bhārata. (5th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PRTHUṆRĀVAS I. A King of Rgyveda times. Indra killed the enemies of this King. (Śūkta 116, Anuvākā 17, Mandalā 1, Rgyveda).

PRTHUṆRĀVAS II. Father of Kāmā, wife of king Ayutanāyā. He lived in the court of Yama. (Śloka 12, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parva).

PRTHUṆRĀVAS III. A sage of ancient Bhārata who was a friend of Yudhiṣṭhīrā. (Śloka 22, Chapter 26, Vana Parv).

PRTHUṆRĀVAS IV. A soldier of Subrahmanya (Chapter 46, Sāya Parv).

PRTHUṆRĀVAS V. A serpent. This serpent was present at Prabhāṣatīrtha to carry the soul of Balabhadrarāma, to Pāṭāla (Śloka 15, Chapter 4, Mauṣala Parva).

PRTHUVĀSTRĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanya (Chapter 46, Sāya Parv).

PRTHUVĒGA. A King of the court of Yama. (Śloka 12, Chapter 8, Sabhā Parv).

PRTHUVĪRŪPA. A beautiful king of a country called Pratiṣṭhāna. Once three wise yogins came to him and said “Oh King, we have travelled round the world. There is a princess in Muktidvīpa called Rupalatā. In beauty she will be a good match for you.” On hearing this Prthuviṇāsā calling the court artist Kumārādatta to his side said “Paint a picture of mine and go along with these three sannyāsins to Muktidvīpa and give the painting in private to the princess there and also bring me an exact painting of hers.""

The painter went to Muktidvīpa and the King coming to know of the talents of the artist Kumāradatta commissioned him to paint a picture of his daughter Rūpalatā. He did the work beautifully. The King was immensely pleased and he enquired if Kumāradatta had seen a suitable prince for Rūpalatā. Kumāradatta immediately showed him the portrait of Pṛthvirūpa. The king found the prince extremely suitable and entrusted the artist himself with the task of negotiating the marriage with Pṛthvirūpa. Kumāradatta returned to his King with the portrait of Rūpalatā and Pṛthvirūpa was infatuated with the dazzling beauty of Rūpalatā. Before long the marriage of Pṛthvirūpa with Rūpalatā was conducted in all grandeur. (Alaikāravatilambaka, Kathāsārītāgama, Tarāṅga 1).

PṛTHVĪTRTHA. A sacred pond on the borders of Kurukṣetra. He who bathes in this pond would get the benefit of doing a sahasrāgādāna (giving away as gift a thousand cows). (Śloka 13, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PUCCHĀNDĀKA. A serpent of the family of Takṣaka. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpasatra of Janamejaya. (Śloka 8, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PŪJANI. A bird of superior intellect. The story of Pūjani was told by Bhīṣma to illustrate that Kṣatryias can never be believed. There was once a king called Brahmadatta in the country of Kāmpīlya. The King had a bird named Pūjani. Pūjani was very intelligent and all-knowing and the king treated her as his friend. Days went by and one day the queen delivered a son. At the same time Pūjani also got a child. The prince and the little bird grew up as great friends. The little bird used to bring to the prince whatever eatable it could take in its little beak. They lived as such thick chums.

One day while Pūjani was away from the cage, the prince caught hold of the little bird and strangled it to death. When Pūjani came back she found her child missing and went about crying loudly. She then knew what had happened and got very angry. She flew and pricked blind the eyes of the prince and bade farewell to the King. The parting scene was very pathetic. Pūjani declared that Kṣatryias were not to be believed and flew away. (Chapter 139, Śaṅkī Parva).

PŪJĀVIDHI. Chapter 155 of Agni Purāṇa states the various acts of worship that should be done daily and the acts of worship observed by all brahmācārins during the time of Manusmṛti. You should rise up at Brāhmamuhūrtta. Finish your excretory routine sitting facing north during daytime and facing south during night time. If it is at dusk or dawn it should be done as during day time. It should never be done in public roads, water or grass. Wash with sand after your excretions and then wash your teeth. After that take your bath. Baths are of six kinds: Nitya-sānā, Naimittikasānā, Kāmyasānā, Kriyāgasānā, Malakarspasānā and Kriyāṣṇā. Any religious act done without a bath is of no use. Therefore you should bathe early. Well-water is good for bathing, water from a fountain is better, water of a lake is much better, river-water is still better and water of a tirtha is still better. The water of the river Gaṅgā is the best.

After washing after excretions you should enter into the waters and wash again and then wash your body. While washing you should recite the following mantras "Hiraṇyavarnaḥ, Śanno deviḥ, āpo hi śhā and idam-āpāḥ." You should submerge yourself in the waters and recite the mantras there under the water. You should also recite Aghamsaṇa sūkta or the Rk named Drupada. Gāyatri should be chanted specially. After the Japa you should rub dry with a cloth your head and body and then offer water to the devas and manes. Then you should worship with water reciting Puruṣa-sūkta.

You should give way to anybody carrying a load, a pregnant woman and preceptors. Never look at the Sun at the time of rising or setting. Never look at the reflection of the moon in waters. Never look at a nude woman. Do not peep into a well. Never trample over clothes and sacred ashes. Never enter the bedroom or the treasure room of another man. Those who rub mud blocks against mud block, cut their teeth or bite their nails will perish. Never enter a house through any other opening than its proper gate. Never interrupt when others are talking. Never use the clothes of another man. Tell everybody 'Bhadram' 'Bhadram' (well well). Never speak to displease anybody. Never walk on the shadow of an individual. Do not pass through the space between two respectable persons sitting and talking. Do not look at falling stars. Never mention the name of another river while in a river. Do not scratch your body with both your hands. Never cross a river before offering water to the devas and manes. Do not throw your excretions into the waters. Never bathe naked. After bath you should pray to gods for your welfare. Never take out a garland from your body by yourself. Avoid dust from the hooves of donkeys sticking to your body. Never laugh at low-caste people, nor live with them nor live in their places. Never live in a place where there are no rivers, doctors or a king. Nor live in a place ruled by barbarous people or a woman or by a number of people together. Never talk with women during their period of menses. If you have talked with them think of Viṣṇu. Never laugh, sneeze or yawn without covering your mouth. Wise man should hide the disgrace to one superior to himself and protect the words of the superior or his own. Never encourage too much activity of the senses nor should you check the pressure of excretions. Do not belittle even the smallest of ailments or the smallest of enemies. If you walk through public roads you should wash yourself. Never walk bearing water or fire. Do not hiss in the presence of respectable and virtuous people. Do not place one leg over the other leg. Never speak directly or indirectly things which are unpleasant to others. Avoid contempt of Vedas, Kings, sages, science and devas. Do not be jealous of women nor do place confidence in them. Always listen to virtuous talks, be devoted to the gods and observe righteous acts daily. On your birthday worship the moon, gods and brahmans. Never take an oil bath on the fourth (caturthi), sixth (gaṅgāṭh) and eighth (aśṭäm) days of lunar fortnight. Throw away your excretions far away from home. Never be unfriendly with venerable and noble people.
PULASTYA. One of the Prajāpatis. The references about him in the Purāṇas are the following:
1) Pulaha was one of the spiritual sons of Brahmā. (Sloka 12, Chapter 204, Vana Parva).
2) Kṣamā, wife of Pulaha, delivered three sons named Kardama, Urvārīvān and Sahiṣṭu. (Chapter 10, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
3) Pulaha got of his wife Kṣamā another son named Karmaśreṣṭha. (Chapter 20, Aṁśa Purāṇa).
4) Pulaha is included in the group of six powerful sages. (Sloka 4, Chapter 66, Aḍī Parva).
5) From Pulaha were born the butterflies, lions, tigers, lambs, wolves and Kimpuruṣas. (Sloka 3, Chapter 66, Aḍī Parva).
6) Pulaha took part in the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Sloka 52, Chapter 122, Aḍī Parva).
7) Pulaha was also among the sages who dissuaded Pārāśara from conducting a yāga to kill all the rākṣasas. (Sloka 9, Chapter 180, Aḍī Parva).
8) Pulaha was a member of the court of Indra. (Sloka 17, Chapter 7, Sābhā Parva).
9) Pulaha was a worshipper of Brahmā. (Sloka 18, Chapter 11, Sābhā Parva).
10) Pulaha did penance at a place on the shores of Alakanandā, a tributary of river Gaṅgā. (Sloka 6, Chapter 142, Vana Parva).
11) He took part in the Janmotsava of Subrahmaṇya. (Sloka 9, Chapter 45, Sālya Parva).
12) Pulaha is included in the twenty one Prajāpatis. (Sloka 35, Chapter 334, Śaṁti Parva).
13) Pulaha is one among the group of Saptarṣis called Citraśīkhaṇḍins. (Sloka 29, Chapter 335, Śaṁti Parva).
14) Pulaha is also one of the Aṣṭapraṇkrītis. (Chapter 340, Śaṁti Parva).

PULAKA. A dāitya who was transformed into an animal. There is a story in the Skanda Purāṇa about him thus—Pulaka performed penance and got from Śiva a boon that he should possess astonishing smell in his body. The demon used to entice even celestial ladies by means of his smell. He thus became a menace to the three worlds. Devas complained to Śiva. Śiva got angry and commanded him to abandon his demoniac form and become an animal. Pulaka agreed to do so but requested Śiva to grant him the smell even in his state of an animal. Śiva granted that.

PULASTYA. One of the Prajāpatis.
1) Birth and marriage. Pulastyā is one of the six spiritual sons of Brahmā. Pulastyā was born from the Karna—ear—of Brahmā. (Chapter 65, Aḍī Parva and Bhāgavata).
Pulastyā had a son named Dattoli (Dambholi) of his wife Pṛiti. This Dattoli in his previous birth was the Agastyā of Śvayambhuva Manvantara. (Chapter 10, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
Pulastyā had a son named Viśravas of his wife Havirbhūti. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata). Mahābhārata states that Pulastyā had two wives named Sandhyā and Pratīcī. Havirbhūti mother of Viśravas had another name, Māmīni.
All these statements taken together indicate that Pulastyā had four wives named Pṛiti, Havirbhūti, Sandhyā and Pratīcī.
2) Genealogy. The race formed by Pulastyā is given below: Pulastyā got a son named Viśravas of his wife Havirbhūti alias Māmīni. Viśravas had two wives named Kaikasi and Devavarṇīni alias Ilaibāli. Kaikasi had three sons, Ravaṇa, Kumbhakarna, and Viśiṣṭaṇa and a daughter named Śūrpaṇakha. Ravaṇa got of his wife Mandodari three sons, Meghanāda, Atikāya and Akṣakumāra. Kumbhakarna got of his wife Vajramālā two sons named Kumbha and Nikumbha. Viṣiṣṭaṇa got of his wife Sarama seven sons. Viśravas got of his wife Ilaibāli a son named Viśravaṇa alias Kubera.
3) Birth of Viśravas. In olden times in Tretāyuga Pulastyā Mahārṣi was doing penance on Mt. Meru. On a nearby hillock the sage Tṛṇabindu was also doing penance. Celestial maidens, Nāgā maidens and their lovers came to the áśrama and by their erotic sports and dances vitiated the precints of the áśrama. Pulastyā got angry and cursed all the maidens to become pregnant if they entered the áśrama area. Without knowing this curse Māmīni, daughter of Tṛṇabindu came to that spot and got pregnant of Pulastyā. Pulastyā then married her and the celebrated Mahārṣi Viśravas was born to her.
4) How he saved Rāvaṇa. Once Rāvaṇa who started on a victory campaign met Kārtavīryārjuna on the shores of Narmadā, Kārtavīryārjuna chained Rāvaṇa in the former’s prison. Pulastyā was griefed much to hear about the plight of his grandson and going to Kārtavīryārjuna and explaining things got the release of Rāvaṇa. (Chapter 46, Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa).
5) Other details.
(i) Pulastyā once blessed Pārāśara for the writing of Purāṇas. (Chapter 1, Aṁśa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).
(ii) Rākṣasas, Vānaras (monkeys), Kinnaras, Gandharvas and Yakṣas were born from the intelligent Pulastyā. (Sloka 7, Chapter 66, Aḍī Parva).
(iii) He was present for the Janmotsava of Arjuna. (Sloka 52, Chapter 122, Aḍī Parva).
(iv) Pārāśara once started to perform a Yāga to destroy all the rākṣasas. Pulastyā along with other sages went and persuaded him to withdraw from his venture. (Chapter 180, Aḍī Parva).
(v) Pulastyā was a member of the court of Indra. (Sloka 17, Chapter 7, Sābhā Parva).
(vi) Pulastyā sits in the court of Brahmā and worships him. (Sloka 19, Chapter 11, Aḍī Parva).
(vii) Once Pulastyā taught Bhīṣma the importance and greatness of all the holy places of Bhārata. From then onwards Pulastyā is called the Guru of Bhīṣma also. (Chapter 82, Vana Parva).
(viii) Pulastyā got of his wife Gau a son named Kuberā. (Sloka 12, Chapter 274, Vana Parva).
(ix) Viśravas was born of half of the body of Pulastyā. (Chapter 274, Sloka 13, Aḍī Parva).
(x) Pulastyā was present for the birth day celebrations of Subrahmaṇya. (Sloka 9, Chapter 45, Sālya Parva).
(xi) Pulastyā also visited Bhīṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Sloka 10, Chapter 47, Śaṁti Parva).
(xii) Pulastyā was one among the twentyone Prajāpatis. (See under Prajāpatī).
(xiii) Pulastyā is included in the group of Saptarṣis called Citraśīkhaṇḍins. (Sloka 29, Chapter 335, Śaṁti Parva).
(xiv) Pulastyā is one of the Aṣṭapraṇkrītis. (Chapter 340, Śaṁti Parva).
(xv) As synonyms of Pulastyā the following terms are used: Brahmaṇṣi, Vīprayoti. (Mahābhārata).
PULINDA(S) I. The people of the country of Pulinda. Information available regarding them from the Mahābhārata is given below:

1) Pulindas were originally Kṣatriyas. But they became Śūdras by a curse of the brahmins. (Chapter 33, Anu āsana Parva).
2) Pulindas who belong to the mleccha tribe became rulers in Kaliyuga. (Chapter 186, Vana Parva).
3) Pulindas were born from the foam of the celestial cow Nandiś of sage Vasistha when she got enraged. (Chapter 165, Āramaṇavāsa Parva).
4) Bhūma fought against the Pulindas and destroyed all their big cities. (Chapter 26, Sabhā Parva).
5) In the great Mahābhārata battle Pulindas fought on the side of Duryodhana. (Chapter 158, Udyoga Parva).

PULINDA(S) II. A mleccha tribe of ancient Daksīṇabhārata. The Vāmana Purāṇa gives some details regarding them.

PULINDI. See under Candaika.

PULKASA. A son born to a Kṣatriya woman of a Śūdra is called Pulkasa. (See under Cāturvarṇya).

PULOMĀ I. A demon. This asura belongs to the asura race born to Kaśyapa of Diti. This asura fell in love with Pulomi, wife of the sage Bhṛgu. (See under Cyavana). Śacidevi, wife of Indra, was the daughter of Puloman. (Chapter 19, Agni Purāṇa).

PULOMĀ II. (PULOMI). Wife of the sage Bhṛgu. (See under Cyavana for details).

PULOMĀ IIII. A demoness. Her sons are called Paulomas. This Pulomā had a sister named Kālakā. Both of them together did severe penance and pleased Brahmā. They got a boon from Brahmā to the effect that their sons would never be killed. The Paulomas were given a golden city in the air to live and he declared that that city could never be destroyed by anyone. (Chapter 173, Vana Parva).

PUM, PUT, PUTRA. Pum alias Put is a hell. Those who die without children go to this hell and he who saves one from this hell is called Putra. (Śloka 38, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva).

Purnāmno narākādyastu
Trāyate pitaraṁ suṭah/
Tasmāt putra iti praktaḥ
Svayameva svayambhuvā//
(Śloka 138, Chapter 9, Manusmṛti).
(Because a son of his own, by birth, saves a father from the hell called ‘Put’ he is called Putra).

There are twelve different kinds of ‘Putras’ (sons).
1) Aurasaputra. A son born to a wife of his own caste begot by the husband himself is called aurasaputra.
2) Kṣetrajaputra. If one dies without children or is impotent or possessed of a disease, his wife is lawfully allowed to live with the brother of the husband to get a child. The son born of such a union is called Kṣetrajaputra.
3) Dattaputra. When one is worrying miserably for getting a son and if at that time a husband and wife willingly hand over a son born to them by mutual consent with the following words: “This son becomes your own from now” with a religious sprinkling of water, such a son is called Dattaputra.
4) Kṛtrimaputra. A son adopted from one’s own caste for the purpose of doing the obsequial ceremonies for the manes is called Kṛtrimaputra.
5) Gūḍhatpanna. A son born to one’s wife by another man is called Gūḍhatpanna.
6) Apaviddhaputra. When a son is rejected by either a father or mother or by both and that son is taken care of and brought up by another man, that son becomes an apaviddhaputra.
7) Kānīnaputra. If a son is born to a virgin before marriage while living with her father, that son is called a Kānīnaputra.
8) Sahaḍhaputra. When a girl is married while pregnant the son born to her after marriage is called a Sahaḍhaputra.
9) Kṛtakaputra. A son purchased and brought up by a sonless man is called Kṛtakaputra.
10) Paunarbhavaputra. A son born to a woman after becoming a widow or after being divorced by her husband by her willingly going with another man is called a Paunarbhavaputra.
11) Svayaṇadattaputra. When a son after becoming an orphan or after being abandoned by his parents goes willingly to another man and remains with him as his son, that son is called Svayaṇadattaputra.
12) Šaundra (Pāraśava) Putra. A son born to a brahmin of a Śūdra wife.

PUNARJANMA. It is the theory that the soul of a man is born again after his death. The Purāṇas and Vedas contain many statements regarding this of which the following are a few:

1) What is Death? When the Jīvātmā (soul) of an individual leaves his body with all its upādhis (attributes and adjuncts) it is called Death. By upādhis are meant the following four things. (i) Mind and the senses. (ii) The five Prāṇas namely Prāṇa, Āpāṇa, Udāna, Vyāna and Samāna. (iii) The Śūkṣmaśāra, that is, the Prāṇa-manovijñānako asaṅghāta (the subtle body that is invisible with the grosser elements), (iv) Karman (action).

All these four things follow the soul even after his death. Only when the soul attains moṣa (salvation) do the upādhis leave it. It is the life-breath Udāna that guides the soul out of the body. It is the Śūkṣmaśāra that gives heat to the body while there is life and that is why when the soul leaves the body with the upādhis the body becomes cold.

2) After death. When the soul leaves the body with the upādhis it becomes active again and its activities and movements depend upon the actions of the soul while living. The spiritual actions of the individual are classified into three.

(i) Aparabrāhmaṇopaśana. He who has done all his deeds according to scriptural injunctions is said to be one who has done upāśana of aparabrahma. When such an individual dies his soul with all the upādhis attains Candra. He goes to Candra through dhūma (smoke), rātri (night), Kṛṣṇapakaṣa (the dark fortnight), daṅkiniyana-kāla (the sun’s passage south of the equator), piṭloka (world of the manes) and Ākāsa (ether). He enjoys the rewards of the deeds done on earth there and reserving some to be enjoyed or suffered in his next birth the soul with the upādhis comes back to earth to enter another body. The soul comes back to earth through ether, vāyu, dhūma, megha, varṣa, vriti, yava, auśadhi, vrksa, Tila, Purusābija and sirigarbha. When the Jīvātmā goes to Candra its padārthavatva (attribute) diminishes gradually and when it comes back to earth it increases gradually. Thus the jīvātmā takes thousands of births going to and from the moon. The jīvātmā coming back from the moon evolves from a plant to man. Plants are the food of man and the soul entering the plant enters the puruṣābha (semen virile) through food. The souls coming out as rebirths do accept wombs according to a definite principle. In the order of the merit of their good deeds on earth they are born in Brahmīn, Kṣatriya, Vaiśya or Śūdra wombs. The souls with great sins are born as worms and insects. This passage of the soul from earth to Candra and vice versa is called Pitrāyana.

(ii) Aparavidyopāsana. There are some people who do not consider performance of religious rites as important but worship Brahmā. They do not treat Brahmān and jīvātmā as one but view them as separate entities. Such devotees are called Aparavidyopāsakas. Their souls as soon as they leave the body move towards aparabrahma. The path to aparabrahma is through Agni, Jyotis, daytime, Suklapakṣa (the white fortnight), Utārāyana (the passage of the sun to the north), Sāvāt-sara (year), Śūryā (sun), Candra (moon) and Vidyut (lightning). The dhanyas (blessed ones) who attain Vidyut go to Varunaloka, Indraloka and Prājāpātīloka and then merge with parabrahma (the supreme being). This path is called Devayāna. Since for both Pitrāyāna and Devayāna the jīvātmā has to depend upon Candra it is to be surmised that there is some special connection between jīvātmā and Candra. Those who attain Aparabrahma by the path of devayāna do not come back to earth. They have no rebirths. Those who have merged with aparabrahma attain Brahmā by the end of a life-time of Brahmā. Thus those who attain Brahmā and do not believe that jīvātmā and Brahmā are one and view them separately attain Parabrahma through the merger with aparabrahma. This is called Kramamukti. Some sages are of opinion that those who attain aparabrahma enjoy prosperity by mind. Those who live attached to worldly pleasures but not do things prohibited by the Vedas attain Pitṛloka by the path of Dakṣaṇāyana. After enjoying all the accrued ‘punya’ there, they come back again to earth to be born again.

(iii) Pāppāpāsana. The jīvātmā of one who does not follow the injunctions of śāstras correctly does not attain Candraloka. It is born again as pests and insects attaining a place called Tṛṣīya. There is no evidence in the Purāṇas of their attaining mokṣa. How a soul subjected to rebirths attains mokṣa is described under ‘Mokṣa’. (Chāndogya Upaniṣad, Gitā, Bhāgavata, Śvetāsvatara Upaniṣad).

PUNARVASU ĀTREYA. An ancient preceptor of Āyurveda. He was the Guru of Agnideva author of the book ‘Agniveśa tantra’ which is the basis of Caraka-sanhitā and also of his classmates like Bhela.

Punarvasu was the son of the sage Atri who was one of the spiritual sons of Brahmā. In support of this statement it can be found in many places in Carakasaṃhitā his name referred to as ‘Atriśuta’ or ‘Atrianandana’.

Atri mahārṣi was also a learned preceptor of Āyurveda. According to Kaṣyapa sanhitā Devendra taught Āyurveda to Kaṣyapa, Vasiṣṭha, Atri and Bhrigu. The incomplete work ‘Āyurvedacakītsātantra’ by Atri was completed by Punarvasu according to Āśvaghoṣa. Punurvasu’s mother’s name was Candrabhāgā. Getting knowledge in Āyurveda from his father and also from Bharadvāja, Punarvasu became an authority on Āyurveda. His important work is ‘Ātreya sanhitā’. There are about thirty prescriptions in his name. The prescriptions regarding ‘Bālāśātāla’ and ‘Aṃtrāśātāla’ are found in Caraka-sanhitā.

PUNASCANDRA. A sacred place. This is situated in the Jamadagniveda in Śūrparakṣakaṭera. (Śloka 12, Chapter 88, Vana Parva).

PUCU. A King of Śūryavānśa (solar race). He was the son of Harita and father of Vījaya. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 1).

PUNDARIKĀ I. A King son of the race of Śī Rāma. He was the son of Nisadha and father of Kṣemadhanva. (9th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PUNDARIKĀ II. One of the Aṣṭādīgajas (elephants guarding the eight zones). (See under Aṣṭādīgajas).

PUNDARIKĀ III. A brahmin who lived during the period of Nārada. Nārada once held a scholarly conversation with him on virtue. He saw Mahāviśṇu in person and attained sāyujya (intimate union with a deity). (Chapter 124, Anuśāsana Parva).

PUNDARIKĀ IV. A great yajña. (Śloka 100, Chapter 5, Sabhā Parva).

PUNDARIKĀ V. A holy place situated on the border of Kurukṣetra. One who bathes in a sacred pond there would get the benefit of doing a Pundarikāyajña. (Śloka 83, Chapter 83, Vana Parva).

PUNDARIKĀ VI. A nymph. This maiden was present for the Jamnottava of Arjuna and performed a dance then. (Śloka 13, Chapter 122, Aṣī Parva).

PUNDARIKĀMUKHA. An eminent serpent King. His subjects, Pundarikāmukhas, lived with him in the beautiful serpent-city surrounded on all sides by gold castles. Gandharvas and Kinnaras of both sexes lived inside the city. A Gandharva of name Lalita fell in love with a Gandharva lady named Lalitā and they lived there happily enjoying amorous sports. One day Pundarikāmukha held a music concert in which Lalitā was asked to sing as the leading musician. His love Lalitā was absent at the assembly and Lalitā could not sing or dance in proper form that day. Karkaṭaka, a serpent chief, privately informed his King the reason for the poor display of Lalitā that day. The King got angry and cursed Lalitā thus: “Wicked one, you will be born as a man-eating rākṣasa. This is the penalty for thinking about your wife while singing for me.” Lalitā immediately became an ugly, fierce-looking demon. Lalitā deeply mourned over this pitiable plight of her husband and followed him in the forests where he roamed about making loud roaring sounds. While they were thus wandering in the forests, they found a pretty āśrama in which there was an ascetic engaged in penance. Lalitā stood before him with tears rolling down her cheeks. When the sage opened his eyes Lalitā told him that she was the daughter of the Gandharva named Viradhānva and that her husband had become a demon by the curse of the serpent King Pundarikāmukha. The sage advised her to observe Ekaḍā’i Vrata. She observed the Vrata with devotion and her husband Lalita, was freed from the curse. He became the former handsome Gandharva once again. They then went back to Gandharvaloka. (Chapter 49, Bhāga 4, Padma Purāṇa).
PUNḌARĪYAKA. A Viśvadeva. (Chapter 91, Anuśaṇa Parva).

PUNDRA I. An ancient King in Bhārata. (Śloka 224, Chapter 1, Ādi Parva).

PUNDRA II. An ancient region of Bhārata. The region comprised then the present district of Mālāda, certain portions on the east coast of river Kośī and certain portions of Dīnājpur. King Pāṇḍu conquered Pundra. (Chapter 112, Ādi Parva). The people of Pundra came to the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira with presents. The Paundrakavāsudeva mentioned in the Bhāgavata was the King of Pundra. Karnā and Arjuna conquered this country at different times. (Chapter 52, Sabhā Parva; Chapter 8, Karṇa Parva; Chapter 82, Aśvamedhika Parva).

PUNṆIKASTHALĀ. A nymph. She was the servant-maid of Bṛhaspati. One day she was collecting flowers for her Guru in a garden when a set of young men and women came to the garden for amorous sports. They were roaming about in the garden in pairs doing all sorts of erotic acts and Punjikasthalā stood watching them for some time with passion aroused in her. She returned to the āśrama thinking all the way about her miserable lot of having no husband to enjoy a similar life. She was full of lust when she returned to the āśrama and on seeing Bṛhaspati she caught hold of him by the hand and pleaded to satisfy her passion. Bṛhaspati was angry at this improper request and cursed her “You have become rotten. You have become lustful by seeing the amorous sports of others. May you be born as a monkey. Get out of this āśrama.” Punjikasthalā came to her senses and regretting her hasty act begged her Guru to grant her release from the curse. Bṛhaspati felt pity on her and said “Go and enjoy to your full sexual life with a lover whom you like best. Then you will get a son from the vitality of Śiva. When that son is born you will be released from the curse and you will go to heaven.” She became immediately a monkey girl named Aṇjānā and started living in a forest of that name itself. She fell in love with a monkey boy named Kesārī there and lived for many years enjoying an amorous life. She did not get a child even after several years and then she prayed to Śiva for a child. It was at that time that Pārvatī and Parameṣvar played amorous sports in the form of monkeys and Pārvatī became pregnant. Pārvatī expressed reluctance to be the mother of a monkey child and then Śiva by his divine powers deposited his semen virile through Viyubhagavān (god of wind) into the womb of Aṇjānā who was then praying to him for a child. Coming to know of this through Nārada and fearing that his lordship over the monkeys would be lost if such a monkey were born to Aṇjānā Bālī poured into the belly of Aṇjānā molten liquid of pañcałoha (five metals). Aṇjānā was not the least injured and she gave birth in due course to a monkey son who became the celebrated Hanumān, the life-force of the Rāma-Rāvaṇa tussle. (Pūrvakāṇḍa, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa; Kiskindhā Kāṇḍa, Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa).

This Punjikasthalā belongs to the famous set of eleven devakanyākās. They are: Menakā, Sahajānyā, Karnikā, Punjikasthalā, Rūṣṭhalā, Gṛḥtā, Pūrvacitī, Ulōcā, Pramločā, Urvāśī and Viśvāc. These were the celebrated court-zens of Svarṇa. (Chapter 125, Ādi Parva).

Punjikasthalā was the dancer at the court of Kubera. (Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva). She took part in the Jambotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PUNTĀNAM NAMBŪTIRI.

1) General information. The ilam (house) of this Nambūtiri who was a contemporary of Meppattūr Nārāyaṇa Bhaṭṭātirī in Nāmmeñi aṭiśa of the taluk of Valluvanāḍu in south Malabar. Though some say that his original name was Brahmadatta there are no sufficient records to support the statement. His Guru according to the work Śri Kṛṣṇakārnāmṛta was a nambūtiri named Nilakanṭha. Puntānām had only ordinary education. He worshipped Kṛṣṇa at the temple of Gūruvāyūr for a very long time and became a great devotee of Kṛṣṇa. He lived for ninety years. When he became very old he found it difficult to come to Gūruvāyūr for worship and so one day he bade farewell to the deity. Then a voice from heaven said “Do not worry. I will be near you on your left side.” He went and sat on a hill named Tirumāndha and to his astonishing ecstasy he found Kṛṣṇa sitting on his left side. He then constructed a temple there and installed his deity Kṛṣṇa there and continued his worship. That was the Vānapura (left place) of Puntānām.

2) Kṛtis (works). The following are the works of Puntānām: (i) Bhaṣākārnāmrta (ii) Kumārāharanam (Pāṇa) (iii) Jñānapāṇa (iv) Pārthasārathistava (v) Ghanasāṅga (vi) Nārāyaṇakārtana (vii) Govindaṁaṁkārtana (viii) Anandanta (ix) Dvāsāsāṅgarāmanāṁkārtana (x) Śrīkṛṣṇakārtana (xi) Aṣṭāṅgaśarākārtana (xii) Brahmāparagovindaṁkārtana (xiii) Gopālakṛṣṇakārtana (xiv) Gaurikārtana (xv) Vānapureśākārtana (xvi) Padmanābhaṁkārtana (xvii) Vivekodayākārtana (xviii) Jayakṛṣṇakārtana (xix) Viṭākolkārtana (xx) Śrī Rāma Kārtana (xxi) Mukundākārtana (xxii) Daśāvatārastotra. Besides these he has composed some philosophical songs in Tamil also.

3) Jñānapāṇa. Puntānām got a son after a long time of prayer and for the ceremony of Annaprāṇa (feeding rice for the first time) all the people of his community were invited. The women who came for the function threw their upper garments on to the cradle where the little child was suffocated to death. Puntānām thereafter became disgusted with life and Jñānapāṇa was written at that time.

4) Santānagopālam. Puntānām spent most of his time in the temple of Gūruvāyūr after the death of his child. It was at that same time that the great scholar Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭātirī, author of the famous Nārāyaṇiya, was in the temple worshipping the deity there. Puntānām had written a poem Santānagopālam in the pāṇa style and he took it to the great pandit Nārāyaṇa Bhaṭṭātirī for correction. With the haughtiness that was his trait he said “What is there for correction in a Malayālam poem? Nothing but blunders will there be in it. Especially when Puntānām is not well-versed in Sanskrit grammar. It will therefore be full of mistakes.” Puntānām could not contain the rebuff and he wept bitterly. Then from the inside of the temple came a voice which said “Though Puntānām is not a grammarian like you Bhaṭṭātirī, he is a greater devotee of mine than you. His Bhakti is more appealing to me than your vibhakti.” The divine voice made Bhaṭṭātirī feel sorry and ashamed of his behaviour and he begged Puntānām to grant him pardon and immediately went through his work giving suggestions for improvement.

PU\NYA I  Son of the sage Dirghatamas. The story of Punya as found in Jñānavāṣīṣṭha is the following:—

There is a mountain called Mahendra in Jambudvīpa. Dirghatamas who was doing penance there had two sons named Punya and Pāvana. Punyakumāra grew up into a boy abounding in virtues. Pāvana was not so broad-minded. When after some time Dirghatamas, their father died, Punyakumāra controlling his sorrow did all the funeral rites; but Pāvana unable to control his sorrow left the place and wandered in the forests weeping bitterly. After some days Punyakumāra went in search of his brother and on finding him consoled him and told him that there was nothing to be worried about their father’s death. On hearing the learned and moral teachings of Punya, Pāvana also got enlightened and after living in that forest for a number of years both of them abandoned their lives.

PU\NYA II  The name of the āśrama of the sage Vībhāṇḍaka. (Sloka 23, Chapter 110, Vana Parva).

PU\NYAJANA. A rākṣasa. Raivata, king of Kuśasthali, born of the race of Saryati, went to see Brāhma. Taking advantage of his absence from the place Punyajana took control over Kuśasthali. Afraid of the demon all the brothers of Raivata left the country. After some time the Saryātī dynasty merged with that of Hēhayā. (Chapter 2, Amśa 4, Viśū Purāṇa).

PU\NYAJANĪ. Wife of Manaibhadra, one of the Sivapāṛśadas. Her father’s name was Kṛatasūta. Manaibhadra got thirteen sons of Punyajani. (Chapters 3 and 7, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa).

PU\NYAKRT. A Viśavēdeva. (Sloka 30, Chapter 91, Anuśasana Parva).

PU\NYANĀMA. A soldier of Subrahmānya. (Chapter 45, Salya Parva).

PU\NYANIDHI. A king of the lunar race. The King was a great devotee of Viśū and he went to Rāmeśvara to do worship of Viśū there. Pleased with the pure devotion of the king Mahāviśū started living at Rāmeśvara under the name of Setumādhava. (Chapter 3, Skanda Purāṇa).

PU\NYAŚILA. A brahmin who was residing on the banks of the river Gāvārī. Once Punyaśila engaged a brahmin widower for officiating in a Śrāddha ceremony. As a result of that sin Punyaśila’s face became that of a donkey. To be freed from the sin he went and bathed in the Śvāmiśīrthī and Akāśagañāṭīrthī of Veṅkaṭeṣa. His sin was washed away and his face regained its original form. (Chapter 2, Skanda Purāṇa).

PU\NYAŚRAVAS. A sage. This mahārṣi who was a great devotee of Viṣṇu was born to the brother of Nanda gopa, during the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Kṛṣṇa, as a daughter named Lavanāgā. (Pāṭāla Khaṇḍa, Padma, Purāṇa Chapter 72).

PU\NYATOYA. A river seen by the sage Mārkaṇḍeya when he moved about inside the belly of Bālamukunda. (See under Mārkaṇḍeya).

PURA. A demon.

PURAMĀLĪNĪ. A river of Purāṇī fame. (Sloka 21, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PURANDARA I. Indra.

PURANDARA II. Tapa, son of the agni called Pāncejanya. Indra once became the son of this Purandara. (Sloka 3, Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

PURANDARA III. The name of Indra in Vaivāsvata Manvantara. (See under Manvantara). In Matsya Purāṇa Purandara has been considered to be one among the eighteen Vāstuśrāvakās (adepts in house building). The other seventeen are: Bhūgu, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Viṣvākarma, Maya, Nārada, Nagnajit, Viśālvēka, Brāhma, Kumāra, Nandīsa, Saunaka, Garga, Vāsudeva, Śukra, Brhaspati and Aniruddha. (Matsya Purāṇa, Chapter 252, verses 2 and 3).

According to Mahābhārata Lord Śiva wrote a book ‘Viśālvēka’ containing ten thousand chapters dealing with Dharma-rhakāmas. Purandara condensed it into a book of five thousand chapters called ‘Bāhudantaka’. Purandara gave that book in honour of his mother, who was called Bāhudantī. (Chapters 59, 89 and 90, Sānti Parva).

PURANJANA. A king. The story of this king was told to king Pracīnabharis by Nārada to illustrate the truth that those who kill yajiṇa cows on earth would surely suffer its consequences at one time or another.

Puranjana once started on a tour after killing a few yajiṇa cows. His aim was to build a new palace. After walking alone for a long time he reached the neighbourhood of Himālayas. While wandering in the forests he saw a beautiful garden and by its side a big castle with nine tower-gates. It was the residence of the Gandharva lady Puranjani. She had innumerable girl companions and her castle was guarded by a five-hooded cobra called Prajāgiri.

Puranjani fell in love with Puranjana at first sight and their greetings and subsequent talks ended in their marriage. Thus Puranjana became the husband of Puranjani and they lived happily an erotic life for a hundred years. Then one day the king went for hunting alone. Even that separation for a little while from Puranjani was unbearable to Puranjana and he returned to his palace soon. Puranjani did not come to receive him. On enquiry her companions informed the king that Puranjani was lying on the floor with grief unable to bear the separation from the king. Puranjana consoled her and they lived again for many years in perfect happiness. Then one thing happened.

Kāla had a daughter named Kālakanyakā who lived a very wicked and vicious life. She wanted to get married but nobody wanted to be her husband. She went about in search of a husband. Puruś became her husband for some time but she was soon divorced by him. She approached a Yavana king named Bhyā who had a brother called Prayāra. Bhyā did not want to take that woman as his wife and so sent her back with a boon that she could stand in hiding and enjoy all men she liked. He sent his brother Prayāra for her help. She found about that for some time and came back again to Bhyā. Kālakanyakā, Bhyā and Prayāra joined together and gathering a strong army attacked Puranjana. A grim battle followed which lasted for several years in the end of which Puranjana was defeated and taken captive. While he was being taken as a prisoner a herd of wild cows attacked Puranjana and he was killed. After that he was born as a princess named Vaidarbhī. Malayadhvaja, king of Pāṇḍya, married her and got seven celebrated sons. Agastya married the daughter of Malayadhvaja. (4th Skanda, Bhāgavata).

PURANJAYA. A king of Ayodhyā. See under Kāikutṣha.
PURANA.

1) General information. The Amarakośa describes a Purāṇa thus:

Sargaṇa pratisargaṇa
Vāṁśa manvantarāṇi ca/
Vāṁśānucaritaṁ cāpi
Purāṇam pañcałakaśaṇam //

According to this definition, Purāṇa is one which describes Sarga, Pratisarga, Vāṁśa, Manvantara and Vāṁśānucarita. Among these Sarga and Pratisarga are natural creation and renovation (Cosmogony). Vāṁśa means history of sages and patriarchs. By Manvantara is meant the period of different Manus. Vāṁśānucarita means Genealogy of kings. In the Purāṇas which are current now some of these five divisions are wanting.

Statements about Purāṇas are found even in the Brāhmaṇas. Therefore it is to be surmised that Purāṇas existed even before historic times. Mahābhārata has used the term Purāṇa to mean stories about devas and Siddhas. The Upaniṣads say that Purāṇas are ihithāsas and as such constitute the fifth Veda. Śrīmānti says that Purāṇas are commentaries on Vedas. From all these statements it can be gathered that Purāṇas have a hoary past. The great Sanskrit scholar Raṅgacārya has defined Purāṇa as Purā nava (Purā = old; nava = new) meaning things which are as good as new though existing from olden times. Though there are large portions of wide imagination dealing with the human side in the Purāṇas many truths about the universe can be grasped from them. All the Purāṇas contain praises of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Mahēśvara. In most of the Purāṇas of old, new additions and interpolations are seen. The Purāṇas in original were in existence before Christ.

(i) Viṣṇu Purāṇa. This is one of the most important of all the Purāṇas. This contains the five technical divisions of the Purāṇas. This is divided into six amāsās. This deals with the events of Vārāhakalpa and contains twenty-three thousand ślokas. The theme is the ten incarnations of Mahāviṣṇu. Viṣṇu Purāṇa is the most ancient of all the Purāṇas and has got the name Purāṇaratna (gem of Purāṇas).

The method of narration is in the form of teaching his disciple Maitreyā by sage Parāśara. Since there is a reference in it to the Maurya dynasty it is to be surmised that this was composed in the first or second century A.D. The narrator himself states thus: "Vyāsa an adept in the composition of Purāṇas composed this Purāṇasamhitā with akhyāṇas, Upākhyaṇas, gāthās and Kalpaśrīyās. A Sūta named Romaharsha was Vyāsa's chief disciple. The broad-minded Vyāsa gave that sāṁhitā to that Sūta. Romaharsha had six disciples named Sumati, Agnivarcas, Mitra-vān, Sāṁśāpaya, Akṛtavrata, and Sāvarni. Of these Akṛtavrata, Sāvarni and Sāṁśāpaya were born in the Kašyapagotra have composed Purāṇasamhitās. There is yet another sāṁhitā composed by Romaharsha which was the basis of the sāṁhitās of his three disciples. I have composed Viṣṇupurāṇa basing on the above four sāṁhitās."

If a man gives as gift a book of Viṣṇu Purāṇa on the full moon day in the month of āsādha (July) with Jaladhenu he will attain Viṣṇupāda.

(ii) Bhāgavata Purāṇa. This is the most popular and widely circulated of all the Purāṇas. It is dear to Viṣṇu-devotees. Divided into twelve Skandhas this contains eighteen thousand ślokas. All the incarnations of Viṣṇu are described in this. The most interesting Skanda is the tenth Skanda in which the author has described the life and activities of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. There was once a belief that it was Baladeva who lived in the thirteenth century A.D. that had composed this Purāṇa. But this belief was smashed when it was found that Valālasena of Bengal who lived in the eleventh century A.D. had made references to this Purāṇa in some of his works. Bhāgavata accepts Kapila and Buddha as incarnations of Viṣṇu. This has been translated into all Indian languages. This book has to be given as gift on the full-moon day in the month of Proṣṭhapada (September). Agni Purāṇa instructs that this book is to be given along with a golden image of a lion.

(iii) Nārada Purāṇa. This is in the form of a narration by Nārada to Śanatkumāra. In this book of twenty-five thousand verses Nārada teaches the dharmas of Brāhatkalpa. If this is given as gift on the full-moon day in the month of Āsvin there will be great prosperity.

(iv) Garuda Purāṇa. This is in the form of instructions to Garuḍa by Viṣṇu. This deals with astronomy, medicine, grammar, and with the structure and qualities of diamonds. This Purāṇa is dear to Vaiṣṇavoris. The latter half of this Purāṇa deals with life after death. The Hindus of north-India generally read this Purāṇa while cremating the bodies of the dead. This has given great importance to the origin of Garuḍa. There are eight thousand verses in this book. This book should be given as gift along with an image in gold of a swan to get prosperity.

(v) Pādma Purāṇa (Pādma Purāṇa). This book is divided into six Khaṇḍas comprising fifty-five thousand verses. The six Khandaśas are Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa, Bhūmikhaṇḍa, Svargakhaṇḍa, Pātālakhaṇḍa, Uttarakhaṇḍa and Kṛiṣyāgagāśa. The Uttarakhaṇḍa describes the importance of all months and also the lotus, the seat of Brahmā. This contains the stories of Sakuntalā and Śrī Rāma as described by Kālidāsa in his works Sākuntalā and Rāghuvīraśa which has made some believe that this Purāṇa was written after Kālidāsa. If this Purāṇa is given as gift with a cow in the month of Jyeṣṭha (June) it brings prosperity.

(vi) Varāha Purāṇa. The mode of narration is in the form of narrating the story by Varāha, the third incarnation of Viṣṇu. The theme is about holy places and mantras. It states that the goddess of earth prayed to Mahāviṣṇu and that prayer took the form of a goddess. This book contains fourteen thousand verses. If one copies down this Purāṇa and gives it as gift along with a golden image of Garuḍa on the full-moon day in the month of Caitra (April) one will attain Viṣṇuloka.

B. Purāṇas relating to Brahmā.

(i) Brahma Purāṇa. This is in the form of teachings by Brahmā to Dakṣa. This contains twenty-five thousand verses. This is called Ādi Purāṇa also. There is a special treatise in this book on Orissa, an ancient holy region of Bhārata. There is in this a special annexure explaining the intimacy between Śiva and Śūrya which is a deviation from other Purāṇas. Brahma Purāṇa states about a sūryakṣetra (sun-temple) situated at a place called Koṇārkā near the holy place of Purī, installed there in the year 1241 A.D. If this Purāṇa along with Jaladhenu is given as a gift on the full-moon day in the month of Vaiśākha (May) the donor will attain heaven.

(ii) Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa. This deals with the origin of the universe as told by Brahmā. In the beginning there was a golden egg and the prapaṇca (universe with its activities) was formed out of it. Portions of Adhāyāmā Rāmāyaṇa, references to Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa and the incarnation of Parasūrāma are included in this. This book contains twelve thousand verses and it is believed to be uttama (best) to give this book as a gift to a brahmin.

(iii) Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa. This was instructed to Sāvarnika by Nārada. The theme is the story of Rathantara. There are four khandaśas in this Purāṇa called Brahmakāṇḍa, Prakṛtikāṇḍa, Ganeśakāṇḍa and Kṛṣṇajanakkāṇḍa. This deals with Prapaṇcaśṛṣṭi (creation of the universe). It says that Prapaṇca is nothing but the Vaiivartta (transformation) of Brahman. It is considered to be holy to give this book containing eighteen thousand verses as a gift on the full-moon day in the month of Māgha (February).

(iv) Markandeyā Purāṇa. This is one of the ancient Purāṇas. There are many stories regarding Indra, Śūrya and Agni in this. This includes a division called Devmāhātmhya containing praises about the goddess Durgā. This contains nine thousand verses and it is considered as uttama (best) to give this book as a gift to a brahmin on a full-moon day in the month of Karttika (November).

(v) Bhaviṣya Purāṇa. This is what is told to Manu by Śūrya (Sun). This contains statements about future events. The book praises the worship of Śūrya (Sun), Agni (fire) and Nāga (serpent). There is an annexure dealing with the several holy places of Bhārata and the rights of pilgrims. The book contains fourteen thousand verses and it is considered to be uttama (best) to give this book along with treacle as a gift to a brahmin on the full-moon day in the month of Pauṣa (January).

(vi) Vāmanā Purāṇa. There is a great similarity between the contents of this Purāṇa and that of Varāha Purāṇa. All the incarnations of Viṣṇu from Vāmanā downwards are described in this Purāṇa. The scene of Śiva marrying Pārvatī is vividly described in this book. This Purāṇa contains ten thousand verses and it is considered to be uttama (best) to give this book as a gift in the autumn season or at the time of Viṣṇuva to a brahmin.

C. Purāṇas relating to Śiva.

(i) Viśṇu Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is told by Viṣṇu. Bāṇabhāṭṭa who lived in the seventh century A.D. makes references to this Purāṇa in his works. There are many references in this Purāṇa about the Gupta Kings who ruled Bhārata in the 4th century A.D. So it is believed that this Purāṇa must have been written in the fifth or sixth century A.D. The book contains plenty of verses in praise of Śiva. There are fourteen thousand verses in the Viṣṇu Purāṇa and it is considered to be best to give this book as a gift to a brahmin on the full-moon day in the month of Śrāvaṇa (August).

(ii) Liṅga Purāṇa. This contains instructions of Śiva on Dharma sitting in the form of liṅga (Phallus). The twentyeight different forms of Śiva are described in this. This contains twelve thousand verses and if this book is given as a gift to a brahmin with tiladhenu on the full-moon day in the month of Phālguna (March) the donor will attain Śivasāyujya.

(iii) Skānda Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is narrated by Skanda. The theme is the slaughter of the demon Tārakāśura by Skanda (Subrahmaṇya). There is a great similarity between this Purāṇa and the Kumārasyambhava of Kālidāsa. There are eightyfour thousand verses in this Purāṇa and giving this book as a gift is thought to be good.

(iv) Agni Purāṇa. This Purāṇa was instructed to the sage Vasishṭha by Agnideva. There are several references in this to Śivalīlīga and Durgādevī. The incarnations of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa are also dealt with in this. Distinct from other Purāṇas this book deals with arts and science like Kavyālaṅkāranāṭakas (Poems, dramas, figures of speech), Jyotīśāstra (Astronomy) and Śilpa-kalā (architecture). This Purāṇa contains twelve thousand verses and is capable of imparting knowledge on all arts and sciences.

(v) Matsya Purāṇa. This Purāṇa was taught to Manu by Matsya, the incarnation of Viṣṇu. The incarnation of Matsya is dealt in this. Several subjects like Jainamata (religion of Jainism), Buddhamaṭa (Buddhism), Nāyaśāstra (historianics) and Āndharaajavāraṇa (kingdom and Kings of Andhra) are discussed in this book. The book contains thirteen thousand verses and this is to be given as gift along with a golden image of a fish at the time of Viṣṇuva.

(vi) Kūrma Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is taught by Kūrmāmurtī (incarnation of Viṣṇu as Kūrma (tortoise) while narrating the story of Indradyumna at Pātāla. All the seven islands and seven oceans are described in this book. Bhārata is situated in the centre of all these and is called Jambudvīpa. Though it is believed that there were four sanhitās for this, only the Brahmasanhitā is available now. It includes Varagīṭa and Viṃśagīṭa.
The book contains eight thousand verses and is to be given as gift along with a golden image of tortoise.

3) Upapurāṇas. There are eighteen minor Purāṇas besides the eighteen major ones. They are:—(1) Sanatkumāra (2) Nārada (3) Naradīya (4) Śiva (5) Durvāsas (6) Kāpila (7) Māñava (8) Uṣānas (9) Vārūṇa (10) Kālika (11) Samba (12) Saura (13) Ādiya (14) Māleśvara (15) Devībhāgavata (16) Vaiśiṣṭha (17) Viṣṇudharmottara’ (18) Nilamata Purāṇa.

The two Upapurāṇas mentioned lastly are associated with Kashmir. The first is about the Vaiśāṇava religion there and the second about the wise saying of a Nāga King of the place called Nila.

(Purāṇas; History of Sanskrit Literature).

PŪRĀṆA. An ancient sage. He was one among the ārṣis who visited Bhiṣma lying on his bed of arrows. (Śloka 12, Chapter 47 Sānti Parva).

PŪRĀVATI. A river of Bhārata of Purāṇic fame. (Śloka 24, Chapter 9, Bhīṣma Parva).

PŪRĀYA. A King of Vedic times. He is mentioned in the dānastuti of Rgveda.

PŪRĪKĀ. A city in ancient Bhārata. This city was ruled by a King named Paurīka. (Śloka 3, Chapter 111, Śaṃti Parva).

PŪRṆA I. A serpent born of the family of Vāsuki. It was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 2, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆA II. A Devagandhavarna born to Kaśyapa of his wife Pradrā. (Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆA III. The name of the tithis (lunar days) Pañcapari, Daśamī and Pañcadāśī. Yudhiṣṭhīra was born on the Pañcamī day called Pūrṇā. (Śloka 6, Chapter 122, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆABHĀDRA I. A celebrated serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆABHĀDRA II. The son of a Yaśo called Ravnabhadra living on the mountain Gandhamādāna. He had a son named Harikēśa (Piṅgala). Harikēśa was a devotee of Śiva and so Pūrṇabhadra who was a devotee of Kubera sent Harikēśa away from his house. Harikēśa was then taken care of by Śiva and made one of his attendants. (Matsya Purāṇa, Chapter 18).

PŪRṆAMUKHA. A serpent born of the race of Dṛgharāṣṭrā. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 1, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆĀNGADA. A serpent born of the family of Dṛgharāṣṭrā. This serpent was burnt to death at the Sarpa-satras of Janamejaya. (Śloka 16, Chapter 57, Ādi Parva).

PŪRṆĀYUS. A Devagandhavarna who was the son of Kaśyapa of his wife Pradrā. (Śloka 46, Chapter 65, Ādi Parva).

PŪROJAYA. A minister of Duryodhana. It was under the guidance of this minister that the lac-palace was constructed and set fire to in order to kill the Pāṇḍavas. Purocana was also burnt to death when the lac-palace was destroyed by fire. (See under Arakkila).

PŪROJAYA. The youngest son of the Vāsū, Prāna, born to his wife Urjjasvati. (6th Skandha, Bhāgavata).

PŪROVASU. A King of the Aṅga line of Kings. He was the son of Babhruseta. He ruled over the country of Gāndhāra. (Chapter 270, Agni Purāṇa).

PŪRU I, A Kṣatriya King. He was the son of Manu. Manu had eleven sons of his wife Nādvalā.

PŪRU II. A mountain. (Śloka 22, Chapter 90, Vana Parva).

PŪRU I. A celebrated king of Candravānīa.

1) Genealogy. Descending in order from Viṣṇu are Brahmā—Atri—Candra—Buddhā—Pūruravas—Āryu—Nahuṣa—Yavāṭi—Pūru.

Yavāṭi had two wives named Sarmiṣṭhā and Devayānī. Sarmiṣṭhā gave birth to Druhyu, Anu and Pūru. Devayāṇi gave birth to Yadu and Turvasu.

2) Pūru becomes king. Yavāṭi, Pūru’s father, was turned into an old man by a curse of Sukrācarya. The king called all his sons to his side and requested each to take his old age and give him their youth. All the elder sons refused to do it but Pūru agreed to do so. Taking the youth of Pūru, his father, Yavāṭi lived a sensuous life for a thousand years. Then the king gave back Pūru his youth and crowned him as the heir apparent to his kingdom. (See under Devayānī).

3) Other details.

(i) Pūru got of his wife Kauśalāya alias Pauṣṭi three sons named Janamejaya (Prāvīra), Iśvara and Rauradāśa. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva).

(ii) After his death Pūru entered the court of Yama. (Śloka 8, Chapter 8, Sābha Parva).

(iii) Pūru along with Indra in the latter’s Vīmaṇa witnessed the war between Arjuna and the Kauravas. (Śloka 10, Chapter 56, Vīraṇa Parva).

(iv) A king called Māṇḍhātā once defeated Pūru in a battle. (Śloka 10, Chapter 62, Droṇa Parva).

PŪRṆA II. The name of the charioteer of Arjuna. (Śloka 30, Chapter 33, Sābha Parva).

PŪRUCHEPA. (PARUCCHEPA). A sage praised in the Rgveda. He was the son of Divodāsa. (Maṇḍala 1, Rgveda).

PŪRṆUJIT. A king who was the son of Kuntībhūja and brother of Kunti, mother of the Pāṇḍavas. He had a brother named Kuntībhūja. In the great battle he fought against Durmukha of the Kaurava army. When he died Pūrṇuji went to Yamaloka. (Chapter 14, Sābha Parva, Chapter 6, Kaṇḍa Parva, Chapter 23, Droṇa Parva).

PŪRṆUKUTSA. The son born to the celebrated king, Māṇḍhātā of his wife Bindumati. (See under Maṇḍhātā for Genealogy). Pūrṇukutsa had a brother named Mucukunda. Descending in order from Pūrṇukutsa were Aranya—Bṛhaspatya—Haryāśva—Tridhanvā—Arūga—Satyavrata—Trīśānu.

One Pūrṇukutsa is praised in the Rgveda. It is not known whether both are one and the same person. Pūrṇukutsa with his wife Narmadādevi went to the forest of Kurukṣetra and doing penance there attained mokṣa. (Chapter 20, Ārāmavāsika Parva).

PŪRUMĪDHA. A king of Puruvamā. He was the son of Bṛhatputra. Bṛhatputra had two more sons named Ajāmīḍha and Dvīmīḍha. Of these three sons the most valiant Ajāmīḍha became the propagator of the dynasty. (Chapter 278, Purāṇa).

PŪRṆUMĪTRA I. One of the eleven valiant sons of Dṛgharāṣṭrā. In the great battle of Mahābhārata Abhimanyu wounded this soldier. (Chapter 73, Bṛhṣma Parva).
PURUMITRA. II. The first Mañḍala of the Rgveda mentions a Rājārṣi youth Vimada marrying the daughter of Purumitra.

PURUNĪTHA. See under Parunītha.

PURURAVAS. I. A prominent king of Candrawanīa (lunar race).
1) Origin of Candrawanīsa and birth of Pururavas. Descending in order from Brahmā came Atri—Candra—Buddha Pururavas. The dynasty which came from Candra was called the Candrawanīsa. Though Buddha was the first king of Candrawanīsa it was Pururavas who became celebrated. The story of the birth of Pururavas is given below:

Brahmā in the beginning deputed the sage Atri for the work of creation. Atrimahārṣi started the penance called anuttara to acquire sufficient power for creation. After some years Saccidānanda brahma with an aura of lustre reflected in the heart of that pure and serene soul. In sheer ecstasy tears rolled down his cheeks and the glittering flow of water was lustfully drunk by the zones taking the form of women with a view to producing progenies. They became pregnant but were unable to bear the embryo of Atri and so they threw them away. Brahman took them all and made them into nine armed youth and took him in his chariot to his land. Then the brahmārṣi requested Brahmā to make him their lord. When the rṣis, devas, gandharvas and nymphs praised him reciting sānveda the majestic lustre of the youth increased. It was from this that ausadhas (medicines) originated and that is why Candra is considered to be the lord of medicines, dvija and Vedasvarūpa. The Candramandala is full of chemicals. It increases and decreases according to the white half and black half of the moon-based month.

Dakṣa gave in marriage to Candra twenty-seven beautiful maidens. Then Candra did penance meditating on Viśṇu for ten thousand Kalpas. Viśṇu pleased by his penance asked him to name a boon and Candra said "When I perform a yāga in svarga all the devas like Brahman should come in person to my yāgaśāla and take the yāgāhāga. Śūlapāṇi should remain as a watchman at my Rājāṣṭaya." Accordingly with the blessing of Viśṇu, Candra conducted the yāga in which Atri, Bhṛgu, Brahmā, Viśṇu, Devas, Vasus, Maruts and Viśvadevas took part. Candra gave as yāga-fees to Ṛtviks all the three worlds. The yāga was complete and when Candra rose up after a bath nine devis fell in love with the amorous beauty of Candra. Lakṣmī, wife of Viśṇu, Sīvālī, wife of Kardama, Dvuiti, wife of Vībhivaśu, Puṣṭi, wife of Dhatā, Prabhā, wife of Sūrya, Kūhā, wife of Havīśmān, Kīrtī, wife of Jayanta, Mohni, wife of Kaśyapa and Dhṛti wife of Nanda, abandoned their husbands and went with Candra. Candra treated them all as his own wives and gave them erotic pleasure to their hearts' content. Those who saw this non-virtuous act stood dumbfounded unable to curse Candra.

Attracted by the dazzling brilliance of Candra Tārā, wife of Bṛhaspati, went with him. Enraged at this, Bṛhaspati joining with other devas prepared for a fight against Candra. Devas took sides and by the mediation of Indra a conference of both the parties was held and Tārā was sent back to Bṛhaspati. Tārā was pregnant then and Tārā confessed that the child in her womb was that of Candra. So when that child was born Candra took it away and named it Budha. Brahmā and other rṣis gave Budha a seat among the planets.

Budha married Iļā and they got a son named Pururavas. (See under Iļā). After that Budha performed a hundred Aśvamedhayāgas. He then enjoyed world prosperity as lord of Saptadvipa living in the beautiful Himādri-śringa, worshipping Brahmā. (Chapter 12, Bhāga 3, Padma Purāṇa).

2) Testing Pururavas and the curse. Pururavas by his brilliance performed a hundred Aśvamedhayāgas and lived in glory at Himādri-śringa. Great demons like Kesi became his servants. Urvasī attracted by his beauty became his wife. While he was living like that Dharma, Artha and Kāma went in disguise to his palace to test him. He received them all well but paid more attention to Dharma. Artha and Kāma got angry and cursed him. Artha cursed him saying that he would be ruined by his greed and Kāma cursed him saying he would go mad by being separated from Urvasī. Hearing that Dharma blessed him thus: "You will live long leading a virtuous life. Your race will increase and remain in glory till the end of the moon and the stars. The insanity caused by your passion for Urvasī would end by the end of sixty years. That celestial maiden would remain then with you for one Manvantara." (Chapter 12, Bhāga 3, Padma Purāṇa).

Pururavas used to visit Indra daily. One day while he was going through air wellarmed with a bow and arrows he saw a demon named Kesī carrying away by force Urvasī and Cītralakā and after defeating Kesī in a fight recovered the nymphs and gave them back to Indra. Indra praised Pururavas and in his honour a drama, Lakṣmīvyanivarana, was enacted by Urvasī, Menakā and others. Urvasī taking the part of Lakṣmī started to dance but seeing Pururavas before her she became lustful and made wrong steps. Nārada who was present at the function got angry and cursed her "You will forget all you have learnt. Not only that, you will live as a creeper separated from Pururavas for a period of sixty years." (For details see under Urvasī). Padma Purāṇa says that it was Bharata who cursed Urvasī. This story is slightly different from that found in the other Purāṇas.

3) Sons of Pururavas. Urvasī got eight sons of Pururavas named Ayus, Dṛśāhāyaus, Vasyāyus, Ḍanāyus, Vṛtṛmaṇ, Vasi, Divijāta and Subhā. Of these Ayus became the propagator of the dynasty. Of the sons born to Ayus five sons, Nahuṣa, Vṛṇḍhāśarma, Rajī, Dambha and Vipāmā became celebrities. A hundred sons were born to Rajī. They were called Rājeyas. (Chapter 12, Bhāga 3, Padma Purāṇa).

Some Purāṇas state that Pururavas had six sons while some state that he had seven sons.

4) Other details. The following references are made about him in the Mahābhārata.

(i) Once Pururavas stole the wealth of some brahmins. The brahmins took Sanatkumāra along with them and made representations to the king. Pururavas did not give back their wealth. The brahmins cursed him and as a result the prosperity of the King waned. Then Pururavas brought down from svarga three Agnis and performed a yāga and thus regained his lost splendour and prosperity. (Chapter 75, Ādi Parva).
(ii) Purūravas got six sons of Urvasī named Āyus, Dhīmān, Amāvasu, Dhṛṣṭāyus, Vanāyus and Śatāyus.
(iii) Once he asked Vāyu the wind-god about the origin of the four castes and the superiority of the brahmans over other castes. (Sloka 3, Chapter 72, Sānti Parva).
(iv) At another time he discussed about yajñapurohitas with Kaśyapa. (Chapter 73, Sānti Parva).
(v) Iksvāku gave Purūravas a sword which in his old age he gave to his son Āyus. (Chapter 166, Sānti Parva).
(vi) He once declared that one can attain svarga by the blessings of brahmans. (Sloka 31, Chapter 6, Anu-śāsana Parva).
(vii) Purūravas was famous as a donor of cows. (Sloka 26, Chapter 76, Anuśāsana Parva).
(vii) Purūravas never ate meat. (Sloka 65, Chapter 111, Anuśāsana Parva).
PŪRŪRAYA. A king of the race of Dīptākṣa.
(Sloka 15, Chapter 74, Udyoga Parva).
PŪRA. See under Prakṛti.
PŪRAŚĀDAKA. An ancient place. (Chapter 57, Sabhā Parva).
PŪRAŚANTI. A mahārṣi well-praised in the Rgveda.
The Aśvindevas once saved him from trouble viz. Turvīti, Dabhitī, Dhvasanti and Puruṣanti. (Sūkta 113, Anuvāka 16, Maṇḍala 7, Rgveda).
PŪRUSOTTAMA. Śrī Krṣṇa. He got this name because of his Pūraṇa (filling) and Sadana (sitting) (Chapter 70, Udyoga Parva).
PŪRUYĀŠA. A king of Pāṇcāla. He was the son of Bhūriyāśas. The King became more and more prosperous observing 'Vaisākhadharmā' following the instructions of the King's preceptors Yāja and Upayāja. (Chapter 2, Skanda Purāṇa).
PŪRVĀḤIRĀMĀ. A river of Purāṇic fame. (Sloka 22, Chapter 9, Bhṛgūma Parva).
PŪRVACITTI. A celebrated celestial maiden. She belongs to the group of six celebrated nymphs named Urvasī, Pūrvacitti, Sahajāyā, Ghṛtācī, Viśvācī and Menakā. (Sloka 68, Chapter 74, Ādi Parva). Pūrva-citti was present for the Jannmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva). When Arjuna went to svarga Pūrvacitti and others danced in his honour. (Chapter 43, Vana Parva).
PŪRVADIŚA (PŪRVADIK). The East.
Of all the sides Pūrvadiśa is the most prominent.
1) The Sun rises in the east.
2) The sādhyas come and do severe penance in the east at dusk.
3) The moon rises here.
4) The result of offering havya to the fire spreads to the east.
5) The daughters of Daḵṣa after becoming the wives of Kaśyapa delivered in the east.
6) Devas made Indra the king of the east.
7) Indra and the devas did penance jointly in the east.
8) Because the devas accepted this side first (pūrva)
the side got the name Pūrvā.
9) The Sun gives away as gifts the yajur Mantras at this place.
10) The devas drink the soma juice facing the east.
11) Varuṇa once entered Pātāla by the east and attained prosperity.
12) Indra selected the sacrificial animals at this place.
13) The soul of man comes to Svarga and the earth through the east. (Chapter 108 Udyoga Parva).
PŪRVAPĀLĪ. An ancient king. The Pāṇḍavas invited this king for the great Mahābhārata battle. (Sloka 17, Chapter 4, Udyoga Parva).
PŪRVĀŚRAMA. A sacred place on the shores of the river Sarayu. While going along the shores of this river with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, Viśvāmitra showed the boys this aṣṭrama and explained to them its importance.
It was at this place that Śiva burnt Kāmadeva (god of love) to death. Kāmadeva got the name Anāṅga at this place. (Bāla Kāṇḍa, Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sarga 23).
PŪṢANĀ. A female follower of Subrahmanyā. (Sloka 20, Chapter 43, Sālāya Parva).
PŪṢA I (PŪṢAN). Pūṣa attended the Jannmotsava of Arjuna. (Chapter 122, Ādi Parva). When Arjuna and Krṣṇa fought against Indra at Kaṁdavprastha Pūṣa stood as an ally of Indra. (Sloka 35, Chapter 226, Ādi Parva). Once all the devas together performed a yāga and not knowing the importance of Śiva, they did not invite him to the Yāga. Śiva attended the function uninvited. The devas did not like it and they attacked Śiva. The twelve adītyas as a team fought against Śiva and in the fight Pūṣa lost his teeth. (Chapter 18, Sauptika Parva). Once Pūṣa presented to Subrahmanyā two warriors named Pāṇitaka and Kālika.
PŪṢA II. (PŪṢAṆ). Another name for the Sun. (Sloka 16, Chapter 3, Vana Parva).
PŪṢKALĀ I. A valiant soldier who fought on the side of Rāvaṇa. Hanumān fought against this soldier defiercely. (Bhāg 2, Padma Purāṇa).
PŪṢKALĀ II. The youngest son of Bharata, son of Dāsaratha. Maṇḍavī was the mother of Puṣkala.
(Chapter 88, Vāyu Purāṇa; Chapter 6, Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa; Chapter 4, Viṣṇu Purāṇa; Chapter 11, Agni Purāṇa).
Details available about Puṣkala from Padma Purāṇa and Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa are the following :
1) Puṣkala was with Śatrughna when the latter served as the guardian of the horse in all the three Śaṁvedha-yāgas conducted by Śrī Rāma. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapters 1 and 22).
2) He defeated Damana, son of Subāhu, while he was following the sacrificial horse. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 34).
3) He fought fiercely against the demons, Viḍyunmāli and Ugraḍaṁśṭra. (Padma Purāṇa. Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 34).
4) He fought against Ruṁmāṇa and Viṛmana, (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 41).
5) He was defeated by Lava who checked the progress of the sacrificial horse. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 61).
6) Puṣkala conquered the country of Gāndhāra and built there a city called Puṣkalāvāṭi alias Puṣkalavāṭa and made it his capital city. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Uttara Kāṇḍa).
7) His wife's name was Kāntimāti. (Padma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 67).
PŪṢKARA I. Son of Varuṇa. Soma's daughter was attracted by the beauty of Puṣkara and married him.
(Sloka 12, Chapter 98, Udyoga Parva).
PŪṢKARA II. The younger brother of Nala. It was this Puṣkara who jointly with Kali defeated Nala in a game of dice and drove him away from his country.
At last Puṣkara apologised to Nala and gave him back his country. (See under Damayanti).

Puṣkara III. A sage. He was the Guru of Para-su-rāma. (Chapter 151, Agni Purāṇa).

Puṣkara IV.
1) General information. This is a holy place situated 36 Kilometres to the north of Ajmer. Brahmā once did penance there. There is a temple of Brahmā there. Padma Purāṇa gives a story about the origin of this tirtha:—

Once Brahmā came to a place holding a lotus. Then Brahmā saw Vajrānābha who was engaged in penance for the destruction of the devas. Suddenly the lotus in the hands of Brahmā fell down making a thundering noise. The sound was so loud that its vibrations killed Vajrānābha. From that day onwards the place was known as Puṣkara.

2) Other details.
(i) Arjuna spent the period after his pilgrimage in this tirtha. (Sloka 14, Chapter 220, Adi Parva).
(ii) Once sage Pulastya praised the greatness of Puṣkara. (Sloka 20, Chapter 82, Vana Parva).
(iii) Sage Dhaunyā praised the greatness of Puṣkara-tirtha. (Sloka 16, Chapter 89, Vana Parva).
(iv) Once the god of death came and did penance at this place. (Sloka 26, Chapter 54, Drona Parva).
(v) Once Brahmā performed a Yāga at this place and then Sarasvatī rose up from the place in the name of Suprabhā. (Sloka 5, Chapter 38, Salya Parva).
(vi) If one performs penance at this place peacefully one can attain mokṣa. (Chapter 297, Śanti Parva).

Puṣkara V. A mountain in the island of Puṣkara. This mountain is full of precious stones. (Sloka 24, Chapter 12, Bhīṣma Parva).

Puṣkara VI. One of the seven islands. The other six are Jambudvīpa, Plākṣadvīpa, Sālmalidvīpa, Kuśadvīpa, Kraunḍadvīpa, and Śākadvīpa. (8th Skandha, DeVī Bhāgavata).

PuṣkaraDhāraṇī. The wife of a sage. There was once a sage named Satya in the country of Vidarbha. PuṣkaraDhāraṇī was the wife of Satya. Satya who believed in Ahinsā performed a Yāga with fruits and roots. It is believed that no yāga is perfect if performed without a sacrificial goat. But even his wife for fear of a curse did not object to a Yāga of the kind.

There was another sage living in that forest in the form of a deer due to a curse and he was a great friend of Satya. The deer came to the place of the Yajña and requested Satya to kill him as the sacrificial animal to make the Yāga a success. Satya did not agree to that but then Sāvitri devi appeared in person and compelled him to kill the deer and conduct the Yāga. With great reluctance Satya killed the deer and conducted the Yāga; but the power of penance of Satya faded away by that deed of his. Then PuṣkaraDhāraṇī performed penance to regain the power of her husband and Dharma appeared in person and blessed Satya. (Chapter 272, Śanti Parva).

PuṣkaraKṣa I. A King of Purānic fame.
There was once a King called Bhadrākṣa in Takṣaśilānagarā. He worshipped Bhagavatī with 108 lotus flowers daily in order to obtain a son. One day he found one flower missing and the brave king tore open his heart and made the number complete. The goddess was pleased and she blessed him saying that he would have a son worthy of becoming an emporor. PuṣkaraKṣa was the son thus born.
The boy grew up and after crowning him as King Bhadrākṣa left for the forests. PuṣkaraKṣa worshipped Śiva daily to get a suitable wife. After some time Śiva blessed him saying that he would get a very good wife.
One day he went for hunting. He saw a camel trying to eat two cobras engaged in the act of mating. Instantly the King sent an arrow against the camel and the camel falling down turned into a Vidyādhara and that Vidyādhara told the King thus:—“Oh King, there was once a Vidyādhara named Raṅgamāli. A Vidyādhara maiden named Taṁravati was attractive by the handsome form of Raṅgamāli. She married him without the consent of her parents. The angered father separated them by a curse. The curse took effect and they soon got separated losing their way in the forest. Pining to see her husband Taṁravati roamed about in the forests and reached the other shore of the western sea. It was a colony of rāśis and there was a fig tree there standing in full blossom. Taṁravati took the form of a beetle and sat on the tree sucking honey. After some days Raṅgamāli also came to the place. On seeing her husband she had emission and from the virile fluid was born a fig fruit. After that both of them flew to the Ganḍharva loka. I am Raṅgamāli. One day a sage named Jitāsva came that way and this fruit fell before him. From the fruit came out a beautiful maiden and Jitāsva with his divine power understood the whole story behind it and so took the girl to his āśrama and named her Vinayavatī. Vinayavatī grew into a beautiful maiden and stayed in the āśrama. One day by accident I happened to see her and attracted by her beauty tried to rape her. She cried aloud and hearing the noise the sage came out and cursed me and turned me into a camel. I pleaded for mercy and the sage said I would be released from the curse when I was killed by the future husband of Vinayavatī, PuṣkaraKṣa by name. Oh King, I am now released from the curse and you should go to the forest named Surabhimārūta on the other side of the western sea and marry that maiden.”

PuṣkaraKṣa was pleased to hear this and the king going back to the palace and entrusting the administration of the state to his ministers left for the forest of Surabhimārūta. Reaching the shore of the western sea he was thinking of ways to cross the sea when he saw a Bhadrakāli temple nearby. When he went to the temple he saw a violin in front of it and taking it he played on it a few songs in praise of Kālī and went to sleep in the temple. The goddess was pleased with his songs and took the sleeping king to the other side of the sea. When he woke up next morning he saw himself on the other shore and was pleasantly surprised. He walked about on the shore and saw an āśrama and peeping in saw a sage sitting inside. On seeing the king the sage told him thus “Oh PuṣkaraRājā, Vinayavatī in search of whom you have come here has just gone to pluck flowers for her worship. She will come just now and you can then accept your wife of your previous birth as your wife of this life.”
The King wanted to know more about Vinayavatī when the sage said she was his wife in his previous birth also. Then the sage said: “Once there was a Vaiśya called Dharmasena in Tāmraliṣṭī. He married a girl named Vidyulakṣā. All their wealth was stolen by thieves and grief-stricken they attempted to commit suicide by jumping into the fire. They saw two swans flying towards them and without waiting for them to reach them they committed suicide. In their next birth they became a swan couple. They lived on a date tree during rainy seasons. Once in a storm the tree died down and in the darkness each went its own way.
In the morning the male swan started searching for his mate. In the end he found her in the lake of Mānasa in Svarga. They lived there happily till the rainy season was over and then they went and stayed on a mountain. One day a forester killed the she-swan and while coming with the dead swan in his hands he saw a set of armed men coming that way and the frightened forester threw the dead swan into a lake nearby.
The dead swan came in touch with the Mṛtasañjīvani herb in the pond and coming to life flew away.
The husband swan went into another group of swans and lived there in sorrow. One day a fisherman came and caught all the swans in a net. At that time the she-swan came there and finding her husband in the net felt very sad. She was thinking of some way to get her husband released from the net when a man came to bathe in the pond. He wrapped the diamond necklace of his in a cloth and placed it on the shore. The she-swan took the necklace and flew making the fisherman see everything before him. Seeing the swan going with the necklace the fisherman went after it. The swan flew to a mountain nearby and placed it on its top.
The fisherman started climbing up and the she-swan then flew back and released her husband from the net.
One day while they were flying making a lotus as an umbrella a hunter shot them down with arrows.
Fortunately the lotus fell on an idol of Śiva and by the power of Śiva they were born in their next birth as a king and a woman. The king is yourself and the woman is Vīṇavatā."

Puṣkarākṣa married her there and returning to his land lived happily for a long period. (Taraṅga 2, Śaṅkāvatilambaka, Kathāsārītāgāra)

Puṣkarakṣa II. A king. Puṣkarakṣa, son of king Sucandra, was cut to death by Parakūrāma. (Brah-māṇḍa Purūṇa, Chapter 3)

Puṣkaramālikī. A very virtuous woman. She was the wife of a sage named Satya who lived on alms in the country of Vīdarbhā. Because she was very strict and perfect in the observance of vrataś she became lean but pure. She was very obedient to her husband and she made her own dress out of peacock feathers gathered from forests. Puṣkaramālikī was against sacrificing cows in yajñas. (Chapter 246, Śanitī Parva)

Puṣkariṇī I. Wife of Ācārī Manu. Ācārī got of Puṣkariṇī a son named Manu. (Chapter 18, Agni Purūṇa)

Puṣkariṇī II. Wife of Bhūmanu, emperor of Bhārata. Bhūmanu got of his wife Puṣkariṇī, six sons named Suhotra, Diviratha, Suhotā, Suhavis, Suyajus and Reika. (Chapter 94, Ādi Parva)

Puṣkariṇī III. Wife of king Umukha. Umukha got of his wife Puṣkariṇī six sons named Avīg, Sumanas, Khyāti, Kratu, Aṅgiras and Gaya. (4th Skandha, Bhāgavata)

Puṣpa. A serpent born of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka
13, Chapter 103, Udyoga Parva)

Puṣpadamśtra. A prominent serpent of the family of Kaśyapa. (Śloka 12, Chapter 35, Ādi Parva)

Puṣpadanta I. One of the Asādīcagajas. (The eight elephants of the quarters)

Puṣpadanta II. One of the three soldiers given to Subhrahmanyas by Parvati. The other two were Umāna and Śaṅkukarna. (Śloka 51, Chapter 45, Sālyā Parva)

Puṣpadanta III. One of the attendants of Śiva.
Due to a curse Puṣpadanta was born on earth as Vararuci.
(See under Vararuci). There was another curse also on him. (See under Jambukēśvara)

Puṣpaka I. A divine Aerial Chariot.
1) Origin. Vīṣvakarmā had a daughter named Sañjīṇā.
She was married to Śūrya. But Sañjīṇā could not live with Śūrya for long because of the terrible heat and so she came back and told his father about it. At once Vīṣvakarmā ordered Śūrya to come to him and the former then tried to reduce his brightness by rubbing him on a grindstone. However much he tried, he was not able to reduce even an eighth of his brightness.
The brightness of the Sun which was rubbed out spread in the atmosphere as suspended lustrous particles.
Vīṣvakarmā collected that lustrous dust and from it created four brilliant things. The Cakrāyuddha of Mahāvīṣu is one, the Trisūla of Śiva is another, and the third is Puṣpakavimāna (Puṣpaka Aerial chariot).
The fourth is Śakti, a weapon of Subrahmanya. Vīṣva-karṇa gave them all as presents to Brahmā. (Chapter
2, Arīνa 2, Viśnu Purūṇa)

2) How Kubera got the Puṣpaka. Vaiśravaṇa alias Kubera was the son born to Vīṣravas of his wife Devavaramīni, daughter of sage Bharadvāja. Vīṣravas did penance to please Brahmā to get a son and Vaiśravaṇa was born by the blessing of Brahmā. Kubera also, even while he was a boy, went to the valley of Himāvān and did penance there. Kubera did penance for ten thousand years with his head downwards in cold water and another ten thousand years in Pañcāgni standing on one leg. At that time Brahmā appeared in person and asked what boon he wanted. He said he wanted to be one of the lokapālakas (guardians of the universe). Granting Kubera that, Brahmā gave him two treasures named Saṅkhanidhi and Padmanidhi and also the Puṣpakavimāna. After that Kubera built a city named Lāṅkā on the mountain of Trikṣuṭa in the southern ocean and started living there.
3) How Rāvana got the Puṣpaka. Vīṣravas had three more sons named Rāvana, Kumbhakarna and Viṣhīṣaṇa. They did penance and acquired divine powers.
Rāvana then went to Lāṅkā and after defeating Kubera and sending him north captured Lāṅkā and made it his capital. He also took by force the Puṣpaka from Kubera.

All the victory marches of Rāvana were in this Puṣpaka.
Once Rāvana was going in his Puṣpaka with a Yakṣa beauty kidnapped from Alakāpurī when the girl cried loudly attracting the attention of Sampāti, a vulture King. Sampāti attacked Rāvana with his fierce beak and powerful claws. Rāvana’s weapons proved futile against Sampāti and the bird broke the Puspaka into pieces. But the Vimāna was a divine one and it regained the original shape and utility soon. All the weapons of Rāvana were destroyed, the great weapon Candrahāsa was thrown away. The crown of Rāvana was struck down and trampled upon. With his sharp beak and piercing claws Sampāti made bruises on the face of Rāvana. Unable to bear the attack of the mighty bird Rāvana begged for peace. Sampāti asked Rāvana to release the Yakṣa girl which Rāvana did at once. Rāvana then returned to Laṅkā in the Puspaka (Kiskindhā Kanda, Kamba Rāmāyaṇa). It was in this Puspaka plane that Rāvana kidnapped Sītā. In the battle that followed, Rāvana was killed and the Puspaka Vimāna came into the possession of Vibhiṣaṇa who gave it as a gift to Śrī Rāma. Śrī Rāma sent it back to its original owner, Kubera. But Śrī Rāma used it again for once. A Śūdra named Sambūka started performing penance in Rāmarājaṇya as a consequence of which there started a series of infant deaths in the country. Śrī Rāma knew the cause and he got down by meditation the Puspaka Vimāna from Kubera. When the plane came from Kubera Śrī Rāma got into it and flew to the place where Sambūka was doing penance and on reaching there killed the Śūdra and saved the country from a calamity. The Vimāna was then sent back to Kubera. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

PUSPAKA II. The great forest lying on one side of the mountain Latāvaṣṭa situated to the south of Dvārakāpurī. (Chapter 38, Dāksiṇāyata Paṭha, Sabhā Parva).

PUSPĀNA. A Yakṣa. He lives in the court of Kubera. (Sloka 17, Chapter 10, Sabhā Parva).

PUSPARĀGAPRĀKĀRA. (RATNĀṢALĀ). The Purāṇa states about a fort made of diamonds called Pusparāga shining red above the heavenly place called Maṇḍipīpā above Brahmaloka. This fort is seven yojanas high. All things inside it, the ground, the trees, the birds, the animals, plants, creepers and gardens are puspāraga-studded and look red like saffron. Therefore the fort is called Ratnasāla also. All the dikpālakas of the universe live with their family and attendants in this fort. (12th Skandha, Devī Bhāgavata.)

PUSPARATHA. The chariot of the King called Vasumanas. This chariot was capable of travelling through air, mountains and oceans. (Chapter 198, Vana Parva).

PUSPĀRĀṇA. A King born of the family of Dhruva. He married a girl named Prabhā. (Skandha 4, Bhāgavata.)

PUSPAVĀHANA. A King of Rathantaraka. He got ten thousand sons of his wife Lāvanyavatī. Puspa-vāhana was a hunter in his previous birth. He used to give daily lotus flowers to a harlot who was doing worship of Viṣṇu observing the Dvādaśīvratra. He was doing this service with such devotion that in the next birth he was born under the name Puspa-vāhana (carrier of flowers). The sage Bṛgu once told him about his previous birth and asked him to observe dvādaśīvratra. Puspa-vāhana observed the vrata and attained bliss. (Śrīṣṭi khanda, Padma Purāṇa).

PUSPAVĀN. A King. This King who ruled supreme over all the three worlds also met with his death. The story of this King was quoted by Bhiṣma to illustrate that everything is transitory in this world. (Chapter 277, Śānti Parva).

PUSPĀVAṬṬI. A sacred place. If one stays here for three nights fasting and bating in the holy pond there one would get the benefit of making a thousand godānas (cow-gifts) and his family will be absolved of all sins. (Sloka 12, Chapter 85, Vana Parva).

PUSPOTKATĀ. Mother of Kubera.

1) Genealogy. From Brahmā were born two demons Heti and Praheti. Heti married Bhayā, daughter of Kāla and to them was born a son named Vidyuṭkeśa. Vidyuṭkeśa married Sālakaṭānkalī daughter of Sandhyā and to them was born a son named Suке-a. They abandoned the child in a forest and went away. Śiva took care of the child Śuke-a who married Daiva-varti daughter of the Gandharva called Maṇḍipīmaya and she delivered three sons named Mālīyavān, Sumālī and Mālī and all the three started living in the crystal palace built at Laṅkā by Viśvakārmā. At that time a Gandharva woman called Narmadā delivered three daughters named Sundari, Ketumati and Vasudhā. When they came of age Sundari was married to Mālīyavān, Ketumati to Sumālī and Vasudhā to Mālī. Mālīyavān got of Sundari seven demons named Vajrapuṣṭi, Virūpākṣa, Durmukha, Suptagha, Yajñakeśa, Matta and Unmattam and a demoness of name Naḷā. Sumālī got of Ketumati ten sons named Prahasta, Akampana, Viśaka, Kaḷakāmukha, Dhumrākṣa, Daṅḍha, Supavās, Samhrāda, Prakvāta and Bhāsakarṇa and four daughters named Vekā, Puspatokta, Kaikaśi and Kumbhinasi. Mālī got of Vasudhā four sons named Anala, Anila, Aha and Sampāti. Sumālī wandered in the forests with his daughters. He gave all the four daughters in marriage to Viśravas, son of Pulastya. Viśravas got of Kaikaśi three sons named Rāvana, Kumbhakarṇa and Vibhiṣaṇa and a daughter named Śurpaṇakhā. Viśravas got of Puspatokta a son named Vaśravana or Kubera. (Chapter 11, Agni Purāṇa; Chapter 275, Vana Parva, Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

PUṢṬI. A daughter born to Dakṣaprajāpati of his wife Prasūti. Dhrama married her. Puṣṭi had twelve sisters. Dhrama married them also. Besides these thirteen daughters Dakṣa got of Prasūti another eleven daughters. They were Khyāti, Satī, Sambhūti, Smṛti, Priti, Kṣamā, Saṇtati, Anasūyā, Uṛjā, Śvāhādevī and Svadhā. They were married in order to Bṛgu, Śiva, Marici, Arīgīra, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Agni and the Piṭṛs. (Chapter 7, Aṇīsa 1, Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

PUṢṬIMATI. Another name for the agni called Bharata. If this agni is appeased there will be health. (Chapter 221, Vana Parva).

PŪṬĀṆĀ. A demoness who was killed by Kṛṣṇa at Ambāḍi. Her previous birth, her relationship with Kaṁsa and such other details are found differently in different Purāṇas.

1) Kṛṣṇa and PūṭāṆā.

(i) PūṭāṆā was the daughter of a demoness called Kaitavi and was the servant maid of the wife of Kāma. She had a younger sister called Vṛkodarī. (Adi Parva, Chapter 18).

(ii) Pūtanā was the dhātrī (foster-mother) of Kāma. She entered Gokula in the form of a bird. (Harivaṁśa, Chapter 2, Verse 6).

(iii) Pūtanā was the sister of Kāma and the wife of Gṛṣṭodara. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa).

2) Pūtrajanam (premious birth).

(i) Pūtanā in her previous birth was born as the daughter of Mahābāli bearing the name Ratnamālā. When Vāmana appeared before Mahābāli during the time of the latter’s Yaśīa, Ratnamālā mentally desired thus:—“Oh if only this Vāmana became my child! I could have then breast-fed him.” Vāmana, the omniscient, understood the desire of Ratnamālā. So during the incarnation as Kṛṣṇa, Ratnamālā was born as Pūtanā and Kṛṣṇa gave her salvation by drinking her breast-milk. (Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa, Chapters 4 and 10).

(ii) Once when the sage Kālabhiru and his daughter Cārumati were travelling together they saw the sage Kāksīvān doing penance on the shores of the river Sarasvatī. Kālabhiru saw in Kāksīvān a suitable husband for his daughter and so gave Cārumati in marriage to him. They were thus living happily together when once Kāksīvān had to go on a pilgrimage alone leaving Cārumati in his āśrama. Taking advantage of her loneliness a Śūdra made her his concubine and when Kāksīvān returned he found out the deceit and cursed her to be born as a demoness. She begged for relief and the sage said she would get relief when Viṣṇu incarnated as Kṛṣṇa. Pūtanā was the cursed form of Cārumati. (Chapter 18, Adi Parva).

PŪTANA II. An evil spirit. This spirit which torments children stays with Subrahmaṇya. (See under Grahasīja. (Chapter 23, Vana Parva).

PŪTIKĀ. A creeper. This can be used in Yāgas as a substitute for Somalaṭā. (Śloka 33, Chapter 35, Vana Parva).

PUTRĀDVARŚANAPARVA. A sub-divisitional Parva of Aśramavāsika Parva. It comprises chapters 29 to 36.

PUTRĀKA. A King. (See under Pāțaliputra). PUTRIKĀPUTRA. A son born to a woman who is either a prostitute or one without a brother. (Śloka 11, Chapter 3, Manusmṛti).

PŪYAVAHA. A hell. (See under Naraka).

R

R. This letter means “sound”. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

RA. The letter ra means fire, strength, Indra. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

RABHĀSA I. A monkey in Śrī Rāma’s army. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddhakāṇḍa, Canto 4).

RABHĀSA II. A Rākṣasa on Rāvaṇa’s side. (Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddhā Kāṇḍa, Canto 9).

RABHYA. An ancient king wedded to justice and fair-play in ruling the kingdom. (For details see under Ekavīra).

RĀDHĀ I. Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s dearest consort. Rādhā is considered to be one of the two forms of Lakṣmīdevī. When Kṛṣṇa lived in Gokula as a man with two hands Rādhā was his dearest consort. But when he lives in Vaikunṭha as four-handed Viṣṇu, Lakṣmī is his dearest consort. (Devī Bhāgavata 9, 1; Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49 and 56-57 and Adi Parva Chapter 11).

Different versions about the birth of Rādhā are given in the Purāṇas, as follows:

(i) She was born in Gokula as daughter of Vṛṣabhānu and Kalāvati. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49; 35-42; Nārada Purāṇa, 2, 81).

(ii) She was got as Bhūmi-kaṇḍā (earth-girl) when King Vṛṣabhānu was preparing the ground to conduct a Yajña. (Padma Purāṇa; Brahma Purāṇa 7).

(iii) She was born from the left side of Kṛṣṇa. (Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa).

(iv) At the time of Kṛṣṇa’s birth Viṣṇu asked his attendants to be born on earth. Accordingly Rādhā, dear cousort of Kṛṣṇa, took her birth in Gokula under the star Jyeṣṭhā in the morning of Śuklaśaṃsi day in Bhāḍrapada month. (Adi Parva 11).

(v) Kṛṣṇa once went with Virājī, the Gopī woman, to the hall of enjoyment (rāsānandālālam). Knowing about it Rādhā followed them to the hall, but both of them were not to be seen. On another occasion when Rādhā found Virājī in the company of Kṛṣṇa and Sudāmā she, in great anger, insulted Kṛṣṇa whereupon Sudāmā cursed her to be born in human womb and experience the pangs of separation from Kṛṣṇa. (Nārada Purāṇa 2, 8; Brahmavaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 49) and Rādhā cursed him in turn to be born in the dānava dynasty. It was on account of this curse of Rādhā that Sudāmā was born as the asura called Śākhacūḍa. (Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa, 2, 4, 9, 34).

(vi) Rādhā is considered to be one of the five forces which help Viṣṇu in the process of creation. (Devī Bhāgavata 9, 1; Nārada Purāṇa 2, 81).

(vii) Rādhā is the mental power of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (For details see under Pañčapraṇās).

RĀDHĀ II. Wife of Adhiratha, the foster-father of Karṇa and the foster-mother of Karṇa. (See under Karṇa).

RĀGA. One of the seven daughters of Bṛhaspati—Āḍīgirā. As she was loved by all beings she came to be called Rāgā. (Vana Parva, Chapter 203).

RAGAKHÂDAVA. A cake-like thing formed in a Yaśīa performed by King Dīlīpa. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 8).

RAGHU.

1) General. A famous king of the Solar dynasty. The great king Dīlīpa was his father. (For Genealogy, birth etc., see under Da’arātha and Dīlīpa).

2) Other information.

(i) Rāghu also occupies a place in the list of famous kings of ancient days. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 232).

(ii) In the fight between the king of Virāj and the Kauravas (over the lifting of cows) Rāghu was present along with Indra to see Arjuna fight. (Virāj Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).

(iii) Rāghu got from King Yuyanāśva a sword, which he presented to Hariṇāśva. (Śānti Parva Chapter 166, Verse 78).

(iv) He did not eat flesh. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 81).

(v) Kṣatriyas who praise Rāghu will not be defeated in war. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 51).

(vi) In the list of kings to be remembered at dawn and at dusk Rāghu too is included. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 51).
RAVATAKA. A celestial woman, daughter of Himavān and elder sister of Pārvatī. (For details see under Pārvatī).

RAHASYAVEDA. A Veda composed by mni Arvāvasu. This Veda is about Sūrya. (Bhārata, Chapter 137, Verse 19).

RAHODARA (RAHODARA). A muni of ancient days. There is a story in Chapter 39 of the Vāmanā Purāṇa about a skull falling on the muni’s neck and the place where the skull was removed from his neck coming to be known as Kapālamocana. Śrī Rāma killed the Rākṣasas who lived in Daṇḍaka forest. The head of one of the Rākṣasas cut by a very sharp knife was thrown off at a distance in the forest and it fell on the neck of Rahodara, who happened to be walking at the time in the forest. It (the head) cut deep into the bones of the Sage and that made it difficult for him to move about. Yet, he visited all the holy places on the earth with the skull of the Rākṣasa around his neck. At last he told the noble Rṣis about his misfortune and they directed him to visit ‘Auśanasatīrtha’, and the moment he touched the water in the tīrtha the skull fell into the water. Having been told about the incident, the Rṣis named the tīrtha ‘Kapālamocana’.

RAHUVĀDI. A king of the Puru dynasty. He was the son of Sairīyāti and the father of Bhadrāsva. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 278).

RAHU. An Asura. 1) Birth. Son of Kaśyapaprajāpati by his wife Sīthikī. (Ādi Parva. Chapter 65, Verse 31). 2) Rāhu and the Solar eclipse. The oldest story about Rāhu is that about the solar eclipse. (See under Candra IV, Para 4). 3) Other information. (i) Rāhu is a member of Brahmā’s court. (Sabhā Parva Chapter 11, Verse 29). (ii) Saṅjaya once spoke to Dṛḍtarṣa about Rāhu. (Bṛhaspati Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 40). (iii) Rāhu exists 10,000 yojanas below the Sun. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha). (iv) Rāhu is installed in temples as wearing a half-moon on his head. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 51).

RAHUGAṆA. A sage who lived in Ṛgvedic times. It was his son Gotama, who composed the 74th Sūkta of the first Maṇḍala of Ṛgveda.

RAIBHYA I. A hermit who was famous in the Palace of Yudhiṣṭhira. Information about this hermit, found in the Mahābhārata is given below: 1) Raibhya who was a friend of Bharadvāja had two sons named Arvāvasu and Parāvasu. They were great scholars. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 135, Stanza 12). 2) Bharadvāja once forbade his son Yavakrīta from going to the hermitage of Raibhya. Getting angry at this, Raibhya struck his matted hair on the ground and created a wicked fairy and ordered her to kill Yavakrīta. Knowing this Bharadvāja ran to that place and cursed Raibhya that his eldest son would kill him. Once Parāvasu, mistaking his father for a cruel animal killed him. By the effort of his second son Arvāvasu, Raibhya was brought to life again. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 136, Stanza 137). 3) Raibhya was the son of Aṅgiras. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 208, Stanza 26). (4) Raibhya was once an assistant at the sacrifice of Uparicaravasu. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 33, Stanza 7). (5) Raibhya was one of the hermits who visited Bhīṣma in his bed of arrows. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 26).

RAIBHYA II. An ancient hermit. This hermit learned the Sātvatadharma from Viraṇa. After that he taught his son Dīkṣā, this dharma. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 343, Stanza 42).

RAIBHYA III. The father of Duṣyanta, the husband of Śakuntalā. This Raibhya was the son of Sumati. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

RAIBHYA IV. One of the sons of Brahmā. Once Raibhya went with Vasu and Aiṅgiras to Bṛhaspati and asked him several questions, about the attainment of Supernal bliss. Bṛhaspati replied that attainment of heaven could be had, not by action but only by devotion. Raibhya immediately started to Gayā to do penance. There he met with the Sanatkumāras. (Varāha Purāṇa). Urvaśī made an earnest effort to hinder the severe vow and penance of Raibhya. But it was of no use, and by his curse, that celestial woman became ugly. She entreated him for liberation from the curse. Raibhya blessed her and said that she could obtain her original form by bathing in Yodhinikūṇḍa. (Yogini Kūṇḍa). Urvaśī bathed in Yodhinikūṇḍa and from that day onwards that tīrtha (holy bath) came to be known as Urvaśīyoginikūṇḍa.

RAIKVA. There was a noble King in ancient India named Jānasruti. The following is a story about the fame of this King.

One night while this King was sleeping, some hermits took the form of swans and were flying through the air. One of them saw the radiance of the fame of Jānasruti shining brightly. The other swans said that the fame of Raikva was far greater than this. Jānasruti heard this. He found out Raikva and placed all his wealth at the foot of Raikva and gave him his daughter in marriage.

RAJVATA I. Information about this King found in the Mahābhārata is given below:— 1) An ancient King in Bhārata. Once he heard the Gandharvas singing songs from Śāmaveda in the arbours of Mandarā mountain in the south and becoming so much immersed in it, he desired to renounce his country, city, wife and everything and go to the forest. (M.B. Udyaṇa Parva, Chapter 109, Stanza 9). 2) He got a sword from Marutta. He gave that sword to Yuvanesa. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 166, Stanza 77). 3) Raivata never ate meat. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 115, Stanza 63). 4) He is one of the Kings who should be praised in the mornings and evenings. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 165, Stanza 53).

RAJVATA II. One of the eleven Rudras. (M.B. Śānti Parva, Chapter 206, Stanza 19).

RAJVATAKA I. A mountain in Gujarat. It stands near the present Junagadh. The present name of Raivatataka mountain is Girnar. In Mahābhārata it is spoken of as Ujjayantagiri. It is stated in Mahābhārata that while Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna were travelling through Prabhāṣa-ksetra once, they got to the top of this mountain. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 217, Verse 8).
The Yādavas once celebrated a great festival on the Raivataka mountain. It was during this festival that Arjuna carried away Subhadrā, the sister of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 219; Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

RAIVATAKA II. A mountain in Sāka Island. Mention is made about this mountain in Mahābhārata, Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Stanzza 18.

RAIVATAKA (RAIVATA). Son of Priyavrata, the brother of Uttānapāda. Priyavrata had two wives Surūpā and Barhīṣmatī. Surūpā gave birth to ten sons beginning with Agnīdhra. Three sons Uttama, Tāmasa and Raivata were born to Barhīṣmatī. These three sons became Lords of Manvantara, in course of time. (See under Manvantara).

RAJA I. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Sālaya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 78).

RAJA II. A Sage. He was one of the sons born to Vasiṣṭha of Urija. (Bhaviśya Purāṇa, Brāhmaṇakāṇḍa).

RAJA (N). All the important Purāṇas have laid special emphasis on the importance of rule by Kings. All living beings will have Kings of their own. It was Brahmā who first assigned or ordained Kingship. After the creation of the Prajāpatis, Brahmā made Candra the King of the stars and medicines; Varuṇa was appointed King of waters like sea, river etc; Vaiśāravana was appointed King of Kings; Viśṇu, King of Devas; Agni, King of Vasus; Indra King of Maruts; Daksāṇa King of the Prajāpatis; Prahlāda King of the dānavas; Himavān, King of mountains; Citraratha, King of Gandharvas; Vāsuki, King of nāgas; Garūda, King of birds; Airāvata, King of elephants; Os, King of cattle, Tiger, King of animals, Peepal tree, King of trees and Uccaiṣravas, that of horses. (Agni Purāṇa).

As to what type the King of man-kind should be and what should form his duties it is ordained as follows. The Rāja should appoint either a Kṣatriya or a brahmin as his Commander - in - chief. The Commander-in-chief should be of noble birth and well-versed in law. Only a strong man who can speak boldly and openly should be appointed emissary or ambassador. Either a male or a female may be appointed to carry chewing materials. But, that person should be loyal, friendly and capable of putting up with hardships. The body-guard of the King should be a good swords-man. Ministers should be conversant with dharmaśāstras (moral and ethical codes).

Also, the King should be surrounded by the royal physician, chief of the elephant division of the army, the mahout, chief of the cavalry force, master of the forts, the architect, preceptor in archery and the chief of the internal administration of the palace.

When it is yet three hours for the dawn, the King should wake up from sleep. Music, praises by courtiers etc. should herald his waking up. As soon as he has woken up, the King should hold talks with his spies. Then he should examine accounts and only after this should he begin the ablutions. After his pūjā (worship) is over, cows with gold should be gifted to brahmans. With their blessings he must look first into the mirror and then in ghee along with gold. Then he must look up the almanac for the day’s star etc. And after having taken the medicine prescribed by the physician, and also the blessings of the preceptor the King should attend court. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 235).

According to Chapter 8 of the Manusmṛti (a great authority on law and ethics) Kings are born from the shoulders of Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Sūrya, Agni, Varuṇa, Candra and Kubera.

RAJA (S). One of the seven sons of Vasiṣṭha by Urija, the other six being Gotra, Īrdhvabāhu, Savana, Anagha, Sutapas, and Şukra. Holy souls, these seven were Saptarṣis in the third Manvantara. (Viśṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

RAJADHARMA. A stork, which was a friend of Brahmā and a son of Kaśyapaprajāpati. This stork was known as Nādiśaṅgha also. (See under Nādiśaṅgha).

RAJADHARMĀNUSĀSANĀ PARVA. A sub-Parva of Sānti Parva, Chapters 1-130.

RAJADHIDEVI. The youngest of the five daughters of the solar King Śūra by Māriśa. King Jayasena of Avanti married Rajādhidevi. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

RAJAGRAHA (GIRIVRAJA). An ancient city in India, capital of Magadha. Dirgha King of Girivraja was killed by King Pāndu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 112, Verse 27). Another King, Ambuvica, had for a time ruled over the city. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 203, Verse 17). Afterwards Jarāsandha became its King. Girivraja is a holy place as well. He who bathes here will become as pleasant-looking as King Kaśyipān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 104).

RĀJAMUKHĪ. A celestial woman. (Skanda Purāṇa).

RĀJANI. A holy river in ancient India. (Bhiṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 21).

RĀJANITI. (Politics and administration).

Politics and administration or administrative politics in ancient India is dealt with in Manusmṛti and Agni Purāṇa. A very brief summary of it is given below:

The King should organise six kinds of army formations, worship the Devas duly and then set out for war. Mūlabala, Bhūtabala, Śrenibala, Suhṛdbala, Satrubala and Āṭavikabala are the six kinds of army formations. The list is given in order of the comparative importance of the bala. The army has six parts i.e. Mantra (advisers), Kosa (treasury), Padāti (infantry), Turaga (Cavalry), Gaja (elephant) and Ratha (chariot).

If an attack is feared either against the forts or across rivers or trenches, the army should be marshaled for their protection. The Army Chieffains surrounded by mighty warriors should lead the divisions. The King and his wife should be at the centre of the army-division along with the treasury and first class soldiers. On both sides of the King should march the cavalry and the chariots should form the farther wings. Elephants should proceed on the two sides of the chariot and soldiers recruited from forests must march on the sides of the elephants. The supreme commander will march behind all the others guiding the army.

If there is cause for fear in front of the army during the march, three Vyūhas (Phalanxes) Makara, Śyenā or Śuci should be put in the Vanguard. The Śaṅka Vyūha is more suited to meet an attack from behind. If attack is feared from the flanks then also the Śaṅka-vyūha is advisable. When attack from all the sides is feared sarvabhadhrayūha is indicated. It is the duty of the Supreme Commander to safe-guard his army and suppress reactionary forces whenever the army gets weakened, when it marches through caves, mountains or rocks or other difficult terrain or weakened by the persistent attacks of the enemy. When the time, place and the people’s attitude are favourable, the King should engage himself in open war with the enemy, and if they are unfavourable he shall not go in for war. If confrontation with the enemy occurs under circumstances in which the King is visible to the enemy, powerful divisions of the army consisting of warriors of great calibre should be stationed either at the front or in the rear.

In the formation of vyūhas (phalanx) there are seven factors called Uras (breast), Kakṣas (arm-pits), two Pakṣas (sides), two Madhyas (centre) and Prṣṭha (rear). The commanders should be surrounded by bold soldiers. The leader is the very life of the war. At the Uras of the vyūha powerful elephants, at the Kakṣas chariots and at the Pakṣas cavalry should be stationed. This is called pakṣabhādvyūha. If at the centre cavalry and at Kakṣas and Pakṣas elephants are stationed, it is called antarābhādvyūha. If there are no chariots, cavalry or infantry may be put in their place. Certain authorities maintain that in every vyūha elephants may be stationed in the place of chariots, if chariots are not available. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 242).

Rājapura I. An ancient and famous city in Kāmboja. Here Karna defeated the Kāmbojas. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 5).

Rājapura II. Capital city of King Citrāṅgada of Kālīṅga. Innumerable kings gathered together in the city in connection with the Śvayabhūvara of the princesses. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 3).

Rājaśekhara. A Sanskrit dramatist who lived in India in 7th century A.D. Bālabhārata or Prakṛtāpanḍava, Bālārāmāyana, Viddhasālalabhājikā and Kaṇpurāmaṇjari are his more famous dramatic works. Kaṇpurāmaṇjari refers to him as the preceptor of a king of Kanauj. Rājaśekhara was known by the name Kaviṛāja also. Bālārāmāyana, called also Mahānāṭaka, is a drama in ten Acts. Bālabhārata contains only two Acts. Its theme is the wedding of Draupadi and the ruin caused by the game of dice. Viddhasālalabhājikā is a drama in four Acts. He has a further work to his credit, Kāvyamīmāṁsā in eighteen chapters. Some scholars hold the view that Rājaśekhara also wrote in the 10th century A.D.

Rājasūya. A great yajña, Haridrona and also Dharmaputra performed it. (Sabha Parva, Chapters 33, 35, 84).

Rājasūyaparva. A sub-Parva of Sabha Parva. (Chapters 33-35).

Rājasūyārumbhā parva. A sub-parva of Sabha Parva, Chapters 13-19.

Rajatanābha. A Yakṣa. He married Manivara, daughter of Anuhra and two sons, Manivara and Manibhadra were born to them.

Rājavān. A muni born in the Bhṛgu dynasty. To Bhṛgu were born of his wife Khyati, Lakṣmi, the wife of Vigu and also two sons called Dhāta and Vidhāta. They married Ayati and Niyati daughters of Meru. Two sons, Prāṇa and Mṛkaṇḍu were born to the couples. From Mṛkaṇḍu was born Mṛkaṇḍeya and from him Vedačīras. Prāṇa had a son called Dyutimān and he a son called Rājavān. It was from Rājavān that the Bhṛgu dynasty multiplied. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

Rājāyoga. See under Yoga.

Rāji (Rājī). A prominent king of the Puru dynasty. He was one of the five sons of Ayus by Svarbhīnu the other four being Naḥuṣa, Kṣatravṛdha, (Vṛddhaśarman) Rambha and Anenas. (Āśrama Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 25).

Puruṇas contain stories that Indra destroyed people born in Rajī’s dynasty as they hated the former. That side in which the powerful Rajī fought used to win. In a fight between the asuras and the Devas, when Indra felt that his side was losing, he secured the participation of Rajī in the fight on condition that the latter would be given Indra-hood. The asuras were defeated and Rajī was made king of svarga.

Rajī had thousands of children and they were known under the common name Rājayakṣatriyas. But they were a foolish lot and lacked the capacity to distinguish themselves in Indra’s place. Therefore, at the instance of Bhhaspati, preceptor of the Devas, Indra destroyed them all and resumed his former position and status. (Bīhārīyata, 9th Skandha; Vāyu Purāṇa, Chapter 92, Verse 76; Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa 11; Harivamśa 1, 28; Matsya Purāṇa. Chapter 24, Verses 34-49).

Rājjukānṭha. A grammarian. In Pāṇini’s asāḍhāyī he is depicted as a mahaṭrī possessing great knowledge of the Vedas.

Rājī. Second of the three wives of Vivavān. The couple had a son called Revata.

Rājīyavardhana. A king of Vaiśalī. Rājīyavardhana was a great ascetic, who could comprehend the past, the present and the future. Knowing that his death was near, he told his subjects about it and went into the forests for tapas. Sorry over the departure of their king, his subjects as well as ministers began worshipping Śūrya, who appeared and blessed them saying that their king would live for ten thousand years in perfect health, victory and with all wealth and prosperity and other resources and with unimpaired youthfulness. The ministers and subjects greatly elated over the boon informed their king in the forest about it, but he only felt sorry about it. He told them that during his life for ten thousands years he would have to witness the death of his sons, grandsons and subjects and would thus have to be sad throughout life.

The king consoled and made them return. Then he did rigorous tapas to Śūrya and secured from him the boon that during his life-time none would die. (Mṛkaṇḍeya Purāṇa).

Rāka. The presiding Devi of the full moon. She too was present at the birth of Subrahmanya. (Sālīya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 14).

Rākađēvī was the daughter of Aṅgiras, who had by his wife Śrīmī four daughters called Śivāśi, Kuhū, Rākā and Anumati. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa. Part 1, Chapter 1).

Rāka II. A Rākṣasa girl. She served, at the instance of Kubera, Mahārājī Vīravas, and a son called Khara and a daughter, Sūrpanakhā, were born to her by the mahaṛī. (Vana Parva, Chapter 275, Verse 3).

Rākṣas. A particular sect of asuras. Yakṣas and Rākṣas were offsprings born to Kaśyapa prajapati of his wife Muni. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).
RÄKŚASA I. A particular sect of asuras. The ancients had ordained that Räkśasas should not be killed at dusk. Välmiki Rämäyaña, Bälakanda, Canto 22, Verse 22). Uttararämäyaña, contains the following story about the origin of Räkśasas. When Brahmac was reciting the Vedas at the beginning of Kṛtyauga he felt very hungry and certain forms emanated from his face. Those who were born from his anger assumed the form of Räkśasas and those from his hunger that of Yakṣas. The Räkśasas turned out to be evil folk killing and eating cows and brahmans. Praheṭi and Hēti were the first born Räkśasas, the latter of whom wedded Bhayā, daughter of Kāla, and to them was born a son called Vidyutkēsa. He married Sālakaṭāṅkā, daughter of Sandhyā. Though a child was born to them they forsook it in the Himālayan slopes and went their own way.

At that time Śiva and Pārvatī came that way and after blessing the child returned to Kailāśa. The child was named Śukéśa. He married Devavatī, daughter of the Gandharva called Māṇimaya and three children were born to the couple, viz. Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī. They did tapas to propitiate Brahmac and when he appeared requested him thus: "We must defeat Yakṣas Kinnaras, Gandharvas, Siddhás, Vidyādharas, Yama, Kuber, Vāsava, Nāga kings and dāityas and dānavas and we must not be defeated by any one. We must kill all enemies and they shall not kill us. We three shall never quarrel among ourselves." Brahmac granted all their prayers. The three, proud and haughty due to these boons, began roaming about consuming cows and brahmans. They asked Vīṣavakarman to build a city for them and he built for them Lāṅkā on Mount Tṛikūṭa in the south sea. The three brothers took their abode in Lāṅkā. Mālyavān, Sumālī and Mālī married respectively Sundarī, Ketumati, and Vasudhā, daughters of the Gandharva woman Narmādā Mālyavān begot of Sundarī seven sons called Vajramuṣṭi Virūpākṣa, Durmukha, Suptaghna, Yajñakosā, Matta, and Unnātī and also a daughter called Nāla. To Sumālī were born of Ketumati ten sons and also four daughters.

Four sons were born to Mālī of his wife Vasudhā, and they became the ministers of Vihbhiṣaṇa.

Then thousands of Räkśasas were born as sons, grandsons, brothers, nephews, etc. to the above and they lived in Lāṅkā, a terror to the whole world.

While the daughters of Sumālī, Vēkā, Puspotakatā, Kaikāṣi and Kumbhiniṣa were once walking in the forest they saw Kuber on a visit to Brahmac in all pomp and glory. They understood that Kuber owed his pomp and glory to his being the son of Vīṣravas and therefore, the next day one of the four, Kaikāṣi, went to Vīṣravas’s āśrama and prayed for children by him. Three sons called Rāvaṇa, Vihbhiṣaṇa and Kumbhakarṇa and a daughter called Śūpapanakā were born to her by Vīṣravas. They secured boons by performing tapas and Rāvaṇa lived in Lāṅkā as king of the Räkśasas.

RÄKŚASA II. An approved system of marriage. (See under Vihbhāha).

RÄKŚASAGRAHA. An evil spirit connected with the Räkśasas. Afflicted by this spirit man will immediately become mad. (Vana Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 50).

RÄKŚASAYAJNA (RÄKŚASASATRA). Parāśara Muni once conducted a yajña to annihilate the Räkśasas altogether. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 180). The provocation for Parāśara to conduct the yajña was that a Räkśasa called Kalmāṣapāda ate Śakti, the father of the muni and the son of Vasīṭhā. When the yajña had reached its climax Pulastya, Pulaha and Krauṣṭa went to Parāśara and held conciliatory talks with him, and Parāśara, ended the yajña. The Agni that he had made to devour the Räkśasas was discarded on the slopes of the Himālayas. According to the Purāṇas that fire, even to this day, continues consuming the Räkśasas, trees and rocks. (For details see under Kalmāṣapāda and Parāśara).

RÄKŚITĀ. A celestial woman, daughter of Kaśyapa-prajāpati by Pradhādevī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 50).

RÄKŚOBHAKṢA. A hell. (For details see under Kāla.)

RÄKŚOVĀṆA. A kingdom in ancient India. The Kṣatriyas there were annihilated by Parāśurāma. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Verse 12).

RAKTA. A son of Mahīṣāsura. He had two sons called Bala and Atubala. He had also a number of mighty army generals like Dhūmrākṣa and thousand aśauhiniś under each general. (Skanda Purāṇa, 7.1.119).

RAKTABĪJĀ.

1) General. Rebirth of Rambhāsura, father of Mahīṣāsura. Stories of Raktabija and Rambhāsuras are inextricably intertwined.

2) Origin of Raktabija. Once upon a time there lived an asura king called Danu. His two sons, Rambha and Karambha who had no children, did tapas at Pañcānada for the blessing of having issues. Rambha and Karambha mediated upon Mālavaṭa Yaka, the former seated at the centre of the five fires and the latter standing in the water. Indra in the guise of a crocodile dragged Karambha away by the feet and killed him. Angry at the death of his brother, Rambha decided to cut off his head and offer it in fire. When he was about to do so, Agni appeared and told him that suicide was worse than killing others, and promised to grant him whatever he desired. Accordingly Rambha requested Agni for a son more effulgent than the latter, who would conquer the three worlds and would not be defeated even by the Devas and the Asuras. Rambha further wanted that son to be as powerful as Vāyu, exceptionally handsome and skilled in archery.

Agni blessed Rambha that he would have, as desired, a son by the woman whom he coveted. On his way back home he saw a beautiful she-buffalo, which he married. He took the buffalo which got pregnant by him, to Pāṭāla to protect it from the attack of other buffaloes. One day another buffalo felt a passion for Rambha’s wife and in the fight that ensued Rambha was killed by it. Rambha’s wife died in his funeral pyre. It was from the centre of the fire that the very powerful Mahīṣāsura was born. Rambhāsura also rose from the fire under the name Raktabija. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 17; Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

3) Boon to Raktabija. Raktabija secured from Śiva a boon according to which if one drop of blood from his body fell on the battlefield, many Raktabijas would arise from the blood and fight the enemies. Each of these Raktabijas would also be like the others in the matter of strength, form and weapons. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).
4) His death. War between Devas and Asuras broke out and in the fight between Devi and Raktajja blood from his body flowed. When Devi found it impossible to kill the lakhs of Raktsuras who arose from the blood, she resorted to a trick. She asked Cāmuṇḍi to lick off the blood flowing from Raktajja before it fell on the ground. Accordingly Devi began killing the asuras and Cāmuṇḍi consuming their blood and flesh. When the artificial Raktajjas were all killed thus, the original Raktajja alone remained and in the fight between them, Devi cut off his head with her sword. Cāmuṇḍi did not permit even a drop of blood to fall on the ground. (Devī Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RAKTAJJA. A form assumed by Arjuna in his previous birth. The following story is told in Padma Purāṇa (Chapter 14) about Arjuna being reborn as such at the meeting of Kali and Dvāpara yugas and Svedaja being born as Karna during the same period. Once during a quarrel between Siva and Brahmr the former nipped off Brahmr's head. (For details see under Brahmr). Some drops of sweat appeared on the forehead of the angry Brahmr, and from the sweat which Brahmr wiped with his hand arose a person wearing a thousand shields, bow and quiver. That person was Svedaja. He asked Brahmr what he should do and the former granted him permission to destroy Siva. He then approached Siva with bow drawn and the frightened Siva ran to Viṣṇu and sought refuge. Svedaja followed Siva and when Viṣṇu, seeing him, raised a loud noise 'Hum', Siva prostrated at Viṣṇu's feet. Siva extended the skull in his hand towards Viṣṇu requesting something to be given to him. Mahāviṣṇu, who had nothing else to give Siva, put his right hand into the skull as alms, Siva wounded the hand with his Śūla (three-pronged weapon) and pure red blood began flowing from the hand into the skull. The blood continued flowing for a thousand years in a length of fifty yojanas and thickness of ten yojanas. At the end of the period Viṣṇu asked whether the skull was not filled yet, and looking into the skull with his three eyes Siva answered that it was full. Then Viṣṇu stopped the flow of blood, and Siva, in the presence of Viṣṇu, looked into the blood for a thousand years and stirred it with his hand. The blood gradually turned into a bubble, and a person possessing thousand hands and as glowing as fire appeared in the skull. He had a crown on his head and he held in his hands a bow and quiver. He wore gloves on his hands. And, that was Raktajja, an incarnation of Naraṇa.

Looking at Raktajja, Siva told Viṣṇu thus: 'This master in archery is Nara. You spoke Nara, and let his name, therefore be Nara. Oh Nārāyaṇa, you both will be called Naranārāyaṇas. This Nara will be of help to you on behalf of the Devas and also in the sustenance and protection of the world. He will further help you to kill the asuras. Nara, the great intellectual that he is, will become a muni, of surpassing wisdom. Brahmr's divine fifth head possesses so much of effulgence. Nara is created from that effulgence and also from the blood from your hands and my look at it. He will annihilate all enemies in war. He will be a terror to those persons who cannot be conquered by you, Indra and the other Devas.

While Viṣṇu stood there amazed Raktajja praised him and Siva with folded hands and asked from the skull what he should do. Then Śiva ordered him thus: You kill this asura (Svedaja) created by Brahmnr with his own effulgence." And Śiva led Raktajja out of the skull by his hands and told him again:—"Look, here lies the terrible person I spoke about made unconscious by the cry of 'Hum' by Viṣṇu. Awake him immediately." After having said this Śiva disappeared. Nara, in the presence of Nārāyaṇa, kicked the unconscious Svedaja with his left foot, and he came out of his unconscious state. The fierce fight that ensued between Raktajja and Svedaja continued for two years. By then Svedaja had lost everything but one of his shields and Raktajja had only his two arms to fight with. At this stage Vasudeva (Viṣṇu) in great alarm went and asked Brahmnr whether Raktajja might not kill Svedaja. Brahmnr answered, 'In the next birth Nara may defeat Svedaja'. Saying 'Right, let that be so', Viṣṇu returned to the battlefield and withdrew them from fighting with the assurance that they would be given an opportunity to fight again during the period of the Kali and the Dvāpara yugas.

Afterwards Viṣṇu directed Ādiyā (Sun) and Ākhandālā (Indra) to look after Raktajja and Svedaja. He told Ādiyā further:—"At the end of the Dvāpara yuga you should see that Svedaja is reborn, in the interests of the Devas, as your son. In the Yadu dynasty will be born a very powerful fellow called Śūra and he will have a very beautiful daughter named Prthā. Durvāsas will advise her some mantras as a boon and she will have some sons from the Devas whom she will invoke with the mantras. With that object in view, while in her periods, she would, at the time of dawn gaze at you with love. Then he (Svedaja) will be born as the son called Vasuṣeṇa of Kuntī, the virgin.'

The Sun-God agreed to obey the above instructions of Viṣṇu and told him further:—"I shall procreate in the virgin a very powerful and valiant son, who will become well-known in the world as Karna. He will gift away all wealth to brahmns." After saying this Śūrya disappeared.

After this Viṣṇu told Indra as follows:—"You should, at the end of the Dvāpara yuga see that this Nara, born from blood, is reborn as an aspect of yours on earth. King Pāṇḍu will one day go into the forest with his wives, Kuntī and Mādri, and he will then become the object of an animal's curse. He will therefore, in a spirit of renunciation, go to mount Śatāśṛiga where he would ask Kuntī to become a mother by another man. Unwilling to do so Kuntī will desire to have sons by Devas, and when she prays to you, you should favour her with this Nara as son. Devendra raised a legal objection to the above injunction of Viṣṇu as follows:—"You, who incarnated yourself as Rāma in the twenty-seventh yuga of the last Manvantara for the purpose of killing Rāvaṇa, killed my son Bāli. Therefore I do not wish to procreate Nara as my son." To this objection of Indra Viṣṇu assured him that as a penalty for the mistake of killing Bāli, he would be a companion of Nara (Arjuna) who would be born as Indra's son. According to the above terms and conditions fighting between Raktajja and Svedaja ended. In the next birth Raktajja was born as Arjuna and Svedaja as Karṇa. Mahāviṣṇu, incarnated himself as Śri Kṛṣṇa. The meeting of the three in the battle-field is well-known.

RAKṬĀNGA. A nāga born in Dhṛtarāṣṭra’s dynasty. It was burnt to death at the yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 18).

RAMĀ. A synonym for Mahālakṣmī. There is a story in the eighth Skandha of Devī Bhāgavata as to how the name Ramā came to be attached to Lakṣmī. Revanta, the very handsome son of Sūrya one day came to Viśnu mounted on his horse Uccaśīśravas to pay his respects to Mahāviṣṇu. Even Lakṣmīdevī stood aghast speechless for a very short time at the charm of Revanta changing her looks between him and his horse. Mahāviṣṇu did not at all like this and that caused since Lakṣmī’s eyes enjoyed the sight of one such woman she would be come to be called Ramā also and that she would be born as a mare on earth.

RĀMA (SRI RĀMA). The seventh incarnation of Mahāviṣṇu, a very powerful king of the solar dynasty. 1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus: Brahmā - Māricī - Kaśyapa-Vivasvān - Viṣṇusvāta Manu-Mahābhāhu - Prasandhi - Kṛṣṇa-Ikṣvāku - Vikuṣi - Saśāda-Kakutstha (Puraṇājaya) - Anenaś-Pṛthulāśa-Praṣenajit-Yuvanāśa-Māndhāti-Puruṣutas-Trasadasu-Anaraṇya-Hryāśa-Vasumanas-Sutanvā - Trāyyāṇuṇa-Satyavratā (Trisūnika)-Hariś-candra - Rohitā-va - Harita - Čuṇcu-Sudev - Bhuruka - Bāhuka - Sagara - Asamasijas-Anīśumān-Bhūgiratā-Sūtanābha-Sindhuvipa-Ayutā-yus-Rūparuṣa - Sarvakāma - Sudās - Mitrasakha (Kalmāśapāda) - Aśmaka - Mālaka - Khaṭvāṅga - Dilipa (Dirghabāhubī - Raghuv-Jaśa-Daśarath-Rāma. 2) Reason for his birth. When Rāvaṇa was ruling over Lāṅkā as a terror to the world, evils and cruelties like matricide, patricide, fratricide, killing of cows, hatred for good people, children’s death, abduction of women, killing of munis, thefts etc. became rampant. When the world became grief-stricken Bhūmidevi (Godess of earth) assumed the form of a cow and took refuge with Indra in Śvarga. She told him about the atrocities committed by Rāvaṇa and the other Rākṣasas. Then Indra took Bhūmidevi (cow) to Brahmā, who took them to Śiva at Kailāsa as killing Rāvaṇa was beyond his (Brahmā’s) power. Śiva thought it improper on his part to kill Rāvaṇa and so he took Brahmā and others to Viṣṇu and submitted their grievance to him. Viṣṇu consoled them by saying as follows:—“I have decided to incarnate mine as the son of Daśaratha, king of Ayodhyā. You Devas also should take birth on earth to help me to kill Rāvaṇa and other evil Rākṣasas and to protect Bhūmidevi and the good people on the world.” (Kamba Ramāyana, Purva Kanda). 3) Birth. King Daśaratha of the solar dynasty ruled Kosalā with Ayodhyā as his capital. Mahārāja Vasiṣṭha was his family preceptor. With the cooperation of eight ministers such as Sumantra and others he ruled the country in the path of supreme welfare and prosperity. A daughter, Śānta, was born to him of his wife Kausalyā. Years passed by, yet he had no son. One of those days King Lomapāda, close friend of Daśaratha visited Ayodhyā. Lomapāda, who was childless requested Daśaratha for Śānta and she was given as his adopted daughter by Daśaratha. Lomapāda gave her in marriage to Ṛṣyāśrīga, who had once caused rain-fall in Āṅga. (For details see under Ṛṣyāśrīga). To have a son, Daśaratha took as his second wife Kaikēyī, daughter of the King of Keśa and younger sister of Yudhījī. But she turned out to be barren. Then he married Sumitrā, daughter of the King of Kaśī. Even after many years none of the three wives of Daśaratha presented him with a son. One of those days Daśaratha went deep into the forest, hunting. While resting on the banks of river Sarayū he heard a sound like that of an elephant drinking water in the river. Without realising the fact that the voice was that of the son of a nāga filling water in a pot for his aged parents, the King released an arrow against him. When Daśaratha walked to the spot, he realised his mistake. He had hit unknowingly a brahmin-boy, a nāga’s son. The boy lay wounded about to die. The boy explained to Daśaratha who he was and how he had come to the river to carry water to his aged parents. After telling the King details about him he breathed his last. Sobiing at his misadventure, Daśaratha went to the aged parents of the dead boy with the pot filled with water. The parents, who were blind thought that it was their son who was approaching them when Daśaratha revealed the sad story to them. After cursing Daśaratha that he too would die of separation from his son, the aged nāga expired; his wife also died in his funeral pyre. The grief-stricken King returned to Ayodhyā. Only Vasiṣṭha and Sumantra were told about the curse, which, though a cause for great sorrow, implied that Daśaratha would have sons. Vasiṣṭha, therefore, advised Daśaratha to get the yajña, called putrakāmeṣṭi performed by Ṛṣyāśrīga. Accordingly the King invited his daughter Śānta and his son-in-law, Ṛṣyāśrīga to Ayodhyā, and the yajña began. Ṛṣyāśrīga made offerings in the sacred fire chanting the putrakāmeṣṭi hymn. Then a divine person arose from the fire with a golden vessel full of pudding (nectar of the Devas) and disappeared again in the fire after giving the vessel to Ṛṣyāśrīga. Ṛṣyāśrīga handed it over to Daśaratha, who as advised by the mahārājñi divided the pudding between Kausalyā and Kaikēyī. They gave a part of their shares of the pudding to Sumitrā also. The three queens conceived, and in due course of time Kausalyā and Kaikēyī delivered a son each and Sumitrā two sons. The son of Kausalyā was named Rāma, the son of Kaikēyī, Bharata, and sons of Sumitrā were named Lāṅkmaṇa and Śatrughna. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bālakanda). 4) Boons granted to Kaikēyī. Before the sons were born to Daśaratha, the mighty asura called Śambara once attacked Devaloka. Daśaratha was at that time known as Nemi, and he was a great friend of Indra, and on his invitation Nemi, along with Kaikēyī, went to Devaloka in a chariot. Nemi killed the asura army within half an hour. Then Śambara assumed the form of ten Śambaras and attacked Nemi from ten points. In this context Nemi turned and twisted his chariot in all the ten directions at the same time and killed all the ten Śambaras and recaptured Śvarga. It was from that day onwards that Nemi came to be known as Daśaratha. In the fight with the Śambaras on all points Daśaratha’s chariot was so violently shaken that the key of its axle was about to slip off and fall down. Noticing the threatened danger Kaikēyī applied her finger to the proper place of the axle and thus averted the mishap. When Daśaratha knew about this timely action of Kaikēyi he was so very pleased that he asked her to choose any two boons she desired, and she asked him to keep the boons with him to be granted whenever she requested for them. Daśaratha and Kaikēyi took leave of Indra and returned to Ayodhya. (Kamba Rāmāyana, Bālakāṇḍa).

5) In the company of Vīśvāmitra. The four sons of Daśaratha grew up in Ayodhya. Though they were equally friendly to one another, intimacy between Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa and also between Bharata and Sātrughna came to be thicker. Once Vīśvāmitra decided to conduct a yajña for the happiness and contentment of all people. At the very commencement of the yajña, Rākṣasas, in batches, tried to spoil it, and Mārica and Subāhu, sons of Tātākā, were the leaders of the obstructionists. Vīśvāmitra knew that Rāma was the most effective weapon against the Rākṣasas and requested Daśaratha to lend him Rāma's help. Daśaratha felt sad about it and Vīśvāmitra was getting excited over the former's attitude when Vasiṣṭha advised Daśaratha to send Rāma along with Vīśvāmitra. Accordingly Daśaratha sent Rāma to the forest in the company of Vīśvāmitra. Lākṣmaṇa too followed his brother.

While walking in the forest Vīśvāmitra related many old stories to Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa. They crossed river Sarayū, passed by many aśrama of munis and reached the Pāla forest. Here Vīśvāmitra imparted to Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa, who felt too weak on account of hunger and thirst the two mantras Balā and Atibalā, which would ward off hunger and thirst. He also taught them the use of certain rare arrows. Śrī Rāma was specially taught the use of a divine arrow called Jmbhakastra.

6) Tātākā killed. While Vīśvāmitra was relating to them the story of Tātākā, who dwelt in the forest, they saw the fierce Rākṣasī coming fast with a long spear in her hand. She threw a big rock at Vīśvāmitra. Rāma shattered the rock with an arrow. Next, Tātākā dashed forward against Rāma roaring furiously, and Rāma, with another arrow killed her. The soul of the dead Tātākā assumed the form of a Gandharva woman and ascended to heaven.

7) Salvation to Ahalyā. Rākṣasas like Subāhu lined up to obstruct the yajña, which Vīśvāmitra began after the killing of Tātākā. Rāma killed Subāhu; Mārica ran away in fright and hid himself in the sea. Rāma drove away the other Rākṣasas.

Next, Vīśvāmitra, hearing about the Śvayaṁvara of Śiṭā, daughter of King Janaka started for his palace with Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa, and on the way he told the boys many Parājīp stories. They bathed in the river Gaṅgā and a short walk took them to the vacant aśrama of Gautama. The great muni called Gautama had once lived in this aśrama with his dutiful wife Ahalyā and their son Saṭānanda, an erudite scholar in all sciences. Indra, who lost his head over the great beauty of Ahalyā went to the aśrama one midnight in the form of a cock and crew. Thinking it was already dawn Gautama went to the river for bath when Indra assumed the form of the muni, entered his bed room and slept with Ahalyā. When Gautama understood the fraud thus played upon him, he cursed her into a stone. She was to resume her old form when, during Tretāyuga, Śrī Rāma trod upon the stone. Accordingly, as soon as Rāma trod on the stone Ahalyā cast off her form as stone and resumed her old form as Ahalyā. Immediately Gautama and Saṭānanda also appeared on the scene. Ahalyā ascended to the sky as a devī.

8) Marriage. Vīśvāmitra came to king Janaka's palace with Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa. Janaka's daughter Śīṭā and his younger brothers' daughters Māṇḍāvī, Urmiḷā and Śrūtakṛtī were living in the palace as sisters and very good friends. One day the princesses who were playing in the garden could not pluck jasmine flowers from a height. Śīṭā then brought the Śaivacāpa (Śiva's bow) from the weapon-room and shot down Jasmine flowers with it. As Janaka watched Śīṭā's action of shooting with the Śaivacāpa an idea came into his head. He announced that the hero, who succeeded in shooting with Śaivacāpa, would be given Śīṭā in marriage. Just as Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa were inseparable companions Śīṭā and Urmiḷā were always to be found together and Māṇḍāvī and Śrūtakṛtī were particular friends. Śrī Rāma shot an arrow from Śiva's bow and he was selected as Śīṭā's husband. Janaka informed Daśaratha of the marriage and he came with his attendants. Bharata married Māṇḍāvī, Lākṣmaṇa, Urmiḷā and Śrūtakṛtī. After living in Mithilā for some time Daśaratha and others returned to Ayodhya. Vīśvāmitra went to the Himālayas for rest.

9) Praṣūrāma's threat. Daśaratha and others on their way back to Ayodhya passed the Videha kingdom and reached the suburbs of Bhārgavāśrama. All of a sudden a shining form of a brahmīn with Kṣatriya effulgence appeared in front of the procession. Vasiṣṭha understood that it was Praṣūrāma and Daśaratha and others were alarmed. Praṣūrāma approached Śrī Rāma who was viewing the former with quiet serenity. Praṣūrāma was very angry that Rāma broke the bow of Śiva who was his (Praṣūrāma's) preceptor. All Rāma's conciliatory talk failed to pacify Praṣūrāma, who spoke thus to Rāma: "You, impudent fellow! you insulted me and my preceptor. All right, let me see your power. Take this my bow, and shoot with it."

Śrī Rāma took hold of the bow and bent it easily and fixing an arrow on it asked Praṣūrāma to point out the target for it. As Praṣūrāma feared that if the arrow was sent, it might crush the whole universe, he asked Rāma so choose the result of his (Praṣūrāma's) taps as target for the arrow. Both the bow and the arrow were of Viṣṇu's power. That power as well as his own Vaishāva power, Praṣūrāma transferred to Śrī Rāma and having thus fulfilled the object of his incarnation Praṣūrāma went to Pupnāśrama for permanent taps.

10) Ruin of the country. Daśaratha decided to install Śrī Rāma as crown prince. The people whole-heartedly welcomed it. During the night previous to the coronation, while the wives of Daśaratha were gladly discussing the happy incident, Mantharā, the tale-bearing maid of Kaikēyi advised her mistress to prevail upon Daśaratha to exile Rāma into the forest and install Bharata as crown prince. Mantharā also reminded Kaikēyi about the boons, which had been promised to her by Daśaratha during the devāśura war. Kaikēyi fell into the trap thus set by Mantharā. Kaikēyi put on a wrathful face and shut herself up in a room. When Daśaratha enquired of her the reason for her anger she asked him to make her son Bharata, the crown prince and exile Rāma for... fourteen years' life in forest. The king fainted when he heard the demand. But, Śrī Rāma, on hearing about it, put on an ascetic's apparel and got ready to start for the forest. Siṭā and Lakṣmanā also got ready to follow Rāma into the forest. While the entire population of Ayodhyā stood there weeping, Rāma, Lakṣmanā and Siṭā wearing the forest-dwellers' garb started for the forest.

11) Death of Daśaratha and Bharata's decision. As soon as Sumantra, who had accompanied Rāma and others returned to Ayodhyā, Daśaratha expired on account of unbearable grief caused by Rāma's exile. Messengers brought to Ayodhyā Bharata and Satrughna from Kekaya where they were put up with their uncle Yudhājit at the time of their father's death. But, they were kept in the dark of all that had happened in their absence till their arrival at the palace. Bharata, who heard of everything from his mother was greatly upset and got ready to go to Rāma in the forest. Satrughna too got ready to accompany him. Arundhatī and Vasīṣṭha in a chariot in the fore-front, Kausalyā and Sumitrā in another chariot just behind the first one, Bharata and Satrughna behind them—in this manner the great journey into the forest started. Leaving all others behind him, Bharata went forward and prostrated before Rāma and Lakṣmanā at Citrakūṭa. Śrī Rāma broke into tears on hearing about the death of their father. But in spite of Bharata’s pressing request Rāma refused to return to Ayodhyā. At last Bharata yielded to Rāma's injunction and returned to Ayodhyā with the latter's sandals. But he did not enter the palace; instead he built an āśrama at Nandigrāma and worshipping Rāma's sandals lived there.

12) Trip to Paṅcavaṭī. From Mount Citrakūṭa Śrī Rāma and others started towards the forest. When they continued their journey after visiting the Sage Atri's āśrama a Rākṣasa called Virāḍha ran away carrying off Siṭā. Rāma killed Virāḍha and regained Siṭā. Then they visited the āśrama of sage Sarabhaṅga in the Kumuda forest. Therefrom they went to the Mrkaṇḍu forest where they visited mahārājī Agastya, and there Rāma took the vow to kill Rāvaṇa and other evil Rākṣasas and thus render the land safe for sages to perform tapas. Agastya presented to Rāma a Vaiṣṇava bow, a Brāhma arrow and a Śaiva quiver. Rāma kept them with Agastya himself to be given to him when required. Then Agastya gave Rāma a divine ornament such as was not available in all the three worlds. Rāma tied it round Siṭā's neck. Taking leave of Agastya, Rāma and others went to the Daṇḍaka forest. It was on a high peak of Mount Mahākūṭaṇḍa in the forest that Jaṭāyū, brother of Sampātī and a very close friend of Rāma lived. Rāma and Jaṭāyū renewed their old frindship and decided to be of mutual service in future. After that Rāma and others rested themselves on the banks of the near-by Godāvari.

13) Stay at Paṅcavaṭī. Paṅcavaṭī was on the southern bank of the Godāvari. Five vaṭas (peepal trees) of the same size stood there in a circle, and so the place was called Paṅcavaṭī. (See under Paṅcavaṭī). Śrī Rāma decided to build his āśrama at the centre of those trees. Lakṣmanā cut down an ebony tree there to put up a pārṇāśālā (hut) At once the log disappeared and the dead body of a Rākṣasa youth was found there. It was the corpse of Sambhukumārī, son of Śūraṇaṅkāhā. He was performing tapas there to propitiate Śiva when he was overcome by the beauty of Siṭā and to look at her from a hidden spot he had assumed the form of the ebony tree. It was him that Lakṣmanā had cut down. Śrī Rāma understood the situation and explained to his wife and brother about the trickeries of the Rākṣasas. Then the pārṇāśālā was constructed and they lived there. Hearing about the coming of Rāma all the sages of the Daṇḍaka forest visited them. They lived in Paṅcavaṭī for thirteen years.

14) Test by Paramesvarā (Śiva) and Pārvatī. Paramesvara and Pārvatī, who knew that many tricky changes would occur in the thirteenth year of the life of Rāma and Siṭā there, decided to submit them to a test. The object of the test was to see whether Rāma and Siṭā would recognise each other under all circumstances. When Siṭā one day entered the river Godāvari to fetch water, she saw two swans enjoying themselves in a lotus pool in the middle of a sand-shoal in the river. When Siṭā went near the pool she saw Rāma bathing in it. But on a closer look she recognised that it was not Rāma, but Śiva, in the guise of Rāma, who was bathing there. To befoul Siṭā Śiva, who was disguised as Rāma, told her:—Dear one! Please come to me quickly. Why were you so late?

Siṭā:—Oh, Devī ! salutations. Why did you alone come to the bath?

Rāma:—I had to come alone as Devī did not come with me at once and was late in coming.

Siṭā:—Why did not the Devī come? You two are unique. Devī might be alone at Kailāsa just now. It was not good that you did not bring her also with you. Śiva:—Oh great Devī ! salutations to your divine greatness. Let me return to Kailāsa after saluting Śrī Rāma. Hail unto thee.

Meanwhile Śrī Rāma was waiting impatiently for Siṭā to return. Then Siṭā approached him looking into a lotus flower she held in her hand and also throwing, off and on, amorous glances at him. (She was in fact Pārvatī in the guise of Siṭā). And she told Rāma:—My Lord! you would excuse my delay in returning. The delay was due to my tarrying there to look at the play of two swans. Śrī Rāma looked closely and recognised that it was not Siṭā and replied as follows:—Oh Devī ! my salutations. Did you come alone? Where is Deva? How is it that you are separated from him? Mahādeva and Mahādevī are one and inseparable. Then how this separation? Siṭā (Pārvatī):—Salutations. Thou art omniscient and omnipotent, I return to the presence of Śiva.

15) The incident of Śūraṇaṅkāhā. Śūraṇaṅkāhā was the wife of a Rākṣasa called Vidyyujjiva. Once in a war which Rāvaṇa, Vidyyujjiva and other Rākṣasas fought at Devaloka Vidyyujjiva was killed by mistake. Rāvaṇa, therefore, permitted Śūraṇaṅkāhā to choose whomsoever she liked as her husband, and she went about the world in search of a suitable husband. She liked some persons, but they did not like her, and vice versa. Thus she was roaming about discontented. She was also on the look-out for an opportunity to take vengeance on Lakṣmanā for killing her son, Sambhukumārā. Śūraṇaṅkāhā, who heard about the beauty of Rāma and Lakṣmanā came to Paṅcavaṭī disguised as Lalīṭā. Śrī Rāma alone was there in the āśrama at the time and she told him that she was love-sick. Śrī Rāma rejected her prayer on the plea that he was already married,
Then she approached Laksmana with the same request. He too refused to oblige her. Then she saw Sita there and decided to shatter her married life and also to make a present of her to Ravana. She also thought that if Sita were got rid of she would have Rama for husband. Maddened by such thoughts she rushed into the aśrama. But, Laksmana drove her out. Then, carrying Laksmana with her she rose into the sky and he cut away both her ears, breasts and nose. Thus disfigured she resumed her form of Rākṣasa. She flew away in the sky roaring loudly.

16) Khara killed. Having heard about the disfigurement of Śūrpaṅkha Khara sent fourteen Rākṣasas to Rāma’s aśrama. Laksmana killed them very easily. Next, Khara, his brothers Dūṣaṇa and Trisirās with fourteen thousand Rākṣasas soldiers came to fight Rāma. Rāma and Laksmana killed them also. This saddened Śūrpaṅkha very much and she reported the entire affair to Rāvana at Laṅkā. She told him that Rāma and Laksmana were very courageous warriors and he was not to enter into direct fighting with them, but was to abduct Sītā whose loss would cause Rāma’s death. She also assured Rāvana that if Rāma died, Laksmana would himself end his life.

17) Sītā abducted. Next day a spotted deer was found playing near the aśrama. Sītā desired to have the deer and Śrī Rāma, after asking his brother to take care of Sītā, followed the deer, which enticed him to a great distance in the forest. At last, finding it difficult to catch the deer alive, Rāma shot an arrow at it. Hit by the arrow the deer transformed itself into a gigantic Rākṣasa and fell down dead crying, “Oh! Sītā O! Laksmana, a Rākṣasa is killing me. Come and save me.”

The Rākṣasa, who thus fell a prey to Rāma’s arrow was really Mārica, uncle of Rāvana. Mārica had done the deed and Rāma’s aśrama at the instance of his nephew to cheat Rāma. Sītā heard the false cry of Mārica and asked Laksmana to hurry up to the spot for Rāma’s protection. Laksmana at first did not want to leave Sītā there alone and go after Rāma. But, when she used hard and cruel words against him Laksmana quitted the aśrama and went into the forest. When Rāma and Laksmana were thus absent at the aśrama an old Sannyāsin came for alms at the courtyard. Sītā, who came out to offer alms was forcibly carried away by Rāvana (the sannyāsin was Rāvana in disguise) in his puspaka aerial chariot to Laṅkā. On the way Ṣaṭāyu saw Rāvana and put up a fight with him to get Sītā released. But, Ṣaṭāyu had to fall down wounded by the sword of Rāvana and he lay there awaiting Rāma’s arrival. Rāma and Laksmana returned to the aśrama only to find Sītā missing. While they advanced some distance lamenting over the loss of Sītā they saw Ṣaṭāyu lying in the forest, his wings cut, but happy in expectation of salvation and repeating the name of Rāma. Ṣaṭāyu gave Rāma all details about Sītā and then gave up his body and ascended to Vaikuṇṭha.

18) Salutation to Kabandha. Rāma and Laksmana moved towards the south in quest of Sītā. An asura woman called Ayomukhi, sister of Śūrapadma tried to entice Laksmana, who went alone to a pool to fetch water. When Laksmana resisted and kept away from her allurements, she tried to carry him away into the sky. But, he drove her away disfigured. When the brothers continued their search for Sītā they were caught in the arms stretched out in semi-circular form. It was a Rākṣasa called Kabandha, and they cut away one arm each. At once the fierce Kabandha (headless body) form disappeared and a Gandharva youth appeared in his place. After offering mokṣa to Kabandha Rāma and Laksmana continued their search for Sītā. (See under Kabandha).

19) Salutation to Śabarī. Rāma and Laksmana reached Śabarīyaśrama and were duly received by the female hermit Śabarī. She presented them with fruits. Not only that, she personally tasted each fruit for its quality and then gave the best to the guests. Rāma was so very pleased with her pure devotion that he offered her salvation. (For details see under Šabarī).

20) Rāma-Śurīva alliance. Rāma and Laksmana bathed in the Pampā river and thus refreshed they travelled up to the height of Mount Rṣyamūkha where Sugrīva lived with Hanūman as his Prime Minister. Sugrīva, who saw Rāma and Laksmana coming, deputed Hanūman to find out whether they were friends or foes. Hanūman, in the guise of a brahmin boy talked with them, who related their story from the abduction of Sītā. Having understood the matters Hanūman resumed his actual form and carried Rāma and Laksmana on his shoulders into the presence of Sugrīva. Sugrīva related to Rāma the story of his expulsion from Kiṅkindhā by Bāli, his elder brother. Sugrīva wanted a powerful ally to recapture the country. Similarly Śrī Rāma too wanted a powerful ally to regain Sītā. So both the parties entered into an alliance, Rāma undertaking to kill Bāli and restore his kingdom and his wife to Sugrīva and Sugrīva undertaking to search for and find out Sītā for Rāma.

Though the above pact was made, Sugrīva was doubtful about Rāma’s capacity to honour his part of the contract, and Rāma, knowing this suspicion of Sugrīva, wanted to dispel it. The mountain-like body of Dunubhī, the Rākṣasa killed by Bāli, lay there in a big heap of bones and at the instance of Rāma, Laksmana threw it into the distant southern sea with the big toe of his left foot. Sugrīva was wonder-struck at this feat of Laksmana and praised him. Yet Sugrīva was not quite cured of his doubt and Rāma wanted to further convince him of their prowess.

There were seven big trees there known as Saptasāla. Bāli used to wrestle with the trees due to his overflowing vitality and power. (See under Saptasāla). Śrī Rāma went near the trees and suddenly fixed an arrow on his bow-string and shot it by drawing the bow, with the big toe of his right foot pressed against a rock. The arrow cut down the seven trees at one and the same time and then automatically returned to its quiver. Sugrīva was taken aback by this marvellous show of power.

21) Exhibition of ornaments. They came again to Rṣyamūkaka and Sugrīva placed before Rāma a bundle of ornaments and said that it was dropped down by a weeping woman from an aerial chariot, which had, a few days back, passed above the mountain. Rāma recognised them as Sītā’s ornaments, shed tears and sat there motionless for some time. At last Sugrīva and Laksmana consoled him and he handed over the bundle of ornaments to Laksmana.
22) Kingdom restored to Sugriva. The very next day Sugriva took Rāma to Kiṣkindhā, and the former challenged Bāli for a combat. Rāma, from a distance, viewed the fierce fight between the brothers, but he could not do anything as it was impossible to distinguish between Bāli and Sugriva on account of their very close resemblance. Sugriva, who was defeated in the first round and retired from fight felt angry towards Rāma, but was soon satisfied with Rāma’s explanation for his inaction. To distinguish Sugriva from Bāli Śrī Rāma, the next day, put a garland on the former’s neck and wearing the garland Sugriva challenged Bāli a second time to a duel. Though Bāli’s wife, Tārā, this time prevented him from accepting the challenge Bāli paid no heed to her protests and rushed forth for the duel.

Bāli and Sugriva fought again, and this time Rāma from his concealment behind a tree shot an arrow at the chest of Bāli. The arrow felled him. Rāma and Laṅkāmaṇa then came into the open and Bāli spoke disparagingly to Rāma about shooting the arrow from concealment. Rāma answered him saying that if he had seen him (Rāma) face to face he would have become his devotee and he had to shoot Bāli from his hiding place as it was not proper to kill one’s devotees. At last, after handing over charge of his wife and son Aṅgada, to Sugriva, Bāli breathed his last. Śrī Rāma decided to crown Sugriva as King and install Aṅgada as crown prince and returned to Śrīyaṃukācala for rest after entrusting, under the supervision of Laṅkāmaṇa, Hanūmān and Jámbavān with the duty of making preparations for the coronation. Though Sugriva invited Śrī Rāma to Kiṣkindhā when preparations for coronation were over, the latter declined the invitation gracefully and deputed Laṅkāmaṇa to represent him at the ceremony. Laṅkāmaṇa installed Sugriva as the Mahārāja, Aṅgada as crown prince, Rūmā as queen and Tārā as queen-mother. Also, Hanūmān was appointed as Sugriva’s minister. Those things over, Laṅkāmaṇa returned to Rāma at Śrīyaṃukācala.

23) Laṅkāmaṇa’s wrath. The next four months were very rainy period. Even after that Sugriva did not make necessary arrangements to search for Śītā. At Rāma’s instance Laṅkāmaṇa went to Kiṣkindhā to enquire about the reason for the delay. The monkeys were alarmed by the grave appearance of Laṅkāmaṇa and Tārā came out and apologised to him. Arrangements were soon finalised for the quest of Śītā. Armies of many lakhs of monkeys were deputed to the eight regions to search for Śītā. Suṣeṣa was appointed chief of the army for the west, Śatabāli for the north, Vinata for the east and Aṅgada for the south. At the south was the chief place for the search, monkeys like Hanūmān, Jámbavān, Viivīda, Nala, Nila, Kumuda, each of them an expert in various ways, were appointed chiefs of different matters. Every chief and his assistant was given suitable instructions by Laṅkāmaṇa and Sugriva, and accordingly the army of monkeys began its march under the leadership of Hanūmān.

24) Words of recognition. To convince Śītā that it was really the emissary of Rāma who went to her the latter imparted to Hanūmān the following three sentences for timely use.

(i) “When I took leave of you for life in exile in the forest you (Śītā) were then in the inner apartment dressed in ordinary fashion came out in the same dress prepared to follow me saying ‘I too...’ feigning anger’.

(ii) When, for our life in the forest, we had left the city and approached a shrubbery, Śītā in her childish ignorance and goodness of heart told me ‘This place will do for our forest life.’

(iii) While she was one day massaging my leg in our bedroom she threw away from her finger the ring studded with stones. When I asked her the reason for it she answered me as follows:—This ring studded with stones may prove to be of danger to me. When your feet touched the hard granite rock it turned out into a world beauty (Aḥalāyā). Under the circumstances how much more beautiful would be the woman, who would be created by the touch of your foot on the beautiful stone of the ring? And, because of that beauty you may...me...and then...”.

We two—I and Śītā—alone knew about the above incident.

Carrying thus Śrī Rāma’s signet ring and words of recognition Hanūmān went along with the army, which started for the south. Sugriva gave one month’s time to the searching parties to find out Śītā and warned them that their throats would be cut if they failed in their mission.

25) Saw Svayamprabhā. Aṅgada, Hanūmān, Jámbavān and others during their search came to an extensive forest. They were dead tired with hunger and thirst. The leader of the party looked about for something to eat and drink when he saw small birds flying up from a distant pit. From drops of water falling from the wings of the birds it was inferred that the pit contained water. When Hanūmān and others entered the pit (cave) and walked a great distance they came to a spacious garden. They were astonished to find a solitary beauty there, and she related to them her autobiography as follows:—

I am the faithful maid of Rambhā. The powerful asura called Caturāśya wanted me to procure Rambhā for him and he got this garden city built by Mayācārya, the architect of the Daityas, for me as reward for my service to him in the matter of Rambhā. Various kinds of gems light this place and creepers and trees supply food materials. Caturāśya, I and Rambhā alone were living here. But, Indra came to know of it, came here, killed Caturāśya and took away Rambhā with him. He cursed me to lead a solitary life here as punishment for having helped Caturāśya. I prayed for redemption from the curse and Indra told me, that after thousands of years a company of monkeys would come here in search of Śītā and that after entertaining them with food I must see Rāma and then return to Svarga. I have thus been awaiting your arrival and now I am leaving the place, which will vanish as soon as I quit it. All of you, please stand there with eyes closed and I shall send you back to the place where you were before coming here.

Accordingly the monkeys stood there with eyes closed and when they opened their eyes there was neither the garden city nor Svayamprabhā there but they were standing in the old plain. Svayamprabhā appeared before Rāma, praised him and then went to Svarga.

26) Met Sambati. The monkeys again went southward, reached Mahendragiri and descending on its southern side came to the shores of the southern sea. They could advance no further to the south. They were suffering from great hunger and thirst and if they returned with no tangible information about Sītā, Sugrīva would kill them. They preferred death by fasting on the seashore to death by the sword of Sugrīva.

Having decided thus the monkeys spread darbha grass on the extensive plain of Mahendra mountain and lay on the grass to die. In a large cave in the mountain was living Sampāti. The huge bird Sampāti was starving without food and was not able to fly as it had lost its wings. But it dragged itself to the mouth of the cave and saw the monkeys lying there awaiting death, and it thought of eating the monkeys one by one. The monkeys, who understood this idea of Sampāti cursed their fate and sang the praise of Jaṭāyu.

Hearing the word ‘Jaṭāyu’ Sampāti approached the monkeys, who related to him the object of their journey. Being told about the death of Jaṭāyu, Sampāti shed tears and told the monkeys as follows:

Jaṭāyu was my younger brother. Our mother was Mahāśvetā and father Sūryadeva. On account of the boon of our parents I was King of all the birds and Jaṭāyu the crown Prince. As our brotherliness grew thicker our haughtiness due to our power and speed also increased. Once we flew up towards the orbit of the Sun to see him, our father. In his youthful enthusiasm my younger brother, Jaṭāyu, climbed higher up in the sky leaving me behind. Due to the heat of the Sun his wings lost their power and energy. Then, to save him, I flew up above him and shaded him. Therefore he could descend to the earth without his wings being burned and thus killed. But, my wings got burned and I fell down on the Mahendra mountain and got my legs broken. Thus I lost the power either to fly or to walk.

I stayed here as the attendant of Niśākara Mahārṣi, who could divine the future also. He told me the story about Rāma’s incarnation. He told me further that monkeys in search of Sītā would come here when I should tell them where Sītā was and that then I would regain my health."

After telling the monkeys the above facts Sampāti, with their cooperation, performed the obsequies of Jaṭāyu. Then the King of birds (Sampāti) raised its head and surveyed the ocean and he saw the following: Mountain Subela in the heart of the southern sea; the plain at the heights of the mountain constituting the base of Lāṅkā; in the centre of Lāṅkā there was Rāvana’s capital; nearby the ladies’ quarters; near the quarters the aśoka garden; at the centre of the garden the śīrṣa‘pā tree and under the tree Śīrṣadevi.

As soon as Sampāti had finished telling the monkeys the above details he regained his health.

Sampāti told the monkeys another story also as follows:

Rāvana once abducted a Yakṣa beauty from Alakāpurī and carried her away in his Puṣpaka Vīmāna. Sampāti clashed with Rāvana on his way and destroyed his plane. But his plane, which was self-generating came again into existence. Sampāti threw away its beak the Candrabāha (Rāvana’s sword) and kicked his crown down. At last, at the request of Rāvana, he and Sampāti signed a non-aggression pact. That was the reason why Sampāti could not fight Rāvana in person.

27) Hanūmān saw Sītā. Aṅgada said that for the search for Sītā in Lāṅkā as told by Sampāti, some one should jump across the ocean. Though many a monkey tried to do so it was Hanūmān, who succeeded in crossing the sea. At one jump he reached the heights of Mahendra; whence he took another jump forward. But, midway Surašā, mother of the nāgas, swallowed him, and he came out through her ear and continued his journey towards Lāṅkā. When he had advanced some more distance an evil spirit called Chāyāgrāhini obstructed his way by a mysterious attack on his shadow. Hanūmān quickly understood what had happened and killed the evil spirit with one kick of his left foot. He again continued his flight. But, he very soon became weak and exhausted. Then Mount Maināka emerged from the ocean and fed Hanūmān with fruits and roots. He reached Lāṅkā at dusk. He defeated Lāṅkākālaṃsi, who tried to prevent his entry into the city. In fact Lāṅkākālaṃsi was Vijayaalākaṃsi, who had been cursed by Brahmas. (For details see under Vijayaalākaṃsi). After defeating her, who was thus absolved from the curse, Hanūmān saw Sītā seated under the aśoka tree. But, none saw him as he was perched on a tree.

28) Hanūmān’s return. That night Rāvaṇa dressed in all splendour visited Sītā and tried to secure her favour by soft words and cajolery, all to no purpose. Then he threatened her with punishments, which too proved to be of no avail. After instructing the Rākṣas women that Sītā should be somehow brought round within a month’s time, Rāvaṇa returned to his palace. Rākṣasīs surrounded Sītā and described to her the greatness and various merits of Rāvaṇa. Sītā continued to sob. Then came there Trijātā, daughter of Vibhīṣaṇa, the great devotee of Viṣṇu, and Sāramā, to console Sītā. Trijātā had boundless devotion towards Rāma and great love for Sītā. She repeated to Sītā certain dreams she had had.

Left to herself Sītā began saying to herself various things regarding her past. She referred to her infancy, beginning of youth, wedding, stay at Ayodhya, forest-life and life in Pāncavaṭi and wept over her recurring thoughts about them. Hanūmān, who heard Sītā’s soliloquy completed Sītā’s story by relating, from his place on the tree, about Jaṭāyu’s salvation, salvation given to Kabandha and Śaṭari, alliance with Sugrīva, killing of Bāli, expedition of the monkeys in search of Sītā, meeting with Sampāti, himself (Hanūmān) crossing the sea and his finding out Sītā. Hearing the words of Hanūmān, Sītā looked up in astonishment. Immediately Hanūmān came down the tree and presented the signet ring at Sītā’s feet. When she examined the ring her hands shook and tears dimmed her eyes. Hanūmān talked to her in detail and told her that he would, if only Sītā permitted him, carry her on his shoulders to Rāma. He told her further that if she did not welcome the idea of thus returning to Rāma, he would return with Śrī Rāma and others, defeat Rāvaṇa in war and take her back. Sītā was not convinced about the power and prowess of Hanūmān. He then increased his body in size so that his limbs grew into the size of a mountain, hands into that of trees, head into that of a mountain peak, tail into that of a river etc. His breathing became akin to a storm. Then he roared in such a manner that even the very ends of the world shook and the people of Lāṅkā were awakened by it.

Sītā was now absolutely convinced of Hanūmān’s bona fides and faithfulness. She handed over to him her Cūḍāmaṇi (ornament worn on the head) to be Rāma and also told him the following three words of recognition so that Rāma might be all the more convinced.

(1) When Rāma first came to the garden near the palace in Mithilā 1 (Sitā) saw his reflection in the blue mirror in the veranda of my palace and the beauty of the reflection attracted me. I looked towards the garden to see the original of the reflection. Then he (Rāma) was looking down into the waters of the glass pond. He also saw my face reflected in the water and suddenly he looked at me. Our eyes met and in all shyness I hurried to and hid myself in the ladies' quarters.

(2) Before our wedding I sent him through a faithful maid, a love letter to which he gave me a suitable reply.

(3) After our wedding while we were living in Ayodhya when one day I returned to our bedroom after a long chit-chat with my younger sisters, my lord (Rāma) was lying on the cot in feigned sleep. Quietly I went up to him and kissed him on the lips. Because of the pressure on his lips and as my breast then touched his chest he pretended to have suddenly woken up and embraced me.

Having received thus from Sitā the Cūḍāmaṇī and these words of recognition Hanumān took leave of Sitā and with her implied sanction went about to have a look at Laṅkā. At one place he heard Vibhiṣaṇa reciting Viṣṇu's names. After wishing that this house of the devotee should turn into a royal abode he passed Vibhiṣaṇa's house. Then he came to Rāvana's palace and gathered information about the Rākṣas power.

"Now I must see Rāvana in person, let him know personally the fact of my visit and I would give him righteous advice"—with this object in view Hanumān began destroying the garden. He drove away the Rākṣasas, who came to punish him and some of them were killed. At last Meghnāda (Indrajit) attacked Hanumān. Hiding in the sky he shot the Brahмаstra against Hanumān, who yielded to it. The Rākṣasas took Hanumān captive to Rāvana. He freely himself of the cords that bound him, extended his tail which he shaped into circles, one over the other so that the last one rose more in height than Rāvana's throne and seated himself on its top. Rāvana and Hanumān then began a conversation. Rāvana, who got angry at the disrespect shown to him by Hanumān, ordered the latter to be killed, but Vibhiṣaṇa opposed it saying that to kill emissaries and messengers was worse than killing one's own mother. Finally Rāvana ordered that Hanumān's tail be set fire to and he be insulted and humiliated.

Immediately Rākṣasas began to cover Hanumān's tail with clothes. But, the tail began growing longer and longer with the result that no quantity of cloths sufficed to completely cover the ever-extending tail. At last the Rākṣasas poured oil over the tail and set fire to it. Then Hanumān broke loose from captivity and jumped up into the air causing universal disaster by fire in Laṅkā. The fire did not affect the palace of Vibhiṣaṇa and also the platform around the Śītāśāp tree where Sitā sat. After thus burning down Laṅkā Hanumān extinguished the fire on his tail by pumping it in the ocean. Taking leave once again of Sitā, Hanumān crossed the sea and reached Mahendragiri.

29) Rāma-Rāvana war. Śri Rāma and Sugrīva, who received Hanumān's report about his visit to Laṅkā started for it with an army of monkeys. They camped on the shores of the south sea. Rāvana held a meeting of his war council attended by his brothers and others. He expelled Vibhiṣaṇa, who opposed war and advised his brother to return Sitā to Rāma and to apologise to him. Vibhiṣaṇa quit Laṅkā and took refuge with Rāma.

Rāma and others, who had assembled on the sea-shore decided to build a bund to Laṅkā. The first thing Rāma did, for the successful conclusion of the expedition, was to install a Śivalinga at Rāmēsvara. (See under Rāmeśvara). Then he prayed to Varuṇadeva for a passage across the sea. But, Varuṇa did not present himself and Śri Rāma, angry with him, shot the āgneya (fiery) arrow into the heart of the sea when Varuṇa appeared, saluted him and advised him to build a bund across the sea. As a reward for Varuṇa Śri Rāma, as requested by the former, killed with one arrow all the Rākṣasas, who lived in Gāndhāra island on the north-western shore of the ocean. Varuṇa returned to his abode. The construction of the bund was begun under the leadership of Sugrīva with Nala as chief planner and Nila as his co-planner. Jāmbavān and Hanumān functioned as supervisors and other monkeys as workers. Mountains, hills, rocks etc were brought from various quarters and the construction of the bund was begun.

Meanwhile, Rāvana sent a great magician called Marutta disguised as King Janaka to Sitā to convert her to the side of Rāvana. But, the attempt failed. Rāvana then sent his two expert spies, Śuka and Śāraṇa disguised as monkeys to Rāma's camp. Jāmbavān and Hanumān captured and brought them before Sugrīva. Weepingly they both sought refuge in Rāma, who set them free. They returned to Laṅkā and reported matters to Rāvana, who felt a desire to have a look at Rāma for which purpose he, with his attendants, climbed to the top of the northern tower. Rāma, who knew about it by his spies climbed the heights of Subela mountain whence he stared at Rāvana. Their eyes met in anger seeing which Sugrīva by one leap reached Rāvana and kicked off to Rāma the crown from the central head of Rāvana. After performing something like a destructive dance on Rāvana's head Sugrīva by another leap returned to Rāma.

Full of disappointment Rāvana returned to his palace. His father-in-law, Mālyavān, tried his best to dissuade Rāvana from war, all to no purpose. Rāma sent an emissary to him to ask him to send Sitā back. Rāvana declined to oblige and immediately war began. During the first day of the war, the majority of the Rākṣasas including their great leaders like Mahābabu, Mahāpārvī, Mahodara, Mahākāya etc were killed. On the second day the Rākṣasa army under the command of Atikāya, son of Rāvana, set out from the northern tower to fight. Lakṣaṁṇa killed Atikāya with Brahmastra. The other two Rākṣasa-commanders were Trisī拉斯 and Meghnāda. Lakṣaṁṇa killed Atikāya with Brahmastra. The other two Rākṣasa-commanders were Trisīras and Meghnāda. Lakṣaṁṇa killed Atikāya with Brahmastra. The other two Rākṣasa-commanders were Trisīras and Meghnāda.
monkeys unconscious. At that time Vibhiṣaṇa was away to arrange for food. When Vibhiṣaṇa returned with food he was taken aback to find Lākṣmaṇa and others lying in an unconscious condition. Rāma was informed about the matter and when he came to the battle-ground and saw Lākṣmaṇa, Sugrīva, Hanūmān and all the others lying there unconscious he lost self-confidence for a short while and remarked that it was all the result of his having put faith in Vibhiṣaṇa, Rāvana’s brother whom he had put in charge of the battle-field. This comment of Rāma pained Vibhiṣaṇa much; but Śrī Rāma soon treated him kindly. Even the Devas who witnessed the scene were alarmed. But Rāma sat there for sometime immersed in meditation and then a light emerged from his right eye, shot towards the north and disappeared in the horizon. At once Garuḍa appeared on the scene from the west and removed with his beak the nāgāstra from Lākṣmaṇa’s body. Lākṣmaṇa jumped up from his unconscious state; Sugrīva and others also regained consciousness. In the fighting that followed all the Rākṣasas leaders were killed. It was Hanūmān, who killed Kumbhakarṇa. At the time of his death Kumbhakarṇa made a last request to Rāma, i.e. his head should be cut off and thrown into the sea as otherwise the Rākṣasas would laugh at him to see the head from which the ears have been bitten off by monkeys. Accordingly Rāma got Hanūmān to throw Kumbhakarṇa’s head into the sea.

Then Śrī Rāma told Lākṣmaṇa thus: Today I shall fight Indrajit. The war shall not continue yet further. Today Indrajit and tomorrow Rāvana should be killed and the next day we will return to Ayodhī. Lākṣmaṇa answered:—“I shall fight Indrajit. I have told Vibhiṣaṇa that I will kill Indrajit within three days.”

With Śrī Rāma’s blessings Lākṣmaṇa began fighting again. Indrajit shot Nārāyaṇastra which attracted by the ‘seven-letter-Mantra’ (Namo Nārāyaṇayaḥ) of Lākṣmaṇa circled him thrice and entered his quiver. The Rākṣasa minister called Mahodara converted his elephant into Āirāvata and himself changed into Devendra and encountered Lākṣmaṇa. Saying that he had no quarrel with Indra and would not fight him Lākṣmaṇa put down his bow, and Indrajit, exploiting the situation shot Brahmāstra against Lākṣmaṇa under cover of the clouds. Lākṣmaṇa, Sugrīva and others fainted. Then Śrī Rāma was in the army-camp, worshipping weapons to render them more powerful. Rāma returned to the battle-ground to find Lākṣmaṇa and others in life-less condition and crying like a mere ignorant fellow he lay by the side of Lākṣmaṇa. Vibhiṣaṇa, who returned with food prayed for the grace of Devas. Indra appeared, gave to Vibhiṣaṇa Gaṅgā water in a golden vessel and asked it to be given to Hanūmān and Jāmbavān, who, though unconscious were not dead.

Vibhiṣaṇa did so and both Hanūmān and Jāmbavān regained consciousness. Jāmbavān told Hanūmān that if mṛtasaṇjīvini (herbal medicine which will put life back into the dead) were brought from the distant Himālayas before dawn the next day all the dead ones like Lākṣmaṇa and Sugrīva could be brought back to life. (See under Mṛtasaṇjīvini). Accordingly Hanūmān started for the Himālayas. Meanwhile Indrajit had told Rāvana about his victory, and as suggested by the latter Rākṣasa women took Sītā to the battle-field in the Puspaika Vimāṇa, showed her Rāma, Lākṣmaṇa and others lying there in a life-less condition and told her that all of them were dead. Sītā wept aloud, but Triśaṭa consoled her by saying that the Puspaika Vimāṇa would not carry widows and therefore Rāma was not dead.

Hanūmān returned before dawn the next day. As he could not distinguish mṛtasaṇjīvini he had brought with him a mountain peak where the four medicinal plants, Śalyaharani, Viśālakarani, Sandhānakarani and Mṛtasaṇjīvini grew. Jāmbavān distinguished mṛtasaṇjīvini from the others and carried the four herbs into the battle-field. Contact with the air, which carried the smell of mṛtasaṇjīvini brought the dead back to life. Viśālakarani removed all the arrows from their bodies and Sandhānakarani healed the wounds. Lākṣmaṇa again went out to fight Indrajit. Reluctant to fight with the former, Indrajit resorted to a new magical trick. He created an artificial or illusory Sītā and with her seated in a chariot he rose up in the sky and said as follows: “Rāvana has abandoned Sītā who brings about humiliation to the Rākṣasas and ruin to Laṅkā. So, I cut her to pieces.” So saying he cut into two, by one stroke of his sword, Sītā, who cried Oh! my lord! oh! brother.” Blood fell on the battle-field and Indrajit disappeared. Though Rāma and others were alarmed by all these, Vibhiṣaṇa explained that it was all the magic of the Rākṣasas, and in the fierce fighting that followed Lākṣmaṇa killed Indrajit. By now all the important and prominent Rākṣasas were killed. At last Rāvana himself entered the battle-field. His first encounter was with Lākṣmaṇa. Then the fighting turned into one between Rāma and Rāvana. The former broke the bow of Rāvana and did not want to fight with the weaponless Rākṣasa King. Next day Rāvana brought Pāṭāla Rāvana and Kumbhodara to Laṅkā. Both of them entered Rāma’s camp during night, but Pāṭāla Rāvana, who realised that nothing could be achieved there returned to Pāṭāla with Kumbhodara. He built a tunnel from Pāṭāla upwards to earth, where in the fort created by Hanūmān’s tail twisted in a circle lay Śrī Rāma and others. The tunnel opened into this ‘fort’, and Pāṭāla Rāvana and his brother made Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa unconscious by making them inhale sammohana medicine and carried them off into Pāṭāla. Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa were laid in the court-yard of a Kālī temple to be sacrificed to Mahākāli the very same night. Arrangements for the sacrifice were completed.

Hanūmān had been frequently looking inside the fort. As soon as the absence of Rāma and Lākṣmaṇa was noticed, Sugrīva and others, under the leadership of Vibhiṣaṇa reached the Kālī temple through the tunnel. In the fighting that followed Hanūmān killed Pāṭāla Rāvana and Aṅgada killed Mahodara. The only son of Pāṭāla Rāvana, Sumālī, was crowned King of Pāṭāla. Rāvana entered the field again against Rāma. Rāma shot the Mahendra arrow against Rāvana. The arrow, which represented in itself the effulgence of Mahendra, the hardness of diamonds, the intensity of fire and Viśṇu’s glow cut off the ten heads of Rāvana. His physical body fell on earth and his spirit ascended to heaven.
30). Return. Rama and others, who were pleased with the turn of events, crowned Vibhiṣaṇa, the new king of Laṅka. Trijñāṇa was put in charge of dressing Sītā in new clothes. Apsaras appeared on the scene. Śacīdevī presented to Sītā a chain, Urvāśī an ornament for the head, Menakā, two bangles, Rambhā, a waist-let, Tilottamā a set of chains for the feet, and Anasīyā, wife of Atri, a Cūḍāmaṇi. When she wore all these ornaments Sītā appeared to be equal to Lakṣmīdevī in grandeur and charm. She was brought in a palaṇquin to Śrī Rāma by Vibhiṣaṇa and others. Rāma was taken aback by the glamorous dress, ornaments etc. of Sītā, and immediately a suspicion arose in his mind, and he kept mum after asking Lakṣmana to do whatever Sītā wanted. As soon as she heard those words of Rāma, Sītā asked Lakṣmana to light a funeral pyre saying that the woman suspected by her husband should not live and so she (Sītā) would quit her life in the very presence of Rāma.

Lakṣmaṇa cast a pathetic look at Rāma; but his face exhibited no change of feeling. He granted Sītā's request by his silence. Those present there awaited developments with bated breath. Lakṣmaṇa, with the help of the monkeys got a pyre ready. After going round Rāma with folded hands Sītā leapt into the glowing fire. Within a very short time three divine forms emerged from the fire, Śvāhādevī, Śīfādevī and God Agni. His suspicions having thus vanished Rāma welcomed Sītā back and the next day they left for Ayodhya in the Pūṣpaka Vimāṇa. Vibhiṣaṇa, Sugrīva, Hanumāṇ and others followed them. After reaching Ayodhya Rāma returned the Pūṣpaka to Kubera. Bharata came back from Nandigrāma. In the presence of all relations and others concerned the coronation of Rāma as king took place. Bharata was appointed crown Prince, Lakṣmaṇa Commander-in-chief of armies and Śatrughna, Finance minister.

31) Sītā abandoned. Under Rāma's rule the country overflowed with milk and honey. Nobody had to fear anything from enemies. He made Sītā kill Sahasramukha Rāvaṇa. (For details see under Sahasramukhāravāpa). Śrī Rāma used to go about the country in disguise to enquire about the welfare of his subjects. On a particular dawn he happened to be standing outside the house of a washerman. The washerman scolded his wife, who had gone out of the house that night for something. He suspected that she had gone to meet her paramour. He bluntly told his wife that he was not prepared to act like Rāma, who had accepted Sītā, though she had lived with another person. Śrī Rāma, who heard the above talk, returned to his palace very sad. After thinking about for a long time he decided that it was his duty to abandon Sītā in the interests of his subjects. Then Sītā was in the seventh month of her pregnancy. She had on the previous day, expressed a desire to go to the forest areas once again, Rāma considered this as the most suitable opportunity to abandon Sītā in the forest and Lakṣmaṇa was entrusted with the matter. That day at Sun-rise Lakṣmaṇa took Sītā in a chariot to the suburbs of Vālmiki's āśrama, abandoned her there and returned to the palace. (According to the Rāmāyaṇa written by Kamba, a Tamil author, it is said that Sītā was left in the suburbs of Gauvāma's hut. There, Sītā who was pregnant was looked after by Alāyā, the wife of Gautama.) Weeping aloud Sītā fell down. Young munis—Vālmiki’s disciples—saw her and took her to the āśrama. At the āśrama she delivered two sons, Kuśa and Lava.

32) Āsvamedha. After abandoning Sītā in the forests Rāma led a sad life for five years. Yet, he decided to perform an Āsvamedha yajña. As soon as Rāma thought of him, Hanumān appeared and he was deputed to invite Vibhiṣaṇa, Sugrīva and others from Laṅka and Kiśkindhā and the feudatory princes and armies from other countries. Sugrīva was put in charge of the armies, Vibhiṣaṇa in charge of finance, and central authority was vested in Lakṣmaṇa. Then the yājñic horse, accompanied by the army, was let loose to travel all over the country. Accompanied by cavalry, the elephant division, infantry and the chariot-force the horse went about the various kingdoms. The army, on its way back to Ayodhya with presents collected from many kingdoms, encamped for rest near Vālmiki’s āśrama when Kuśa and Lava tied the yājñic horse, which was strolling there unfettered. Consequent upon this action of Kuśa and Lava a fight broke out between them and the king’s army in which the latter got defeated. Even the arrows of Lakṣmaṇa failed to have any effect on the boys. The boys having not returned even though it had become very late in the evening, the āśramites went in search of them and it was only when they came to the scene of fighting did Lakṣmaṇa and others know who the boys really were. During this period of time infants’ death was very much on the increase in Ayodhya. It was believed that such deaths increased when Śūdras did tapas, and to find out if any Śūdra was engaged in tapas Rāma flew over the Danḍaka forest where he found a Śūdra called Sambūka performing tapas hanging down from the branch of a tree with his head down. Rāma killed him and his spirit got salvation. Afterwards, appreciating the beauties of the forest Rāma came near Vālmiki’s āśrama where he and Sītā met face to face. Kuśa and Lava also came there and they noticed with surprise the change in appearance brought about in their mother and Rāma on their meeting each other. When they heard from Hanumān the real facts about Rāma they withdrew their arrows and prostrated at the feet of Rāma. Śrī Rāma then, with the consent of all and in accordance with his own desire, took back Sītā and returned with her to Ayodhya. Lakṣmaṇa and others followed him. Kausalyā and others received Sītā most heartily. Śrī Rāma, who till then was having no wife, had made a golden image of Sītā for the purposes of the a’vamadha. Now, since the real Sītā was with him the idol was an unnecessary thing. The Āsvamedhayajña went off very well.

33) The end. Śrī Rāma’s reign became all the more prosperous. It was during this period that Rāma, as desired by the munis in the Yamunā plain, killed Lavaṇāśura, son of Madhu in the great city called Durga in the centre of the Madhu forest. (For details see under Lavaṇa). After Lavaṇa’s death, a sect of Gandharvīs called Śallīśas, who lived on the shores of the eastern sea, proved to be enemies of Ayodhya. Śrī Rāma annihilated them also. Kaikeyī began getting jealous of the prosperity and happiness of Sītā. One day when Rāma had gone to hunt in the forest, Kaikeyī closely questioned Sītā over particulars in Laṅka and prevailed upon her, overruling her unwillingness, to draw a picture of Rāvana. Sītā drew on a piece of ‘sitting-plank’ Rāvana’s figure with the ten heads. Kaikēyī took away the picture on the pretext of exhibiting it in the ladies’ quarters, and gave it to Rāma, when he returned from hunting, to sit on at the time of Pūjā (worship). Rāma got angry to find Rāvana’s picture drawn on the ‘sitting-plank’. Kaikēyī then told him that it was Sītā, who had drawn the picture and also that she usually praised Lākṣāṇā and Rāvana. Rāma pronounced the death penalty on Sītā for having drawn Rāvana’s picture. The inmates of the palace shuddered to hear the judgement. When Lākṣāṇa seated Sītā on the floor to kill her, Bhūmidevi (earth) rent itself open into two and carried her off through the opening.

Sīr Rāma grew sadder and sadder following the disappearance of Sītā. Ill omens began to appear in Ayodhīyā in increasing measure. One day a divine Rṣi whom the people of Ayodhīyā had not seen till then, came to Rāma’s palace. He told Rāma that he had to impart certain secrets to the latter and after making Rāma vow that no one would enter the room while they were conversing and that if any one did come when they were talking, he should either be killed or forsaken for ever, he began to talk with Rāma in a secluded spot. Rāma posted Lākṣāṇa at the entrance with the strict injunctions that nobody should come into their presence. Within a short time great munis like Sanaka came there and told Lākṣāṇa that they wanted to see Rāma. They were not prepared to wait even for a short time as requested by Lākṣāṇa, but threatened ruin to the royal family. Lākṣāṇa then, was prepared to suffer the consequence, and went to Rāma and told him about the arrival of Sanaka and others. Rāma, in keeping with his vow, banished Lākṣāṇa immediately. But, when Rāma came out and looked for Sanaka and others no one was to be found anywhere there. When he returned to the inner apartment the Rṣi also was not to be seen. In fact they were Kāla and his emissaries deputed by Brahmā to recall Rāma as the object of his incarnation was already achieved.

Rāma, who had already been suffering mental agony on account of Sītā’s departure, lost all peace of mind as Lākṣāṇa’s banishment followed Sītā’s departure. He decided to put an end to his life for which purpose he went to the river Sarayū. All the dependants followed him. While the great mass of people who thronged both the banks of the river burst out into weeping Śrī Rāma and his followers drowned themselves in the waters of the Sarayū, and their spirits attained Vaikuṇṭha. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Kamba Rāmāyana and Tulasidāsa Rāmāyana).

RĀMĀYANA. A holy place on the boundary of Kurukṣetra. Ambā, daughter of a King of Kāśi once bathed here. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 186, Verse 28).

RĀMAKA. A mountain. Sahadeva, during his triumphal tour of the south, conquered this mountain. (Śabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 66).

RĀMĀNA I. A son born to the Vasu known as Soma of his wife Manoharā. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 22).

RĀMĀNCĪNA. A particular region in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

RĀMAṆ (M). (RĀMAṆAKAM). An island near Dwārakā where, according to Chapter 38 of the Southern Text of Bhāratā, there was a forest. It was in this island that Vīna, mother of Garuḍa and Kadrū, mother of the nāgas lived. Garuḍa, after freeing his mother from her slavery evicted the nāgas from this island. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 17). Following the eviction, many of the prominent nāgas lived in Pātāla. But, Kāliya, in fear of Garuḍa, lived in Kālindī. After his suppression by Śrī Kṛṣṇa Kāliya, with his family, as advised by Kṛṣṇa returned to Rāmaṇakam. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

RĀMĀṆAKA. The third son of Yājñabāhu, son of Priyavrata. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RĀMĀṆIYAKA. The island called Rāmaṇakam where the nāgas live. (See under Rāmaṇaka).

RĀMATHA (S). I. A mlecha tribe who lived in the kingdom of Māndhātā. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 14).

RĀMATHA (S). II. People of a low caste (mlecchas) who lived in South India during Purānic times. Nakula, subjugated this caste, and from that day onwards they became devoted to the Pāṇḍavas. They were invited to the Rājasūya conducted by Yudhiṣṭhira. (Vana Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 25).

RĀMĀṬIṚTHA I. A holy place in the river Gomati. He who bathes in this tirtha will derive the results of performing the Āsvamedha yajña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 73).

RĀMĀṬIṚTHA II. A holy spot on the top of the Mahendra mountain where Pāraśurāma lived. A bath here brings the benefits of performing the āsvamedha yajña. (Vana Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 17).

RĀMĀṬIṚTHA III. A holy place in the plains of river Sarasvatī. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 49, Verse 7).

RĀMĀṆĀ. 1) General. Rāmāyana is considered to be the first poetic composition in the world or at least in India, and hence it is called the Ādi Kāvyā (First Epic). It is an epic as it contains descriptions and references to ancient themes. Vālmiki is its author, and hence Vālmiki is known as the ‘Ādi kavi’ also. Vālmiki and Śrī Rāma were contemporaries. During his life in exile in the forest Rāma visited Vālmiki’s āśrama. It was in this āśrama that Śrītā lived after being abandoned by Rāma. The connection in many ways of the life of Vālmiki with the ‘Rāma story’ was an incentive for him to write the Rāmāyana.

2) Composing of Rāmāyana. Once while returning from the river Tamasā Vālmiki witnessed a hunter shooting down one of a Kauśī (a kind of bird) couple. The intense emotion created by the incident burst out as follows in verse form.

Mā niśāda pratiśṭhān vamagamaṁ śāśvatīḥ samāh /
Yat krauṇcamaṁ bhadradekamavadhiḥ
kāmamohitaṁ //

Immediately Brahmā appeared on the scene and advised Vālmiki to write the story of Rāma in the same pattern as that verse. Brahmā taught him about the past and the future of the history of Rāma. As Śrītā, Kuśa, and Lava were living in his āśrama Vālmiki was well in the know about the present. In the above background Vālmiki completed writing the Rāmāyaṇa Story in 24,000 verses. The epic is divided into seven kāṇḍas (sections) of five hundred chapters. The seven sections are the Bālakāṇḍa, the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, the Arāpya kāṇḍa, the Kiskindhā Kāṇḍa, the Sūndara Kāṇḍa, the Yuddha Kāṇḍa and the Uttarakāṇḍa. Vālmiki taught the poem to Lava and Kuśa and when they went with Vālmiki to Ayodhyā during the āśvamedhāyajna of Śrī Rāma, they sang the poem in the open assembly there.

3) Different views about the author. Tradition ascribes the authorship of the Rāmāyaṇa to Vālmiki. But, western scholars hold the view that a part of Bālakāṇḍa and the whole of Uttarakāṇḍa are interpolations of a future date. The following are the reasons for this view.

(i) Two different texts are found for cantos one and three of Bālakāṇḍa. In one of them many of the stories mentioned in the other are missing. It may, therefore, be surmised that the two texts were composed during different periods.

(ii) In the early texts of Rāmāyaṇa stories like Gaṅgāvataraṇam are not to be found. So they must be interpolations of a later period.

(iii) Only in Kāṇḍas one and seven is Śrī Rāma treated as an incarnation. In the other Kāṇḍas he is considered in the capacity of a hero only.

(iv) Uttarakāṇḍa is not to be found among the early translations of Rāmāyaṇa into other languages.

(v) In the Bālakāṇḍa it is stated that Vālmiki composed the Rāmāyaṇa, taught it to Kuśa and Lava, and that they recited the whole poem before Śrī Rāma at Ayodhyā. Many of the things mentioned in this Kāṇḍa are repeated in Uttarakāṇḍa, which, therefore, must have been written by someone else.

4) The period of Rāmāyaṇa. According to Indian belief Śrī Rāma lived at the end of Tretāyuga, which came to its close in 8,67,100 B.C. As per Rāmāyaṇa Śrī Rāma ruled the country for 11,000 years. He was forty years old when he ascended the throne. Vālmiki began writing the Rāmāyaṇa after Lavakuṣa was born. In the light of the above facts, certain scholars opine that the Rāmāyaṇa was written near about 878000 B.C. But, western critics and some eastern critics do not accept this view. Professor Jacoby holds the view that the original of Mahābhārata is anterior to Rāmāyaṇa. Most scholars do not agree with this view. A great majority of critics are of opinion that Rāmāyaṇa is anterior to Mahābhārata. They argue as follows:

(i) The traditional belief in India is that Rāmāyaṇa was written much earlier than Mahābhārata.

(ii) Rāmāyaṇa makes no reference to any of the characters of Mahābhārata.

(iii) The Śrī Rāma story is referred to in many a Jāta story of the Buddhists.

(iv) Vālmiki has made no mention about the city of Pāṭaliputra established near about 380 B.C. It is an irrefutable fact that Śrī Rāma had passed by the city.

(v) During the reign of emperor Aśoka the Prākṛta language was spoken in the areas where the incidents mentioned in Rāmāyaṇa took place. But, Rāmāyaṇa was written much anterior to the emergence of Prākṛta language. According to Professor Keith Rāmāyaṇa was written in 300 B.C.

5) Different readings of Rāmāyaṇa. In various parts of India three original texts or readings are found of the original Rāmāyaṇa. In each of the three texts nearly 1/3 of the portions differ from one another. The Bombay text is popular in northern and southern India. The second is the Bengal text. The third, the Kashmir text, is popular in the north-western parts of India. The inference to be made from the existence of these three different texts is that the original epic was composed in a Prākṛta language, which was most popular at the time and that it was later translated into Sanskrit by different persons at different times. This theory will explain the existence of the different texts. For many years it continued to be handed down from mouth to month till it assumed written form in Sanskrit.

6) Other Rāmāyaṇas. The Rāmāyaṇa story in other forms and garbs, is also prevalent in India. One of them is Vāsiṣṭhārāmāyaṇa or Jñānavāsīṣṭha. The authorship of it also is ascribed to Vālmiki. Most of the Rāmāyaṇas like Vāsiṣṭhottararāmāyaṇa, Sitāvijaya, Ad bhutarāmāyaṇa, Adbhutottararāmāyaṇa also found widely in different parts of India are believed to have been written by Vālmiki. Adbhutarāmāyaṇa is composed of twentyseven cantos. According to this Rāmāyaṇa, it was Śitā, who killed Rāvaṇa of ten heads. There is another Rāmāyaṇa in Sanskrit called Adhyātma-Rāmāyaṇa. It is a poem separated from Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa. It is written in the form of a conversation between Umā (Pārvatī) and Śiva. Ananda-Rāmāyaṇa and Mūla- Rāmāyaṇa extol the greatness of Hanūmān.

RāmBHĀ An asura. (For details see under Kārambha). RāmBHĀ I.

1) General. One of the most beautiful of the apsārā women. Urvaśī, Tilottama and Rāmbhā are really reputed for their beauty.

2) Birth. All the famous Celestial women were daughters of Kaśyapa-prajāpatī by his wife Pradha. Devarṣi (Kaśyapa) begot the following daughters of his wife Pradha i.e. Alambuṣa, Āṁra, Vidyutparna, Tilmottama, Arunā, Rakṣīta, Rāmbhā, Manoramā, Subhā, Keśīni, Suratā and Surajā. (Adi Parva, Chapter 65).

3) Rāvaṇa raped. Rāvaṇa raped Rāmbhā and Nalakābara cursed him. (See under Nalakābara).

4) Pururavas and Rāmbhā. Indra once killed an asura chief named Māyādhara and held a festival in honour of the victory. At the festival Rāmbhā danced before her preceptor Tumburu. Pururavas too was present on the occasion and he ridiculed Rāmbhā for her mistakes in dancing. Moreover he claimed that he was a greater master of dance than Tumburu preceptor of Rāmbhā. Enraged by this claim Tumburu cursed that Pururavas would be separated from his wife Urvaśī. (Kathāśārītīgāra, Lāvaṇakalamba, Tāraṅga 3).

5) Rāmbhā and Susēṇa. There was a King called Susēṇa on mount Cīrarūgā. This handsome bachelor prince used to sit alone in the lotus pond near his palace. When once Rāmbhā passed through the sky above the pond her eyes met those of Susēṇa and she alighted on the spot and the long talk between the two started in their marriage. Susēṇa enjoyed life there for a long time with Rāmbhā without knowing that she was an apsārā woman. He had attempted many a time to know the real facts about her, to no purpose. Rāmbhā did not even think about her native Svarga. Her companion, a Yakṣī, showered gold all over Susēṇa’s
RAMBHĀ II

In due course Rambhā delivered a beautiful female child and then she told the King that she was Rambhā and that she had continued as his wife till then as she felt love towards him. She further told him that now she had begot a daughter, she was leaving him and that she had a curse upon her which had been redeemed now. She also assured him that they would meet in Svarga in case the daughter was duly wedded. Rambhā departed to Svarga. Suṣena named the child Sulocanā and when she came of age he married her to Vatsamaḥarṣī and then went to Devaloka where he lived happily with Rambhā for a long time. (Kathāsārītāngarā, Madanamaṇikālambakā, Tārāṅga 2).

(ii) The Sage Gautama alias Saradvān experienced seminal emission on siege Rambhā and from the semen was born Krīpī whom in due course of time Droṇācārya married. (Kathāsārītāngarā, Madanamaṇikālambakā, Tārāṅga 6).

(iii) Indra once deputed Rambhā to break the vigorous tapas Vīṭvāṁitra was observing. She approached him in the guise of a nightingale and with her song disturbed his meditation. The muni cursed her as follows and turned her into a rock. "Oh! evil woman Rambhā, you have cheated me, who have mastered desire and anger and so you be turned into a rock for a thousand years. The great brahmin ascetic, Bhūrītejas will solve you from my curse and you will then resume your own form." (Vālmikī Rāmāyaṇa. Bālakāṇḍa, Canto 64).

(iv) Rambhā gave a dance performance on the occasion of the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 62).

(v) She had lived for sometime in the court of Kubera serving him. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 10).

(vi) When Arjuna lived in Svarga as Indra's guest Rambhā danced in honour of the former. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 29).

(vii) On another occasion she danced in Kubera's court in honour of Aśāvakra muni. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 44).

RAMBHĀ II. Wife of Mayāśura. The couple had the following seven children i.e. Māyāvi, Dūndubhi, Mahīṣa Kālaka, Ajakarṇa, and Mandodari. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, 3.6. 28-29).

RĀMEŚVARA. There is in South India a very famous holy place called Rāmeśvara and a Śiva temple there. Rāma and others encamped on the sea shore to cross over to Lāukī to release Śītā from Rāvaṇa's custody. This temple, according to Kamba, was built by Rāma at that time. The following story is from the Yuddha Kāṇḍa of Kamba Rāmāyaṇa.

To make the passage over to Lāukī easy, Rāma decided to build a great temple at Rāmeśvara and install a Śivalinga in the temple. Under the expert supervision of the great architects, Nala and Nila, all the monkeys cooperated to build the temple. As ordered by Rāma, Hanūmān went to Kailāsa to fetch Śivalinga. Hanūmān did not return with the linga though the auspicious time for the installation was very near. How could the installation be made without the idol and the installation had to be made at the appointed time.

Śrī Rāma stood ready near the installation platform. It was the exact time for the installation of the idol. A divine effulgence was seen to emerge from Rāma and immediately a Śivalinga automatically appeared at the spot where rituals were conducted for installation. Everyone was wonder-struck by this mysterious happening.

Hanūmān by now, returned with the linga and he felt sorry that the installation of the idol had already been made. Śrī Rāma told him: "Please remove the idol already installed, we shall install a new one."

Happy at the words of Rāma, Hanūmān entwined the idol with his tail and jumped directly upwards. But, his tail was cut, head clashed against the roof which was broken and Hanūmān fell down unconscious. Śrī Rāma held him up and patted him on the head and Hanūmān was more pleased than ever. Afterwards, to fulfil Hanūmān's desire and for the prosperity of the temple Hanūmān was made to install the new Śivalinga in front of the eastern tower of the temple. Śrī Rāma laid down the following rule also. Only after worshipping the idol at the tower, should the God in inside the temple be worshipped.

The rule was also recorded there.

RĀMOPĀKHYĀNAPARVA. A sub-parva of Mahābhārata comprising chapters 273 to 292 of Vana Parva.

RAMYAGRĀMA. Capital of a State. Sahadeva, during his triumphal tour, conquered Ravyagrāma. (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 31, Verse 14).

RAMYAKA I. A son of Agnideva, who had nine sons by his wife Pārvacitti. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha). Ramyaka ruled the Kingdom called Ramyaka Varṣa near Nilagiri. Arjuna, during his triumphal tour conquered Ramyaka and levied taxes from the people there (Sābhā Parva, Chapter 28).

RAMYAKA II. A particular region in Ilaśvītra, one of the seven Continents. On the eastern part of Ilaśvītra there exist three mountains called Nilagiri, Śvetagiri and Śṛṅgavāṅ. These mountains joint into the sea, and are separated from one another by a distance of two thousand miles each and are the source of many rivers. In between the three mountains are three regions of land called Ramyaka, Hīraṃmayā and Kuru. (Devi Bhāga-vata, 8th Skandha).

RĀNA. A Rākṣasa. He was killed by Vāyu deva in the war between Hīraṃyaśa and the Devas. (Padma Purāṇa, Sṛṣṭi Khaṇḍa).

RĀNAYANI. A Preceptor in the line of the Sāma (Veda) disciples of Vyāsa. (Jaiminiya Grhyasūtra 1, 14).

RĀNGADĀSA. A great Śūdra devotee of God. He built a number of temples on mount Veṅkaṭaśāla (Skanda Purāṇa).

RĀNGAVIDYĀDHARA. A Gandharva. (See under Sudeva III).

RĀNOTKAṬA. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. (Śālya Parva Chapter 45, verse 68).

RANTIDEVA. The Kindest and the most liberal of the Kings in ancient India.

Suhotā-Gala-Garda-Suketu-Bṛhatksastra - Nara - Sankṛti Rāntideva.
2. His importance. Rāntideva’s unique kindness is very famous in history. After the great war was over, Nārada once narrated the stories of sixteen kings to Dharmaputra. There are a number of stories relating to Rāntideva’s kindness, hospitality etc. He had engaged 20,000 people to cook food for guests who came to the palace everyday. He was very vigilant about treating guests day and night alike. He gifted away all wealth which had been righteously earned, to brahmins. He learned Vedas and subdued enemies by Dharm (righteousness). The very blood that flowed from the skin of cattle killed to entertain his guests formed itself into a river called Carmayati. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 29. 21,000 cows were daily killed for the guest. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 67).
3. Other information.
(i) Rāntideva entered Svarga by giving Vasiṣṭha warm water. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 294, Verse 17).
(ii) He once worshipped maharṣis with fruits and vegetables and achieved his desire. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 292, Verse 7).
(iii) He never ate flesh. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 67).
(iv) He entered heaven once by making oblations to Vasiṣṭha. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 6).
(v) He is recognised as one of the Mahārājās who are to be remembered both at death and at dusk. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 51).

RĀNTU (The Malayālam word for ‘two’).
1. Ayānas two.
2. Arthadhānās two. (Misuse of wealth)
(i) Spending money for bad purposes and not spending money for good purposes.
(ii) Stealing money or wealth and not giving money to poor deserving people.
3. Alākhāras two. (Figures of speech). Arthālāṅkāra and Sabdālāṅkāra.
4. Anuśādas two. (Medicines). Curatives like medicated oils and ghees, honey etc. and purgatives like vasti (enema), recanam (purification) and vamanam (vomiting).
5. Aids for health two. Cleanliness and sexual continence.
7. Kaṭudavyam. Pippali (long pepper) and Marica (Pepper)
10. Kārapadāvayam (Two causes). Upādānam (ultimate cause) and Nimittam (immediate cause).
11. Kāsradāvayam (Two salts). Alkaline salt (Saltpetre), Sodium Carbonate.
12. Čapaladāvayam (Fickle ones two). Women and fools.
15. Nīśhadāvayam. Turmeric and Amonum Xanthorrhizon.
16. Nītṛhadāvayam. Sādhya (knowledge) and Sādhana (action).
17. Pāksadhāvayam. Kṛṣṇapakṣa (dark fortnight) and Suklapakṣa moon-lit fortnight.
21. Togadāvayam. Karma (action) and Jñāna (knowledge).
22. Rāgadāvayam (colour). Pūrṇam (unmixed) and Janyam (mixed).
23. Rogaṣadāvayam (Diseases two). (a) Physical and mental (Kāyika and Mānasika). (b) Congenital and acquired. (Sahaja and Āgantuka).
25. Śīrgaradāvayam. Love or the erotic sentiment two. Love in union and that in separation. (Sambhoja and Vipralambha).
26. Śrutiśādānāvyadāvayam (Musical cadence two). High pitch and low pitch (Uccca and nica).
27. Samūdhrānapadāvayam (Two causes for peace). Patience or forbearance and generosity. (Kṣāma and dānsāla).

RAPHENACA. A nāga born in Takṣa’s dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 8).

RASĀTALA. A particular part of Pātāla where, according to the Purāṇas, the Nīvatakavacasa live. The Mahābhārata contains the following information regarding Rasātala.
1. During the deluge the Agni called Saṁvarta rent the earth and reached up to Rasātala. (Vana Parva, Chapter 188, Verse 69).
2. The Rākṣas called Kṛṣṇa created by the asuras once carried away Duryodhana to Pātāla. (Vana Parva, Chapter 251, Verse 29).
3. Rasātala is the seventh stratum of the earth. Surabhi the mother of cows born from nectar lives there. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 1).
4. It is more comfortable and happy to live in Rasātala than to live either in Nāgaloka or Svarga. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 102, Verse 14).
5. It was in Rasātala that Mahāviṣṇu incarnated as Boar and killed the asuras with his tusk. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 206, Verse 26).
6. Mahāviṣṇu, who assumed the form of Hayagrīva went to Rasātala, killed Madhu and Kaiṭabhā and resurrected the Vedas. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 347, Verse 54).
7. King Vasu went to Rasātala because he uttered one lie. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 6, Verse 34).
8. Rasātala is Ananta’s abode. Balabhadra, who was an incarnation of Ananta, gave up his material body at Prabhāsaīrthā and attained Rasātala. (Svar-gārohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 28).

RAŚMIKETU. A Rākṣasa who fought on the side of Rāvaṇa against Rāma. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa; Sarga 9).
RAŚMIVĀN. An eternally universal Deva (Viśvadeva). (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 36).

RĀṬKARAṆDHANA. A minister of Daśaratha. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 6).

RATA. A daughter of Dakṣaprajāpati. Dharma married her and the Vasu called Ahar was born to the couple. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 66, Verse 17).

RATHACITRA. A river famous in the Purāṇas. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 26).

RATHADHVĀJA. Father of king Kuśadhvaja of Videha. Vedavāti was his grand-daughter. (See under Vedavatī).

RATHADHVĀNĀ. Another name of Virāgni, son of Śanuṭu, (Vana Parva, Chapter 219, Verse 9).

RATHĀGRANĪ. A warrior. He had accompanied Śatrughna who led the Śavamedhī horse of Rāma. (Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭalalakhaṇḍa).

RATHAKRTA. A Yakṣa who rotates in the month of Caitra along with the Ādiyā called Dhātā. (Bhāgavata, 12th Skandha).

RATHĀKṢA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 63).

RATHANTA R A. A Sāman, which, having assumed form, worships Brahmā in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 30). This Rathantarā sāman possesses the power to cure fainting fits. Once Vasiṣṭha restored Indra to consciousness with this Sāman. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 281, Verse 21).

RATHANTA R A I. Son of the Agni called Pāṇeṣajanya, He was also called Tarasāhīra. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222, Verse 7).

RATHANTA R YĀ (RATHANTARĪ). Mother of King Dūṣyanta. She was the daughter of King Ilīna and had five sons, i.e. Dūṣyanta, Śūrā, Bhīma, Pravasu and Vasu. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94).

RATHAPRAḤHU. A synonym of Virāgni, son of Śanuṭu. (Vana Parva, Chapter 219, Verse 9).

RATHASENA. A valiant warrior who fought on the Pāṇḍava side against the Kauravas. His horses were very magnificent ones. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 62).

RATHASTHA. A Yakṣa who rotates in the month of Jyeṣṭha in the company of the Ādiyā called Mitrā. (Bhāgavata, 12th Skandha).

RATHASTHĀ. One of the seven tributaries of the Gaṅgā. According to the ancients, bathing in the river will wash off all sins. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 169, Verse 20).

RATHĀṬRASĀṆKHYĀṆAPARVA. A sub-Parva of Śānti Parva, Chapters 165-172.

RATHAVĀHANA. Brother of the Virāṭa King. He fought against the Pāṇḍavas. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 158, Verse 42).

RATHĀVARTA. A holy place considered to be on the right side of Śākambhārdevi. He who visits this place will, due to the grace of Śiva, attain salvation. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 23).

RATHĀVITĪ. A mahārāṣṭra. He lived in a hilly region very far away from the Himalayas. Once the mahārāṣṭra called Śyāvaśva invited Rathāviti to perform a homa at the yajña conducted by King Taranta, and when he came for the homa with his daughter the father of Śyāvaśva asked him to marry his daughter to Śyāvaśva. Rathāviti not only refused, but also dismissed Śyāvaśva from the yajña platform. At last Rathāviti married his daughter to Śyāvaśva at the request of King Taranta. (Kṛṣṇa, Śayana-bhāṣya).

RATHĪTARĀ. A king of the solar dynasty. He was the son of Prṣṭāṭa. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

RATI I. Wife of Kāmadeva and some Purāṇas hold the view that Kāma was the son of Dharma whose father was Brahmā. But, the story of Kāma and Rati is described in the Kālikāpurāṇa as follows:

Brahmā created ten prajāpatis. A beautiful lady called Sandhīya was his next creation. As soon as she was born, seeing her exquisite beauty Brahmā and the prajāpati jumped to their feet. All of them thought in the same way. While the court of Brahmā was in such a perplexed confusion, an extremely handsome person emerged from his mind. Fish was the symbol on his flag, and he asked Brahmā thus: &ldquo;Oh father, what should I do? Give me a suitable name and you should also decide upon a place and position and also a wife for me.&rdquo; Brahmā told him as follows:&ldquo;You are moving about everywhere in this world (full of men and women) engaged in the eternal function of creation with the five arrows of flower in your hands and thus multiply the population. Your arrows will go everywhere and no one, not even the Devas will dare to obstruct your arrows. Everyone will yield to your behests. Viṣṇu, Śiva and I also will yield before your arrows. You will enter the hearts of living beings in invisible form and giving them happiness engage yourself in eternal creation. The chief aim and object of your arrows of flower will be the hearts of living beings. You will be given a suitable name just now.&rdquo;

The prajāpati, who understood the wish of Brahmā, after mutual consultation said: &ldquo;You emerged churning our minds. Therefore, you will become famous under the name Manmatha (he who churns the mind). You will lay low Śiva’s haughtiness and conceit. Oh! best among men, Dakṣa, chief among the prajāpati, will give you a wife.&rdquo;

Happily pleased at the above words of Brahmā, Kāma held up in his hands the bow and arrows of flowers and decided to shoot five arrows, i.e. harsaṇa (pleasing or gladdening), Rocanam (attracting or tempting), mohanam (deluding or infatuating), soṣaṇam (weakening) and māraṇam (killing). He decided to use the arrows first against Brahmā and then against the prajāpati. Accordingly the arrows shot forth and Brahmā and all the prajāpati were overwhelmed by sexual passion stared at Sandhyādevī. Sandhyā also got excited and from her body sprouted up 49 parts; 64 kalās (arts) also were born from her. She used incessantly against the leaders of the world (Brahmā and others) who were down by the arrows of sexual passion, arrows dear to Manmatha. The expressions of Brahmā made Sandhyā sick with love.

Śiva, who was just then travelling along the sky, seeing the boisterous exhibitions of passion by Brahmā and others alighted there. He ridiculed Brahmā for his display of passion towards his own daughter Sandhyā and spoke further like this: &ldquo;This Kāma too is a fool. He tested his arrows here itself, he has no sense of propriety and discretion. &rdquo; Brahmā was thoroughly ashamed at the words of Śiva. He perspired and swept with his hands the drops of sweat that oozed from his body. With great difficulty he controlled his passion and gave up Sandhyā.
Once Raudrāśva fell in love with the celestial maid Mśrakesī. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 94, that as a result of the married life of these two, ten archers beginning with Anvagbhānu, were born.

RAUDRĀŚVA II. A hermit who was the disciple of the hermit Kātyāyana. Once Mahiṣāsura came in the guise of a beautiful woman to the hermitage of Raudrāśva to hinder his penance. The hermit cursed Mahiṣāsura, “You will die because of a woman.” (Kalīka Purāṇa, Chapter 62).

RAUMYA (S). A group of gaṇas (warriors of Śiva). It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sānti Parva, Chapter 284, that these Raumyas were born from the hairpores of Virabhadra, the chief of the guards of Śiva.

RAUPYA. A Purāṇic famous river of Ancient India. The holy bath Prasarpāṇa of the hermit Jamadagni is situated on the banks of this river. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 129, Stanza 7).

RAURAVA. One of the twentiyeight hells. For details see the part Naraka under the word Kāla.

RĀVĀNA. The Rākṣasa King of Lāṅkā who had ten heads.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu thus:—Brahma—Pulastya—Viśravas—Rāvana.

2) Birth. Viśravas, grandson of Brahman and son of Pulastya married Kaikaši, daughter of Sumāli. While Viśravas and Kaikaši were living in the forest Śleṣmata, K&aacute;kāši became pregnant. She delivered four children in four Yāmas, with an interval of one yāma between them. The elder three were the famous Rākṣasas, Rāvana, Kubhakarna and Viḥiṣaṇa; the fourth one, a girl, was named Śūrpanakhā. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Bālākāṇḍa).

Kubera was another son of Viśravas born of another wife called Devavarnī alias Iblīsā. As soon as he came of age Kubera captured the Puspakā chariot and began ruling the kingdom with Lāṅkā as capital. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

3) Previous lives of Rāvana. See under Jaya XI.

4) Rāvana secured boons. Kaikaši (Rāvana’s mother) who became envious of the pomp and prowess of Kubera advised her son to secure boons from Brahman by tapas and become equal to Kubera. Accordingly he went to Gokarna with his brothers and began tapas. Kubhakarna did tapas for 10,000 years; Viḥiṣaṇa also did tapas for 10,000 years standing on one foot. Rāvana, standing in the middle of the five fires, meditated upon Brahman. Though 10,000 years passed thus, Brahman did not appear yet. Rāvana then cut one of his ten heads and made an offering of it to Brahman in the fire. Thus, within 9000 years he cut nine of his heads and offered them to Brahman in the fire. Lastly when he was about to cut off his tenth head, Brahman appeared and asked him to choose whatever boon he wanted. Rāvana chose the boon that from none but men should he meet with his death. Kubhakarna desired to secure the boon of ‘nirdevatvā’ (Absence of the devas) but secured by a slip of the tongue ‘nīdṛvātvar’ (sleep). Viḥiṣaṇa chose devotion to Viṣṇu. On his return after securing the boons, Rāvana occupied Lāṅkā, drove away Kubera and took his puspaka chariot. Rāvana further declared Mahāviṣṇu to be his eternal enemy. Hearing about Rāvana’s victory the Rākṣasas from Pātāla came to live in Lāṅkā.

the drops of sweat falling on the ground from the body of Brahman were born the pitṛs called Agniśvātta and the Barhiṣadas, the former 64,000 in number and the latter 4,80,000. Drops of sweat from the bodies of the prajāpatis also fell on the ground and from them were born the Devas. The pitṛs called Somапās are the sons of Kratu; those called Svakālikas are the sons of Vasīṣṭha; sons of Pulasta are called Ājyāpās and Havīrhuks are the sons of Aiṅgiras.

Brahman, who was angry that Kāma shot his arrows against him in the presence of Śiva cursed the former that he would be burnt to ashes in the fire of Śiva’s eyes, and Kāma trembling with fear at the curse prostrated at the feet of Brahman and wept Then Brahman said that though he would die in the fire of Śiva’s eyes, he would be born again.

From the drops of perspiration that fell on the ground from Dakṣa’s body arose a beautiful woman, and Dakṣa told Kāma that the woman, his daughter would become famous as Rati devī. Dakṣa gave Rati Devī to Kāma to be his wife. Thus did Rati become Kāma’s wife. (For the second birth of Rati see under Pradyumna and for other details see under Kāma.)

RATII. An apsarā woman of Alakāpurī. She danced on the occasion of Kubera welcoming Aśṭavakramuni. (Anūśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 45).

RATIII. Wife of Vibhū born in the dynasty of King Rābhadeva of Ajanabhavarṣa. Prthuṣenā was her daughter. (Bhāgavata, 5th Skandha).

RATIGUNA. A Devagandharva whose father was Ka’yapaprajapati and mother Pradhā. (Āḍī Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 47).

RATIVIDAGDHĀ. A courtesan of Hastināpura. As she performed the pious deed of feeding brahmans she attained Vaikuṇṭha after her death. (Padma Purāṇa, Kriyākhaṇḍa).

RATNAGRIVA. A king of Kāñcana-nagarī who was a great devotee of Viṣṇu. He performed tapas and attained Vaikuṇṭha. (Padma Purāṇa, Patāla Khaṇḍa).

RATNAKARA. A Vaiṣya. He was killed by an ox, but he attained Vaikuṇṭha as a brahmin called Dharmaśeva sprinkled Gaṅgā water on him. (Padma Purāṇa, Kriyākhaṇḍa).

RATNAKUTĀ. One of the wives of Atrimahārṣi. (Padma Purāṇa, Patāla Khaṇḍa).

RĀTRIDEVI. The presiding deity of night. Indrāṇi once worshipped Rātridevi for the fulfilment of her desires. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 13, Verse 25).

RAUJBHYA. A hermit. It is seen in Uttara Rāmāyaṇa that this hermit called on Śri Rāma on his return from Lāṅkā.

RAUDRA. A class of giants who lived on Kailāsa and Mandara mountains. The hermit Lomaśa gave warning to the Pāndavas, when they went to the north during their forest life, to be careful of the Raudras. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 139, Stanza 10).

RAUDRAKARMĀ. One of the hundred sons of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 127, Stanza 62, that Raudrakarmā was killed in the battle of Bhrārata by Bhīmasena.

RAUDRĀŚVA I. A son born to the emperor Pūru of his wife Pauṣṭi. Raudrāśva had two brothers Pravīra and Isvara.
5) Family life. Rāvana married Mandodarī, foster-daughter of Mayāsura and three sons, Meghanāda, Atikāya and Aṣākumāra were born to the couple. He then conquered the whole world with the cooperation of his sons and other Rākṣasas. The Aṣād dikpālakas (protectors of the eight regions) were subjugated. Meghanāda by magical trickery captured Indra and released Rāvana from custody. Meghanāda came to be called Indrajit from that day onwards.

6) Kārtavyārjuna and Rāvana. See under Kārtavyārjuna, Para 6.

7) Curses heaped on Rāvana. As a result of ruling the land, as a terror to the whole world, for many years and of his triumphal journey Rāvana had invited on his head eighteen śāpas (curses) as follows:

(i) Nalakūbāra śāpa. Rāvana once insulted Rambhā, the betrothed wife of Nalakūbara during her tour at a place near Alākā. On hearing about the insult Nala-kūbara cursed that Rāvana should die with his ten heads broken.

(ii) Vedavattisāpa. While Vedavati, the only daughter of sage Kuśadhvaja, was doing tapas to secure Śrī Mādhava as her husband, Rāvana committed rape on her and she cursed him thus:—"You and your family will be ruined by Lord Nārāyaṇa on account of me."

(iii) Brāhmaṇaśāpa. He invited a Vedic brahmin to install the idol of Tripurasundari given to him by Śiva. As the brahmin happened to be a bit late to come, Rāvana imprisoned him for seven days, and the old brahmin cursed that Rāvana would be imprisoned seven months by a man.

(iv) Nandikeśvarāśāpa. For calling him ‘monkey’ at Kailāsā, Nandikeśvara cursed that Rāvana and his kingdom would be destroyed by monkeys.

(v) Vasiṣṭhaśāpa. As Vasiṣṭha refused Rāvana’s invitation to teach the Vedas etc. he took the former captive. When he was released from captivity by the solar King Kuvalayāśva, Vasiṣṭha cursed that Rāvana and his family would be destroyed by those born in the solar dynasty.

(vi) Atāṅkaraśāpa. Rāvana once saw sage Āstāvakra at Ślesmātaka and gave him a kick saying, ‘Oh! handsome fellow! I shall curse your eight hunches’, and the curse Rāvana as follows:—"For kicking me, a poor innocent sage, you will be kicked from head to foot and foot to head by monkeys."

(vii) Dattātreyaśāpa. Rāvana once poured on his own head water kept purified by mantras by Dattātreya to bathe the head of his Guru, and the latter cursed that Rāvana’s head would be polluted by the feet of monkeys.

(viii) Dvaipāyanaśāpa. When Rāvana molested and wounded the lips of Dvaipāyana’s sister in his own presence he cursed that Rāvana’s sister would be mutilated by a man and he would be humiliated by monkeys.

(ix) Māṇḍayaśāpa. During a pleasure trip of his with Mandodarī Rāvana cruelly manhandled Māṇḍaya-maharsi, when the latter cursed that Rāvana too would be roughly handled by a monkey.

(x) Atriśāpa. Rāvana once dragged by hair the wife of Atri in his very presence, and Atri cursed that Rāvana will have to witness his wife being denuded of her dress and dragged by the hair by monkeys.

(xi) Nāradaśāpa. Nārada refused to explain the meaning of ‘Om’ to Rāvana and the latter threatened to cut the tongue of Nārada. Nārada then cursed that all the ten heads of Rāvana would be cut by a man.

(xii) Ṛtuvarmaśāpa. Rāvana once raped Madanamaijari, wife of Ṛtuvarma, who lived as an anchorite in the marutta forest, and the latter cursed that Rāvana would be killed by a man.

(xiii) Maudgalyāśāpa. Once maharṣi Maudgalya was sitting in the svastika pose resting his neck on the yogadānā (a short stick-like piece of wood with a handle) Rāvana happened to come there and he cut into two the yogadānā with his Candrabhāsa (sword) with the result that the maharṣi fell down with face upwards and broke his back-bone. The maharṣi then cursed that Rāvana’s Candrabhāsa would prove ineffective in future.

(xiv) Brāhmaṇaṇjanamantāśāpa. Certain young brahmin girls who had gone for sea-bath were humiliated by Rāvana in the presence of their mothers when they cursed that the wife of Rāvana would be insulted in his very presence by monkeys.

(xv) Agniśāpa. Rāvana once humiliated Svāhādevi, wife of Agni in his very presence and Agni cursed that Rāvana’s wife would be humiliated by monkeys in his presence.

(xvi) Anaragyāśāpa. Rāvana killed by one blow on his chest King Anaragyā of the solar dynasty who sought refuge with him, and the King cursed that Rāvana would die with all his ten heads cut by the arrows of a prince of the solar dynasty.

(xvii) Bṛhaspatiśāpa. When Rāvana was about to return after conquering Devaloka and taking the devas captives, Sulekhādevi, daughter of Bṛhaspati tried to take shelter somewhere when Rāvana attempted to catch her by force. Then Bṛhaspati cursed that Rāvana would die hit by the thorns of Rāma.

(xviii) Brahmadevaśāpa. Rāvana tried to humiliate Puṇjiṅkādevi, daughter of Bṛhma, and the latter cursed that Rāvana would die with all his ten heads broken if he touched unwilling women.

8) Rāvana got Candrabhāsa. See under Candrabhāsa.

9) He threatened Devas. Rāvana during his triumphal march with the armies, once came to the Uṣāvīrīva mountain. Then the King called Marutta was performing Mahēśvarāya yajña on the plains of the mountain. Indra and the other devas came to receive their portion of the offerings. But they ran away in fear on the arrival of Rāvana. Indra assumed the form of a peacock, Yama that of a-crow, Kubera that of a chameleon and Varuṇa that of a swan, and the devas, thus assuming various forms went away in different directions. Marutta got angry and got ready to fight Rāvana. But, as the maharṣis prevented him from it no fighting took place. Rāvana returned with the glories of victory.

10) He defeated Kāla. Once Nārada felt the urge to witness a quarrel. He went to Lāhkā and told Rāvana tales about Kāla, that Kāla was more powerful than Rāvana, that Kāla would soon be causing Rāvana’s death etc. These stories awakened the anger in Rāvana against Kāla, and the former, with a strong army challenged Kāla, and war between the two started.
Brahma was in a fix, for he had given Ravana the boon that the latter would be killed only by a man. At the same time he had given the boon to Kala that anybody thrashed with his (Kala’s) club would die. Brahma, therefore, decided to end the fighting between Kala and Ravana somehow, and he approached Kala and requested him to withdraw from fighting. Accordingly Kala acknowledged defeat and thus the fighting ended.

11) Ravana attacked Patāla. Afterwards Ravana marched with his army to Patāla where he defeated Takṣaka, the nāga King and exacted tributes from him. Then he attacked Nivāta-kavaca. When the fighting became very fierce Brahma intervened and brought about a compromise between the two. Next, Ravana attacked Surabhi in Varuṇa’s palace, but the Rākṣasas who emerged from the pores on Surabhi’s body drove away Ravana.

12) Raped Rambha. See under Nalakūbara.
13) His death. Ravana’s sister, Sūrpanakhā met Śrī Rāma and Laksmana at Pañcavaṭi and wanted first Rāma and then Laksmana to marry her. But, Laksmana cut away her nose, breasts etc. Enraged by this Ravana abducted Sītā. Śrī Rāma, with the help of the monkey-army, killed Ravaṇa in war. (See under Rāma.

RAVI I. A prince of Sauvira. It was this prince who stood with the flag behind the chariot of Jayadratha, who had come to carry away Draupadi. He was killed by Arjuna. (Vana Parva, Chapter 221, Verse 27).

RAVI II. A son of Dhrtarāṣṭra. He was killed by Bhīma in the great war. (Śaṭya Parva, Chapter 26, Verse 14).

RAYA. A king of the lunar dynasty and son of Purūravas. Urvaśī, who had many sons like Ayus, Śrutayus, Satyayus, Raya, Vijaya and Jaya. (Bhāgavata, 9th Skandha).

Rbhu I. An ancient sage. He was the son of Brahma. He was an extraordinary scholar who became the preceptor of Nidāgha who was the son of Pulastya and the grandson of Brahma. Rbhu conveyed all knowledge to Nidāgha. But he saw that although he taught Nidāgha all branches of knowledge, the latter did not take any interest in “Advaita”. So he left him in disappointment but later got him interested in Advaita. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Arīsa 2. Chapters 15-16).

Rbhu. They made a cow and covered it with the skin of the dead cow and placed it in front of the calf. Because of its likeness to its mother, the calf believed it to be its mother.
(ii) Rbhus restored their parents who had become old, to youth. (Ṛğveda, 1st Manḍala, 16th Anuvāka. 11th Sūkta).
(iii) Ṛgveda says that it was the Rbhus who made Indra’s horses, the chariot of the Aśvinis and Bhṛṣpati’s cow.

RCAYU. A king of the Puru Dynasty.
1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order:-Brahma-Atri-Candra-Budha-Pūrūravas. Ayus-Nahuṣa. Yāyā-Puru-Janamejaya-Prācinvar-Pravira-Namasyu-Vitabhaya-Śunu-Bhuvahī-Saṇyāti- Raho-vādi-Raudrāvya and Rceyu.
2 Other details.
(i) His mother, Miśrakeśi was a goddess. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 10).
(ii) He had two other names; Anvagbhāna and Anvārṣī. Matināra was the son of Rceyu. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verses 11-13).

RCIKA (AJIGARTA). A famous sage.
1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order:-Brahma-Bṛhṛg-Cyavana-Ūṛva-Rcika. Rcika was the father of Jamadagni and grandfather of Parasu-rāma.
2) Rcika’s marriage. Gāḍhi, a king of the Lunar dynasty had a daughter, Satyavatī. Rcika wished to marry this beautiful princess. Gāḍhi agreed to give his daughter in marriage to the sage if he gave 1,000 horses with black ears. Rcika offered worship to Vaṇuṇa to help him in the matter. Varuṇa was pleased and a thousand horses rose up from the river Gangā. Rcika married Satyavatī after giving the horses. Afterwards both of them went and settled down in the forest.
3) Birth of Jamadagni. One day Satyavatī made a request to Rcika that she should have a son. Besides, she requested him that her mother should be blessed with a son, so that she might have a brother. Rcika performed a “homa” and after that he made two balls of rice and gave them to Satyavatī. He advised her to eat one of them and to give the other to her mother. Rcika had put “Brahmāteṣaḥ” (brilliance of Brahmās) in the first rice-ball and “Kṣatrateṣaḥ” (brilliance of Kṣatriyas) in the other. When Satyavatī and her mother ate the rice-balls, it so happened that the rice-ball intended for her mother was eaten by Satyavatī and the one intended for Satyavatī was eaten by the mother. Later Rcika came to know of this mistake. In due course, Satyavatī and her mother gave birth to sons, Satyavatī’s son was named Viśvāmitra. (Brahmaṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 57).
4) Other sons of Rcika. After this three more sons were born to Rcika. The eldest of them was named Śunaḥpuccha, the second was named Śunāṣṭeṣṭa and the third, Śunolāṅgula.
5) The sale of Śunāṣṭēṣṭa. Once king Ambariṣa started a yāga. Indra who was jealous of him, stole the sacrificial cow. Since it was an evil omen, the priest advised Amba-riṣa that either the lost cow or a human being in its place must be obtained to complete the yāga. In spite of searches made in many places, the cow could not be traced. At last Ambariṣa’s men met Rcika who was doing tapas on Bhrugutūṅga. Rcika sold his second son, Śunāṣṭeṣṭa to Ambariṣa in exchange for the price of 100,000 cows.
The king took Sunaśeṣpha with him and came to Puṣkara tīrtha. There they happened to meet Viśvāmitra. Sunaśeṣpha complained to Viśvāmitra and lamented over his ill-fate. Viśvāmitra wished to save him and to send one of his own sons in his place with Ambariṣa. But none of his sons was willing to oblige. Viśvāmitra cursed them and turned them into eaters of human flesh. Then he turned to Sunaśeṣpha and said:—

"When you stand ready to be sacrificed near the altar, offer your prayers to Agni. If you do so, you will attain siddhi." (salvation or mokṣa). He also taught him two songs of praise to Agni.

While standing at the altar ready to be sacrificed Sunaśeṣpha recited the two songs of praise. Indra and the other gods appeared and after saving Sunaśeṣpha rewarded Ambariṣa for his yāga. (Vānīki Ramāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, 62nd Sarga).

6) Rečika and the Vaisnavā bow. Once Viśvakarmā made two mighty bows. One of them was taken by Siva to burn the Tripuras. That bow is known as "Saivacāpa". The other bow was given to Viṣṇu. It is called "Vaiśnavacāpa". The Devas wished to see a trial of strength between Siva and Viṣṇu. They prompted Brahmā to bring about such a conflict. Brahmā succeeded in causing a quarrel between Siva and Viṣṇu. A fight began between Siva and Viṣṇu. Both the Saivacāpa and Vaiśnavacāpa went into action. But Siva was defeated. After that, Siva gave his bow to Devarāta, king of Videha. By inheritance it came into the hands of king Janaka, the father of Sītā. It was this bow which was broken by Śrī Rāma at the time of Sītā’s Svayamvāra.

After the battle with Siva, Viṣṇu gave his bow to Rečika who, in turn gave it to Jamadagni. Jamadagni presented it to his son Paraśurāma. It was with this Vaiśnavacāpa that Paraśurāma confronted Śrī Rāma who was returning after Sītā’s Svayamvāra. (Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, 75th Sarga).

7) Other details.

(i) Rečika was given 1,000 white horses with black ears which could run fast, by Gādhi as dowry. Varuṇa presented these horses on the bank of the river Ganga. The place in Ganga where the horses rose up, came to be called "Avāfirta". Gādhi gave Satyavatī to Rečika at the place called ‘Kanyākubja’. (M.B. Aranāya Parva, Chapter 115).

(ii) Mahābhārata, Aśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 23 says that Rečika once tried to stop Paraśurāma from killing Kṣatriyas.

(iii) Once Dyutimān, King of Sālva, presented a tract of land to Rečika. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 28).

(iv) Rečika attained Vaikuṇṭha and his wife Satyavatī accompanied him in her earthy body. It is said that after it, Satyavatī transformed herself into a river under the name "Kauśikī" and began to flow in north India. (Vānīki Ramāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa, 34th Sarga).

Rečika II. One of the twelve Ādityas. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 42).

Rečika III. A king who was the grandson of emperor Bharata and son of Dyumanyu. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 24).

Rakṣa. Varuṇa’s wife. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 117. Verse 9).

Rādhī. A great serpent. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 160, Verse 13, there is a reference to the killing of this serpent by Garuḍa.

Reśu I. A teacher-priest, who was the son of hermit Viśvāmitra and the author of a Sūkta in Rgveda. (Āitareya-Brāhmaṇa 7. 17. 7; Rgveda 9. 70).

Reśu II. King of the dynasty of Ikṣvāku. Reṇukā the wife of the hermit Jamadagni, and the mother of Paraśurāma was the daughter of this King. Reṇu had other names such as Prasena, Prasena and Sveṇu. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 116; Verse 2).

Reṇukā I. The wife of the hermit Jamadagni. (For further details see under the word Jamadagni).

Reṇukā II. A holy place frequented by Sages. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82. Stanza 82 that those who bathe in this holy bath would become as pure as Candra (Moon). It is stated in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 82, that this holy place lies within the boundary of Kurukṣetra.

Reṇukā. A powerful Nāga (serpent). This serpent who was a dweller of Pāṭāla, (neither world) once went to the Diggajas (Eight elephants supporting the globe), in accordance with the instruction of the gods, and asked them questions pertaining to duty and righteousness. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva. Chapter 132, Stanza 2).

Reṇpha. A hermit of the period of Rgveda. Once the asuras threw this hermit into water. This was the punishment for the sins committed by him in his previous life. (Rgveda, Manḍala 1, Anuvāka 17, Śūkta 116).

Revaṇa. A son of the sun.

1) Birth. The sun married the daughter of Viśvakarmā named Sañjñā. She gave birth to three children named Manu, Yama and Yamī. Once, being unable to bear the radiance of her husband, Sañjñā went to the forest to do penance. During this period Chāyā the maid of Sañjñā attended on the sun. Three children, Sañāścara, Manu and Tapati were born to the Sun of Chāyā. Once Chāyā cursed Manu. Then only did the Sun remember about Sañjñā. At that time Sañjñā had been doing penance in the forest in the form of a mare. The Sun took the form of a horse and lived with her in the forest. From this union Aśvinikumāras and also the last son Revanta were born. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Arha 3, Chapter 2).

2) Lakṣmi astounded at the sight of Revaṇa. For the story of how Lakṣmi was astounded at the sight of Revanta’s handsome figure and how Mahāviṣṇu cursed Lakṣmi consequently, see under Ekaśīra.

Revaṇa. The father of Revaṇi, the wife of Balabhadrāma. Revanta was the son of Ānarta and the grandson of king Śārīyāti. It is mentioned in Devī Bhāgavata, Skanda 7, that Revanta was the first king who erected his capital in the Island Kuśasthali and began to rule over it.

Revaṇī I. Wife of Balabhadrāma. Revanta the son of Ānarta and the grandson of King Śārīyāti was ruling over the island Kuśasthali. Hundred sons beginning with Kukudmi, were born to him. As the youngest of all a daughter named Revati was born. At the instruction of Brahmā the beautiful Revaṇi was given in marriage to Balabhadrāma. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10; Devī Bhāgavata, Skanda 7).

Revaṇī I. In Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 230, Stanza 29, the name ‘Revaṇi’ is used as a synonym of Aditi Devī.
REVATI III. One of the twenty-seven stars. The following statements occur in the Mahabharata about the importance of this star.

(i) Sri Krsna started on his journey at the auspicious moment of Maitra on the star Revati in the month of Krttika. (M.B. Udhyoga Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 6).

(ii) If a cow is given as alms on the day of this star that cow will go to heaven and make preparations for the comforts and convenience of the giver. (M.B. Anusasana Parva, Chapter 64, Stanza 33).

(iii) He who gives offerings to the manes on Revati day would become wealthy. (M.B. Anusasana Parva, Chapter 89, Stanza 14).

REVATI IV. The mother of Raivata, the lord of the fifth Manvantara (age of a Manu). There is a story in the Marcaedeya Purana about the birth of Revati. A son was born to the hermit Rtvak on Revati day. By and by he became wicked. Having learned from the hermit Garga that his son became wicked because he was born under the star Revati, Rtvak cursed the star Revati and kicked it down from its place. The spot on which the star fell became a lake. After a time a beautiful damsel was born from the lake. The hermit Pramuca took the girl home and brought her up. She was called Revati. When she came of age, she was given in marriage to Durgama, the son of king Vikramasila. At the request of Revati her marriage was conducted at an auspicious moment on the day of the star Revati. The hermit blessed the couple “Let a son, who would become the Lord of the Manvantara, be born to you.” As a result of this blessing the bright and valiant son Raivata was born to them. This Raivata was the Lord of the fifth Manvantara.

RGGVEDA. The Rgveda is the oldest recorded work of human race. The Egyptians claim that another book entitled “Book of the Dead” was also written during the period of the Rgveda. The Babylonians have an ancient work called ‘Gilgamesh’, which according to scholars, is not as old as the Rgveda. Rgveda is the work that forms the basis of Hindu religion. Of the four Vedas, Yajurveda, Samaaveda and Atharvaveda were composed after Rgveda.” The Rgveda suktas were interpreted for the first time in Yaska’s “Nirukta” and Saya’s “Vedarthapakasa”.

The most important of the four Vedas is Rgveda. It is divided into ten “Manadalas”. There are 1017 suktas and 10472 Rks in it. Although there are 11 more Suktas called “klias”, they are not usually included in the Rgveda.

Manadalas two to seven of the Rgveda were composed in different Rikulas. The second Manala was of Bhargava Kula, the third of Visvamitrakula, the fourth of Vamadeva, the fifth of Atri, the sixth of Bharadvaja and the seventh of Vasishtha. The eighth Manala and the 50 Suktas of the first Manala were composed by Kanvakula. The general view is that the tenth Manala was written by someone at a later period.

Most of the Rgveda suktas are praises. But some of the Suktas in the tenth Manala are of a different type. We can see in many suktas the joy and wonder experienced by the Aryas when they entered the beautiful land of India for the first time. Most scholars believe that the Rgveda was composed during the period between 2, 500 and 2,000 B.C.

Ancient Belief about Rgveda. The four Vedas—Rgveda, Yajurveda, Samaaveda and Atharvaveda emerged from the four faces of Brahma. In Krtayuga, Brahma gave these Vedas to his sons. In Devaparayuga, the Rsis got these Vedas. Mahavishnu incarnated on earth for the preservation of Dharma, in the person of Veda Vyasa. Vyasa distributed the Vedas among his son Sakyals and his disciples. Sakyals received Rgveda. He communicated it to his disciples. (Bhagavata, 12th Skandha. See under the word Veda).

RIPU. Grandson of Dhruma. Two sons called Siisi and Bhavya were born to Dhruma by his wife Sambh. Sisi’s wife Succhayaa delivered five sons, i.e. Ripu, Rupunjaya, Vipra, Vrka and Vrkaetaj. Saksusa Manu was born as the son of Ripu by his wife Brhati. (Vishnu Purana, Part 1, Chapter 13).

RIPUNJAYA. I Son of Suratha, lord of Kuskala city. Once Suratha captured Sii Rama’s yajnic horse there ensued a fierce war between him and Sutrughna. Ripunjaya too was present at the fighting. (Padma Purana).

RIPUNJAYA II. A braklin, who was born as Divodasa, king of Kasi in his rebirth. When once fire ceased to be in Kasi, he took upon himself the function of fire. (Skanda Purana, 4.2, 39-48).

RIPUNJAYA III. See under Ripu.

RISTA. A king. He worships Yama in his assembly. (Sabh Parva, Chapter 8).

RJIVAA. A king mentioned in the Rgveda. Once he besieged the city of another King, Vaingra, with the help of Indra. (Rgveda, 1st Manala, 10th Anuvaka, 53rd Suktaka).

RJRAIVA. A muni (sage) celebrated in the Rgveda. Some details: (1) Rjraiva was made blind by his father (Rgveda, 1st Manala, 16 th Anuvaka, 112th Suktaka). (2) Rjraiva was the son of the royal sage, Vrsagir. Once the donkey which is the vehicle of the Adivindevas assumed the shape of a she-wolf and went to Rjraiva. Rjraiva gave it 100 sheep belonging to the people of the country and cut them to pieces and offered the same as food to the she-wolf. This plunder of the people’s wealth enraged Vrsagir. He cursed Rjraiva and made him lose his eye-sight. Rjraiva who thus became blind offered prayers to Agni, who restored his eyesight. (Rgveda, 1st Manala, 17th Anuvaka, 116th Suktaka).

RK. A small section of the Veda. The Veda which issued from the face of God at the time of creation, consisted of 1,000,000 books in four sections, beginning with RK. (Vishnu Purana, Part III, Chapter 4). The root “RK” means “to praise”. It got the name “RK” meaning, “to praise gods”.

RKSA I. A king of the Puru dynasty. He was the father of Satirana. For genealogy see under the word Satirana (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 94).

RKSA II. King Harila had a son named Rkasa born to him by his wife Sudev. Mahabharta, Adi Parva, Chapter 95 says that this Rkasa had a son named Matanara, by his wife Jival.

RKSA. Wife of Ajamindha, who was a king of the lunar dynasty. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 37).

RKSADEVA. Son of Sikhandi. Mahabharta, Droana Parva, Chapter 23 refers to his horse with white and red colour.
RKŚAMBĪKĀ. A woman follower of Lord Skanda. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 12).

RKŚARAJAS. A monkey who was the foster-father of Bāli and Sugriva. He was the king of Kīśkindhā. He had no issue for a long time. Bāli and Sugriva were brought up by Ahalāyā at Gautama’s āśrama. RKṣarajas, with the permission of Indra, went to the āśrama and took Bāli and Sugriva with him to Kīśkindhā. From that time, Bāli and Sugriva remained with him as his foster-sons. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).

There is a story in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Prakṣipta Sarga, about the origin of this monkey.

One day, RKṣarajas went to a lake to quench his thirst. Seeing his own image reflected in the water, he thought it was some enemy and jumped into the lake, to attack him. But he soon realized his mistake and returned to the shore. As soon as he came out of the water, he felt that he had become a woman. Seeing her fascinating beauty, Indra and Śūrya were filled with lustful passion. Both of them had involuntary emission of semen. Bāli was born from Indra’s semen which fell on the head and Sugriva was born from Śūrya’s semen which fell on the neck of RKṣarajas. Towards the end of the night, RKṣarajas lost his female form and regained his former shape as a male. At once he took the two children with him to Brahmā and told him the whole story. Brahmā sent a messenger with RKṣarajas and had him appointed king of Kīśkindhā. After the time of RKṣarajas, Bāli became king of Kīśkindhā.

RKṢAŚRGṢA. The younger son of Dirghatapas who was performing tapas in Mandāravana on the northern part of Kṣī. Since he was killed by Citrasena, all others committed suicide. But Dirghatapas who was left behind collected their bones, and deposited them in the sacred Śūlabhedatīrtha. Skanda Purāṇa says that consequently they attained Heaven.

RKṢAVĀN. One of the seven mountains in India. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 11).

ROCAMĀNA. An attendant of Skandadeva. (M.B. Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Stanza 28).

ROCAMĀNA I. A Kṣatriya King. The following information is available from Mahābhārata about him.

(i) Rocamāna was born from a portion of an asura named A’vagrīva. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 18).

(ii) Rocamāna also was present at the Svayāmvara (marriage) of Draupadī. (M.B. Adi Parva, Chapter 185, Stanza 10).

(iii) Rocamāna was the King of the country Aśva-medha. Bhimasena, at the time of his regional conquest, defeated this King. (Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 79, Stanza 8).

(iv) At the beginning of the battle of Kurukṣetra, the Pāṇḍavas sent an invitation to this King to join the battle. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Stanza 12).

(v) Rocamāna was a mighty warrior on the side of the Pāṇḍavas in the battle of Kurukṣetra. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 70, Stanza 47).

(vi) Rocamāna was killed by Kaṇḍa in a battle. (M.B. Kaṇḍa Parva, Chapter 56, Stanza 49).

ROCAMĀNA II. Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27, Stanza 19, mentions another Rocamāna who had been defeated by Arjuna in his regional conquest.

ROCAMĀNA III. Mention is made in the Mahābhārata, Kaṇḍa Parva, Chapter 6, Stanza 20, that teacher Droṇa had killed two brothers with the name Rocamāna in the Bhārata-battle.

ROCANĀ I. The daughter of the King Devaka. Vasudeva married Rocanā. Two sons Hema and Hemāṅgā were born to her. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

ROCANĀ II. Grand-daughter of Rukmī, the King of Vidarbha. Aniruddha the grandson of Śrī Kṛṣṇa married her at Bhojakaṇṭha. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 10).

ROCANĀMUKHA. An asura. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 105, Stanza 12 that Garuḍa killed this Asura.

RODHA. A hell. See the part Naraka under the word Kāla.

ROHĪÑI I. The mother of all the cows. The following is a story about the origin of Rohiṇī, given in Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kānda, Sarga 14.

Prajāpati Kaṭayaṇa married Surabhi the seventh daughter of Daśa. Two daughters Rohiṇī and Gandharvī, were born to Surabhi. In later years cows and oxen were born in the world from Rohiṇī and horses from Gandharvī. In the Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 66, it is mentioned that two daughters Vimalā and Analā were born to Rohiṇī and that these two, in later years cattle were born.

ROHĪÑI II. 1) General information. One of the wives of Candra (Moon). The twenty-seven stars are the wives of Candra. Of these twenty-seven wives, Rohiṇī was loved most by Candra. (See under Candra).

2) Rohiṇī and Daśaratha. (See under Daśaratha, Para 10).

ROHĪÑI III. The mother of Balabhadrārāma.

1) General information. Vasudeva had two wives Devaki and Rohiṇī. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was born from Devaki and Balabhadrārāma from Rohiṇī.

2) Previous Birth of Rohiṇī. Vasudeva was the rebirth of Prajāpati Kaṭayaṇa. When Kaṭayaṇa took birth as Vasudeva, his two wives Aditi and Surasā were born as Devaki and Rohiṇī respectively. (They took birth thus, because of the curse of Varuṇa. For details of the curse see under Kaṭayaṇa, para 6).

3) The birth of Balabhadrā. The seventh child of Devaki was placed in the womb of Rohiṇī and Balabhadrārāma was born. (For this story see under Kṛṣṇa, para 6, Kaṁsa, para 6 and Saḍarbhaṭaka).

4) Death. As soon as a messenger named Dāruka brought the news that the entire race of the Yādavas had perished in Dvārakā, “because of grief, Vasudeva, Devaki and Rohiṇī forsook their bodies.” (Bhāgavata, Skandha 11).

ROHĪÑI IV. Niśā the third wife of the Agni (fire) called Manu or Bāhū gave birth to a daughter named Rohiṇī. Because she had done some misdeeds, she became the wife of Hiraṅyakaśipu. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 221).
ROHINĪ V. The mother of Utathya, a famous hermit. (For details see under Satyatapas).

ROHITA (ROHITĀSVA). The son of Hariścandra. This son, who was born by the blessing of Varuṇa, was wanted to be sacrificed by Varuṇa himself. In connection with this Hariścandra had to bear much sorrow and misery. (For details see under Hariścandra).

ROHITAKA (ROHITAKĀRANYA). A mountain famous in the Purāṇas. Places surrounding this mountain also were known by the name Rohitaka. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Stanza 4, that during the regional conquest of Nakula he passed through this country. The present name of this country is Rohitak (Haryana).

ROMAHARṢAṆA. A famous disciple of Vyāsā. The great Vyāsā gave the collection of Purāṇas to Romaḥa-rṣana. Sumati, Agni-vāras, Mitṛāṇu, Saṁśāpāyana, Akṛtvārana and Sāvarty were the six disciples of Romaharasana. (See under Guruparāmarā).

ROMAKA. A country in ancient India. The inhabitants of this country were called the Romakas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Saṁbhā Parva, Chapter 51, Stanza 17, that the Romakas came with presents to the horse-sacrifice performed by Yudhishṭhira.

ROMAPĀDA. See under Lomapāda.

ROMASĀ. A daughter of Bṛhaspati. The reply given by Romasā to her husband when he teased her, is given in Ṛgveda, Mandala 1, Anuvāka 19, Sūkta 126.

ṚṢĀBHA I. A King of the Lunar dynasty. He was the great grandson of Uparicaraṇavaśu.

Mahābhārata, Droṇa Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 12 says that he fought within the Gāruḍavyuha formed by Droṇa.

ṚṢĀBHA II. A muni (sage) who was the grandson of King Agniḍhara.

1) General information.

Ṛṣābha was the son of King Nābhi by his wife Meru-devī. One hundred sons were born to Ṛṣabha by his wife Jayantī. After entrusting his kingdom to Bharata, the eldest of his sons, Ṛṣabha went to the forest and did tapas in Pulaha’s āśrama.

2) Ṛṣabha and Ṛṣabhakīti Ṛṣabha did tapas in the forest for many years. The mountain peak on which he performed his tapas got the name “Ṛṣabhakīti”. The sage who wished to observe strict silence did not like the presence of strangers and visitors in the vicinity. So he pronounced a curse that the mountain should drop boulders on any one who ventured to come there. Once he ordered the wind to blow without noise as it passed by the side of the mountain. He declared that anyone who made noise in Ṛṣabhakīti would be struck with thunder. A place of holy waters came into existence there. (M.B.Āraṇya Parva, Chapter 11).

3) The power of Ṛṣabha’s Tāga. Ṛṣabha became a devotee of Śiva by worshippimg him. Once a Brahmāṇa named Mandara had an illicit alliance with Piṅgalā, a prostitute. Both of them died together. Mandara was re-born as Bhadrāṇya, the grandson of Nala and Piṅgalā as Sumati, the wife of King Vajrābāhu (Amśumān). Sumati became pregnant. Her co-wives who were jealous of her poisoned her. As a result of it, she and the child born to her fell victims to diseases. Dāsāṁa abandoned them in the forest. Sumati lived in the house of a Vaiśya with her child. While living there, the child died of disease. Ṛṣa-bha went to the grief-stricken Sumati and comforted her. (Śiva Purāṇa).

4) Ṛṣabha’s End. Ṛṣabha performed tapas according to the rules of Vānaprastha āśrama and conducted yāgas as ordained by Śastras. On account of his austerity he became so lean and thin that all the veins in the body could be seen. Putting a pebble in his mouth, he went about in the forest, determined to renounce his body. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Chapter 1, Section 1).

In the course of his wanderings in the forest a wild fire broke out in which his body was burnt up. Śiva Purāṇa says that the soul of Ṛṣabha who died in the wild fire, attained Śiva Loka.

ṚṢĀBHA III. A Nāga born in the Dṛtarāṣṭra family. In Mahābhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 11, we read that this nāga was burnt to ashes at Janame-jaya’s Sarpasatra. (Snake sacrifice).

ṚṢĀBHA IV. An Asura. (M.B. Sānti Parva, Chapter 227, Verse 51).

ṚṢĀBHADVIPA. A holy place on the banks of the river Sarasvatī. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 says that by bathing in this place, one would obtain Devamāna.

ṚṢĀBHAKUṬA. See under Ṛṣabha II and Ṛṣabhaparvata.

ṚṢĀBHAPARVATA. There are twenty mountains on the four sides of Mahāmeru. Ṛṣabha is one of them. (Devi Bhāgavata, Aṣṭama Skandha).

There is a reference to Ṛṣabha Parvata when Sugriva gave instructions about the way to the army of monkeys going out in search of Sītā. Sugriva speaks about the Ṛṣabha mountain as situated in the middle of the ocean of milk. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Kiśkindhā Kāṇḍa, 4th Sarga, Verse 44).

ṚṢĀBHATIRTHA. An ancient place of holy waters in Ayodhyā. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 84 says that an observance of fast at this tirtha is equivalent to the gift of 1,000 cows and a Vājapeyajāña.

ṚŚī. Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348 states that the letter “Ṛ” means “sound”. The word “Ṛśī” is derived from this root: During the period when the art of writing was not known, Vedas, Śastras and other sacred lore were communicated through the mouth of the Ṛśīs. The voice of Ṛṣa Bhārata itself is the voice of the Ṛśīs. Hindus believe that the Vedas are the outcome of the inspiration, introspection and spiritual vision of the Ṛśīs. There is a Saṃskṛta stanza defining a Ṛśī, which is given below:

Urdhvatātaspasyāḥ
Niyatāt ca saṁyami //
Sāpanugrahayoḥ śaktah
Satyasandho bhavedṛṣīḥ ||

India has given birth to numerous Rśīs. The word “Ṛśī” may be found throughout the Vedas. Rśīs born in all classes of people had lived in India. The general belief is that the number of Rśīs may, come to about 48,000. It is not possible to know the names of all of them. In the Rāmāyaṇa we find that when Śrī Rāma returned to Ayodhya after his life in the forest and took up the reign, many Rśīs came to Ayodhya from all parts of the country. Among them, Viśvāmitra, Yavakritā, Raibhya, Kanva and Garga came with their party of disciples from the east; Dattātreya, Namuci, Pramuci, Vālmiki, Soma, Kuṇḍu and Agastya came with their disciples from the south; Vṛṣaṅgu, Kaviṣa, Kaumya, Raudreya, Nārada, Vāmadeva, Saubhāri, Aśāvakra, Śuka, Bhṛgu, Lomaśa, Maudgalya and others with their disciples came from the west and Kaśyapa, Vasiṣṭha, Atri, Gautama, Jamadagni, Bharadvāja, Sanaka and party, Sarabhaṅga, Durvāsas, Mātarṣa, Vībhāṅdaka, Tumburu, the Saptarṣis and others with their party of disciples arrived from the north, according to Uttara Rāmāyaṇa. There are three classes of Rṣis—Brahmarṣi, Rājaṛṣi and Devaṛṣi. Vasiṣṭha was a Brahmarṣi, Vivāṁitra, a Rajaṛṣi, and Kaśyapa, a Devaṛṣi.

Rṣigiri. A mountain situated near Girivraja, the capital of Magadha kingdom. This mountain is also known as “Mātaṅga” (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verses 2 and 3).

Rṣika I. A Rājaṛṣi. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verses 32 and 33 state that he was the rebirth of Arka, the Asura leader.

Rṣika II. A town in North India. A terrible battle took place here between Arjuna and Rṣika, the Rājaṛṣi. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 27, Verse 25).

Rṣikulīya. A sacred river in ancient India. Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 47 mentions that those who bathe in this river will attain Mokṣa (salvation).

Rṣyamūka. A mountain. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 9 states that Rāma and Lāksmana visited the sage Mārkaṇḍeya on the top of this mountain. It was here that Rāma and Lāksmana met Sugrīva. Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 279, Verse 44 states that the river Pampā runs round the Rṣyamūka mountain.

Rṣyaśṛṅga. Son of the sage Vībhāṅdaka.

1) Birth. Vībhāṅdaka, son of Kaśyapa was the father of Rṣyaśṛṅga. There is a strange story about him in the Mahābhārata.

Once sage Vībhāṅdaka happened to see Urvasī at Mahābhārata. At the very sight of her, the sage had an involuntary emission of semen. The semen fell in the water and just then a female deer came there to drink water. It swallowed the semen with water and in due course became pregnant and gave birth to a human child. But the child had the horns of a deer. Consequently Vībhāṅdaka named the boy “Rṣyaśṛṅga”. Vībhāṅdaka and Rṣyaśṛṅga lived together in the āśrama. Rṣyaśṛṅga grew up into a youth, but he had never seen anyone except his father Vībhāṅdaka.

2) Rainfall in the kingdom of Āṅgā. At that time, the kingdom of Āṅgā was ruled by Lomapāda, a friend of Daśaratha. Once he cheated a Brāhmaṇa. Consequently all the Brāhmaṇas in that country left the place and emigrated to other lands. From that time there was no rain in the land of Āṅgā. A severe drought and famine followed. Lomapāda invited devout Brāhmaṇas and consulted them how they could bring rain to the land. They told him that if he could get a Muni (sage) who had never seen women to perform a yāga, there would be rainfall in the land. The King sent his men far and wide to find a Muni who had never set eyes on a woman. At last he got news that Rṣyaśṛṅga, son of Vībhāṅdaka was the sage who had never seen women. He then began to plan how Rṣyaśṛṅga could be brought over to Āṅgā. Lomapāda called together some prostitutes and asked them whether they could bring Rṣyaśṛṅga to his country. All except one of them said it was quite impossible. One of them, however, agreed to try. As desired by her, the King sent her with several other damsels.

The young women went to the forest and made a floating āśrama in a boat in which they sailed in the river by the side of Vībhāṅdaka’s āśrama. They stopped the boat close to the āśrama and one of the girls entered the āśrama when Vībhāṅdaka was not there. She had a talk with Rṣyaśṛṅga in the course of which she used all the amorous enchantments of her sex to captivate the young Muni. She told him that she was the daughter of a Muni, living in an āśrama, three yojanas away. Rṣyaśṛṅga felt a peculiar fascination for her and tried to please her by offering fruits etc. When she left him, he felt deeply distressed and unhappy. He was in that depressed and gloomy state of mind when Vībhāṅdaka returned to the āśrama. Finding him unusually restless and depressed, the father asked him whether anyone had come there. Rṣyaśṛṅga who was an entire stranger to the feminine world told his father that a handsome youth of irresistible charm had visited him during Vībhāṅdaka’s absence. But from Rṣyaśṛṅga’s description of the “youth” Vībhāṅdaka understood that the visitor must have been a woman. But he could not guess who it was.

On another occasion, the same woman came again to the āśrama in the absence of Vībhāṅdaka. At her sight Rṣyaśṛṅga was enraptured and before his father’s return, they left the āśrama. They entered the floating āśrama in the boat and the woman set the boat sailing in the river. It glided slowly down the river and at last reached near the palace of Lomapāda. They landed there and the King married his daughter Sāntā to Rṣyaśṛṅga.

To appease Vībhāṅdaka, Lomapāda sent him rich presents and much wealth. When Vībhāṅdaka returned to his āśrama he was met by the King’s servants who had brought the presents and wealth. Ignoring them and their rich presents, the furious Brāhmaṇi set out to the city of Campā, the capital of the Āṅgā Kingdom. At the royal command, Vībhāṅdaka was welcomed by the people with honour. When the sage found that the whole kingdom belonged to his son, his anger was assuaged. After ordering his son to return to his āśrama after the birth of a son, Vībhāṅdaka left the palace. As a result of Rṣyaśṛṅga’s yāga there was rainfall in Āṅgā and famine ended. After the birth of his child he returned to the forest as ordered by his father. (M.B. Aranyya Parva, Chapters 110-112).

3) Rṣyaśṛṅga in Ayodhyā. King Daśaratha of Ayodhyā had no children for a long time. His Minister Sumantra advised him to invite Rṣyaśṛṅga to perform a yāga for the purpose. Lomapāda sent Rṣyaśṛṅga to Ayodhyā at the invitation of Daśaratha. He arrived at Ayodhyā and performed a yāga called Purakāmeśi. From the sacrificial fire there arose a dark monstrous figure, with a pot of pudding in his hand. Daśaratha received it from him and gave one half of it to Kauśalyā and the other half to Kaikeyi. Both of them gave half of their shares to Sumitra. Thus Sumitra got two shares while the other two wives of Daśaratha got only one share each. As a result Kauśalyā and Kaikeyi gave birth to a son each, while Sumitra had two sons. Kauśalyā’s son was named Rāma, Kaikeyi’s son was Bharata and Sumitra's sons were Lakśmaṇa and Satrughna. (Vālmiki Rāmāyana, Bāla Kāṇḍa, Chapters 14-16).

ṚṬA I. One of the 11 Rudras. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 12).

ṚṬA II. See under the word Praṃṭa.

ṚṬA III. This word has a general meaning “truth”. Besides, in Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 152, we see that it also means “Something obtained by begging”.

ṚṬAḌḤĀMA. Another name of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. (M.B. Śánti Parva, Chapter 342, Verse 62).

1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order—Brahmā—Marici—Kaśyapa—Vivasvān—Vaivasvata Manu—Ikṣvāku—Vikuṣi—Sāśāda—Kākutṣṭha—Anenas—Prthuḷā’va—Viṣvaga’va—Adri—Kuvalāśva (Dhunghumāra).

2) How he got the name Dhunghumāra. The most heroic exploit of Kuvalāśva or Kuvalayāśva was his killing of the Asura Dhundhu.

Madhu and Kaśṭhaka were two Asuras born from the ears of Mahāvīśu. The Asura Dhundhu was their son. After his birth, Mahāvīśu killed Madhu and Kaśṭhaka. Dhundhu was furious over the death of his fathers. He worshipped Brahmā who granted him unconquerable strength. After defeating the gods he went to the desert called Ujjjālaka and lay beneath the sands. Whenever he heaved a sigh clouds of dust rose up to the sky and the earth shook for seven days. It caused great damage to life and property in the world, like a storm. Uṭṭaṇkā, a sage who lived in the neighbourhood of Ujjjālaka was the person who suffered most from Dhundhu's misdeeds.

Bṛhadāśva, of Ikṣvāku dynasty and father of Kuvalāśva in his old age entrusted the rule of the country to his son and prepared to go to the forest. At that time, the King went to the forest only after killing Dhundhu. Bṛhadāśva called his son Kuvalāśva and after giving him the task of killing Dhundhu, proceeded to the forest.

Kuvalāśva had 21,000 sons. Leading them, he went to the desert Ujjjālaka to kill Dhundhu. Uṭṭaṇkā declared that anyone who killed Dhundhu would get part of Mahāvīśu's strength. Kuvalāśva's sons surrounded Dhundhu. The Asura awoke with anger. In the fire from his eyes, all the 21,000 sons of Kuvalāśva were burnt to ashes. Next Kuvalāśva came into conflict with Dhundhu. In that fight Dhundhu was killed. The gods gave Kuvalāśva many boons. From that day, Kuvalāśva got the name, “Dhunghumāra” (one who killed Dhundhu). (M.B. Vana Parva, 4 Chapters from 201).

3) His sons. Kuvalāśva had three more sons named Dṛḍhāśva, Kapilāśva and Candrāśva, or Bhadrāśva besides the 21,000 sons. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 204, Verse 40).

4) Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 59 gives the following account of how Kuvalāśva won the favour of sage Gālava.

Long ago while sage Gālava was performing tapas in his aśrama, an Asura called Pāṭālaketu used to disturb his meditations regularly. One day, the sage looked up to Heaven and heaved a sigh. At once a horse dropped down from the sky. A mysterious voice was heard saying—"This mighty horse will travel thousands of yojanas in a day." The sage received that horse and presented it to Ṛṭadhvaja, King of the lunar dynasty. Ṛṭadhvaja mounted the horse and killed Pāṭālaketu.

It was Viśvāvasu who dropped this horse from Heaven. Pāṭālaketu had once fallen in love with Viśvāvasu's daughter, Madālāśi. It was in revenge that Viśvāvasu had done this.

ṚṬAḌḤVJA JA II. A Maharśi (sage). The sage Jābbalī was his son. (For further details, see Para 2 under the word Viṣvavākām.)

ṚṬAMBHAR A. An ancient King. He worshipped Kāmadhenu and obtained a son who was a devotee of Viṣṇu. The son's name was Satyaवān. In connection with Śrī Rāma's Aśvamedhayāga, Satrughna who was leading the horse, arrived in Satyaवān's city during his tour of the eastern lands. (Pādma Purāṇa, Pātāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 30).

ṚṬASTUBH A Muni (sage) celebrated in the Ṛgveda. (Ṛgveda. 1st Maṇḍala, 16th Anuśāvaṇa, 112th Śūkta). ṚṬAYU. See under Kālinga.

ṚṬEYU I. A king of the lunar dynasty.

ṚṬEYU II. A Maharśi (sage) of the western country. He was a ṛtvik (priest officiating at a yāga) of Varuṇa. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 150, Verse 36).

ṚṬUKĀLA. The time that is most auspicious for sexual intercourse for a woman with her husband. In ancient India certain days were prescribed as the best period for women to become pregnant. This period is called Ṛṭukāla. (Ṛtu—Menstruation. Kāla—time, period.) The sixteen days following menstruation are supposed to be good; but the first three days are not very good and it is advisable not to have sexual intercourse during those days. The next even days beginning with the fourth day (4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 14th and 16th) are the best days for coitus if a female issue (a son) is desired. The odd days (5th, 7th, 9th, 11th, 13th, 15th) are to be preferred if a female issue (daughter) is desired. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 151).

ṚṬUPARNA. A king of the Ikṣvāku dynasty.

1) Genealogy. From Viṣṇu were descended in the following order:Brahmā—Kaśyapa—Vivasvān—Vaivasvata Manu—Ikṣvāku—Vikuṣi—Sāśāda—Kākutṣṭha—Anenas—Prthuḷā’va—Viṣvaga’va—Adri—Kuvalāśva (Dhunghumāra).

2) Other Details.

i) Nala's ignominy life. While Nala was wandering in the dense forest after leaving Damayanti, he was bitten by the serpent, Karkotaka. His complexion turned blue owing to the effect of the poison. Karkotaka gave him a garment by wearing which Nala could regain his form. As advised by Karkotaka, Nala went to the palace of Ṛṭuparna, king of Ayodhyā, assuming the name Bāhu. He lived there as the chief charioteer of the king. He had mastered the art “Asvahṛdaya” by which he could drive the chariot-horses with astonishing speed. Ṛṭuparna appointed him as his chief charioteer and gave him two assistants, Vāṃṣeṣya and Jīvala. (M.B., Aranyu Parva, Chapter 67).

(ii) Ṛṭuparna and the second marriage of Damayanti. Damayanti came to know that Nala was living in Ṛṭuparna's palace, through the messenger Parnāda. She sent a secret message to Ayodhya through a Brāhmaṇa named Sudeva that her second marriage was fixed for the next day and that Rūparṇa should attend the ceremony. Rūparṇa started at once with Bāhuka as his charioteer. On the way, Rūparṇa's cloak happened to fall down from the chariot. At once he asked Nala to stop the chariot. But he told him that within a moment, the chariot had covered a distance of one yojana from the place where the cloak fell.

They saw a tree in the forest which was heavily laden with fruit. Rūparṇa was able to tell at a glance, the exact number of leaves and fruits on that tree. He told Nala that he was able to do so with the help of the art "Aksahārdaya" and he taught it to Nala. In return for it, Nala taught the king the art of Aksahārdaya. At last they reached the city of Vidarbhā. Damayanti managed to recognize Nala even in his disguise. Rūparṇa who was happy over the reunion of Nala and Damayanti returned to Ayodhya on the next day. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 77).

Rūtsthālā. A Celestial damsel. In Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, we find that she attended the birth festival of Arjuna.

Rītva. A Deva Gandharva. Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 122 states that he had taken part in Arjuna's birth-festival.

Rītvik. A Priest who officiates at a yāga.

Those who perform yāgas like Agnisāndhāna, Agniṣṭoma, Pākayāna etc. are called Rītvik. (Manusmṛti, Chapter 2, Verse 143).

Rucakaparvata. (The mountain Rucaka) A mountain standing near the mountain Mahāmēru. It is mentioned in Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 8, that there are twenty mountains including Rucaka on the four sides of Mahāmēru.

Ruci I. A celestial maid of Alakāpūri. This celestial maid danced in the Palace of Kubera on the occasion of the visit of Aṣṭāvakra. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 19, Stanza 44).

Ruci II. A son of Brahmā and a Prajāpati. This Prajāpati married Aṅkūti the daughter of Manu Svāyambhuva. A son and a daughter were born to Ruci of Aṅkūti. The son was the incarnation of Viṣṇu. He was named Yajñī. The daughter who was incarnation of Mahālakṣmi was named Daksinā. Yajñī was brought up in the hermitage of Svāyambhuva and Daksinā grew up in the hermitage of Ruci. When they grew up Yajñī married Daksinā. Twelve sons, named Toṣa, Sanoṣa, Pratoṣa, Bhadra, Śanti, Daksapati, Idhama, Kavi, Vibhū, Vahni, Sudeva and Rocana, were born to the couple. In the time of Manu Svāyambhuva these twelve were called the Tūṣitas, a group of devas (gods).

Ruci III. The wife of the hermit named Devasārmā. (For detailed story see under Vipula).

Ruciparva. Son of the king Āktī. In the Bhārata battle, to save Bhīmasena, Ruciparva confronted the elephant of Bhagadatta and was killed by Bhagadatta. (M.B. Drona Parva, Chapter 26, Stanza 51).

Rucīrāśva. A king of the Lunar dynasty. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 9).

Rudhirāmbhas. A hell. (See under the word Kāla).

Rudhirāśana. A giant-chief who came to fight with Śrī Rāma, under the leadership of the giant Khara. In that fight the captains of the army of the giants were Rudhirāśana etc. All of them were killed by the arrow of Śrī Rāma. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya, Kāṇḍa Sarga 26).

Rudra. A form of Śiva.

1) General information. The birth of Rudra is from Brahmā. Even before the creation of the Prajāpati, Brahmā had created Sanandana, Sanaka, Sanātana and Sanatkumāra. These four were not desirous of mundane pleasures and were not prepared to beget children. They were great sages and scholars, of abstinence and without any discord and animosity. When these four showed no interest at all in the creation of the world, Brahmā became angry to such an extent that he was prepared to destroy the three worlds. At that time the whole of the three worlds shone in the radiance that emanated from the fire of the fury of Brahmā. Then from his shining eyebrows which were curved with fury, a figure of unbearable radiance like the mid-day sun came out. That figure was Rudra. Half of the fierce body of that Rudra who was very furious, was a woman and the other half was a man. Brahmā, saying, "Divide body", disappeared. Instantly Rudra split himself into the figure of a man and the figure of a woman. He again divided the body of the man into eleven parts. These eleven figures are the eleven Rudras. The names of the eleven Rudras are given differently in different Purāṇas. In a text it is said that the eleven Rudras are, Manyu, Manu, Mahānasa, Mahān, Śiva, Rudhva, Ugraretas, Bhava, Kāma, Vāmdeva and Dhītavrata. According to some other Purāṇas, the eleven Rudras are Aja, Ėkapāda (Ēkapāt), Ahirbudhnya, Tvaṣṭa, Rudra, Harā, Šambhu, Tryambaka, Aparājīta, Īśāna and Tribhuvana. Brahmā apportioned to the eleven Rudras the eleventh positions of the heart, the five organs of senses and the organs of action and to Rudra the eight positions of life, ether, air, fire, water, earth, the sun and the moon. It was said before that Rudra was divided into man and woman. From the woman portion eleven Rudrāṇis came into being. They were Dhi, Vṛtī, Uśānā, Umā, Niyūtā, Sarpis, Ilā, Ambikā, Iravati, Sudhā and Diśā. The eleven Rudrāṇis became the wives of the eleven Rudras. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anśa 1, Chapter 7).

2) Other information regarding Rudra. Details about the orgin, life, character etc. of Rudra which occur in other Purāṇas are given below.

(i) Thirtythree children were born to Prajāpati Kāya-pa, by his wife Aditi, as Adityas, Vasus, Rudras and Asvins. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Aranya Kāṇḍa Sarga 14).

(ii) From the fury of Brahmā, Rudra was born; from the lap of Brahmā, Nārada was born; from the right thumb, Daṅka; from the mind, Sanaka and the others; and from the left thumb, a daughter named Vīraṇī was born. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

(iii) In the beginning of Kalpa (Age of Brahmā) Brahmā meditated upon getting a child like himself and a child of blue complexion appeared on his lap. He ran here and there crying aloud. Brahmā asked him "Why are you crying?" He replied: "I must be named." Because he was crying (doing rodana) Brahmā named him Rudra (He who cries). He cried seven times more. Brahmā gave him seven more names. They were Bhava, Sarva, Īśāna, Paśupati, Bhīma, Ugra and Mahādeva. Thus there were eight Rudras. To each of them, Brahmā gave a position and wives and children.
The Sun, water, earth, air, fire, ether, Brahmin who has taken vow and the moon were allotted to them as their positions and figures. Their wives were Suvarcalā, Usā, Vikeśī Śivā, Svāhā, Dīśā, Dikṣā and Rohini. This world is filled by the sons and grandsons and so on of these wives. Their sons respectively were Śanaiścara Śukra, Lohtāṅga, Manojavā, Skanda, Sārga, Santāna and Budha. This Rudra who is described above, married Satī the daughter of Prajāpati Dakṣa. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Aṣṭāḥ 1, Chapter 8). (For further information see under ŚIVA also).

RUDRAKETU. An asura. Two sons named Devāntaka and Narāntaka were born to this asura by his wife Sārada. The hermit Nārada was greatly pleased at the value of these two sons, and taught them “Pañcakṣārānāsahāvi-dyā,” Devāntaka and Narāntaka, who became haughty and arrogant by their prowess were killed by Gaṇapati. (Gaṇeśa Purāṇa, Kriyā Kāṇḍa 2).

RUDRAKOTI. A holy place in North India. Once a large number of hermits gathered in this place to worship Śiva. Greatly pleased at this Śiva appeared before them in the form of many phalluses. From that day onwards the place Rudra-kiot became a holy place. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Stanza 118).

RUDRĀKṢA. (Elaco Carpus seeds) Beads for rosaries.
1) General information. A holy thing worn by devotees.
In the Purāṇas much importance is attached to Rudrākṣa. In Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 11, there is a story stating how Rudrākṣa came to be honoured in this way.
Once there lived an asura chief who was mighty and valiant. His name was Triprā. He defeated Devas and deva chiefs and became emperor of the asuras. The Devas were much grieved because of him. They went to Śiva and represented their grievances. Śiva thought for a while, how to kill Triprā, and sat with open eyes. This sitting continued for a thousand divine years. After this prolonged time Śiva winked his eyes and tears fell down from them. The Rudrākṣa tree originated from these tears. From the Sun-eye of Śiva twelve types of Rudrākṣas came into being; from the moon-eye sixteen kinds of Rudrākṣas and from the fire-eye ten kinds of Rudrākṣas originated. Those which originated from the Sun-eye are bloodcoloured, those from the moon-eye white Rudrākṣas and from the fire-eye black rudrākṣas.
Boiled Rudrākṣa is considered a Brahmin caste, red rudrākṣa a Kṣatriya caste, white one a Vaiśya caste and the black rudrākṣa a Śūdra caste.
2) Division of rudrākṣa based on quality. The division of rudrākṣa according to the number of faces, and qualities thereof are given below:
With one face: Rudrākṣa with only one face is the figure of Śiva. By wearing this remission from the sin of Brahma-hatyā could be procured.
With two faces: Rudrākṣa with two faces is the figure of Devīdeva. This is known by the name “Gauriśākara.” By wearing this remission from all sins committed knowingly and unknowingly, would be obtained.
With three faces: This is the figure of Agni (fire). By wearing this the sin incurred by Śṛiḥātī (killing a woman) would be washed away.
With four faces: Rudrākṣa with four faces is the figure of Brahmā. By wearing this, the sin incurred by Nara-hatyā (killing a man) could be got rid of.
With five faces: This is the figure of Kālāgni (Fire of Kāla the God of death). By wearing this, remission of sins incurred by eating food which ought not to have been eaten and enjoying woman who ought not to have been enjoyed, could be obtained. All sorts of sins would be absolved by five-faced rudrākṣa.
With six faces: Six-faced rudrākṣa is the six-faced god Kārttikeya. By wearing it on the right hand, remission from all sins, beginning with Brahma-hatyā could be obtained.
With seven faces: Rudrākṣa with seven faces is the figure of Kāmadeva (Cupid). If this is worn, sins such as theft of gold etc. could be removed.
With eight faces: Rudrākṣa with eight faces is the figure of Vināyaka, the general of the great army. By wearing this, sins incurred by deceit such as selling rice of low quality as good quality, keeping false weights and measures, giving gold of lower carat as good carat gold, by enjoying woman of wicked families, touching the wife of teacher, and so many other kinds of sins would be absolved, and impediments would be avoided and finally one can attain supernal bliss.
With nine faces: This rudrākṣa is the figure of Bhairava. This should be worn on the left hand. By doing so one would become as mighty as god and would become devoted to god and would attain salvation. The sins incurred by killing the child in the womb a thousand times and killing Brahmans a hundred times would be got rid of by wearing this rudrākṣa.
With ten faces:—This is the figure of the real Jānārdana. If one wears this, the devils, wicked planets, Ghosts, goblins, spirits haunting funeral places, Brahma-hatyās (a kind of demon) etc. will not come near him. Moreover, snake-bite would not affect him.
With eleven faces:—Rudrākṣa with eleven faces is the figure of the Eleven Rudras. This should be worn on the head. By doing so one could obtain the fruits of performing a thousand horse-sacrifices and a hundred Vājapeyās (Kind of sacrifice).
With twelve faces:—Rudrākṣa with twelve faces is the dwelling place of the twelve Ādityas. This should be worn on the ear. If it is done so, the sun-god will be pleased. The wearer will obtain the fruits of performing horse-sacrifice, cow-sacrifice etc. He will not be wounded by animals with horns, or quills or teeth. He need not fear disease or worry. He need not fear to go anywhere. Wherever he goes he will be honoured as God. All the sins incurred by slaughter of elephant, man, snake, rat, frog etc. will instantly be absolved.
With thirteen faces:—He who wears rudrākṣa with thirteen faces will be equal to Kārttikeya. All his wishes will be realized. He will get rasa (mercury) and rasiyana (sweetened medicine) and all the pleasures and luxuries of the world. The great sins of killing parents, brothers etc. will be removed.
With fourteen faces:—He who wears rudrākṣa with fourteen faces will be exactly like the real Paramāśiva.
3) The mode of wearing Rudrākṣa. He who wears thirty-two rudrākṣas on the neck, forty on the head, six on each ear, twelve on each hand, sixteen on each of the upper arms, one on each eye, one on the lock of hair, and one hundred and eight on the chest is really Śrī Nilakaṇṭha Paramāśiva Himself.

RUDRAMĀRGA. A holy place. If a day and a night’s fast is taken in this place, one will attain the world of Indra. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 83, Stanza 181).
RUKMÌ. 1) General information. King of the Province Bhoga-kata in the country of Vidarbha. It is stated in Mahabhārata, Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 62, that this Rukmi was born from a portion of the Asura named Krodhavaśa.

2) Birth. Father of Rukmi was the king Bhīśmaka. Two children were born to Bhīśmaka, named Rukmi and Rukmini. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 31, Stanza 62).

3) Getting a bow. Śri Kṛṣṇa took Rukmi's sister Rukmini by force and married her. Rukmi did not like this and so he confronted Śri Kṛṣṇa. In the contest Śri Kṛṣṇa reviled him. Rukmi got angry at this and went to Kailāsa and did penance before Śiva. Śiva appeared before him after three years, and gave him a bow for destroying the enemies. Śiva told him that it would be broken, only if it was used against Mahāvīṣu. After getting this bow he returned to Bhojakata and lived there.

4) The details regarding Rukmi, given in the Mahābhārata. (i) Rukmi accepted the suzerainty of Sahadeva at the time of his regional conquest. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Stanza 62).

(ii) Rukmi paid tribute to Karṇa at the time of his regional conquest. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 254, Stanza 14).

(iii) The Pāṇḍavas had sent invitation to Rukmi for the Bhārata-battle. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 11, Stanza 16).

(iv) Bhīṣmaka, the father of Rukmi, was known by the name 'Hiranyaromā' also. Rukmi became famous throughout all the countries. He accepted Druma, a famous Kimpurusa (Kinnara) as his teacher in archery. Druma presented him with a bow called Vijaya. This Vijaya was on a par with the Gāndiva. Rukmi fought with Śri Kṛṣṇa and was defeated. The place at which he was defeated by Śri Kṛṣṇa is known as Bhojakata.

After having been defeated by Śri Kṛṣṇa, a thought arose in the mind of Rukmi to keep amity and concord with Śri Kṛṣṇa. Knowing this, the Pāṇḍavas invited Rukmi to their palace. He promised his help if ever Arjuna feared to do battle. At this Arjuna laughed and said that he was not in need of any help. After this Rukmi went to Duryodhana and promised to help him. But Duryodhana also rejected his help. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 158).

5) Death of Rukmi. Discontented with everybody, Rukmi lived in Bhojakata, having no contact with anybody. During this period the king of Kaliṅga once approached Rukmi and advised him to challenge Balabhadrarāma for a game of dice. The challenge was made knowing that Balabhadrarāma was not a good player. Knowing that to reject a challenge was not honourable, Balabhadrarāma went to play the game. Rukmi won the first round of the game. Staking everything, the second round of the game began and Balabhadrarāma won the game. But Rukmi and the king of Kaliṅga did not accept the victory. All the kings who witnessed the game sided with Rukmi. Instantly an ethereal voice said "Balabhadrarāma has won the game." The friends of Rukmi did not accept the ethereal voice. They began to create a tumult in the hall. Balabhadrarāma who became furious at this ridicule took a pestle of iron and killed
RUKMINI

Rukmini with one blow. The rest of the kings fled from the place. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

RUKMINI. The chief queen of Śri Kṛṣṇa.

1) Birth. From the following Purānic statements, it could be understood that Rukmini was the incarnation of goddess Lakṣmi.

(i) “Śri Devī (Lakṣmi) by her portions, took birth in the earth as Rukmini in the family of Bhīṣmaka”.

(M.B, Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Stanza 156).

(ii) Formerly Lakṣmi Devi took birth as the daughter of Bhṛgū by his wife Khyāti. Next she took birth from the sea of Milk at the time of the churning of it by the combined efforts of the devas and the asuras, to take Amṛta (ambrosia). When Viṣṇu took birth as Āditya, Lakṣmi took birth from lotus. When Viṣṇu incarnated as Paraśurāma Lakṣmi Devi became the earth-goddess. In the incarnation of Śri Rāma she became Sītā and in that of Śri Kṛṣṇa she was Rukmini. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Anśa 1, Chapter 9).

It was in the kingdom of Vidarbha that Lakṣmi Devi took birth as Rukmini during the incarnation of Śri Kṛṣṇa. To Bhīṣmaka, the King of Vidarbha, five sons beginning with Rukmi, were born. The sixth was a daughter who was named Rukmini. She grew up into a beautiful damsel. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

2) Marriage. Rukmini fell in love with Śri Kṛṣṇa. Her parents agreed to her choice. But her brother Rukmi was an enemy of Śri Kṛṣṇa. Rukmini desired to give his sister to Śiśupāla. The date of the marriage was fixed and the heart was burning within Rukmini. She sent a Brahmin as messenger to Kṛṣṇa.

The time of marriage drew near. The kings of Aṅgā, Kālīṅga, Mālava, Kekaya, Vāṅga, Magadha, Kosala, Śālva, Cola, Pāṇḍya, Kerala and so on took their seats in the nuptial hall. Śri Kṛṣṇa and Balabhadra came with their army. The army under the leadership of Balabhadra remained behind and Śri Kṛṣṇa went alone to the nuptial hall. While preparations were being made to give Rukmini to Śiśupāla, Śri Kṛṣṇa took her in his chariot and quickly left the place. All the other kings who ran after Śri Kṛṣṇa to fight had to confront with the mighty army of Balabhadra, who defeated the kings and returned to Dvārakā. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 10).

3) Sons. It is mentioned in Bhāgavata, Skanda 10, that ten sons were born to Śri Kṛṣṇa by Rukmini. They were Pradyumna, Cārudeṣaṇa, Sudeṣaṇa, Cārudeha, Sucāru, Cārugupta, Bhadrācāru, Cārुcandra, Cārubhadra and Cāru. But a slight difference is observed in the description of the sons of Rukmi given in Mahābhārata, Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 14, Stanzas 33 and 34.

4) Took to the chariot by Durvūṣas. See under Durvūṣa, Para 3.

5) Consoled Arjuna. After the death of Śri Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna visited Dvārakā. Seeing the dilapidated city without rulers and the women without husbands, he cried aloud. Rukmini Devī ran to him and consoled him and seated him on a golden chair. (M.B. Mausala Parva, Chapter 5, Stanza 12).

6) Death. After the death of Śri Kṛṣṇa, Rukmini, with the other wives of Śri Kṛṣṇa jumped into a burning pyre and died.

“Śaibyā, Rukmiṇi, Gāndhārī, Haimavati and Jāmba-vatijumped into the fire.” (M.B. Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Stanza 73).

7) The Palace of Rukmini. There is a statement in the Mahābhārata, Dākṣiṇātya Pāṭha, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 28, about the palace of Rukmini. “Viśvakārma built a palace for Śri Kṛṣṇa at the instance of Indra. The highest dome of it is covered with gold. So this dome dazzled as the peak of Mahāmeru. It was this dome that was set apart for his beloved wife Rukmini by Śri Kṛṣṇa”.

RUMĀ I. A noble woman obtained from the sea of Milk at the time of its churning by the devas and the asuras to get Amṛta (Celestial honey of immortality). At the time of the churning, many beautiful and noble things were obtained from the sea of Milk. Jyeṣṭhā, Airavata, Uccaiśravas, Kalpa tree, Cintāmaṇi, Kaustubha, Candra (Moon), Celestial maidens, nymphs of heaven, Mahālakṣmi, Tārā, Rūmā and so on were some of them. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Yuddha Kāṇḍa).

RUMĀ II. The wife of Sugrīva. She was the daughter of the famous monkey called Panasa. (Brahmanda Purāṇa, 3:7:221). After driving Sugrīva away from Kiṣkindhā, Bāli took Rūmā by force. After the death of Bāli, Rūmā returned to Sugrīva. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Kiṣkindhā Kāṇḍa, Chapter 20, 21; Padma Purāṇa 4: 112:161).

There was Rūmā also, among the women who came to see Śri Rāma on his return to Kiṣkindhā after visiting Vībhīṣaṇa. (Padma Purāṇa, Śrīṭi Kāṇḍa).

RUMANVĀN. Son of Supratīpa, a captain of the army of Udayana. (See under Udayana).

RUMANVĀN II. The eldest of the five sons born to Jamadagni by his wife Renuka. The sons of Jamadagni were, Rumanvān, Suceṇa, Vasu, Viśvāvasu and Paraśurāma. It was Rumanvān that Jamadagni ordered to kill Renuka who was late in fetching water from the river. But Rumanvān did not obey his father. The angry hermit cursed Rumanvān. According to the curse Rumanvān became dull-witted like birds and beasts. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 116, Stanza 10).

RŪPAKA. See under Patu (Ten)

RŪPAVAHIKA. A country in ancient India. Mention is made about this country in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Stanza 43.

RŪPAVATI. A harlot who lived in Tretāyuga. It is mentioned in Padma Purāṇa, Pāṭāla Kāṇḍa, that Rūpavati and her lover Devadāsa attained salvation by adopting the life of a house-holder in the forest.

RŪPAVIDYĀ. The figure of Devī. The figure of Devī, shown as sitting with twelve hands, is called Rūpavidyā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 50).

RŪPIN. A son born to the emperor Ajāmidha by his wife Kesini. He had two brothers named Jahnu and Vṛāja. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Stanza 32).

RURU I. A hermit famous in the Purāṇas.

1) Genealogy. Descended from Viṣṇu in the following order: Brahma-Bhrūg-Cyavana - Pramati -Ruru.

2) Birth. The beautiful Pulomā was the wife of Bhrūg. Bhrūg got the son Cyavana by Pulomā. Cyavana married Sukanyā the daughter of Śaryāti. A son named Pramatī was born to them. The hermit Pramatī married the beautiful damsel Pratāpi. Ruru is their son. He grew up to be a famous hermit. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skanda 2).
3) Marriage. Ruru happened to see the exceedingly beautiful Pramadvarā the daughter of Viśvāvasu by Menakā. The moment he saw her he fell in love with her. The father of Pramadvarā came to know of this and he decided to give her in marriage to Ruru. Preparations for the marriage were being made. One day during that time Pramadvarā who had been running here and there joyfully, was bitten by a snake and she fell down dead. Ruru instantly reached the spot.

Ruru, who was greatly sad and disappointed, got down to the Ganges and bathed. Then rinsing his mouth he took some water in his hand and said “By the favour of God I have acquired by my devotion and worship of gods, devotion and service to my teacher, by my scripture-study, my worship with Gāyatri, my prayer, and meditation, my penance, my offerings to the holy fire, and my oblations, let her come to life. If she does not come to life, I will die in this Ganges water.” Making this prayer, making the gods witnesses he poured the water down.

Immediately a messenger from heaven appeared in the sky and said that she would come to life again provided Ruru was prepared to give half of his life to her. Ruru agreed to it. Thus Pramadvarā came to life again and Ruru married her. (Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 2).

4) Hatred towards Serpents. A relentless hatred grew up in the heart of Ruru against serpents, because a serpent had killed his wife. He wandered about destroying every serpent he came across. Finally when he confronted Duṇḍubha he was given exhortations and good advices regarding righteousness by Duṇḍubha. (M.B. Ādi Parva Chapter 9, Stanza 19). Moreover it is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, that Ruru had taken a lively interest in the sacrifice of Janamejaya meant for the extermination of serpents.

RURU II. A mighty and valiant Asura. After procuring a boon from Brahmā, Ruru became arrogant and attacked the realm of gods. The Devas who were defeated by Ruru ran to the Blue mountain and prostrated before the goddess Śaktī, who had been doing penance there. This goddess Śakti had been born from the matted hair of Śiva.

Ruru followed the Devas and reached the Blue mountain. When Devī saw Ruru and his mighty army a loud laugh burst out from her. From that laugh thousands of devilish figures came into existence. They completely annihilated the army of Ruru. After this Devī killed Ruru with the nail of her toe. (Padma Purāṇa, Srṣṭī Khaṇḍa).

RURUKA. A King of the Ikyāku dynasty. This King was a scholar in economics and administration. (Harivānā, 1 ; 13 ; 29).

RUṢĀBHĀNŪ. Wife of Ḫiraṇyākṣa, an asura. (Bhāgavata, Skandha 7).

RUṢADRATHA. A King of the Aṅga family. He was the son of Titikṣu and the father of Paila, a member of the line of Vyāsa’s disciples. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 277).

RUṢADRU. A King in ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Saṁhitā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 13, that this King stays in the palace of Yama.

RUṢĀMA. A Priest who had studied the Vedas well. A story occurs in the ‘Paṁcavinīśabrahmaṇa’, about his priest.

Once Indra and Ruṣāma bet on going round the world. Both got ready and started. But Ruṣāma walked round Kurukṣetra and returned, while Indra travelled the whole of the way round the world and kept the conditions. The question arose as to who won the bet. The devas gave the decision, “Kurukṣetra is the dais of Brahmā, and so Kurukṣetra contains the entire world. Therefore both Indra and Ruṣāma were declared to have won the bet.”

RUṢĀNGU. An ancient hermit. Once the great hermit Ārṣṭiṣeṇa came to the hermitage of Ruṣāngu and did severe penance. Viśvāmitra obtained Brāhmaṇatva (Brahminhood) by doing penance in this place. Towards the end of his life Ruṣāngu and his sons came to Prthūdakārthira and sang laudatory songs about Prthūdakārthira. Ruṣāngu said that those who did penance and died in this holy bath would not have to undergo miseries after death. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 39, Stanza 24).

RUṢĀRDHĪKHA. A wicked King of the Saurāstra dynasty. Mention is made about this King in Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva, Chapter 74, Stanza 14.

RUYYAKA (RUCIKA). A Sanskrit playwright who lived in the 12th century. He has another name ‘Rucika’ also. The book of criticism called “Alaṅkāra-sarasvāsa” is written by him. He was the teacher of Maṅkha, the author of Śrīkaṅṭhacarita. Some are of opinion that Ruuyaka had written only the Sūtras in the book ‘Alaṅkāra-sarasvāsa’ and that the gloss or commentary was given by Maṅkha. Some of the other works of Ručika are Śūrdyālayālī, Alaṅkārānusaraṇī etc.

S

SĀ (শ). The letter Sā means to lie down and also Śaṅkara. ‘Sam’ means comfort or happiness. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

SĀ (স). The sound ‘Sa’ means indirect; ‘Sā, Lakṣmī (Godess of wealth and prosperity) and ‘sam’ means hair. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 348).

SABLĀ. A nāga born to Kaśyapaprajāpati of his wife Kadru. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 7).

SABLĀKSHA. A divine mahaṇā. He once visited Bhīṣma. (Aruṇāṣana Parva, Chapter 28, Verse 7).

SABLĀSAVA I. The thousand sons born to Daśa of his wife Viraṇi, are known as Saḥalāsvas. To procreate man-kind Daśa first created five hundred sons by his wife Asikiṇi and named them Haryavas. Daśa had to create the Saḥalāsvas as the Harya’vas were misled by Nārada. But, Nārada approached and told the Saḥalāsvas also that it was not correct on their part to procreate children before they had studied the interior, exterior, bottom and top of the earth. Believing Nārada’s advice the Saḥalāsvas also set out to measure the extent of the earth and they have not yet returned. Because of this Brahmā cursed that Nārada, instead of living at one place, should always be on the move. (Visnu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 15).

SABLĀSAVA II. A King born in the dynasty of King Kur. His father, Avikṣit or Aśvavān was the grand-son of King Kuru. Avikṣit had, besides Saḥalāsva, seven sons called Pārikṣit, Adiśaṅkha, Jitari, Uceśi-ravas, Bhāṅgakāra and Jitīrī. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 52).
SABARA. A mleccha—low caste. The Mahābhārata has the following about Sabarars.
(i) Sabarars were born from the dung and urine of Nandini, the cow of Vasistha. (Adi Parva, Chapter 174, Verse 16).
(ii) When Śātayaki annihilated the Kauravas the dead bodies of thousands of Sabarars were heaped on the battle-field. (Droṇa Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 46).
(iii) In early days the Sabarars lived in the kingdom of Mándhaṭā, their profession being murder, and looting. (Śānti Parva, Chapter 65, Verse 13).
(iv) Śiva had once taken the form of forest-dwellers and Sabarars. (Anuśāsana Parva. Chapter 65, Verse 17).
(v) Many Kṣatriyas lived for many years hidden in caves for fear of Paraśurāma, and as they had no association with Kṣatriyas during the period, they became Sabarars. (Aśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 15).

SĀBARI. A woman of the tribe of forest-dwellers. Śrī Rāma, during his life in the forest, gave her salvation.
1) Former life. Sabari, in her former life, was the only daughter Mālinī of the Gandharva King, Citrakavaca. An erudite scholar, Viśhottara, married her. As he was ever immersed in contemplation of Brahmā his wife Mālinī, (later Sabari) kept one hunter, Kalmaṣa, as her paramour, and her husband cursed her thus: "As you have become a lover of the hunter, you turn out to be a hunter-woman." 2) At the Suburbs of Matanga's hermitage. Mālinī in tears sought redemption from the curse from her husband, and he told her that she would get absorption from her infamy and the curse from Śrī Rāma. Immediately she was transformed into a hunter-woman and she came to the suburbs of Matanagāśramā. She took a special liking for the place, the reason being that the flowers in the āśrama possessed a special fragrance. Once while the disciples were carrying a load of flowers for the muni (Matanaga) a few drops of sweat from their bodies fell on the ground, and the muni blessed that the trees and creepers, which grew up from the sweat and their flowers would never fade. This is described as follows in Canto 73, Aranyakāṇḍa of Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa. "Oh! Rāma! nobody plucks and wears those flowers. They neither fade nor fall down. While the disciples of Matanaga were carrying a load of flowers for him, they sweated on account of exhaustion and some drops of sweat fell on earth which developed themselves into flowers due to the prowess of the guru's tapas. Even today may be seen there Sabari, who has taken to sannyāsa and who tends the flowers. She will attain heaven only after seeing you." Sabari lived for long there serving Matanaga's disciples, performing tapas and learning knowledge about Brahmā. At the time of the munis giving up their physical bodies they blessed Sabari that without further delay she would meet Rāma and get redemption from the curse. They also blessed that she would possess divine eyes to see hidden things and also the past and the future. After that she was spending her days awaiting the arrival of Rāma.

It was the period of the life in the forest of Rāma and Laksmaṇa. After visiting various āśramas Rāma at last came to Matanagāśrama. Hearing about Rāma's visit Sabari had gathered a lot of fruits. Now, Rāma and Laksmaṇa came and Sabari received them most respectfully. After herself biting each fruit to test its taste she gave the fruits for them to eat. The left-overs of Sabari appeared as nectar to Rāma. Then Sabari told Rāma thus: "When you go a short distance southwards there is the beautiful stream called Pampā. You cross Pampā and advance a little further and you will reach mountain Rṣyamūkha. On the top of that mountain lives Sugrīva, son of Sun, and if you enter into alliance with him you will succeed in finding out and getting back Sītā after annihilating the enemies. Oh! Lord! my salutations." After speaking thus, Sabari the great anchorite and chaste woman closed her eyes. Immediately she was transformed into Mālinī, the Gandharva damsel, and all at once a handsome Gandharva prince appeared there in a divine plane. It was Viśhottara, the husband of Mālinī. After saluting Śrī Rāma he took away his wife in a chariot to the Gandharva city. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Aranyakāṇḍa).

SĀBARIMALA (SABARI MOUNTAIN). A sacred place in South India in the eastern region of Kerala on a mountain called Sabarimala. It is not quite certain whether the name of this mountain is in any way related to Sabari, to whom Śrī Rāma had given salvation. At any rate a very ancient temple with Sāstā as the presiding deity therein is found at Sabarimala today. It is proof positive of the great sanctity attached to the ancient temple that every year lakhs of devotees from all parts of India visit it braving dense forests, mountains and wild beasts on their way. Historical evidence about the origin of the temple or its philosophical importance is sparse, but there is a legend, more illuminating than facts of history, about Sāstā (Ayyappan) the deity installed in the temple. The legend is as follows—

In olden days the royal family of the Pāṇḍyās divided itself into two branches, one of them settling down at Velliyūr and the other at Madura. When the king of Madura one day went hunting in the forest he met a handsome and very powerful and courageous Malayāli youth. The king immediately took a liking for him and appointed him as an officer in his army. The youth gradually rose up in military service to become the Commander-in-Chief. The other officers, who were jealous due to the rise of the youth—Ayyappan—began conspiring to drive him out. The queen became a weapon in the hands of the conspirators, and at their instance she pretended herself to be very ill and lay in a fainting fit. All the physicians acknowledged defeat in curing her. Then a physician, an agent of the conspirators, came forward and assured the king that he would cure the queen of her illness within one and a half hours if a leopard's milk was made available. The king told Ayyappan about it. Ayyappan went into the forest and returned to the palace with many she-leopards. He rode a tiger leading the leopards. People in the royal court were frightened by the sight of the leopards. The King realised that Ayyappan was not an ordinary person. Being questioned about him by the King, Ayyappan replied that God was his father and the whole world his home. As he did not like to live any further with tale-bearers and conspirators he returned to Kerala.
Ayyappan’s departure made the King sad and very restless in mind. After giving all his immovable property to the King followed Ayyappan to Kerala, taking all his ornaments, jars and other utensils, and came at last to Pantalam. This region of Kerala was then in the control of a petty Chieftain called Kaippuzha Tampān. The King of Madura purchased some land from the Tampān, put up a palace there and lived therein with the members of his family.

Ayyappasvāmi on his way back to Kerala met Paraśu-rama, who told the former that he had already, for the protection of Kerala, installed on mountains and the sea-coast idols of his (Ayyappasvāmi) and that he would install another idol of Ayyappan at Sabarimala where they had now met each other. From that day onwards Ayyappasvāmi took his abode there.

One of those days the Pândyan king living at Pantalam had a dream, and in that dream Ayyappasvāmi appeared and told him that he (Ayyappan) was living at Sabarimala and the King might meet the Svāmi if he went there. The next day morning the King with his retinue started for Sabarimala. At Sabarimala the King got the forest cleared and made a search of the ground where he found an idol installed by Paraśurāma. The King built a temple there and installed the idol of Ayyappasvāmi therein. He also got necessary purificatory ceremonies conducted in the temple by the famous tantrī (high-priest) Tāzhāman. A routine programme for the conduct of affairs in the temple was fixed. As it was difficult for men to live in the forest infested by wild beasts and conduct pūjā etc. daily, it was fixed that pūjās need be conducted only for five days in every month and that Makarasambhrānti should be the annual festival day. From the first of Makaram (January) for five days it was to be utsava with the deity led in procession. On the fifth of Makaram every year a ‘Kalabham’ and on the seventh day a ‘guruti’ also were ordained.

On the annual festival day the temple priest, the senior pilgrim, mārārs and other employees go to Sabarimala carrying with them rice etc. for food and calling aloud ‘Śvāmiye Saranam Ayyappa’ (Oh! lord Ayyappa! you are our refuge), devotees climb the mountain today also repeating this slogan. (See under Śāstā).

ŚABHĀKA (ŚALĀKA). See under Dhanāñjaya V.

ŚABHĀNARA. A King of the Bharata Dynasty. He was son of Anudruhyu, and the father of Kālanara. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 9).

ŚABHĀPĀRA. An important section in the Mahābhārata. The main theme mentioned in this section is the building of the palace of the Pāṇḍavas. (Sabhā= palace).

ŚABHĀPATI. A prince who took the side of the Kauravas and fought against the Pāṇḍavas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Karṇa Parva, Chapter 89, Stanza 64, that this prince was killed by Arjuna.

ŚACI. Daughter of Pulomā and wife of Indra. The following information about Śaci is gathered from the Mahābhārata.

(1) It was from an aspect of Śaci that Pāncālī, daughter of King Durgapada was born. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 157).

(2) Śaci is seated on the best throne in the assembly of Devas in the court of Indra. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 4).

(3) She worships Brahmā also in his court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 42).

(4) It was Śacidevi, queen of Indra, who took Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhāmā, during their visit to Devaloka to the Devamātā. (mother of Devas). (Sabhā Parva, Dākṣīnātyapāthā, Chapter 38).

(5) When Indra, afflicted by Brahmahātā, hid himself away from Devaloka Śacidevi was kept under the protection of Brhaspati. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 20).

(6) While he was made Indra, Nāhuṣa wanted to take Śaci for wife and she tried hard not to fall into his clutches. (See under Nāhuṣa).

(7) Śaci was present at the birth of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 13).

SADĀCĀRA (Good conduct).

1) General information. Each country has good customary practices of its own. A man with good habits or behaviour is considered as having conquered the two worlds. The sound ‘Sat’ denotes ‘Śāthūs’. Śāthūs are those who are without any bad conduct or behaviour. The habits and practices of the Śāthūs are called Sadacāras. The Saptarṣis, (the seven hermits), the Prajāpatis (Lords of all creatures) and Manus (the fathers of men), were persons who were careful to keep up the good practices. Once the hermit Aurva advised Sagara, what the good usages of the people of Bharata ought to be. The laws of good conduct according to hermit Aurva are given below:

2) The passing of excrement and urine. Every one should wake up in the Brāhmamuhūrta (Two hours before dawn). After having risen, he should go to the south-west corner of the village or house at a distance of an arrow-shot for stooling and passing urine; should not pour the water used for washing the face and the legs, in the courtyard; should not pass urine in one’s own shadow, or in the shade of a tree, or facing cow, the Sun, fire, wind, teacher and Brahmin. Ploughed fields, fields where grains are ready for harvest, cattleshed, crowd, path, lakes or rivers and their banks, are places, forbidden for stooling or passing urine. When there is no danger, a wise man should pass urine, facing the north in the day and facing south at night. When passing excrement the ground should be covered with grass and his head should be covered with cloth. Should not sit long or talk much when stooling.

3) The conduct of ablution after answering the calls of nature and rinsing the mouth after meals. Soil such as taken from white ant-hill, ground thrown up by moles or rats, soil at the bottom of water, remainder of soil used by another, soil taken from the wall, soil gathered by worms and flies, ploughed soil etc. should not be used for ablation. By using soil, do the cleansing of the urethra once, the anus thrice, the left hand ten times, and both the hands together, seven times. After this use pure water (in which there is no mud or foam and which has no foul smell) and rinse the mouth. Take soil again and wash the legs with it. Rinse the mouth thrice and wipe the face twice. Then holding water in the hand, touch the apertures in the head such as eye, etc. the crest of the head, both upper arms, navel and heart. With this rinsing take bath. After bath, with the help of a mirror, tie the hair, anoint the eyes with collyrium, and wear flower garlands etc. carefully. Bathing should be done in river, rivulet, lake, jungle-stream, mountain. or holy bath (tīrtha), or draw water from the well and bathe there or carry well-water home and bathe there. After the bath put on clean dress. Then take some water in the hand, offer it as oblation to gods, sages, and the manes with care. Throw water thrice for the blessing of the gods and hermits and to Prajāpati once, as ordained. In the same way, to the manes and the great ancestors also give oblation of water thrice.

After so much do the customary sacrificial offerings, prayer etc. to Devī. Then invite guests to the house and welcome them. (Viśu Purāṇa, Aṁśa 3, Chapter 11).

SADĀJIT. A king of the dynasty of Bharata. He was the son of Kuntī and the father of Maḥiśmān. (Bhāgavata, Skanda 9).

SADĀKANTA. A river in India, Purānicly very famous. Mention is made of this river in Mahābhārata, Bhūṣṇa Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 25.

SADĀNIRA. A river in India very famous in the Purāṇas. Mention is made of this river in Mahābhārata, Bhūṣṇa Parva, Chapter 9, Stanza 204. Some scholars are of opinion that this river is the same as the Karatoya of Modern India.

SADARBHAKA (S). Six sons of Marīci. Subjected to a curse they had to live many lives and ultimately they resumed their old forms as children of Devaki. (For details see under Kaṁsā, Para 2).

SADASVA. A king of ancient India. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 12, that this king remains in the palace of Yama, glorifying him.

SADASYORMI. A king. He is a worshipper of Yama. (M.B. Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Stanza 11).

SADGUNA I. The six qualities or attributes of Bhagavān (God). Aśīvamya (prosperity), Viryam (prowess), Vairāgym (non-attachment or renunciation), Vijñānam (super-knowledge), Śrī (welfare and prosperity) and Yaśas (fame, reputation) are the six attributes of Bhagavān.

SADGUNA II. Six kingly or political policies. Sandhi, Vigraha, Yāna, Asana, Dvaitha and Aśraya are the six policies of state-craft. (Manasmi, Chapter 8, Verse 160)

1) Sandhi. To enter into peace and concord with the enemy is Sandhi. One may make peace for one’s own benefit with the enemy, who is powerful and is fighting. There are sixteen kinds of sandhi called Kapālāsandhi, etc. No kind of peace or treaty should be made with twenty kinds of kings, i.e. infants; old men; one suffering from chronic disease; cast out by one’s own people; coward; one whose supporters are cowards; miser; one whose people are misers; who is very much addicted to women and such other material things; one, who has not a mind of one’s own and is ruled by more than one adviser; he, who does not respect Devas and brahmīns; one hated or forsaken by God; blasphemer; one subject to scarcity and sorrow; one not with satisfactory army; local person; one with many enemies; one whose days are numbered and one devoid of truth and righteousness. One shall only fight and not enter into peace with the above types of people.

2) Vigraha. Fighting, i.e. war is vigraha. War is the result of mutual evil-doings. The king, who desires prosperity who is troubled by others and in whose favour time and circumstances are, should go in for war. The main causes of war are the following:

the desire to capture kingdom, woman, position etc. haughtiness and imperiousness, obstruction to duties and rights, the interest of friends and allies, destruction to one’s allies, both parties getting interested in one and the same thing etc. Enmity is engendered chiefly due to the following causes: rivalry of co-wives, disputes about property and women, verbal controversies and wrongs committed. The following kinds of wars should not be fought: Wars the benefit of which is meagre or futile; war which would cause harm in the present as also in future; with the enemy whose strength is not correctly known; incited by others, for others, on account of women, which would continue for long; with brahmīns, where time and fate are not in favour; with him, who has powerful allies, though of temporary advantage but which will not be so in future; though of advantage in future but useless at present.

The king should always do what will be of advantage at present as also in future. If one’s own army is strong and enthusiastic and when the army of the adversary is not so, one may go in for war. Also, when all circumstances are in one’s favour and against the antagonist one may fight.

3) Yana. Yana means marching for war. One may start for war after declaring it, after making peace, after making alliances; and incidentally also.

4) Asana. To remain quiet or doing nothing which is also of four kinds as yana.

5) Dvaitha. To get in between the contending parties to support with words only and to remain without joining either side is dvaitha. He who takes up the stand should, on meeting both the parties, serve the stronger side. But if he finds that both the parties are making peace, and not in need of his aid, he should approach their enemy, who is more powerful than they, or he should fight by himself.

6) Aśraya. When one is attacked by a stronger enemy and if one finds no means to retaliate, one should depend upon another person, who is noble, truthful and powerful. To put on a supplicant’s look, to understand the moods of that person whose help is sought and to be humble to him—these are the characteristics and traits of the dependent. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 240).

SĀDHU. An incarnation of Śiva. The Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa contains the following story about it.

When the Himālaya and Maināka mountains once began a very intense tapa, the Devas and Rṣis fearing great ruin to the world in case the mountains got salvation, sought Śiva’s protection and prayed for a solution for the problem. So Śiva, in the guise of a brahmin named Sādhu, went to the mountains, spoke to them condemning Śiva and thus made them retract from their devotion to Śiva.

SĀDHYĀ. Mother of the Sādhyas. (See under Sādhyas).

SĀDHYĀ (S).

1. General. A Gaṇadevatā. These Devatās often used to play an important role in Purānic movements and incidents. The Sādhyas were born from the seed Virāṭ Puruṣa. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 35). But according to Viśu Purāṇa (Part 1, Chapter 35) the Sādhyas were the grand-children of Daśa-prajāpati. Of the sixty daughters of the Prajāpati by his wife Asikni, ten were married by Dharmadeva; The Viśvadevas were the sons of Dharmadeva by his wife Viśvā and the Sādhyas were his sons by Sādhyā.
2. Other information.
(i) The Sādhyas fought with Garuḍa, who went to Deva-loka for Amṛta and got defeated. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 16).
(ii) The Sādhyas feared Viśvāmitra. (Anuśāsana Parva,
Chapter 71, Verse 39).
(iii) Sādhyaganas participated in the birthday celebrations of Arjuna. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 122, Verse 70).
(iv) Sādhyas took their place in planes above the palace of Drupada to witness Draupadi's wedding. (Ādi Parva Chapter 186, Verse 6).
(v) They were present at the Devayajñā conducted at Naimisha forest. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 195, Verse 3).
(vi) They were present with various kinds of arrows at the battle between Sīr Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna on the occasion of the burning of the Kañḍavā forest. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 226 Verse 38).
(vii) They live in Indra's court. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter
7, Verse 22).
(viii) They go to the court of Brahmā also and worship him. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 44).
(ix) In the battle between Subrahmanya and Tārakāśura they fought on the side of the former. (Vana Parva, Chapter 231, Verse 71).
(x) Once they made a prayer to Dattātreya muni.
(Udyoga Parva, Chapter 36, Verse 3).
(xi) On the occasion of the battle between Karṣa and Arjuna at Kurukṣetra the Sādhyas wished success for the former. (Salya Parva, Chapter 41, Verse 29).
(xii) They served as store-keepers at the yajñā perfor-mated by king Marutta. (Śanti Parva, Chapter 29, Verse 22).
(xiii) They remain on Mount Munjavān worshipping Śiva.
(Āśvamedhika Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 1).

SĀDYASKA. A yajñā ordained for Rājarṣis. It could be performed in one day. (Vana Parva, Chapter 204, Verse 16).

SAGARA. A king of the solar dynasty, Sagara ruled Ayodhya.

Satyavrata (Trisāṇku)-Haricandra-Rohitāśa-Harita-Cūcuc-Sudeva-Bharuka-Bāhuka-Sagara.
2) Birth. Bāhuka, father of Sagara, was known as Subāhu also. Sagara was Bāhuka's son by his wife, Yādāvi. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16). Though Sagara was a prince he was born at the aśrama of Aurva, and there was a reason for it.

Subāhu and Yādāvi did not have a child for long. But, as a result of many yajñas conducted for the gift of a child, Yādāvi conceived. While she was in the seventh month of her pregnancy her co-wife administered poison to her with the result that she did not further advance in pregnancy and deliver in due time. Thus she continued as a pregnant woman for seven years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 16). The King became an old man.
During this period Tālajāṅgha, king of Hēhaya, attacked Ayodhyā with his army, and Subāhu, despite his old age, fought back. But the fighting grew fiercer.
Subāhu found that he would not be able to defeat Tālajāṅgha and so he escaped into the forest with his wife Yādāvi. They took shelter in the aśrama of sage Aurva. Subāhu expired there due to old age and Yādāvi got ready to follow him in his pyre. The Muni prevented her from doing so by pointing out to her that the child in her womb was a very fortunate one and would become emperor of the seven islands when he grew up to manhood. Yādāvi delivered shortly.
As the poison (gara) given to her by the co-wife had immobilised her pregnancy for so long Aurva named her child Sagara. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 16 and 17).

3) To Ayodhyā. Sage Aurva conducted the Upanayana ceremony of the boy and taught him the Vedas etc.
Once Yādāvi wept to hear the boy address the muni 'teacher', and when the son asked her the reason for it she told him that the muni was not his father, who was really greater than the muni. She also told him their previous history, and Sagara decided to return to Ayodhyā somehow.
The people of Ayodhyā lived scattered here and there in fear of Tālajāṅgha, and disgusted with such an existence, they came together and took refuge with Vasiṭha, who told them that king Subāhu had expired in Aurvāśrama, but that his son Sagara was there in the aśrama. He further advised them to bring Sagara back and reconquer Ayodhyā. Yādāvi wept at the sight of the people from Ayodhyā and they insisted upon Sagara's return to the state as their king. They waited in the aśrama for five days for Sagara. Then Sagara and his mother, with the blessings of the Sage, returned to Ayodhyā along with the people. Sagara fought Tālajāṅgha, reconquered Ayodhyā and crowned himself as king. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 20 to 23).
4) Family life. Sagara had two wives called Sumati alias Vaidarbhī and Keśini alias Śaibā. Sumati was the daughter of Garuḍa.

As he had no issues for long, Sagara, with his wife, went to Himālayas and began doing tapas at Bhīguraśravanā mountain. After hundred years Bhīgu appeared and blessed Sagara that one of his wives would give birth to 60,000 sons and the other to one, who would add to the glory of the dynasty. Sumati chose 60,000 sons and Keśini the one son.
The king and the queens returned to Ayodhyā and in due course Sumati delivered the son called Asamāṇjasa who was to bring prosperity to the dynasty. Sumati gave birth to a lump of flesh, which developed into 60,000 children. They were put in pots of ghee and they grew up to become young persons. (Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa, Bālaṅkāṇṭha, Canto 33).

Some Purāṇas contain stories somewhat different from the above about the birth of the 60,000 children.
e.g. in the 9th Skandha of Devi Bhāgavata, the story is related as follows; "Keśini delivered the son Asamāṇjasa and Sumati did not deliver at all. So she did tapas for Śiva for children and because of his blessing she conceived. Sumati delivered only hundred years after continuing to be pregnant, and even that was only a piece of flesh, and she began weeping addressing Śiva, who appeared before her and cut the mass of flesh into 60,000 paris. Each piece of flesh transformed itself into a very powerful and effulgent man."
5) Loss of children. Kapila turned into ashes the 60,000 sons of Sāgarā. Bhaigiratha revived them. (For details see under Bhaigiratha).

6) Triumphant tour. Sāgarā ruled the kingdom well and while living happily thus with his sons, he set out on a triumphant tour. After conquering the northern regions he moved towards the south, his object being Māhīśmati, Kingdom of the Hēhayas. He destroyed the Hēhayas completely in battle. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapters 89 and 90).

7) Evening of life. Sāgarā ruled the kingdom for 300 years. (Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa, Chapter 91). His son, Asamāñjasā was a tormentor of his subjects. In the evening of his life, Sāgarā transmitted the throne to his grandson Anūṣumān (son of Asamāñjasā). The rest of his life he spent in Aurvāsrama with his wife engaged in meditation.

8) Other information.

(i) Sāgarā worships Yama in his court, (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 19).

(ii) Sāgarā ousted Asamāñjasā from the palace, because he led an immoral life. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 89).

(iii) Sāgarā went to heaven after handing over the throne to Anūṣumān. (Vana Parva, Chapter 107, Verse 64).

(iv) Sāgarā had gone, in the plane of Indra to Virāṭanagara to witness the fight between Arjuna and Kṛpa. (Virāṭa Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 10).

(v) Śrī Kṛṣṇa once described the yājña and dāna of Sāgarā. (Sānti Parva, Chapter 29 Verse 130).

(vi) Sāgarā never ate flesh in his life. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 115, Verse 66.

(vii) He is considered to be one of the kings to be remembered both at dawn and dusk. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 165, Verse 49).

SĀGĀRA. Ocean. Samudra (ocean) got the name Sāgarā as it was formed later at the place where the 60,000 sons of King Sāgarā dug the earth in the course of their quest for the missing yājñīc horse. (See under Sāgarā).

SĀGARĀKA. A Kṣatriya king who lived at the place called Sāgarā. He participated in Yudhīṣṭhira’s Rājasūya. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18).

SĀGARODĀKA. Holy water of the sea. He who bathes in it will go to heaven in an aerial chariot. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 9).

SĀGNI (S). Pītrī, who are sons of Brahmā. Agnīśvātta, Barhiśadās, Anagnīs and Sāgni are the Pītrī born from Brahmā. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 20).

SAHĀ I. One of the hundred sons of Dhrītarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhīmasena. (Karna Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 8).

SAHĀ II. A very powerful Agni. (Vana Parva, Chapter 222).

SAHĀ. A Celestial woman. She also was with the apsārā women who were present at Indraloka to receive Arjuna. (Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 43, Verse 30).

SAHABHOJA. A bird in the line of the offsprings of Garuḍa. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 101, Verse 12).

SAHADEVA I. The fifth among the Pāṇḍavas. Facts about Sahadeva are related under the headings, Dharmaputra, Bhīma, Arjuna, Nakula and Pāṇḍavas.

Only those facts, which have not been so related are given hereunder.

1) A brief biographical sketch. Sahadeva was the son of Pāṇḍu by his wife Mādri. Two sons, Nakula and Sahadeva were born to Mādri by the Aśvinīdevas. Along with Yudhīṣṭhira, Bhīma and Arjuna, sons of Kuntī, Nakula and Sahadeva spent their childhood in the company of Sages at Śataśriga mountain. Pāṇḍu died and Mādri followed him in the funeral pyre. After that the Pāṇḍavas lived at Hastināpura under the care of Kuntī. When the ‘lac-palace’ was burnt down, they took themselves to the forest and ruled the kingdom with Indraprastha as capital. The Pāṇḍavas, who were defeated in the game of dice went again into the forest. Their going into the forest has been described as follows by Vidura.

Yudhīṣṭhira, covering his face with cloth and Bhīma stretching out his powerful hands moved into the forest. Arjuna followed them throwing up sand particles. Sahadeva went rubbing his face with earth, Nakula, the most handsome of men, followed them, his body smeared with dust. Pāñčāli, her face concealed in hair and weeping went behind the king. Sage Dhaumya with Kuśa grass in his hands, accompanied them chanting Vedic hymns. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 80).

Dṛṣṭarāṣṭra asked Vidura why the Pāṇḍavas assumed these different poses and attitudes and Vidura answered him thus: Yudhīṣṭhira covered his face to show that he would not retaliate in anger though he had lost the kingdom due to cheating. Bhīma stretched out his hands to show that he was unrivalled in manual power. Arjuna threw out sand to say that he would shoot his arrows into the enemy camp like particles of sand. Sahadeva rubbed earth on his face as he did not want anybody to distinguish his face. Nakula, the most handsome of men, smeared his face with dust so that, on the way, women should not desire him.

When the Pāṇḍavas returned after twelve years’ stay in exile in the forest and one year’s stay incognito Duryodhana refused to allot them even a single house, and war for eighteen days between the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas was fought in the field of Kurukṣetra. The Kauravas were wiped out. Yudhīṣṭhira became king and performed the Rajasūyayajna after which the Pāṇḍavas went out on the great journey and gave up their lives.

2) Other information about Sahadeva.

(1) He was dedicated to the service of elders. (Adi Parva, Chapter 1, Verse 114).

(2) He was exceptionally handsome. (Adi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 111).

(3) In the fight that followed Arjuna’s endeavour to capture king Drupada to be presented as Gurudaksīṇa (tuition fee to Drona, who trained the Pāṇḍavas in the use of arms) Nakula and Sahadeva protected the wheels of Arjuna’s chariot. (Adi Parva, Chapter 137, Verse 27).

(4) A son called Śrutasaṇa (Śrutakarmana) was born to him of Pāñčāli. (Adi Parva, Chapter 220, Verse 80).

(5) He had also married the daughter of King Duyutimān of Madra called Vijāyā and the couple had a son called Suhotra. (Adi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 80).

SAHASRAKĀ. A holy place of pilgrimage. This place is situated in Kurukṣetra. It is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 158, that those who bathe in this place will get the merits of giving thousand cows as gifts.

SAHASRAMUKHARĀVĀNA.

1) General. A Daitya King, who ruled Trilokapuri, a country thousands of miles away from India. Trilokapuri was an island at the centre of the seas. He was a terror to the whole world and possessed a thousand heads and two thousand hands.

2) Secured boon. This Rāvana once went to Satyaloka and performed the most intense tapas for many years. Yet, Brahmā did not appear and then he began cutting his heads one after the other and offering them in the fire. Nine hundred and ninety-nine of his heads were cut thus. When he was about to cut the last head also, Brahmā, fearing the end of the world, appeared and granted him the following three boons.

   (i) You will not die at the hands of anyone, but a woman.

   (ii) Brahmāstra, which would annihilate, will be at your disposal.

   (iii) You will also possess an aerial chariot for travels as you please.

Sahasramukha, who returned to his country with the boons became emperor of all Daityas and then conquered heaven, Pātāla, Kailāsa, Vaikuṇṭha and the eight regions of the world.

He then defeated Pātālārāvaṇa and wedded his only daughter Indumukhi. He got as a present a weapon called Kāṭhorakūṭhāra. He propagated in the world the customs and practices of heaven with the result that all the customs of the Devas were derogated. Good people felt harassed. In the rise of unrighteousness righteousness became helpless.

3) Curse. Once on his way to his father-in-law's house Sahasramukhāravāṇa raped a Vidyādhara woman, Caṇḍalākṣi, who was performing tapas of Lākṣmīdevi and Caṇḍalākṣi cursed him that Lākṣmīdevī would kill him.

4) Son. Vajrābū was Sahasramukha's son. He secured from Śiva Pāṭupaṭāstra and an armour impenetrable by anyone. Vajrābū captured Indra and Subrahmanya killed the former.

5) Death. Sahasramukha had an army-chief named Bāna and both of them together did incalculable harm to the three worlds. Śrī Rāma was King of Ayodhyā at the time, and Devas and sages complained to him about Sahasramukha and as soon as the complainants left Ayodhyā, Śugrīva and Viṣṇu came there. They told Rāma about the abduction by Sahasramukha's second son, Candra Gupta of Śugrīva's daughter and Viṣṇu's daughter-in-law. At once Śrī Rāma, along with Lākṣmaṇa, Śugrīva, Viṣṇu, Hanumān and a great army of monkeys reached Sahasramukha's capital city. Śrī Rāma sent word to him through Hanumān that Śugrīva's daughter and Viṣṇu's daughter-in-law should be returned, Indra should be released and that pardon should be begged for, for his errors. Angered at this message Sahasramukha deputed Bāna to fight Śrī Rāma. Bāna was killed in battle. (See under Bāna IV). Then ensued a fierce battle between Rāma and Sahasramukha, the latter aided by Candra Gupta. Aṅgada was about to be overpowered by Candra Gupta, and then the following celestial voice was heard: "Candra Gupta will not die as long as his wife Padmāvati is reciting Brahman mantra imparted by Brahmā." Then Viṣṇu sent Hanumān to the women's quarters and as a result of the latter using a Kūṭātantrayantra great confusion and quarrels broke out among the women-folk, and utilising the opportunity Aṅgada killed Candra Gupta. Sahasramukha fought Śrī Rāma single-handed. All tactics of Rāma proved to be of no use. Then he remembered Brahman's boon to Sahasramukha and Caṇḍalākṣi's curse upon him. Immediately Śrī Rāma brought down Sītā from Ayodhyā and the latter shot the Śaktika arrow at the throat of Sahasramukha and he was killed. (Kamba Ramāyaṇa, Uttarakāṇḍa).

SAHASRANĀMA (N). (Śahasra = thousand; nāma = name).

Hymns containing the thousand names of Viṣṇu, Śiva and Devi are generally known as Sahasranāma. The recitation of these names is considered to be annihilative of all sins. Sahasranāma of Viṣṇu is more popular.

SAHASRĀNIKA. A King of the lunar dynasty. (For details see under Udayana).
SAHASRAPADA (SAHASRAPT).
1) General. A maharsi, who was transformed into a serpent by the curse of Khagama, another maharsi. But a talk with King Ruru restored him to his former self. (For details see under Ruru, para 4).
2) Other information. Ruru desired to get some information about serpent yajña from Sahasrapat, who answered the former that he would hear the story of Āstika from brahmins and then disappeared. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 12, Verse 3).

SAHASRAVĀK (SADAHIŞUVĀK). One of the hundred sons of Dhartarāṣṭra. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 100).

SAHIŚU. One of the three sons of Pulaha Prajāpati by his wife Kṣamā, the other two being Kardama and Urvāryān. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 1, Chapter 10).

SAHODHĀ. A child conceived by a girl while she is unmarried but delivered after she is married. (See under Putra).

SAIHYA. A mountain on the plain of Lavanaśamudra (salt sea). Monkeys, in the course of their search for Śīta crossed this mountain, which is one of the sapta-kulaparvatas (seven great mountains) in India. Nāhuṣa once picnicked on this mountain along with apsārā women. (Udyoga Parva, Chapters 11 and 12; Vana Parva, Chapter 282; Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9).

SAIHYA I. An ancient King of India. He was the father of Śrījaya and a close friend of Sage Nārada and Sage Parvata. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 7).

SAIHYA II. King of the Śibi land. Mahābhārata gives the following pieces of information about him:—
(i) Govāsā, King of Śibi land was the father-in-law of Yudhiṣṭhira. (M.B. Ādi Parva, Chapter 95, Verse 76).
(ii) Sāi hya adorned Yudhiṣṭhira’s assembly. (M.B. Sahā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 25).
(iii) Sāi hya and the King of Kaśi had come to Upalavāya city with an “Aḵaṣuhi” (division of the army) to attend the marriage of Abhimanyu. (M.B. Vīraṇa Parva, Chapter 72, Verse 16).
(iv) Duryodhana admitted that Sāi hya was the greatest archer in the army of the Pāṇḍavas. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 5).
(v) During the Bhrāta Yuddha, Sāi hya and the King of Kaśi were standing to protect Dṛḍhdumma’s “Krauṇčavīyaḥ”. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 50, Verse 56).
(vi) This Sāi hya was the grandson of Uṣṇara. (M.B. Droṇa Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 64).

SAIHYA III. Name of a horse tied to Śrī Kuśāna’s chariot. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapters 20, 22, and 283).

SAIHYA IV. A Kṣatriya hero born in the Vṛṣni family. In Mahābhārata, Sahā Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 34, we read that he learnt Dhanurveda (science of archery) from Arjuna and shone in Yudhiṣṭhira’s assembly.

SAIHYA V. A Kṣatriya King who was defeated by Śrī Kuśāna. There is a reference to this Sāi hya in Mahābhārata, Dākṣiṇāyaṇa Pātha, Sahā Parva, Chapter 38.

SAIHYA VI. A warrior who fought against the Pāṇḍavas on the side of Kauravas. He fought from the “Sarvatobhadravyūḥa” formed by Bhīṣma. (M.B. Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 99, Verse 2).

SAIHYA VII. King of Sauvīra land. When Jarāsandha invaded Gomanta city, Sāi hya was put in charge of the defence of the western gate of that city, (Bhāgavata, 10th Skanda). His daughter Rāma married Akūra. (Matsya Purāṇa, Chapter 45, Verse 28).

SAIHYA I. One of the wives of King Sagara. Sagara had two wives named Sumanī and Kesīni. In Devī Bhāgavata, 9th Skanda we see that Sumanī had another name, “Vaidarbhi” and Kesīni had another name, “Sāi hya”. Prince Asamaṇiṣṭa was the son of Sāi hya.

SAIHYA II. Queen of Dvīnatsena, the King of Sālva. This Sāi hya was the mother of Śaṭyavān. (See under Śaṭyavān).

SAIHYA III. One of the wives of Śrī Kuśāna. When her husband Śrī Kuśāna renounced his body, this Sāi hya jumped into the fire and was burnt to death. (M.B. Mausala Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 73).

SAIKHĀVATYA. An ancient sage. Ambā who was forsaken by the King of Sālva went and mourned over her misfortune in Saikhāvata’s āśrama. This sage consoled her. (M.B. Udyoga Parva, Chapter 175, Verse 38).

SAILALBHĀ. A Saṅiṣṭhāna Viṣvadeva. (M.B. Anuśasana Parva, Chapter 91, Verse 32).

SAILAKAMПĪ. A warrior of Subrahmanyā. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 63).

SAILĀLAYA. A King of ancient time. He was the grandfather of Bhagadatta. After performing tapas in the tapovanā at Kurukṣetra he attained Indraloka. (M.B. Āramavāsika Parva, Chapter 20, Verse 10).

SAILODĀ. A river flowing between the two mountains, Meru and Mandara. Arjuna conquered and subdued the low class people who inhabited the valley of this river. A low-class people known as “Khasas” used to live on the banks of this river under the shade of the dense growth of bamboo trees. These low class people had brought presents of gold for Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājāsūya. (M.B. Sahā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 2).

SAILUṢA. A Gandharva. A class of Gandharvas is also known as “Sailūṣas”. Some references found in the Purāṇas concerning Sailūṣas are given below:—
(i) Śrī Rāma sent Bharata and completely destroyed the class of Gandharvas called Sailūṣas who were causing trouble on the shore of the eastern ocean. (Kamba Rāmāyaṇa, Uttarā Kāṇḍa).
(ii) During the reign of Śrī Rāma, as ordered by him, Bharata killed with his shower of arrows, the wicked Gandharva named Sailūṣa and his three crores of sons who lived on the banks of the river Sindhu. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 11).
(iii) Rāvaṇa’s brother, Vibhiṣāna had married Saramā the daughter of a Sailūṣa Gandharva. (Uttara Rāmāyaṇa).
(iv) The Gandharva named Sailūṣa serves Kubera and remains in Kubera’s assembly. (M.B. Śalya Parva, Chapter 10, Verse 26).

SAIHMHIKEYA (S). The Asuras (Demons) who were the sons of Sinhikā. Two sons named Hiranyākaśa and Hiranyakaśipu and a daughter named Sinhikā were born to Prajāpati Kaśyapa by his wife Diti. Sinhikā was given in marriage to Virapraciti. The sons of this couple were known by the name Saimhikeyas. Rāhu was the first of the Saimhikeyas. (Agni Purāṇa. Chapter 19). For further details see under Rāhu.

SAINDHAVA I. A disciple of the hermit Śaṇaka. (See under Guruparamparā).
SAINDHAVA II. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 25, that the inhabitants of the kingdom of Sindhu were called Sāindhavas.

SAINDHĀVĀRAṆYA. An ancient holy place of pilgrimage in Bhārata. This holy place is mentioned in Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, Chapter 89, Verse 15.

SAINDHĀVAYĀNA. One of Viśvāmitra’s sons, who were expounders of Vedas. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 51.)

SAINYANIRYĀṆA PARVA. A sub-section of Udyoga Parva in Mahābhārata. This subsection comprises Chapters 151 to 159 of Udyoga Parva.

SAIRANDHRI. The pseudonym assumed by Pāńcāli, when the Pāṇḍavas lived incognito in the palace of King Virāța. (See under Pāńcāli.)

SAIRĪṢAKA. A region in India, celebrated in the Purāṇas. Nakula, in the course of his triumphal march in the western regions, conquered this land also. (M.B. Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 6.)

SAĪṢAVA. A land famous in the Purāṇas. The Kṣatriya Kings of this country brought presents for Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājaśūya. (M.B. Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18.)

SAĪṢIRĀṆA. A Mahārṣi. The famous Kālayavana was his son, born to him by his wife Gopāli. SaīṣirāṆa was the priest of King Trigarta. Once the king ordered the sage to have sexual union with his wife Vṛkādevi to test his virility. (Harivarhaṇa, 1; 35; 12.)

SAĪṢIREYA. An acārya who was the disciple of Sākalya. “Saīṣi irya Saṅhīṭā”, a work produced by him is considered to be an authoritative treatise on the Sākalya branch of knowledge.

SAĪṢIRINDHRA. A country in ancient India. Mention is made about this country in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 57.

SAĪVAGĀṆA. Siva’s bow. It was made by Vīṣṇukarmā. He made a Vaiṣṇavacāpa and a Saɪvaçāpa for the purpose of a battle which was fought once between Viṣṇu and Siva. (See the 7th sub para, 7th para in the work Viṣṇu.)

Long ago when Śiva set out to break up Dakṣāyana, he was armed with this bow. After defeating the enemy and breaking up the yāga, Śiva cooled down and presented the bow to his devotee, the king of Videha. The king took the bow to his palace, kept it in his armoury and used to offer due worship to it. His descendants also continued to worship it. (Kambha Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla Kāṇḍa.)

SAĪVĀṆA. A town in India. There is a reference to it in Mahābhārata, Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 52, Verse 18.

SAKA. A particular sect of people or caste. The following information about the Śakas is gathered from the Mahābhārata.

(i) Śakas were born from the breast of Nandini, Vasīṣṭha’s cow. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 147, Verse 36.)

(ii) Bhīmasena, during his triumphal tour of the eastern regions subjugated the Śakas. (Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14.)

(iii) Nakula conquered them. (Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14.)

(iv) King of the Śakas participated in Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rajaśūya. (Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 32.)

(v) The Pāṇḍavas invited them to take part in the great war. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 15.)

(vi) They did along with Sudākṣiṇa, king of Kāmoja, service in Duryodhana’s army. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 19, Verse 21.)

(vii) Śrī Kṛṣṇa once conquered them. (Drona Parva, Chapter 119, Verse 45.)

(viii) Karna once defeated them and conquered their country. (Karna Parva, Chapter 8, Verse 18.)

(ix) Śakas who were originally Kṣatriyas were demoted as Śūdras as they incurred the displeasure and anger of brahmās. (Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 33, Verse 21.)

(x) As the Śakas and the Yavanas had helped the Hābhīya kings Paraśurāma, Sagara and Bhārata defeated them in war and drove them off from the country. (Bhāgavata, Navarna Skandha.)

ŚĀKA. A tree in the Śaka island. The island got the name from this tree. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11, Verse 23.)

ŚĀKADVIPA. One of the Saptadvipas (seven islands). Śaṅjaya once gave Dhṛtarāṣṭra a description of this island. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 11.) Jambūdvipa, Plākṣadvipa, Śāmalīdvipa, Kuśadvipa, Krauṇīcadvipa, Śākadvipa and Puṣkaraadvipa are the Saptadvipas. (Devi Bhāgavata, 8th Skandha.)

ŚĀKALA. A city made famous in the Purāṇas. Once it was the capital of the Madra kingdom. (Sahbhā Parva Chapter 32, Verse 14,) Modern scholars opine that the modern Sīvalokt was the old Śākala.

ŚĀKALADVIPA. An ancient kingdom referred to in the Purāṇas. Pratīvindhya, king of this kingdom was defeated by Arjuna. (Sahbhā Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 14.)

ŚĀKALYA. A mahārṣi in the lineage of gurus (preceptors). (See under Guruparamparā.) He systematised the Vedasāṅhīṭās. It was Bādarāyanakṛṣṇa, who became later famous as Vedaśya, who first arranged in systematic order the Vedasāṅhīṭās. Prominent scholars hold the view that Vyāsa lived between 1500-1500 B.C. The sāṅhīṭā text now popular systematised by Sākalya is called Sākalya śākha (Śākalya branch).

Śākalya is reported to have saved Kaśyapa mahārṣi once. When king Pārīśit was cursed that he would die by Taksaka’s poison Kaśyapa started for his court to save the king from the calamity. But, Taksaka met him on the way and sent him back laden with presents of gems, ornaments etc. People derided Kaśyapa, who on account of covetousness, retreated from the duty of saving the king’s life and non-cooperated with him in every way. In this contingency Kaśyapa sought the help of Śākalya, who advised the former to bathe in the sacred tirthas in the rivers Godāvari and Sarasvati. Kaśyapa did so and regained his old reputation.

ŚAKAMBARĪ. A sacred place dear to Devi. He, who fasts for three nights here, will derive the same benefits as of eating lettuce (śāka) for twelve years. (Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 13.)

ŚĀKATA. An asura. (See under Kṛṣṇa, Para 9, Sub Para 2.)

ŚĀKATĀLA. An intelligent minister. (For details see under Vararuci.)

ŚĀKATAṆAYANA. A famous grammarian. He lived before Yāsaka and Pāṇini. He is considered to be the author of the well-known text on grammar called ‘Uṇādāśṭrapāṭha’. He is referred to as the foremost among the grammarians in the aṣṭādhyāyī of Pāṇini. (Pāṇiniśūtra, 1, 4, 86 and 87.)
SĀKAVAKTRA. A warrior of Subrahmanya. (Mahābhārata, Śalya Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 78).

SĀKAYANYA. A māhārṣi. (For details see under Brhadāraha).

SĀKHA. According to one view Sākha was the younger brother of Subrahmanya while there are others who maintain that he was Subrahmanya’s son. In verse 37, Chapter 44 of Śalya Parva it is stated that Sākha was the son of the Vasu Anala and the younger brother of Subrahmanya and that he had two brothers called Vaiśākha and Naigameya. It is stated in Chapter 15, part 1 of Viṣṇu Purāṇa as follows:- “Āpa, Dhruva, Soma, Dharmā, Anila, Agni, Pratyuṣa and Prabhāsa are the aśavasus. Vaitaṇḍa, Śrama, Śanta, and Dhvani were sons of Āpa: Kāla, who annihilates the entire world is the son of Dhruva and Varccas is Soma’s son. Varccas gives people the vital glow. Dravīṇa, Hutaḥavya, Śīṣvara, Prāṇa and Varaṇa were the sons of Dhruva by Manoharā. Anila’s wife was Śīvā, and two sons, Manojava and Avijñatagati were born to the couple. Kumāra, son of Agni was born in Sarastamba and he had three brothers called Sākha, Viṣākha and Naigameya.”

The following story about the birth of Sākha is from Tarāṅga 6, Lāvāṇakalambaka of Kāthāśārīśaṅgara: Defeated in battle by Tārakāsa, Indra decided to have no more fight with him and retired to Mount Mahāmeru. Devas and māhārṣis sought asylum with Subrahmanya, who gave them protection. Indra came to know of it and fought with Subrahmanya feeling that the latter had captured his kingdom. Two sons, Sākha and Viṣākha were born from the face of Subrahmanya wounded by the Vajra-yudyah of Indra.

SĀKRA. A synonym of Indra. (See under Indra.)

SĀKRADEVA. A prince of Kālinga, who fought on the Kaurava side in the great war and got killed by Bhīma. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 54, Verse 24).

SĀKRAKUMĀRīKA. A sacred place from very olden days. Those who bathe there will attain heaven. (Vana Parva, Chapter 82, Verse 81).

SĀKRAVĀPI. A nāga, which lived in a forest near Gīrīvraja. The forest was near the āśrama of Gauțama. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 21, Verse 9).

SĀKRAVARTTA. A holy place. He who worships Devātās and the souls of his ancestors here will attain the holy world. (Vana Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 29).

SĀKRDGRAHA. A rural area in ancient India. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 9, Verse 66).

SĀKTA. Son of Manaśvī, the great-grandson of emperor Puru. Sauvīrī was his mother. He had two brothers called Sāṇīhanana and Vāgni, both of them great in warfare. (Ādī Parva, Chapter 94, Verse 7).

SĀKTI I. (1) General. Son of Vasiṣṭha by Arundhati. He was the first-born among the hundred sons of Vasiṣṭha. Kalmāsāpata, the Rākṣasas captured and ate Sākti and his pregnant wife Adrśyantī spent her days in great grief with Vasiṣṭha. Pārāśaramuni, father of Vyāsa, was Adrśyantī's son. (For details see under Adrśyantī).

2) Other information
(i) It was Śīva, who incarnated himself as the son of Vasiṣṭha.
(ii) Gopāyana, Bharadvājā, Āpastamba and Arpodara belong to the line of disciples of Sākti. (Vāmana Purāṇa, Chapter 6).

SĀKTI II. The weapon of Subrahmanya is called Sākti, and it was made by Viśvakarman. Viśvakarman once grilled Śūrya (sun) on his machine and reduced his glow. The glow thus released by Viśvakarman fell on the earth and Viśvakarman made with that glow the cakra (disc) of Viṣṇu, the triśūla (trident) of Śiva the Puspaka, aerial chariot of Kubera and the Sākti of Subrahmanya. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa, Part 3, Chapter 2).

SĀKTI III. The sound ‘Ś’ means welfare or prosperity and ‘kti’ prowess. Therefore Sākti means she, who is the embodiment of prosperity and prowess or she, who grants prosperity and prowess. The definition of ‘Bhagavati’ is, she who combines in herself knowledge, affluence, wealth, reputation, power and the female organ. Therefore the word ‘Sākti’ may be taken to mean Bhagavati and Pārvatī, and what are termed as Bhagavati, Sākti, Devi, Ambikā, Pārvatī etc. are the manifestations of Sākti, Śiva’s spouse. This Sākti exists fractionally in all Devas. When, once upon a time the Aśuras war broke out the Sāktis of Devas like Bhramā emerged to help Cāḍikā. The vehicle, ornaments, weapon etc. of each Deva, his Devi also possessed. The Sāktis (Devis) of the Devas appeared in the following manner. Brahmāṇī, wife of Brahmā, rode on the swan wearing beads around her neck and holding the water-vessel in her hands. She was followed by Vaiṣṇavi Viṣṇu’s Sākti on Garuḍa wearing yellow clothes and with the conch, disc, lotus etc. in her hands. Śāṇikā Śiva’s Sākti rode on the ox with the crescent moon and serpents as ornaments and holding in her hands the Śūla. ‘Kamārī’, Subrahmanya’s Sākti rode on Airāvata with Śūla in hands. The Sākti called ‘Vārāhi’ in the form of a great boar rode carrying a corpse. Nārasiṁha Sākti took the form of narasiṁha (half man and half lion). Yāmāya, Yama’s Sākti, rode on buffalo holding in her hands a long stick. Sāktis called Kauberī and Vāruṇī took their respective forms and in this manner all the Sāktis came to the help of Devi. This sight pleased not only the Devas, but the mother of the universe also. Along with them incarnated on earth Śarākara, who gives śāṁ (happiness) to the world and blessed Cāḍikā on the battle-field (Devi Bhāgavata, 5th and 9th Skandhas).

SĀKTIBHADRA. A dramatist in Sanskrit, who lived in the seventh century A.D. He belonged to Chengannur in the Kerala State. He was a disciple of Saṅkarācārya. The Dramatic composition ‘Ācaryacāḍamāni’ is his work.

Sāktibhadra, after writing his drama, once read it out to Saṅkarācārya. As the ācārya was observing silence that day, he made no comments about the drama. Disappointed at this silence of his Guru, the dramatist burnt his work to ashes in fire. When his observance of silence was over, the Guru asked his disciple for the drama. When told about the burning of the drama the ācārya repeated from memory the whole drama. The above legend is widely prevalent in Kerala.

SĀKUNA (OMENS).

1) General. In ancient times people in all countries used to consider Śakunas to be harbingers of good or evil things. Today also many people believe in omens. In India
Sakuna had developed as a science even in olden days. A general description about omens, good and bad, according to the Indian concept, is given below.

Mixed medicines, black grains, cotton, grass, dried cow-dung, charcoal, molasses, one whose head is shaven clean or whose body is smeared with oil or who is naked; flesh-eater; iron, dirt, skin, hair of the head, insane person, eunuch, prison, guard; women, who are either carrying or are widows; oil cake, paddy husk, ashes, skull, bone, broken vessel etc. are evil omens. Broken, fierce or murmuring instrumental music also is a bad omen.

It is a good omen to hear the voice of beckoning (come) in the front of the traveller; it is not good if the voice is heard from behind. It is good if the voice of farewell (go) is heard from behind, but is bad to be heard in the front. Disapproving or prohibitive words like "Where are you going, stop, don't go", "what is to be done by going there?" etc. will cause death. It is a bad omen to see carnivorous birds perched on the top of flag-staff etc. For vehicles to bump, weapons to break and head to get wounded by dashing against doors etc. as also for umbrella or clothes to fall down are ill omens. Praising or worshipping Viṣṇu will do away with the inauspicious results of ill omens. But, if evil omens are seen continuously the traveller should return home.

White flowers are good omens. Full pots are the best of omens. Flesh, fish, sound from afar, old man, solitary man, cow, goat, ox, horse, elephant, devas, burning fire, Đūrva grass, fresh cow-dung, prostitute, gold, silver, gems, Oris root, mustard, medicinal herbs rooted out of soil, Bengal gram, weapon, sword, stool, royal symbols, dead body being carried without lamentation, fruits, ghee, curdled milk, milk, aksata, mirror, honey, conch, sugarcane, auspicious words, music by devotees, loud thunder and lightning are auspicious omens.

2) Two kinds of omens. Omens are divided into two varieties, dipta (glowing) and śānta (quiescent, mild). Glowing omens bring about auspicious results and the other inauspicious results. There are six ways or elements, which make omens diptam, i.e. velā (time), dik (region), deśa (place), Karāṇa (action), rūta (cry) and jāti (kind). The power or effect of dipta increases in ascending order.

To see creatures, which move about during day time as moving about during night and vice-versa is velādīpta. In the case of stars, lagnas (the dominant zodiac) and planets, those which are virulent are considered to be diptas. With regard to stars and lagnas, those which the Sun enters into are dvāmita, those where the Sun is already present are jvalita and those from which the Sun has left are Amārini. These three are diptas and the rest śāntas. (This is called velādīpta).

When dik (region) is dipta it is called digdīpta.

To see forest animals in village and village animals in forest is digdīpta. To see good brahmans at inauspicious places is deś-adīpta.

To see some one doing work not ordained to his caste is karana-dīpta. To hear different horrible voices is rūtadīpta.

To see purely flesh-eating animals is jāti-dīpta. If all the characteristics of dipta do not synchronise but differ from one another it is called śānta and if the characteristics of dipta and śānta are mixed up it is called mīśra.

3) Birds, animals etc. If the cāg bird (wild crow) makes sound when the king gets out of the palace, he will meet with dishonour. If the sound is heard on the left side, there will be quarrel, but food will be served. If the bird is sighted on the right side at the start of the journey, it is a good omen. If the peacock makes different sounds, threats from thieves will result. If a deer is seen in front of the king going out on a journey, death will happen to him. To see the monkey-bear, rat, tiger, lion, cat and donkey coming in the opposite direction also will bring about death. Donkey braying in awkward notes is also inauspicious. To see kapiṇjala bird on the left side is an excellent omen; on the right side also it is not bad. But, behind the person, it is a bad omen. Tītirī bird also on the rear is not good.

It is always a good omen if the deer, boar and spotted deer cross the path from the left to the right side; the opposite of it is bad omen. It is a favourable omen if the ox, horse, jackal, tiger, lion, cat and donkey pass from the right to the left side. It is auspicious to see the females of the jackal etc. on the right side and the males on the left. To hear the serpent, hare, boar and wild lizard named is good, but to see them is not so. Contrary to this is the effect to see the monkey, ox etc. The result of the important and powerful omens witnessed at the start of the journey will be experienced the very same day. The omen of the intoxicated, those craving for food, children, people quarrelling and those who stand away from the limits of the road is effectless. To hear the jackal howl once, twice, thrice or four times is a good omen, but to hear it five or six times is bad. The seventh time is good.

If heard for more than the seventh time it will have no effect. Dipta omen facing the Sun will horripilate men, cause fear in the case of vehicles and is to be greatly feared. If sāṅgīva (lotus, deer, elephant, peacock, cuckoo, lion, horse etc.) is met as the first thing in an auspicious place its good effect will last for one year, and if these are met at the inauspicious place, the result will be bad. Everybody should see sāṅgīva at some auspicious place every dawn.

If the crown is found crowing in fear on the left side of camps put up for the army of the King, the head of the army will have to face great threats. If the crow, perches on and pecks on the shadow, vehicle, slippers, umbrella, clothes etc. the owner of those things will die. If they are respected by the crown, honour will accrue to their owner. If the crow flies about the entrance of the house it means that he, who had left the house will return. If the crows bring and scatter red coloured and baked things in the courtyard, the owner of the house will meet with imprisonment. If the crow carries to a house something yellow in colour, gold or silver, the owner of the house will get such things. Whatever thing the crow carries away from the house, such things therein will be destroyed. If the crow vomits raw flesh in the rear of the house, the owner of it will come into possession of wealth; if soil is deposited thus, land will be acquired. If gem is deposited, extensive lands will come to the owner of the house. If the crow flies in the same direction as the one chosen by the traveller, prosperity and success will result to him and if it flies in the opposite direction not only will the traveller not achieve his object but, he will also meet with danger. If the crows come crowing against one starting on a journey, it will be hindered.

To see the crow on the left side is a good omen. If it is seen on the right side, the journey will not end in success. It is very good if the crow flies in the same direction as the traveller on his left side, if on the right side the result will be of medium nature. If it flies in the opposite direction on the left side the traveller will face hindrance. If the crow flies into the house when one is about to start on the journey, it means the journey may be begun. The crow which looks at the sun with one eye and perched on one leg is surely indicative of fear for the traveller. If it is in the hollow of a tree great calamities will happen. To dream of crow with its mouth full of excretion is indicative of all-round success.

If the dog enters and barks in the house the result will be sure death of the owner of the house. But, if the dog smells on the left side of the man it is good, and if it smells on the right side, it is bad. If the dogs come against the person about to start on a journey, it will cause hindrance to him. If the dog stands blocking his path there will be threat from thieves. If it comes facing him with a piece of bone in its mouth, he will fail to achieve the object of his travel; if it comes biting a cord, the same will be the result. It is auspicious to see dog, which carries a slipper in its mouth or the mouth of which is filled with flesh. Fear will overtake him in front of whom the dog urinates and goes away. But if not a bitch and if, after urination, it goes to an auspicious place, to the shade of an auspicious tree or towards an auspicious thing, then it is a good omen. The same considerations are valid in the case of the jackal etc.

If cows cry without cause or reason, it indicates ruin to the master. If the cry is in an awkward tone, death will result. If the ox murmurs during night, it is good for the master. Ox tied to a cord also is good omen. If cows are found to treat their calves without love, it spells ruin for pregnant women. It is a good omen to see cows which have got wet and whose horns are smeared with earth. These considerations apply to buffaloes as well.

If elephants indulge in the sexual act in villages, it augurs ill to the villages. If the she-elephant delivers or gets mad in the country, i.e. not in the forest, it spells ruin to king. Ruin to the king will be the result if the elephant objects to his mounting it or runs back home or if the mad elephant is found without madness. It is an auspicious omen if the elephant places its right foot on the left foot of it and also if it holds its tusk with its trunk.

Sakuni I. A serpent born in the Dhrta-rāṣṭra dynasty.
It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña conducted by Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 16).

Sakuni II. An asura who was the son of Hiranyaśakya and brother of Śambara, Trimūrdhā, Śāṇku and Ārya. (Agni Purāṇa, Chapter 19).

Sakuni III. A king born in the dynasty of Bharata, son of Dusyanta. Sakuni was Bhimaratha’s son and father of Urudhi. (Baḥgavata, 9th Skandha).

Sakuni IV. A son of Ikṣvāku. (For details see under Viśvakarmā, Para 2).

Sakuni V. A māhārṣi to whom were born nine sons called Dhrvua, Śāli, Budha, Tāra, Jyotisāmān, Nirmohā, Jitakāmā, Dhyānākṣaṇa, and Gupaḍhika. The first five of them led householders’ life while the last four took to Sannyāsa even as children. (Padma Purāṇa Ādikhaṇḍa, Chapter 31).

Sakuni VI. The notorious uncle of Duryodhana. Son of King Subala of Gandhāra and brother of Gandhāri. Sakuni, staying at Hastināpura, pulled the strings for all the evil actions of Duryodhana. It was Sakuni’s hands, which worked in the background in driving the Pāṇḍavas out of the kingdom and in denuding Pāṇcālī of her clothes. It was also his evil tactics, which tore asunder all chances of conciliation with the Pāṇḍavas on their return from the forest and thus led to the great war that lasted for eighteen days. At last he was killed by Sahadeva during the war. (Śāla Parva, Chapter 28, Verse 61).

A resume of the part played by Sakuni in the Bhārata story is given below:
1. It was with his help that Duryodhana defeated Dharmaputra in the foul game of dice. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 50).
2. He was born, due to the anger of the Devas, to destroy righteousness. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 63, Verse 11).
3. He was Dvāpara re-born. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 78).
4. It was he who took the initiative in marrying Gandhāri to Dhṛtarāṣṭra. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 109, Verse 15).
5. He was present at the wedding of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 2).
6. He once advised Duryodhana to annihilate the Pāṇḍavas, root and branch. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 199).
7. He was present at the Rāṣṭrā yajña performed by Yuddhiṣṭhira. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 66).
8. Even after the yajña was over and everyone had departed, he remained there for some time more with Duryodhana. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 68).
9. It was he who first discussed with Dhṛtarāṣṭra the question of inviting Dharmaputra for a game of dice so that the wealth of the Pāṇḍavas might be extracted from them. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 49).
10. By foul play he defeated Dharmaputra in the game of dice. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 60, Verse 61).
11. It was he who cooperated with Duryodhana to invite Dharmaputra again for a game of dice fixing the bets and in defeating him in the game. (Śabha Parva, Chapter 76, Verse 9).
12. He once prophesied that the Pāṇḍavas would not return after their life in forest. (Vana Parva, Chapter 7, Verse 7).
13. While the Pāṇḍavas were living in the Dvaita forest Sakuni suggested the need for leading a procession to them. (Vana Parva, Chapter 238, Verse 21).
14. Sakuni and Duryodhana led the procession. In the forest he got wounded in fighting with the Gandharvas and he returned home. (Vana Parva, Chapter 241, Verse 17).
15. Afterwards he once advised Duryodhana to restore the kingdom to the Pāṇḍavas. (Vana Parva, Chapter 251, Verse 1).
16. He too participated in the great war and on the first day of the war he fought a duel with Pratīvindhyā. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 45, Verse 63).
17. In the battle that followed, Trāvāṇ killed five brothers of Sakuni. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 90, Verse 25).
(18) He then fought with Yudhiṣṭhīra, Nakula and Sahadeva and got defeated. (Bhīṣma Parva, Chapter 105, Verse 8).
(19) He fought with Sahadeva. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 14, Verse 22).
(20) Then Sakuni resorted to certain magical tricks. Arjuna successfully faced the tricks and Sakuni ran away from the battlefield. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 30, Verse 15).
(21) He fought with Abhimanyu. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 37, Verse 5).
(22) He fought with Nakula and Sahadeva. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 96, Verse 21).
(23) He fought with Sātyaki. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 120, Verse 11).
(24) Bhīmasena killed the seven mahārathis and five brothers of Sakuni. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 157, Verse 22).
(25) Nakula defeated Sakuni. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 269, Verse 16).
(26) He attacked the Pāṇḍava army at the instance of Duryodhana. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 170, Verse 66).
(27) Arjuna defeated Sakuni. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 161, Verse 25).
(28) On the death of Drōṇacārya Sakuni ran away from the battlefield in great fear. (Drōṇa Parva, Chapter 193, Verse 9).
(29) In the fight that followed he defeated Śrutasena. (Karna Parva, Chapter 25, Verse 40).
(30) Sakuni was defeated in the fighting with Śātyaki. (Karna Parva, Chapter 61, Verse 48).
(31) In the fight with Bhīma he fell down. (Karna Parva, Chapter 77, Verse 66).
(32) In the next fight he killed the Kalinda prince. (Karna Parva, Chapter 85, Verse 7).
(33) Cavalry of the Pāṇḍavas attacked Sakuni and he got wounded. (Salya Parva, Chapter 23, Verse 41).
(34) In the battle that followed Sahadeva killed Sakuni. (Salya Parva, Chapter 28, Verse 61).
(35) After the war was over Vyāsa summoned the souls of those killed in the war to the surface of Gaṅgā and Sakuni’s soul was present among them. (Āśrama-vāsika Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 9).
(36) After his death he joined Dvāpara. (Svargarohaṇa Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 21).
(37) Synonyms of Sakuni used in Mahābhārata: Gāndhārapati, Gāndhārārāja, Gāndhārājasaputra, Gāndhārājasutakā, Kātava, Parvatiya, Saubala, Sauba-lakā, Saubaleya, Subalaśa and Subalaputra.

SĀKUNI. A mahārṣi, who lived in Madhu forest. Of the nine sons of Sakuni, Dhrūva, Śīla, Budha and Tāra were house-holders and agnihotris (those who sacrificed offerings in fire). (Padma Purāṇa, Svarag-Khaṇḍa 81).

SĀKUNIGRAHA. Vinātā, in her fierce attitude or aspect is Sakunigraha, Brahmans call it Skandāpasmāra also. (Vana Parva, Chapter 280, Verse 26).

SĀKUNIKĀ. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salā Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 15).

SĀKUNTA. A son of Visvāmitra. He was a Vedāntin. (M.B. Anuśāsana Parva, Chapter 4, Verse 50).

SĀKUNTALĀ. Foster-daughter of sage Kaṇva.

1) Birth. Sakuntalā was a daughter born to Visvāmitra of the Apsarā woman called Menakā. Visvāmitra was engaged in intense tapas on the banks of river Mālinī in the Himālayas. Indra deputed Menakā to break the mahārṣi’s tapas. She enticed him away from his tapas and got pregnant by him. But she forsook the child on the banks of Mālinī and returned to Devaloka.

2) Childhood. Birds gathered round the forsaken orphan-child. While Sakuntas i.e. birds were petting the child Kaṇva came that way, saw the child and took it with him to the āśrama. As sakuntas had petted it, the child was named Sākuntalā.

3) As queen. King Dusyanta of the lunar dynasty married Sākuntalā and to the couple was born the famous Bharata. This is the original story about Sākuntalā’s married life. All the Indian languages contain two different versions of Sākuntalā’s life. One version is that related in Vyāsa’s Bhārata and the second is that contained in Kālidāsa’s Sākuntala. Many scholars opine that in the matter of the Sākuntalā episode Kālidāsa has gone a step further and for the better, and therefore both the versions of the story are to be carefully studied by us.

(i) Vyāsa’s Sākuntalā. Sākuntalā, now grown up as a maiden, was alone in the āśrama when King Dusyanta, out in the forest on a hunting expedition, came there. In the absence of her foster-father Kaṇva, Sākuntalā welcomed the King. They fell in love with each other and the King married Sākuntalā according to the Gandharva way of marriage and lived with her for a few days. Sākuntalā became pregnant. The King returned to his palace.

Kanya returned to the āśrama and he was pleased that what had been destined to take place had happened.

In due course of time Sākuntalā delivered a boy, who was named Sarvadamanas. When the child was grown up, Kaṇva sent his mother along with him to Dusyantā’s palace. The King did not recognise them, but a celestial voice convinced him that the child was his own son. The King heartily welcomed his wife and son and Sākuntalā lived in the palace as his honoured wife.

(ii) Kālidāsa’s Sākuntalā. Kaṇva brought up Sākuntalā born to Visvāmitra of Menakā in his āśrama and she had two companions called Anasūyā and Priyānandā. All the three grew up and became maidens.

King Dusyanta, who went out hunting in the forest followed a deer to Kaṇva’s āśrama where he saw Sākuntalā watering the garden with her companions. Kaṇva was then away at Cakrāṭīrtha. Dusyanta, who fell in love with Sākuntalā, married her according to the Gandharvas rules and lived with her in the āśrama for a few days. Meanwhile Sākuntalā became pregnant, and emissaries from the palace came and the King returned with them. He left the āśrama after promising Sākuntalā that he would soon return to her. He gave her his signet ring.

Sad over the separation from Dusyanta and immersed in thought about him, Sākuntalā was sitting there in the āśrama when Durvīṣas came there. She did not see the mahārṣi nor welcome him respectfully. He got angry at this and cursed her that she be forgotten by him about whom she was so intensely thinking. Sakuntalā did not hear the curse either, but her companions who heard it begged pardon of the muni on behalf of Sākuntalā and prayed for absolution from the curse. Then he said that if Sākuntalā showed the King any sign about their relationship the King would remember her. Her companions did not tell Sakuntalā about the

Days and months passed by, yet Duṣyanta did not return and Kaṇva sent Śakuntalā, in whom signs of pregnancy had become prominent, to the palace of the King in the company of Gautami and Śāṅgīgarva. Anāśīyā reminded Śakuntalā to take particular care of the signet ring. On their way to the palace Śakuntalā and others bathed in the Somavārātrīthā. and nobody noticed Śakuntalā losing from her finger the ring in the tirthā. They reached the King's palace. None noticed them. Duṣyanta did not remember having even seen her. The signet ring was missing. After leaving Śakuntalā at the palace her companions returned to the āśrama. Menākā, whose heart melted at the pathetic wailings of Śakuntalā led her to Kaṭyāyaṇa's āśrama, left her there and returned to Devaloka.

The signet ring lost by Śakuntalā was swallowed by a fish, which was netted by a fisherman, who went about the streets to sell the ring extracted from inside the fish. Servants of the King took the fisherman captive. At the sight of the ring thoughts about the past dawned on the King and he remembered all about Śakuntalā. His days became sad pondering over separation from Śakuntalā.

Śakuntalā delivered a boy at the āśrama of Kaṭyāyaṇa. The child was named Sarvadamanā and he grew up as a courageous boy.

On his return from the devāsura war, Duṣyanta entered Kaṭyāyaṇa's āśrama where he saw Sarvadamanā counting the teeth of a lion he had captured. Having heard details about him from the boy the King went inside the āśrama and saw Kaṭyāyaṇa and Śakuntalā. He returned with Śakuntalā and the boy to the palace with Kaṭyāyaṇa's blessings. It was this boy Sarvadamanā, who afterwards became Bharata, the famous emperor of India.

Śāla I. One of the three pugilists deputed by Karṇa to attack Krishna at Mathurā, the other two being Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika. Krishna kicked Šāla to death. (Bhāgavata, 10th Skandha).

Śāla II. A serpent born in Vāsuki's dynasty and burnt to death at the serpent yaṣña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 5).

Śāla III. One of the hundred sons of Dhrītarāṣṭra. He was killed in the great war by Bhīma. (Karna Parva, Chapter 84, Verse 3).

Śāla IV. Son of Somadatta, a King born in the Kuru dynasty. He had a brother called Bhūriśravas.

1) Šāla was present at the wedding of Draupadi. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 185, Verse 15).

2) He was present at Yudhīṣṭhīra's Rājasūya yajña. (Sabhā Parva, Chapter 34, Verse 8).

3) He was a fierce warrior in Duryodhanā's army. (Udyoga Parva, Chapter 55, Verse 68).

4) He fought from the southern wing of the great vyuha set up by Bhīma. (Bhīma Parva, Chapter 51, Verse 57).

5) He fought with Abhimanyu in the great war. (Drona Parva, Chapter 37).

6) He was killed by Śrutavarman in the battlefield of Kuruksetra. (Drona Parva, Chapter 108, Verse 10).

7) He was one among the valiant souls brought to the surface of the Ganga by Vyāsa (Āramavāsika Parva, Chapter 32, Verse 10).

8) After death he became one with the Viśādevas. (Svargarohanā Parva, Chapter 5, Verse 16).

Śāla V. Son of King Parikṣit of the Ikṣvāku dynasty. Susobhanā, daughter of the Mandāka King was his mother. He had two brothers called Dala and Bala. Śala did not return some horses, which he had taken as loan from Viśādeva mahārṣī. Angered at this the mahārṣi created some Rākṣasas, who killed Śala. (Vana Parva, Chapter 192).

Śālabha I. An asura, son of Kaṣyapa-prapājapati by his wife Danu. He was born in his next life as Prahliāda, the Bālhika King. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 67, Verse 30).

Śālabha II. A warrior, who fought against the Kauravas on the Pāṇḍava side. He was killed by Kaṇa. (Karna Parva, Chapter 56, Verse 49).

Śālabhā. Wife of Atrimaharṣi. (Brahmanda Purāṇa, 3; 8; 74-78).

Śālabhī. A female attendant of Subrahmanya. (Salya Parva, Chapter 46, Verse 26).

Śālagrāma. A stone emblem of Viṣṇu.

1) Origin of the name. Śālagrāma is the kind of ammonite, used for making the image of Viṣṇu. Mahāviṣṇu is known by the name Śālagrāma also. This name originated from the name Śālagrāma which is the name of the place from where the river Gaṇḍaki, which flows through Nepal, starts. This Śālagrāma is considered to be a holy place. Mahāviṣṇu and other gods always dwell in this place. Śālagrāma is the name of Viṣṇu who dwells in Śālagrāma. (M.B. Vana Parva, Chapter 84, Stanzas 123 to 125).

2) The importance of Śālagrāma. The place Śālagrāma is at the origin of river Gaṇḍaki. There are various kinds of stone figures which are called Śālagrāmas. These Śālagrāmas themselves have originated from portions of Viṣṇu. That is why these stones are used for making images of Viṣṇu. There is a story in the Devī Bhāgavata, Skandha 9, stating that the derivation of these stones is from a portion of Viṣṇu.

During the early days, Sarvasvatī, Laksāni and Gaṇḍā were wives of Mahāviṣṇu. One day there arose a family quarrel among them. (See under Tulasi). As a result of this quarrel, the Devis cursed each other. Sarvasvatī cursed Laksāni and changed her to holy basil plant (Tulasi) on the earth. When Laksāni was about to depart as Tulasi, Mahāviṣṇu blessed her thus, "Look! Laksāni! you will live in the world as a holy basil and when the curse has been completed you will come back to me. On that day, a river named Gaṇḍaki, will start from your body which will be in the shape of the holy basil plant. (It is also said that the river Gaṇḍaki has taken birth from the sweat of Śiva and Viṣṇu. Refer to the word Gaṇḍakt). On the bank of that river, I will remain as a stone image. There will be so many worms with strong tusks and teeth, which will pierce the stone into the shape of Sudarśana cakra (the weapon of Viṣṇu) and will create numberless Śālagrāmas. The Śālagrāmas thus made, will be of various sizes and shapes.

3) Different classes of Śālagrāmas. Mention is made in the Purāṇas about nineteen classes of Śālagrāmas. They are given below:
(i) Lakṣmiṇārya. With one hole, four cakras (wheels) and Vanamāla (a line like the garland) and of the colour of clouds.
(ii) Lakṣmiṣaṇḍana. This is the same as Lakṣmiṇārya, with the difference that there will be no Vanamāla.
(iii) Raṇgūṇa. With two holes and four wheels and mark of the hoof of a calf. This also will have no Vanamāla.
(iv) Vāmana. With two very small wheels and the colour of the cloud. This too will have no Vanamāla.
(v) Śrīdhara. This is the same as Vāmana with the exception that it will be having Vanamāla. The house in which this is placed will have a prosperity and well being of its own.
(vi) Dāmodara. Will be large and round with two cakras (wheels) and with no Vanamāla.
(vii) Raṇarāma. Neither too large nor too small, but of medium size and round, with two wheels and the marks of child’s kick, bow and quiver.
(viii) Raṭjārājēswara. Of the size of Raṇarāma with seven cakras, (wheels), ornamented with the mark of umbrella. This will earn for the possessor kingly wealth.
(ix) Ananta. Somewhat thick with fourteen wheels, and as black as a cloud. This Sālagrāma will give men the four Puruṣārthas (objects of life) ‘Dharmārtha-kānamokṣa’ (Duty, wealth, desire and salvation).
(x) Madhusūdana. A sālagrāma in the shape of a wheel, with two wheels, and impression of cow’s hoof, having the shade of cloud, of ordinary size. This will be very bright.
(xi) Sudarśana. Sudarśana will have only one cakra (wheel).
(xii) Gaḍāḍhara. This also will have only one wheel which will not be bright.
(xiii) Hayagrīva. This will have two wheels and the face of a horse.
(xiv) Nārāyaṇa. With a very wide mouth, two wheels, and awful shape. This Sālagrāma will cause instant self-renunciation.
(xv) Lakṣmiṇaraśīthaka. This also will be having a wide mouth and two wheels. Besides these, there will be the Vanamāla also. This will make house-holders cosy and comfortable.
(xvi) Vāsudeva. The Sālagrāma with two wheels at the region of the hole and with round shape having vividness and brightness, is Vāsudeva. This will grant all desires.
(xvii) Pradyumna. This will have only a minute wheel. The colour will be that of clouds. But on the outer side, there will be a hole in the inside of which there will be a number of cuts or dents. This will give house-holders comfort always.
(xviii) Saṅkarṣaṇa. In the Saṅkarṣaṇa two wheels will be joined face to face. The fore-part will be thinner than the hind-part. This also will do good to house-holders.
(xix) Aniruddha. The colour of this is yellow. This will be quite round and bright. This also will give comfort to the house-holder. (Devi Bhāgavata, Skandha 9; Agni Purṇa, Chapter 46).
4). The greatness of Sālagrāma. Of these, the stores with cakras (the weapon Discus), are Bhagavān Viṣṇu in reality. Those who worship this stone with mark of cakra, need not have to take another birth. He who habitually worships Sālagrāma, should avoid arrogance and should be charitable. He who worships Sālagrāma with the mark of wheel should not covet others’ wealth and women. The cakra from Dvārakā and the stone from Gaṇḍakī will bring atonement in a moment for sins incurred in a hundred births. Even if one has incurred thousands of sins, one will get remission for all of them by drinking the water of Sālagrāma. Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, Vaiṣya and Śūdra will attain heaven if they become house-holders according to Vedic convention and worship Sālagrāma. On no account should women worship Sālagrāma. If by ignorance, a woman, whether she is good-natured or of a higher status, happens to touch Sālagrāma, all her merits earned by good deeds will be lost and she will go to hell. Brahmīn sages say that women throwing flowers as oblation on Sālagrāma, commit the greatest sin. If a woman touches a Sālagrāma, the offering of Sandal-wood will be like poisoned rice, flowers like diamond, and meals presented to god before being eaten by the servants in the temple, will be like Kāla-kūta (the poison of Vāsuki), to Bhagavān Viṣṇu. If a woman touches Sālagrāma, she will have to remain in hell for the duration of fourteen Indras. Even the sin of Brahmahatyā (killing a brahmin) will be remitted by drinking the water of Sālagrāma and he will attain heaven. Basil (tulasi) sandalwood, water, conch tinkling bell, wheel, stone, copper pot, and name of Viṣṇu comprise ‘Padāṁṛta’ (the celestial nectar of words) which is said to have the power of remitting sins. The merits obtained by bathing in all the tirthas and the performing of all the yāgas (sacrifices) dwell in each drop of water of Sālagrāma.
(Padmā Purṇa, Pāṭāla Khaṇḍa, Chapter 20).
SALAKA. Wife of mahaṛṣi Dhanañjaya, who belonged to Vasīṭha gotra. (For details see under Dhanañjaya V).
SALAKARA. A naga born in Takṣaka’s dynasty. It was burnt to death at the serpent yajña of Janamejaya. (Ādi Parva, Chapter 57, Verse 9).
SALAKAṬAṆKAṬA (SALAKAṬAṆKAṬ) I A synonym for Alambaṇa. (See under Alambaṇa).
SALAKAṬAṆKAṬA II. A giantess who was the daughter of Sandhyā. The giant Vidutkeśa married this giantess Sālakaṭaṅkaṭa. A son named Sukuṣa was born to them. (See under Vidutkeśa).
SALAKAṬAṆKAṬI. Another name of the giantess Ḥīḍimba. (See under Ḥīḍimba).
SALANKĀYANA. A son of Viśvāmitra. He was an expounder of the Vedas. Mention is made in Mahābhārata, Anuṣāsana Parva, Chapter 4, about this Śālankāyana.
SALI. A mahaṛṣi in the lineage of Gurus (preceptors). See under Guruparamarā.
